The eighth Sunday "Pop" at Music Hall, last evening, attracted an audience that by its immense numbers left not a shadow of doubt as to the popularity of the artists engaged for the occasion, these being Sig. Italo Campanini, the tenor; Sig. C. Del Puente, the barytone; Miss Ida Klein, soprano; Mr. Leo Schulz, violoncello soloist; Mr. Leon Keach, pianist, and the Boston Orchestral Club. The honors of the evening were equally shared by Sig. Campanini and Sig. Del Puente, and both these talented artists put forward their best efforts on this occasion. The renewed vigor, purity and musical quality of Sig. Campanini's voice were again as apparent as when he sang here a few weeks ago, and he gave his most delightful vocal work in Ponchielli's aria "Cielo e Mar" from "Gioconda," and the song by Tosti, "Vorrei Morire," both of which created the greatest enthusiasm among the audience by reason of the merits of their interpretation by this consummate artist. Recall after recall followed each selection, and necessitated additional efforts by the singer, who should be spared such unreasonable demands upon his voice.

Sig. Del Puente had quite as enthusiastic a reception, and the friendly rivalry between the two men singers resulted most happily for the audience. Sig. Del Puente chose as his selections the aria "Di Provenza" and a couple of his own song compositions, "From Flower to Flower" and "Why?" thus giving himself an opportunity of being heard to the best possible advantage. The "Traviata" aria seldom has a better hearing than when it is sung by this accomplished singer, and he woke the audience to a grand ovation in his honor at the close. The tuneful songs from his own portfolio are good evidences of Sig. Del Puente's musical nature, and well worthy the efforts of even so good an artist as he is. He was gracious as usual in responding to the applause of his audience, and fully maintained his great popularity with the Boston public in his appearances.

Miss Ida Klein was heard with much pleasure in the "Jewel Song," from "Faust," and some ballads by Jensen, the former displaying the admirable training of her voice to excellent advantage, and the latter, with added encore numbers, her fine taste and intelligence as a ballad singer.

The three vocalists were also heard in the familiar trio "I Lombardi," which created great enthusiasm, despite the late hour at which it was reached in the programme.

Mr. Leo Schulz gave some excellent 'cello playing in his solo number, which displayed his technical attainments to splendid advantage.

The Boston Orchestral Club, made up of Mr. E. Fielder and Mr. J. Hoffman, violins; Mr. S. Goldstein, viola; Mr. L. Schulz, violoncello; Mr. A. Goldstein, bass, and Mr. E. M. Heindl, flute, made its first public appearance on this occasion. The players of the organization are all well and favorably known as musicians of rare ability and extensive experience in orchestral work, and their entire success as an organization for concert work can be predicted without hesitation. Their numbers included the "Martha" and "Pique Dame" overtures, a "Faust" fantasie, and other equally pleasing selections, skilfully arranged for their own use, and all of these were given with the en-

[53]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

 Season of 1890-91. ***

Leave Boston Monday, Dec. 8, at 1.00 P.M., Providence Depot.
Arrive New Haven Monday, 6. P.M.
NEW HAVEN HOTEL.
Concert at Hyperion Theatre, 8.00 P.M.
Leave New Haven directly after Concert. Steamer "Northam."
Arrive in New York Tuesday, Dec. 9.
GRAND CENTRAL HOTEL, 673 Broadway.
Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 12 o'clock noon.
Concert at Chickering Hall, 8.00 P.M.
Leave New York Wednesday, Dec. 10, at 11.30 A. M., via Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.
Arrive Philadelphia 1.45 P.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 00 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia Thursday, Dec. 11, at 8.15 A.M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 24th and Chestnut Streets.
Arrive Washington 11.45 A.M.
WILLARD'S HOTEL.
Rehearsal at Lincoln Hall, 4 P.M.
Concert at Lincoln Hall, 8.00 P.M.
Leave Washington, Baltimore & Ohio Depot, Friday, Dec. 12, 2 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore 3 P.M.
CARROLTON HOUSE.
Rehearsal at Concordia Hall, 4.00 P.M.
Concert at Concordia Hall, 8.00 P.M.
Leave Baltimore directly after concert.
Arrive New York Saturday, Dec. 13, at 7.00 P.M.
Leave New York, Grand Central Depot, 10.00 A.M.
Arrive Boston 4.30 P.M., Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

Members of the Orchestra not playing in New Haven will leave for New York Monday, Dec. 8, via Fall River line. Train leaves Park Square Depot at 6.00 P.M.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

SATURDAY, December 6, 1890.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 8, 1890

The Symphony Concert.

Nothing could better demonstrate the favor with which Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concert-meister of the Symphony Orchestra, is regarded by the musical public of Boston than the reception given to him Saturday evening, the occasion being his appearance as the soloist of the evening and his performance of Goldmark's concerto for violin, in A minor. It was an ovation such as has not been previously seen at Music Hall this year, and there has been nothing to approach it, except the reception to Mrs. Wyman. As Mr. Kneisel rose in his place the applause was loud and long continued—it was repeated at the end of each movement, and at the close the audience would not wait for the finale by the orchestra, but broke into a tremendous and very enthusiastic encore. Five times the talented violinist was called back to bow his thanks—and in the applause his fellow members of the orchestra heartily joined. The rendition was artistic and praiseworthy. The first and third movements call for great virtuosity in the performer, particularly the cadenza in the closing movement, which glides easily and gracefully into a tutti by the band. The andante, the basis of which is a lovely air, calls for exquisite phrasing and the pure legato tone which Mr. Kneisel knows so well how to give, and withal it is a beautiful movement and richly scored. At no time does the solo instrument or the band appear obtrusively prominent, but each seems a part of the ensemble. Its effect is harmony, and there was no question of the delight of the auditors. In the other two movements there was a deal of technique, which served to display the skill of the soloist rather than to add to the pleasure of the audience as a musical composition, but the performance was the attraction of the evening.

Since the original announcement of the programme, and too late for Mr. Wilson to incorporate in his annotations, Mr. Nikisch had added two melodies by Grieg for string orchestra, which seemed to quiet the audience after the theatrical performance of Beethoven's Coriolanus Overture and the enthusiasm awakened by the brilliant playing of Mr. Kneisel. The delicious ending of the second of these was beautiful, and very artistically done, and Mr. Nikisch had the thanks of the audience. It was a capital preparation for Schumann's Symphony in C major, which closed the programme, and was rendered in Mr. Nikisch's characteristic style. There is to be no Symphony next week, and the following week Miss Emma Thursby is to be the soloist.

There were many distinguished musical people at Music Hall last night, and operatic music was given to the delight of old opera habitues. Campanini and Del Puente were in excellent voice and were recalled many times. Among the audience was noticed Miss Mary Howe, the brilliant soprano from Brattle-

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 7.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the 29th ult. presented Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture; Berlioz's "Symphony Fantastique," and Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody," No. 2. The Weber overture was given with great fire and clearness, as a whole, though with unaccustomed variations on the usual order of procedure in respect to changes of tempi. It is doubtful if any new enjoyment was added to the hearing of the work by the treatment it received; and, speaking for ourselves, we must confess we prefer the traditional interpretation, to which we are most accustomed. The Berlioz symphony was beautifully played, and was accorded a richly colored reading by Mr. Nikisch. It showed signs of age, and much of its frenzy and passion appeared to be blatant, while it must be admitted there were moments when the ear becomes wearied of what, after all, is but little else than experiments in instrumentation. In this latter respect the symphony was a wonder in its day, but the achievements of later masters of orchestral effect, notably Wagner, cause Berlioz's scoring, despite its brilliancy, to sound tame—perhaps even thin. The Liszt fantasie, the opening bars of which, by the way, seemed remarkably like a continuation of the Berlioz work that preceded it, was given with splendid spirit and rhythmical emphasis. The concert, however, was, on the whole, dull in its programme.

The Adamowski Quartet gave their second concert in Steinert Hall on Monday evening, performing Beethoven's Quartet in G, op. 18, No. 2; Arthur Foote's Romance for violin and piano in E, op. 9, No. 3; Quartet in G-minor, op. 14, Volkmann. An excellent audience was present. The quartet playing was thoughtful, conscientious and spirited. Occasionally a little roughness came to the surface, and now and then there was faulty intonation, but on the whole the Beethoven and Volkmann works were well interpreted and performed in a manner that excited equal interest and pleasure. Mr. Foote's romance, which has been heard here before, renewed the admirable impression it made at its earlier hearings. It seizes the attention from the very outset and holds it steadily to the end. Its themes are chaste and are treated with due skill and judgment. Mr. Adamowski played the violin part broadly, tunefully and artistically, and with a grace and warmth of color that were as appropriate as they were refined. The piano part was played by Foote. Both artists were applauded heartily and recalled.

A very attractive programme has been arranged for to-night's Popular Concert in Music Hall. The soloists are to be Miss Ida Klein, soprano, Signor Campanari, tenor, Sig. del Puente, baritone, and Mr. Leo Schultz, 'cello. The newly organized Boston Orchestral Club, consisting of Messrs. Feidler, Hoffman, S. Goldstein, L. Schultz, E. M. Heindl, and A. Goldstein, will assist, making their first appearance on this occasion as an organization.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 8, 1890.

The Symphony Concert Saturday—Mr. Kneisel as Soloist.

Spite of evident enthusiasm and poetic instinct on the part of the conductor, and of fiery zeal in the orchestra, there was by no means the excellent ensemble present in Saturday's performance that we have the right to expect from such an organization. There was a roughness and lack of finish perceptible in every number, but most of all in the accompaniment to the violin concerto, where almost everything seemed syncopated—except the syncopations. It would seem wiser to shorten the programmes a trifle than to take up more numbers than can be thoroughly rehearsed, and while I gladly acknowledge the magnetism and masterful character of Nikisch's readings, he may yet become more of a drillmaster without deteriorating as a poet.

The overture to "Coriolanus" by Beethoven is one of the most heroic examples of a school begun by Gluck and culminated by Beethoven. Mr. Nikisch reads it with a breadth that is admirable. If I mistake not, it was his musical visiting card to us, for he began his musical career in America with it, or at least it was the first number in which he showed the spirit which is in him. At the end the pauses were a little overdrawn, and the attacks after them were ragged and indecisive.

The chief triumph of the concert was won by Mr. Franz Kneisel, whose performance of Goldmark's violin concerto was something long to be remembered. Not only was it of ineffable tenderness in the andante, but it possessed breadth and brilliancy throughout the other movements. The work on the G and D strings, second movement, was remarkably full-toned and powerful, and proved the artist to be growing in this direction, the only one in which improvement was possible. There was a great deal of double stopping in the last movement, both in themes and cadenza, and this was perfectly executed, as also were the scales. The cadenza was so magnificently played that one rash neophyte started applause at its end, but was immediately frowned into silence. The only fault the most hypocritical could find in the performance was that the highest notes in the finale were a trifle flat (a very slight and temporary aberration of intonation) and the orchestral work somewhat irregular. As a work the concerto seems a very important addition to the modern repertoire. It has the Chopin fault of making the solo instrument too prominent, and, as in Beethoven's great violin concerto, the last movement seems to fall away sadly from the power of the first two. But it has some magnificent touches also, among these I may mention the brusque beginning of the chief theme of the first movement, entering at once without any introductory phrases, and its subsequent treatment in a very ingenious fugato. The movement ends with the first phrase, forming a sort of symmetry of the Schubert style. The sequences of the second movement are superabundant but the rhythmic effects of drum and horn are original and attractive. The use of the trumpet against the violin phrases in the finale is another bold stroke and the entire movement has a Bohemian, rhapsodical character. At the close of the work Mr. Kneisel received an ovation of which any artist in the world might be proud; he was recalled a half dozen times amid the wildest enthusiasm.

The Grieg themes for string orchestra were not as characteristic as much of the music of this composer, and were roughly played besides. The instruments are used mercilessly in the high positions, and at times the cadences had a Gaelic style.

Schumann's second symphony ended the concert. Mr. Nikisch reads Schumann's works with a nobility of expression and a subtlety of meaning that shows how close the task lies to his heart. He allows the brasses their proper power, and works up the climaxes with overwhelming force. Yet the attacks in the second movement could have been more exact, and in details of routine and execution faults were to be found. The adagio was the best played movement, and a word of praise may here be spoken for the excellent oboe playing. The finale was one grand tornado of passion, but did not become mere vehemence until its close. During all these proceedings the kettle drummer had sat in silent indignation. He had seen the strings given beautiful passages, the woodwind come prominently to the front and the horns give a lofty theme of thanksgiving, while he, the most emphatic and muscular artist of the entire orchestra, was obliged to be mute. But at the very close of the symphony Schumann has given a short passage in accented triplets to the kettle drums, has marked them "Solo" (for they carry on the rhythm that has preceded on the brass and woodwind) and has added accents to them. It was our drummer's one golden opportunity and he seized it! In 10 seconds he had made more impression on the audience than all the other instruments combined! It may perhaps be doubted whether the cannonading was just the effect that the composer desired, but it was impressive, nevertheless. Hereafter when any American composer desires a sforzandississimo (picturing the crack of doom, the crash of the universe, or anything of that sort), he had better score it for kettledrum solo, and stipulate that our drummer shall play the part.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

A Very Artistic Sunday Popular.

The Music Hall popular of last evening was undoubtedly the best, from an artistic point of view, thus far of this concert series. The programme was made up, for the most part, of vocal selections, and from artists who have won universal fame and approval. The hero of the evening, in the estimation of the enthusiastic audience present, was Sig. Del Puente, and his baritone solos were received with such favor that double encores were demanded. Sig. Campanini and Miss Ida Klein shared the honors of the evening with him, and to them was meted out their full share of approval. The Boston Orchestral Club made its first appearance as an organization, and at once established itself in both popular and critical favor. Its rendition of the "Hungarian Dance" was ex-

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 7, 1890.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Franz Kneisel.

The eighth of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conducter, was given at Music Hall last evening, the programme being introduced by a performance of Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus," in which the points of the work were brought out with theatrical effects which made something of a novelty of this familiar composition.

Following the overture came Goldmark's concerto for violin in A minor, op. 28, in which the solo part was played by Franz Kneisel, the faithful and talented concert master of the orchestra. The composer Goldmark is credited with the somewhat egotistical remark: "Raff and Rubinstein would make symphonies of what I throw into my waste basket," but it would seem, after a hearing of the evening's concerto, that the composer was taken with an economical fit when it was produced, for its ideas are of insufficient value to warrant their saving under ordinary circumstances.

Goldmark's early training as a violinist led him to put together in this concerto a set of studies that few students would care to attempt in public, and the skill shown by Mr. Kneisel in mastering the technical difficulties of the solo part justified the enthusiastic applause which his brother musicians bestowed upon him as he finished his task. Whether such performances give much enjoyment to the average concert patron is, at least, an open question, but last evening's audience applauded the popular violinist almost without limit, and recalled him again and again to acknowledge this applause.

Two melodies for string orchestra by Grieg followed, and made a most enjoyable contrast to the preceding composition, the tuneful ideas and their varied and pleasing treatment affording rest and refreshment to all who listened.

Mr. Nikisch brought the concert to a close by a masterly performance of Schumann's C major symphony No. 2, op. 61, which has had many hearings under his predecessors' batons, and which, as performed on this occasion, appeared to gratify the audience.

Next week the orchestra takes its second trip to cities south of New England, the ninth concert being announced for the 20th inst., with Miss Emma C. Thursby, soprano, as the soloist.

MR. NIKISCH'S PROGRAMMES.

There seem to be differences of opinion as to the character of the programmes presented at the Symphony concerts by Conductor Nikisch, and some indications point to a "tempest in the local teapot" over this subject. It is well that a matter of such vital importance should have a free discussion, in order that the desires of the majority be made known, and the minority be given an opportunity to aquiesce, whatever the situation may be proven to be. The following extract from yesterday's Beacon may help in the discussion of this subject:

"Somebody makes a 'jotting' in the Transcript to this effect:

"'Whatever may have been said of the Symphony concert programmes in former seasons, those of the current series, already presented and announced, are remarkable for their catholicity and novelties. * * * But if the spirit that has so far animated the selection of works continues its power, the audiences at the Symphony concerts will have no reason to complain either of a lack of variety in style and school, or of indifference to the art movement of the day.'

"The writer of that paragraph cannot have paid much attention to the programmes he indorses so wholesalely. Including the concert of last week there have been played 24 orchestral works, of which—counting the Slavic authors as German—only five represented any other nationality, one each being taken from Tschaikowsky, Moszkowski, Sgambati, Gade and Berlioz. Of novelties there have been just six, if the Sgambati concerto, already introduced to Boston by Mr. Lang, may count as new. One-half of these were brought out by the soloist, so that there remain to the credit of the orchestra only a Goldmark overture, the Smetana poem and the Tschaikowsky extracts. If this be 'catholicity and novelty' and 'variety of style and school,' we have much yet to learn."

TONIGHT'S MUSIC HALL "POP."

The managers of the Music Hall Popular concerts have secured a strong list of artists for this evening, having engaged Sig. Italo Campanini, tenor; Sig. C. Del Puente, baritone; Miss Ida Klein, soprano; Mr. Leo Schulz, violoncello; Mr. Leon Keach, pianist, and the Boston Orchestral Club, and these artists will be heard in the following selections:

Overture, "Stradella" ..... Flotow
Boston Orchestral Club.
Aria, "Di Provenza" (Traviata) ..... Verdi
Sig. Del Puente.
Jewel song from "Faust" ..... Gounod
Miss Klein.
Solo for 'cello (selected).
Mr. Schulz.
Aria, "Cielo e mar" (Gioconda) ..... Ponchielli
Sig. Campanini.
Fantasie, "Faust" ..... Gounod
Boston Orchestral Club.
Songs.
(a) "From Flower to Flower" ..... Del Puente
(b) "Why?" ..... Del Puente
Sig. Del Puente.
Song, "Vorrei Morire" ..... Tosti
Sig. Campanini.
Songs (selected) ..... Jensen
Miss Klein.
Selection.
Boston Orchestral Club.
Trio, "I Lombardi" ..... Verdi
Miss Klein, Sig. Campanini and Sig. Del Puente.
Overture, "Pique Dame" ..... Suppe
Boston Orchestral Club.

[54]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Season of 1890-91.

Leave Boston Monday, Dec. 8, at 1.00 P.M., Providence Depot.
Arrive New Haven Monday, 6. P.M.
NEW HAVEN HOTEL.
Concert at Hyperion Theatre, 8.00 P.M.
Leave New Haven directly after Concert. Steamer "Northam."
Arrive in New York Tuesday, Dec. 9.
GRAND CENTRAL HOTEL, 673 Broadway
Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 12 o'clock noon.
Concert at Chickering Hall, 8.00 P.M.
Leave New York Wednesday, Dec. 10, at 11.30 A.M., via Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.
Arrive Philadelphia 1.45 P.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8.00 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia Thursday, Dec. 11, at 8.15 A.M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 24th and Chestnut Streets.
Arrive Washington 11.45 A.M.
WILLARD'S HOTEL.
Rehearsal at Lincoln Hall, 4 P.M.
Concert at Lincoln Hall, 8.00 P.M.
Leave Washington, Baltimore & Ohio Depot, Friday, Dec. 12, 2 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore 3 P.M.
CARROLTON HOUSE.
Rehearsal at Concordia Hall, 4.00 P.M.
Concert at Concordia Hall, 8.00 P.M.
Leave Baltimore directly after concert.
Arrive New York Saturday, Dec. 13, at 7.00 P.M.
Leave New York, Grand Central Depot, 10.00 A.M.
Arrive Boston 4.30 P.M., Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday) after the Concert.

Members of the Orchestra not playing in New Haven will leave for New York Monday, Dec. 8, via Fall River line. Train leaves Park Square Depot at 6.00 P.M.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

SATURDAY, December 6, 1890.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 8, 1890

The Symphony Concert.

Nothing could better demonstrate the favor with which Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concert-meister of the Symphony Orchestra, is regarded by the musical public of Boston than the reception given to him Saturday evening, the occasion being his appearance as the soloist of the evening and his performance of Goldmark's concerto for violin, in A minor. It was an ovation such as has not been previously seen at Music Hall this year, and there has been nothing to approach it, except the reception to Mrs. Wyman. As Mr. Kneisel rose in his place the applause was loud and long continued—it was repeated at the end of each movement, and at the close the audience would not wait for the finale by the orchestra, but broke into a tremendous and very enthusiastic encore. Five times the talented violinist was called back to bow his thanks—and in the applause his fellow members of the orchestra heartily joined. The rendition was artistic and praiseworthy. The first and third movements call for great virtuosity in the performer, particularly the cadenza in the closing movement, which glides easily and gracefully into a tutti by the band. The andante, the basis of which is a lovely air, calls for exquisite phrasing and the pure legato tone which Mr. Kneisel knows so well how to give, and withal it is a beautiful movement and richly scored. At no time does the solo instrument or the band appear obtrusively prominent, but each seems a part of the ensemble. Its effect is harmony, and there was no question of the delight of the auditors. In the other two movements there was a deal of technique, which served to display the skill of the soloist rather than to add to the pleasure of the audience as a musical composition, but the performance was the attraction of the evening.

Since the original announcement of the programme, and too late for Mr. Wilson to incorporate in his annotations, Mr. Nikisch had added two melodies by Grieg for string orchestra, which seemed to quiet the audience after the theatrical performance of Beethoven's Coriolanus Overture and the enthusiasm awakened by the brilliant playing of Mr. Kneisel. The delicious ending of the second of these was beautiful, and very artistically done, and Mr. Nikisch had the thanks of the audience. It was a capital preparation for Schumann's Symphony in C major, which closed the programme, and was rendered in Mr. Nikisch's characteristic style. There is to be no Symphony next week, and the following week Miss Emma Thursby is to be the soloist.

There were many distinguished musical people at Music Hall last night, and operatic music was given to the delight of old opera habitues. Campanini and Del Puente were in excellent voice and were recalled many times. Among the audience was noticed Miss Mary Howe, the brilliant soprano from Brattleboro', Vt.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 7.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the 29th ult. presented Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture; Berlioz's "Symphony Fantastique," and Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody," No. 2. The Weber overture was given with great fire and clearness, as a whole, though with unaccustomed variations on the usual order of procedure in respect to changes of tempi. It is doubtful if any new enjoyment was added to the hearing of the work by the treatment it received; and, speaking for ourselves, we must confess we prefer the traditional interpretation, to which we are most accustomed. The Berlioz symphony was beautifully played, and was accorded a richly colored reading by Mr. Nikisch. It showed signs of age, and much of its frenzy and passion appeared to be blatant, while it must be admitted there were moments when the ear becomes wearied of what, after all, is but little else than experiments in instrumentation. In this latter respect the symphony was a wonder in its day, but the achievements of later masters of orchestral effect, notably Wagner, cause Berlioz's scoring, despite its brilliancy, to sound tame—perhaps even thin. The Liszt fantasie, the opening bars of which, by the way, seemed remarkably like a continuation of the Berlioz work that preceded it, was given with splendid spirit and rhythmical emphasis. The concert, however, was, on the whole, dull in its programme.

The Adamowski Quartet gave their second concert in Steinert Hall on Monday evening, performing Beethoven's Quartet in G, op. 18, No. 2; Arthur Foote's Romance for violin and piano in E, op. 9, No. 3; Quartet in G-minor, op. 14, Volkmann. An excellent audience was present. The quartet playing was thoughtful, conscientious and spirited. Occasionally a little roughness came to the surface, and now and then there was faulty intonation, but on the whole the Beethoven and Volkmann works were well interpreted and performed in a manner that excited equal interest and pleasure. Mr. Foote's romance, which has been heard here before, renewed the admirable impression it made at its earlier hearings. It seizes the attention from the very outset and holds it steadily to the end. Its themes are chaste and are treated with fine skill and judgment. Mr. Adamowski played the violin part broadly, tunefully and artistically, and with a grace and warmth of color that were as appropriate as they were refined. The piano part was played by Foote. Both artists were applauded heartily and recalled.

A very attractive programme has been arranged for to-night's Popular Concert in Music Hall. The soloists are to be Miss Ida Klein, soprano, Signor Campanari, tenor, Sig. del Puente, baritone, and Mr. Leo Schultz, 'cello. The newly organized Boston Orchestral Club, consisting of Messrs. Feidler, Hoffman, S. Goldstein, L. Schultz, E. M. Heindl, and A. Goldstein, will assist, making their first appearance on this occasion as an organization.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 8, 1890.

The Symphony Concert Saturday—Mr. Kneisel as Soloist.

Spite of evident enthusiasm and poetic instinct on the part of the conductor, and of fiery zeal in the orchestra, there was by no means the excellent ensemble present in Saturday's performance that we have the right to expect from such an organization. There was a roughness and lack of finish perceptible in every number, but most of all in the accompaniment to the violin concerto, where almost everything seemed syncopated—except the syncopations. It would seem wiser to shorten the programmes a trifle than to take up more numbers than can be thoroughly rehearsed, and while I gladly acknowledge the magnetism and masterful character of Nikisch's readings, he may yet become more of a drillmaster without deteriorating as a poet.

The overture to "Coriolanus" by Beethoven is one of the most heroic examples of a school begun by Gluck and culminated by Beethoven. Mr. Nikisch reads it with a breadth that is admirable. If I mistake not, it was his musical visiting card to us, for he began his musical career in America with it, or at least it was the first number in which he showed the spirit which is in him. At the end the pauses were a little overdrawn, and the attacks after them were ragged and indecisive.

The chief triumph of the concert was won by Mr. Franz Kneisel, whose performance of Goldmark's violin concerto was something long to be remembered. Not only was it of ineffable tenderness in the andante, but it possessed breadth and brilliancy throughout the other movements. The work on the G and D strings, second movement, was remarkably full-toned and powerful, and proved the artist to be growing in this direction, the only one in which improvement was possible. There was a great deal of double stopping in the last movement, both in themes and cadenza, and this was perfectly executed, as also were the scales. The cadenza was so magnificently played that one rash neophyte started applause at its end, but was immediately frowned into silence. The only fault the most hypocritical could find in the performance was that the highest notes in the finale were a trifle flat (a very slight and temporary aberration of intonation) and the orchestral work somewhat irregular. As a work the concerto seems a very important addition to the modern repertoire. It has the Chopin fault of making the solo instrument too prominent, and, as in Beethoven's great violin concerto, the last movement seems to fall away sadly from the power of the first two. But it has some magnificent touches also, among these I may mention the brusque beginning of the chief theme of the first movement, entering at once without any introductory phrases, and its subsequent treatment in a very ingenious fugato. The movement ends with the first phrase, forming a sort of symmetry of the Schubert style. The sequences of the second movement are superabundant but the rhythmic effects of drum and horn are original and attractive. The use of the trumpet against the violin phrases in the finale is another bold stroke and the entire movement has a Bohemian, rhapsodical character. At the close of the work Mr. Kneisel received an ovation of which any artist in the world might be proud; he was recalled a half dozen times amid the wildest enthusiasm.

The Grieg themes for string orchestra were not as characteristic as much of the music of this composer, and were roughly played besides. The instruments are used mercilessly in the high positions, and at times the cadences had a Gaelic style.

Schumann's second symphony ended the concert. Mr. Nikisch reads Schumann's works with a nobility of expression and a subtlety of meaning that shows how close the task lies to his heart. He allows the brasses their proper power, and works up the climaxes with overwhelming force. Yet the attacks in the second movement could have been more exact, and in details of routine and execution faults were to be found. The adagio was the best played movement, and a word of praise may here be spoken for the excellent oboe playing. The finale was one grand tornado of passion, but did not become mere vehemence until its close. During all these proceedings the kettle drummer had sat in silent indignation. He had seen the strings given beautiful passages, the woodwind come prominently to the front and the horns give a lofty theme of thanksgiving, while he, the most emphatic and muscular artist of the entire orchestra, was obliged to be mute. But at the very close of the symphony Schumann has given a short passage in accented triplets to the kettle drums, has marked them "Solo" (for they carry on the rhythm that has preceded on the brass and woodwind) and has added accents to them. It was our drummer's one golden opportunity and he seized it! In 10 seconds he had made more impression on the audience than all the other instruments combined! It may perhaps be doubted whether the cannonading was just the effect that the composer desired, but it was impressive, nevertheless. Hereafter when any American composer desires a sforzandissimo (picturing the crack of doom, the crash of the universe, or anything of that sort), he had better score it for kettledrum solo, and stipulate that our drummer shall play the part.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

A Very Artistic Sunday Popular.

The Music Hall popular of last evening was undoubtedly the best, from an artistic point of view, thus far of this concert series. The programme was made up, for the most part, of vocal selections, and from artists who have won universal fame and approval. The hero of the evening, in the estimation of the enthusiastic audience present, was Sig. Del Puente, and his baritone solos were received with such favor that double encores were demanded. Sig. Campanini and Miss Ida Klein shared the honors of the evening with him, and to them was meted out their full share of approval. The Boston Orchestral Club made its first appearance as an organization, and at once established itself in both popular and critical favor. Its rendition of the "Hungarian Dance" was excellent.

Among the gems of the evening were the trio "I Lombardi," sung by Miss Klein, Sig. Campanini and Sig. Del Puente, the Jewel song from Faust by Miss Klein and the cello solo by Mr. Leo Schultz. The audience was very liberal in its applause, and the programme was doubled in length by the encores that were vigorously demanded.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 7, 1890.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Franz Kneisel.

The eighth of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the programme being introduced by a performance of Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus," in which the points of the work were brought out with theatrical effects which made something of a novelty of this familiar composition.

Following the overture came Goldmark's concerto for violin in A minor, op. 28, in which the solo part was played by Franz Kneisel, the faithful and talented concert master of the orchestra. The composer Goldmark is credited with the somewhat egotistical remark: "Raff and Rubinstein would make symphonies of what I throw into my waste basket," but it would seem, after a hearing of the evening's concerto, that the composer was taken with an economical fit when it was produced, for its ideas are of insufficient value to warrant their saving under ordinary circumstances.

Goldmark's early training as a violinist led him to put together in this concerto a set of studies that few students would care to attempt in public, and the skill shown by Mr. Kneisel in mastering the technical difficulties of the solo part justified the enthusiastic applause which his brother musicians bestowed upon him as he finished his task. Whether such performances give much enjoyment to the average concert patron is, at least, an open question, but last evening's audience applauded the popular violinist almost without limit, and recalled him again and again to acknowledge this applause.

Two melodies for string orchestra by Grieg followed, and made a most enjoyable contrast to the preceding composition, the tuneful ideas and their varied and pleasing treatment affording rest and refreshment to all who listened.

Mr. Nikisch brought the concert to a close by a masterly performance of Schumann's C major symphony No. 2, op. 61, which has had many hearings under his predecessors' batons, and which, as performed on this occasion, appeared to gratify the audience.

Next week the orchestra takes its second trip to cities south of New England, the ninth concert being announced for the 20th inst., with Miss Emma C. Thursby, soprano, as the soloist.

MR. NIKISCH'S PROGRAMMES.

There seem to be differences of opinion as to the character of the programmes presented at the Symphony concerts by Conductor Nikisch, and some indications point to a "tempest in the local teapot" over this subject. It is well that a matter of such vital importance should have a free discussion, in order that the desires of the majority be made known, and the minority be given an opportunity to aquiesce, whatever the situation may be proven to be. The following extract from yesterday's Beacon may help in the discussion of this subject:

"Somebody makes a 'jotting' in the Transcript to this effect:

"'Whatever may have been said of the Symphony concert programmes in former seasons, those of the current series, already presented and announced, are remarkable for their catholicity and novelties. * * * But if the spirit that has so far animated the selection of works continues its power, the audiences at the Symphony concerts will have no reason to complain either of a lack of variety in style and school, or of indifference to the art movement of the day.'

"The writer of that paragraph cannot have paid much attention to the programmes he indorses so wholesalely. Including the concert of last week there have been played 24 orchestral works, of which—counting the Slavic authors as German—only five represented any other nationality, one each being taken from Tschaikowsky, Moszkowski, Sgambati, Gade and Berlioz. Of novelties there have been just six, if the Sgambati concerto, already introduced to Boston by Mr. Lang, may count as new. One-half of these were brought out by the soloist, so that there remain to the credit of the orchestra only a Goldmark overture, the Smetana poem and the Tschaikowsky extracts. If this be 'catholicity and novelty' and 'variety of style and school,' we have much yet to learn."

TONIGHT'S MUSIC HALL "POP."

The managers of the Music Hall Popular concerts have secured a strong list of artists for this evening, having engaged Sig. Italo Campanini, tenor; Sig. C. Del Puente, baritone; Miss Ida Klein, soprano; Mr. Leo Schulz, violoncello; Mr. Leon Keach, pianist, and the Boston Orchestral Club, and these artists will be heard in the following selections:

Overture, "Stradella" ..... Flotow
Boston Orchestral Club.
Aria, "Di Provenza" (Traviata) ..... Verdi
Sig. Del Puente.
Jewel song from "Faust" ..... Gounod
Miss Klein.
Solo for 'cello (selected).
Mr. Schulz.
Aria, "Cielo e mar" (Gioconda) ..... Ponchielli
Sig. Campanini.
Fantasie, "Faust" ..... Gounod
Boston Orchestral Club.
Songs.
(a) "From Flower to Flower" ..... Del Puente
(b) "Why?" .....
Sig. Del Puente.
Song, "Vorrei Morire" ..... Tosti
Sig. Campanini.
Songs (selected) ..... Jensen
Miss Klein.
Selection.
Boston Orchestral Club.
Trio, "I Lombardi" ..... Verdi
Miss Klein, Sig. Campanini and Sig. Del Puente.
Overture, "Pique Dame" ..... Suppe
Boston Orchestral Club.

[54]

DAY MORNING, DEC. 8, 1890

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

...ogramme of the eighth Symphony ...ven at Music Hall Saturday evening ...follows:

..."Coriolanus".....Beethoven
...for violin in A minor, op. 28.....Goldmark
(First time.)
...for string orchestra.....Grieg
(First time.)
...y in C major, No. 2, op. 61.....Schumann

...concerto of Goldmark, although it con...passages of beauty, although in many ...is admirably written, is neither a re...work nor a valuable contribution to ...erature of the violin. The first move...opens with a pomp which misleads; for ...the first and second themes are of a more ...mental than heroic nature. These themes ...a strong family resemblance to each ..., and the second, with its exquisite ...companiment, is closely related to certain ...bers of the "Queen of Sheba," the most ...acteristic of Goldmark's works. The ...mentation of the whole concerto, let it ...marked, is the work of a master hand; it ...varied, so full of color, and above all ...discreet. The melodies of the first move...ment are beautiful; but this same movement, with its mixture of pomp, sentimentalism and strict style (for there is a curious digression for the orchestra in the shape of a ...ssimo of fughetta, which serves as a resting ...e for the solo player), is rather episodic ...than firmly knit. The second movement is ...air which, though clothed in modern har...monies, still preserves the old-fashioned grace ...of the last century. The final movement suggests the bolero, and with its spirited rhythm and characteristic melody will no doubt always be the most popular of the three. In this last movement is an elaborate cadenza. As a whole, the work does not show so much imagination as skilful elaboration of detail.

This concerto was superbly played by Mr. Kneisel. Its many and great difficulties were ...ssed with "classic calmness and accuracy," to use a favorite phrase of German critics; and in overcoming these difficulties the labor already spent and any present anxiety were studiously concealed. Sureness and a confidence which does not boast are always seen in Mr. Kneisel's work; and his exquisite taste keeps him from sensationalism or dulness. The beauty of tone displayed by him last Saturday evening has always charmed. Nor was it the brilliancy he gave the cadenza which distinguished his playing. The distinctive feature of his performance was its elegance. Possibly in the first and third movement one wished that a drop of the virtuoso's blood might quicken his pulse; but had there been more fire or passion, that which was ennobled by his elegance might have seemed tawdry; for by a dashing player the finale could easily be made a cheap affair.

The other numbers of the programme do not invite discussion. The pretty melodies of Grieg for string orchestra were given for the first time—that is, at these concerts. Our novelties come; but they come late. These same melodies have been often played in various towns of this land, and even the inhabitants of Des Moines listened to them three years ago.

When Mr. Nikisch first came among us, his "reading" of the "Coriolanus" overture was at variance with custom and well-established traditions. Bitter words were interchanged; much ink was shed. This year, his treatment of the second theme is more conventional, and the mannerisms, which in this overture frightened some and amused others, are less marked and fewer in number.

The Schumann symphony, in C, were it not for the wonderful adagio, would not stand by the side of the others. For the dryness of treatment is often repulsive; and passages of grandeur are closely followed by barren measures. What could, for instance, be a greater contrast than the scherzo and either of its trios; and even in the noble adagio there is an empty display of counterpoint which might well have been omitted. The last movement has much noise and but little of the true spirit of Schumann.

The performance of the orchestra was like unto the programme: it was eminently respectable.

There will be no concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall next Saturday evening. The programme for the evening of Dec. ... includes Brahms's "Academic Overture," ...berger's "Variations on a Theme by Schu... and Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony. Miss ...Thursby will sing an aria and songs.

PHILIP HALE.

Messrs. Campanini and Del Puente were warmly welcomed at the concert given at Music Hall last evening. Neither of them, however, was in excellent condition. Miss Ida Klein, soprano, has from nature a good voice, and in her singing of the "Jewel song" from "Faust," and Gounod's "Spring," she showed considerable musical taste. Mr. Shulz played two melodies with much feeling: but his virtuoso-piece might well have been called "A study on false notes," so impure was his intonation. The Boston Orchestral Club played the overture to "Martha," the first movement from Hofmann's Serenade, and a Hungarian dance by Brahms.

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

SUNDAY, DEC. 7, 1890.

Symphonic Sounds from Mr. Nikisch's Players.

Schumann always finds at the hands of Mr. Nikisch and the Symphony orchestra a most sympathetic and poetic interpretation. The leader himself seems to be peculiarly en rapport with the mind and thought of this great composer; and the players share his earnestness and zeal. The symphony in C major was the offering yesterday. It has never been given a more impressive hearing in Boston.

Mr. Franz Kneisel took the solo part of a concerto by Goldmark, for violin and orchestra—a novelty to this public. Needless to commend the artist's work further than to say that it was as careful and sure in effect as possible. The concerto itself was pleasant to hear throughout; it is worthy of the composer, and, while it offers in the closing movement particularly abundant opportunity for the display of virtuosity, the work is far from being a mere "show piece."

Two characteristic melodies for string orchestra by Grieg made a pleasant prelude for the symphony. The great "Coriolanus" overture by Beethoven, nobly played, opened a programme that evoked much more than the usual faint symphony hand-clapping. Mr. Kneisel was recalled again and again.

Off and away on another triumphal journey goes the orchestra this week. When Mr. Nikisch returns, on the 20th inst., he will bring with him as soloist that brilliant singer, Miss Emma C. Thursby. The selections for the ninth concert include Brahms' "Academic" overture, Henberger's variations on a theme from Schubert, and Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony.

At Music Hall Tonight.

Campanini, "the silver-voiced," and Del Puente, heard in Sunday populars here for the first time, with Miss Ida Klein, operatic singer; Mr. Leo Schulz, violoncello soloist; Mr. Leon Keach, pianist, and the Boston Orchestral Club will be heard in Music Hall tonight. The club includes Messrs. E. Fielder, J. Hoffman, violins; S. Goldstein, viola; L. Schulz, violoncello; A. Goldstein, bass, and E. M. Heindl, flute, who will make their first appearance on this occasion as an organization. The programme follows:

Overture, Stradella.....Flotow
Boston Orchestral Club.
Aria, Fair Provence (Traviata).....Verdi
Sig. Del Puenta.
Jewel song from Faust.....Gounod
Miss Klein.
Solo for 'cello (selected.)
Mr. Schulz.
Aria, Sky and Sea (Gioconda).....Ponchielli
Sig. Campanini.
Fantasia, Faust.....Gounod
Boston Orchestral Club.
From Flower to Flower and Why?.....Del Puente
Sig. Del Puente.
Song, Were It to Die.....Tosti
Sig. Campanini.
Songs, (selected).....Jensen
Miss Klein.
Selection.
Boston Orchestral Club.
Trio, I Lombardi.....Verdi
Miss Klein, Sig. Campanini and Sig. Del Puente.
Overture, Pique Dame.....Suppe
Boston Orchestral Club.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 7, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY.

The eighth symphony concert last evening commenced with a fine performance of Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus." An entirely appropriate tempo was taken at the outset, and artistically maintained to the end. The powerful authoritative opening chords were prolonged to just the right length; the unrivalled mass of strings swept through the first theme, and its splendid episode, sang the appealing second theme in a slightly slower tempo with exquisite feeling, and gave the pathetic closing chords so expressively as to cause breathless silence, which relieved itself afterwards by prolonged applause.

The first of three novelties came next. A concerto for violin, by Goldmark, in A minor, opus 28. Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist. The work is comparatively simple in structure, and throughout gives the solo instrument every opportunity to assert itself, without having to struggle with an overpowering orchestral score.

Two melodies for string orchestra, by Grieg, followed the concerto. They were announced for a first performance, but if we mistake not, have been given before in Boston. Schumann's symphony, No. 2, in C, opus 61, was the final number. The rendering of this was from beginning to end but another example of Mr. Nikisch's rare ability as a conductor.

Mr. Kneisel was fortunate in his selection, and evidently realized this fact himself; for, it seemed to us that while he played with all his usual breadth, clearness and artistic finish, he also infused into his performance an unwonted expressiveness and warmth.

The accompaniment, too, was perfectly sustained; and at the conclusion of the work our talented first violinist was applauded with extreme heartiness.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

The second concert of this organization was given in Steinert Hall, last Monday evening. Beethoven's quartet in G major, opus 18, No. 2, for strings, was the first number on the programme. This work, one of the six that were dedicated to Prince Lobkowitz, represents Beethoven in a jolly, light-hearted mood, and is delightful to listen to from beginning to end. The programme was fairly good, although, as has been previously remarked concerning the playing of the quartet, it was not one of evenly sustained excellence. Each movement had the advantage of a good beginning; but before coming to an end, more or less uncertainty in ensemble and intonation became apparent, which, it is scarcely necessary to add, marred the pleasure that would otherwise have been received. It did not provoke much enthusiasm. Volkmann's quartet in G minor, opus 14, formed a genial compliment to the Beethoven, and was more interestingly given. The scherzo was especially well played, and won considerable applause. Between these two numbers, Mr. Adamowski and Mr. Arthur Foote played a romance in E, opus 9, for violin and piano, composed by the latter performer. It is a melodious, well constructed and prettily harmonized piece (one of a set of three), and in it Mr. Adamowski, at least, was heard at his best. His playing was altogether charming and artistic; the sweet and expressive tones which he can at times draw from his instrument being fully displayed throughout. Mr. Foote's work at the piano can hardly be said to have appeared in an equally favorable light, for his touch seemed rather devoid of warmth, and this was rendered the more noticeable from its having been brought so immediately in contrast with the playing of his companion. The performance was greeted with much applause, and a recall. The third concert is announced to take place Jan. 5.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

—A WEEKLY PAPER—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1890.

MRS. NIKISCH SINGS IN PROVIDENCE.—PROVIDENCE, R. I., November 19.—Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sang for the first time before an American audience in this city this evening. She was five times recalled.

NIKISCH.—At the sixth of the season's symphony concerts in Music Hall, Boston, last Saturday evening, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, the program consisted of Beethoven's symphony No. 1, in C major; Haydn's concerto for violoncello; Smetana's symphonic poem "Vltava," and Weber's overture "Oberon." The soloist was Mr. Anton Hekking.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DEC. 7, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

NINTH CONCERT.

Last night's concert was remarkable for the variety of discussion that it would naturally provoke, owing to Mr. Nikisch's somewhat erratic reading of Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, and the careless treatment that the Schumann Symphony in C, op. 61, No. 2, received. Mr. Kneisel's performance of the Concerto for violin in a minor by Goldmark was by far the worthiest feature of the concert, and this, as well as other interesting details of the occasion, will be treated at length in our next issue.

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, DEC. 10.

Caught By the Symphony.

NEW YORK, Dec. 9.—The Boston Symphony orchestra, at the concert given at Chickering Hall before an overflowing audience tonight, achieved a larger share of success than it has done for a long time. The success was due principally to the novelty of the evening, the concerto for violin and orchestra in A minor, op. 28, by the Viennese composer, Carl Goldmark.

EDITED BY HORACE GREELEY.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1890.

TWELVE PAGES.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Unless one chooses to indulge in platitudes concerning the playing of the band, the sweet simplicity and cheeriness of Haydn's D-major symphony, the brilliancy of Dvorak's unique composition entitled "Scherzo Capriccioso" which is played in New-York quite as often as Beethoven's Symphony in C-minor, and that gorgeous, pompous, strutting and pretentious symphonic poem in which Liszt wished the world to recognize a lament for the sufferings of Tasso and a celebration of his tardy triumph, there is not much to be said about the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place in Chickering Hall last night. It is true there was a novelty in the list of pieces which invited a twofold interest from the fact that it was a violin concerto by Goldmark which had never been heard in public in New-York and was played by Mr. Kneisel, who stands high in the admiration of local music-lovers; but unhappily the work turned out to be one of such an indeterminate character that it made scarcely any impression, exciting neither a keen sensation of pleasure nor a profound feeling of disappointment. It was followed by several hearty rounds of applause, but these were plainly a tribute to the performer and were wholly deserved by the suave loveliness of his tone and the masterly manner in which he conquered the technical difficulties with which the solo part bristles. Solo violinists are harder put to it than any of their colleagues among musical virtuosi for new concert pieces, and it is small wonder that the work of so well equipped a composer as Goldmark should be taught up with eagerness, but we would hesitate to say that the new concerto is a valuable addition to violin literature, or one that will relieve the violinists of the embarrassment which they have labored under since Mendelssohn wrote his lovely concerto for Ferdinand David. It seems likely that the two works by Bruch will still be looked upon as coming nearest to supplying the want. An exceedingly animated spirit prevailed among the audience that crowded the hall, and every number was greeted with tokens of delight.

The World

JOSEPH PULITZER

Published Every Day in the Year at Nos. 53-63 Park Row.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1890.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Arthur Nikisch's Second Concert—Goldmark's Violin Concerto.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concert given at Chickering Hall last night before an overflowing audience achieved a larger share of success than it has done for a long time. The success was due principally to the novelty of the evening, the concerto for violin and orchestra (in A minor, op. 28) by the Viennese imposer, Carl Goldmark, and to the rendition of the violin part by Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concert-meister of the orchestra. It is a long time, in fact, since composer and executant together gave such unalloyed artistic delight to a New York audience. Even with the memories of so many brilliant visitors, last of all Sarasate with his splendid virtuosity, the playing of the Goldmark concerto by Mr. Kneisel and the Nikisch orchestra will long be remembered as an example of splendid artistic achievement. For once, the charm of melody, the pure beauty of sound, the chaste delicacy of musical workmanship, were permitted full exposition.

In his concerts for violin Herr Goldmark has written a work that will live. It is one which the virtuoso will avoid, because it does not afford enough opportunities for pyrotechnical display, but it will be welcomed wherever the love of music for itself, in its purity, its beauty, is present in artist and audience. All through Herr Goldmark has kept the orchestra in its proper place, and Herr Nikisch can be sincerely praised for not overstepping the bounds set by the composer.

The last two movements of the concerto are the best. The violin solo work in the second movement, the andante, is extremely lovely, almost poetic and original in its long-drawn-out beauties, even though it does occasionally infringe upon the domain of the Prize Song in "Meistersinger." Throughout the melodiousness is never lost sight of, and its beauty is set forth deliciously by the background of orchestral coloring.

The success of the number was gained by Mr. Kneisel in the third movement in the cadenza, after which the audience, without daring to disturb the progress of the concerto, burst into a well-defined but only half expressed murmur of astonished delight. The cadenza was one of the greatest difficulty, and could have afforded more opportunity for display perhaps, but Mr. Kneisel proved himself too good an artist to forget for a moment the demand for the dignity and artistic exposition of the composer's ideas. Mr. Kneisel's tone is not large, but it is always true and pure, perhaps even to coldness. His octaves were exceedingly clean. He is an absolute master of technique, which, however, is entirely submerged in artistic truthfulness. If he lacks anything it is in poetic expression, perhaps. But one can't have everything. Mr. Kneisel had an ovation at the conclusion of the work and was called back four or five times.

Mr. Nikisch conducted the orchestral portion of the work with great care and was heard to best advantage in the Haydn Symphony, in D major, where the strings for which the Boston musicians became famous under Gericke, had the burden of the work. At the next concert of the Boston Symphony Society here on Jan. 13, Mme. Nikisch, the wife of the conductor, will make her first appearance as the vocal soloist.

[95]

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 8, 1890

EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the eighth Symphony concert given at Music Hall Saturday evening was as follows:

Overture—"Coriolanus".....Beethoven
Concerto for violin in A minor, op. 28.....Goldmark
(First time.)
Two melodies for string orchestra.....Grieg
(First time.)
Symphony in C major, No. 2, op. 61.....Schumann

The concerto of Goldmark, although it contains passages of beauty, although in many ways it is admirably written, is neither a remarkable work nor a valuable contribution to the literature of the violin. The first movement opens with a pomp which misleads; for both the first and second themes are of a more sentimental than heroic nature. These themes have a strong family resemblance to each other, and the second, with its exquisite accompaniment, is closely related to certain numbers of the "Queen of Sheba," the most characteristic of Goldmark's works. The instrumentation of the whole concerto, let it be remarked, is the work of a master hand; it is so varied, so full of color, and above all so discreet. The melodies of the first movement are beautiful; but this same movement, with its mixture of pomp, sentimentalism and strict style, (for there is a curious digression for the orchestra in the shape of a species of fughetta, which serves as a resting place for the solo player), is rather episodic than firmly knit. The second movement is an air which, though clothed in modern harmonies, still preserves the old-fashioned grace of the last century. The final movement suggests the bolero, and with its spirited rhythm and characteristic melody will no doubt always be the most popular of the three. In this last movement is an elaborate cadenza. As a whole, the work does not show so much imagination as skilful elaboration of detail.

This concerto was superbly played by Mr. Kneisel. Its many and great difficulties were overcome with "classic calmness and accuracy," to use a favorite phrase of German critics; and in overcoming these difficulties the labor already spent and any present anxiety were studiously concealed. Sureness and a confidence which does not boast are always seen in Mr. Kneisel's work; and his exquisite taste keeps him from sensationalism or dulness. The beauty of tone displayed by him last Saturday evening has always charmed. Nor was it the brilliancy he gave the cadenza which distinguished his playing. The distinctive feature of his performance was its elegance. Possibly in the first and third movement one wished that a drop of the virtuoso's blood might quicken his pulse; but had there been more fire or passion, that which was ennobled by his elegance might have seemed tawdry; for by a dashing player the finale could easily be made a cheap affair.

The other numbers of the programme do not invite discussion. The pretty melodies of Grieg for string orchestra were given for the first time—that is, at these concerts. Our novelties come; but they come late. These same melodies have been often played in various towns of this land, and even the inhabitants of Des Moines listened to them three years ago.

When Mr. Nikisch first came among us, his "reading" of the "Coriolanus" overture was at variance with custom and well-established traditions. Bitter words were interchanged; much ink was shed. This year, his treatment of the second theme is more conventional, and the mannerisms, which in this overture frightened some and amused others, are less marked and fewer in number.

The Schumann symphony in C, were it not for the wonderful adagio, would not stand by the side of the others. For the dryness of treatment is often repulsive; and passages of grandeur are closely followed by barren measures. What could, for instance, be a greater contrast than the scherzo and either of its stiff trios; and even in the noble adagio there is an empty display of counterpoint which might well have been omitted. The last movement has much noise and but little of the true spirit of Schumann.

The performance of the orchestra was like unto the programme: it was eminently respectable.

There will be no concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall next Saturday evening. The programme for the evening of Dec. 20 includes Brahms's "Academic Overture," Heuberger's "Variations on a Theme by Schubert" and Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony. Miss Emma Thursby will sing an aria and songs.

PHILIP HALE.

Messrs. Campanini and Del Puente were warmly welcomed at the concert given at Music Hall last evening. Neither of them, however, was in excellent condition. Miss Ida Klein, soprano, has from nature a good voice, and in her singing of the "Jewel song" from "Faust," and Gounod's "Spring," she showed considerable musical taste. Mr. Shulz played two melodies with much feeling: but his virtuoso-piece might well have been called "A study on false notes," so impure was his intonation. The Boston Orchestral Club played the overture to "Martha," the first movement from Hofmann's Serenade, and a Hungarian dance by Brahms.

.....

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DEC. 7, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

NINTH CONCERT.

Last night's concert was remarkable for the variety of discussion that it would naturally provoke, owing to Mr. Nikisch's somewhat erratic reading of Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, and the careless treatment that the Schumann Symphony in C, op. 61, No. 2, received. Mr. Kneisel's performance of the Concerto for violin in a minor by Goldmark was by far the worthiest feature of the concert, and this, as well as other interesting details of the occasion, will be treated at length in our next issue.

[55]

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

SUNDAY, DEC. 7, 1890.

Symphonic Sounds from Mr. Nikisch's Players.

Schumann always finds at the hands of Mr. Nikisch and the Symphony orchestra a most sympathetic and poetic interpretation. The leader himself seems to be peculiarly en rapport with the mind and thought of this great composer; and the players share his earnestness and zeal. The symphony in C major was the offering yesterday. It has never been given a more impressive hearing in Boston.

Mr. Franz Kneisel took the solo part of a concerto by Goldmark, for violin and orchestra—a novelty to this public. Needless to commend the artist's work further than to say that it was as careful and sure in effect as possible. The concerto itself was pleasant to hear throughout; it is worthy of the composer, and, while it offers in the closing movement particularly abundant opportunity for the display of virtuosity, the work is far from being a mere "show piece."

Two characteristic melodies for string orchestra by Grieg made a pleasant prelude for the symphony. The great "Coriolanus" overture by Beethoven, nobly played, opened a programme that evoked much more than the usual faint symphony handclapping. Mr. Kneisel was recalled again and again.

Off and away on another triumphal journey goes the orchestra this week. When Mr. Nikisch returns, on the 20th inst., he will bring with him as soloist that brilliant singer, Miss Emma C. Thursby. The selections for the ninth concert include Brahms' "Academic" overture, Henberger's variations on a theme from Schubert, and Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony.

At Music Hall Tonight.

Campanini, "the silver-voiced," and Del Puente, heard in Sunday populars here for the first time, with Miss Ida Klein, operatic singer; Mr. Leo Schulz, violoncello soloist; Mr. Leon Keach, pianist, and the Boston Orchestral Club will be heard in Music Hall tonight. The club includes Messrs. E. Fielder, J. Hoffman, violins; S. Goldstein, viola; L. Schulz, violoncello; A. Goldstein, bass, and E. M. Heindl, flute, who will make their first appearance on this occasion as an organization. The programme follows:

Overture, Stradella.....Flotow
Boston Orchestral Club.
Aria, Fair Provence (Traviata).....Verdi
Sig. Del Puente.
Jewel song from Faust.....Gounod
Miss Klein.
Solo for 'cello (selected.)
Mr. Schulz.
Aria, Sky and Sea (Gioconda).....Ponchielli
Sig. Campanini.
Fantasie, Faust.....Gounod
Boston Orchestral Club.
From Flower to Flower and Why?.....Del Puente
Sig. Del Puente.
Song, Were It to Die.....Tosti
Sig. Campanini.
Songs, (selected).....Jensen
Miss Klein.
Selection.
Boston Orchestral Club.
Trio, I Lombardi.....Verdi
Miss Klein, Sig. Campanini and Sig. Del Puente.
Overture, Pique Dame.....Suppe
Boston Orchestral Club.

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, DEC. 10.

Caught By the Symphony.

NEW YORK, Dec. 9.—The Boston Symphony orchestra, at the concert given at Chickering Hall before an overflowing audience tonight, achieved a larger share of success than it has done for a long time. The success was due principally to the novelty of the evening, the concerto for violin and orchestra in A minor, op. 28, by the Viennese composer, Carl Goldmark.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 7, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY.

The eighth symphony concert last evening commenced with a fine performance of Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus." An entirely appropriate tempo was taken at the outset, and artistically maintained to the end. The powerful authoritative opening chords were prolonged to just the right length; the unrivalled mass of strings swept through the first theme, and its splendid episode, sang the appealing second theme in a slightly slower tempo with exquisite feeling, and gave the pathetic closing chords so expressively as to cause breathless silence, which relieved itself afterwards by prolonged applause.

The first of three novelties came next. A concerto for violin, by Goldmark, in A minor, opus 28. Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist. The work is comparatively simple in structure, and throughout gives the solo instrument every opportunity to assert itself, without having to struggle with an overpowering orchestral score.

Two melodies for string orchestra, by Grieg, followed the concerto. They were announced for a first performance, but if we mistake not, have been given before in Boston. Schumann's symphony, No. 2, in C. opus 61, was the final number. The rendering of this was from beginning to end but another example of Mr. Nikisch's rare ability as a conductor.

Mr. Kneisel was fortunate in his selection, and evidently realized this fact himself; for, it seemed to us that while he played with all his usual breadth, clearness and artistic finish, he also imfused into his performance an unwonted expressiveness and warmth.

The accompaniment, too, was perfectly sustained; and at the conclusion of the work our talented first violinist was applauded with extreme heartiness.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

The second concert of this organization was given in Steinert Hall, last Monday evening. Beethoven's quartet in G major, opus 18, No. 2, for strings, was the first number on the programme. This work, one of the six that were dedicated to Prince Lobkowitz, represents Beethoven in a jolly, light-hearted mood, and is delightful to listen to from beginning to end. The programme was fairly good, although, as has been previously remarked concerning the playing of the quartet, it was not one of evenly sustained excellence. Each movement had the advantage of a good beginning; but before coming to an end, more or less uncertainty in ensemble and intonation became apparent, which, it is scarcely necessary to add, marred the pleasure that would otherwise have been received. It did not provoke much enthusiasm. Volkmann's quartet in G minor, opus 14, formed a genial compliment to the Beethoven, and was more interestingly given. The scherzo was especially well played, and won considerable applause. Between these two numbers, Mr. Adamowski and Mr. Arthur Foote played a romance in E, opus 9, for violin and piano, composed by the latter performer. It is a melodious, well constructed and prettily harmonized piece (one of a set of three), and in it Mr. Adamowski, at least, was heard at his best. His playing was altogether charming and artistic; the sweet and expressive tones which he can at times draw from his instrument being fully displayed throughout. Mr. Foote's work at the piano can hardly be said to have appeared in an equally favorable light, for his touch seemed rather devoid of warmth, and this was rendered the more noticeable from its having been brought so immediately in contrast with the playing of his companion. The performance was greeted with much applause, and a recall. The third concert is announced to take place Jan. 5.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

—A WEEKLY PAPER—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1890.

MRS. NIKISCH SINGS IN PROVIDENCE.—PROVIDENCE, R. I., November 19.—Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sang for the first time before an American audience in this city this evening. She was five times recalled.

NIKISCH.—At the sixth of the season's symphony concerts in Music Hall, Boston, last Saturday evening, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, the program consisted of Beethoven's symphony No. 1, in C major; Haydn's concerto for violoncello; Smetana's symphonic poem "Vltava," and Weber's overture "Oberon." The soloist was Mr. Anton Hekking.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1890.

TWELVE PAGES.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Unless one chooses to indulge in platitudes concerning the playing of the band, the sweet simplicity and cheeriness of Haydn's D-major symphony, the brilliancy of Dvorak's unique composition entitled "Scherzo Capriccioso" which is played in New-York quite as often as Beethoven's Symphony in C-minor, and that gorgeous, pompous, strutting and pretentious symphonic poem in which Liszt wished the world to recognize a lament for the sufferings of Tasso and a celebration of his tardy triumph, there is not much to be said about the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place in Chickering Hall last night. It is true there was a novelty in the list of pieces which invited a twofold interest from the fact that it was a violin concerto by Goldmark which had never been heard in public in New-York and was played by Mr. Kneisel, who stands high in the admiration of local music-lovers; but unhappily the work turned out to be one of such an indeterminate character that it made scarcely any impression, exciting neither a keen sensation of pleasure nor a profound feeling of disappointment. It was followed by several hearty rounds of applause, but these were plainly a tribute to the performer and were wholly deserved by the suave loveliness of his tone and the masterly manner in which he conquered the technical difficulties with which the solo part bristles. Solo violinists are harder put to it than any of their colleagues among musical virtuosi for new concert pieces, and it is small wonder that the work of so well equipped a composer as Goldmark should be taught up with eagerness, but we would hesitate to say that the new concerto is a valuable addition to violin literature, or one that will relieve the violinists of the embarrassment which they have labored under since Mendelssohn wrote his lovely concerto for Ferdinand David. It seems likely that the two works by Bruch will still be looked upon as coming nearest to supplying the want. An exceedingly animated spirit prevailed among the audience that crowded the hall, and every number was greeted with tokens of delight.

The World

JOSEPH PULITZER.

Published Every Day in the Year at Nos. 53-63 Park Row.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1890.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Arthur Nikisch's Second Concert—Goldmark's Violin Concerto.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concert given at Chickering Hall last night before an overflowing audience achieved a larger share of success than it has done for a long time. The success was due principally to the novelty of the evening, the concerto for violin and orchestra (in A minor, op. 28) by the Viennese imposer, Carl Goldmark, and to the rendition of the violin part by Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concert-meister of the orchestra. It is a long time, in fact, since composer and executant together gave such unalloyed artistic delight to a New York audience. Even with the memories of so many brilliant visitors, last of all Sarasate with his splendid virtuosity, the playing of the Goldmark concerto by Mr. Kneisel and the Nikisch orchestra will long be remembered as an example of splendid artistic achievement. For once, the charm of melody, the pure beauty of sound, the chaste delicacy of musical workmanship, were permitted full exposition.

In his concerts for violin Herr Goldmark has written a work that will live. It is one which the virtuoso will avoid, because it does not afford enough opportunities for pyrotechnical display, but it will be welcomed wherever the love of music for itself, in its purity, its beauty, is present in artist and audience. All through Herr Goldmark has kept the orchestra in its proper place, and Herr Nikisch can be sincerely praised for not overstepping the bounds set by the composer.

The last two movements of the concerto are the best. The violin solo work in the second movement, the andante, is extremely lovely, almost poetic and original in its long-drawn-out beauties, even though it does occasionally infringe upon the domain of the Prize Song in "Meistersinger." Throughout the melodiousness is never lost sight of, and its beauty is set forth deliciously by the background of orchestral coloring.

The success of the number was gained by Mr. Kneisel in the third movement in the cadenza, after which the audience, without daring to disturb the progress of the concerto, burst into a well-defined but only half expressed murmur of astonished delight. The cadenza was one of the greatest difficulty, and could have afforded more opportunity for display perhaps, but Mr. Kneisel proved himself too good an artist to forget for a moment the demand for the dignity, and artistic exposition of the composer's ideas. Mr. Kneisel's tone is not large, but it is always true and pure, perhaps even to coldness. His octaves were exceedingly clean. He is an absolute master of technique, which, however, is entirely submerged in artistic truthfulness. If he lacks anything it is in poetic expression, perhaps. But one can't have everything. Mr. Kneisel had an ovation at the conclusion of the work and was called back four or five times.

Mr. Nikisch conducted the orchestral portion of the work with great care and was heard to best advantage in the Haydn Symphony, in D major, where the strings for which the Boston musicians became famous under Gericke, had the burden of the work. At the next concert of the Boston Symphony Society here on Jan. 13, Mme. Nikisch, the wife of the conductor, will make her first appearance as the vocal soloist.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There was great matter in the eighth concert Saturday evening, if some of it (the smaller portion) was indifferent. A great overture by Beethoven, not the less great for being short, and a great symphony of Schumann outweigh a deal of commoner metal. Here is the programme:

Beethoven—Overture, "Coriolan."
Goldmark—Concerto for violin, in A minor, op. 28. (First time).
Grieg—Two melodies for string orchestra. (First time).
Schumann—Symphony in C, No. 2, op. 61.
Soloist, Franz Kneisel.

Beethoven's overture, composed for Collin's tragedy (a German Shakspeare!) may as well be taken for his concise, intense, fiery embodiment in music of the character, the personality of the passionate, proud, conquering, fated Roman hero in himself, not as presented by any dramatist. What a concentrated fire glows and flashes in this music! The opening chords smite like thunderbolts. It is Jupiter Tonans, full of wrath. The little short-breathed broken phrases of the first motive show a troubled atmosphere; the more deliberate, sweeter, pleading melody that follows suggests, if you will, the mother and the wife and children at his feet in the battlefield, imploring mercy for Rome. The quick, fiery utterances flash out again and again with stern brief emphasis. At last the tempest of the proud soul is spent, he bows to the inevitable, and those opening thunderclaps die off in the distance amid haunting phrases of the softer melodies. How soon it has all passed! How much there is in that little! All that could be put into a five-act tragedy oven of our own Shakspeare! And the greatest wonder is, it is all beautiful; a consummate, fascinating whole of most ideal art, teres et rotundus, as perfect as a globe of crystal. It takes a genius like Beethoven to tell a story so; have any of the new school moderns done it? The rendering of the "Coriolan" seemed to us faultless, well considered at all points, a triumph of true effect.

The violin concerto of Goldmark sins very little in the way of modern extravagances; there is nothing coarse or boisterous about it; and only occasionally, seldom in fact, does it sound far-fetched. There is a sweet and gentle mood predominating throughout its three long movements. But it is long, without obvious necessity or reason. Tiresomely long, prolix, is the first movement (Allegro moderato,) while it is full of graceful, flowery phrasing, long drawn out without flaw, as if pleased with itself, making a sort of "endless melody" (not just in the Wagner sense) which must be grateful to the finished, self-poised, even and unfailing virtuoso violinist. The orchestration, too, is good. But often we caught ourself questioning the raison d'être; especially where suddenly a brusque fugue sets in emphatically. The theme is immediately answered in four parts; but where you expect a working-up, you are mystified by something turbulent and un-fugue-like; and all this is a prelude to—what? To a short cadenza. Now, a fugue, occurring in the course of a long movement, usually either ushers in something of importance or it forms the concise and stately peroration to things already presented in a simpler way; or it is a whole movement by itself, like the fugue on four subjects which constitutes the finale of Mozart's greatest symphony, which they call the "Jupiter." But to employ all the classical and ceremonious dignity of a fugue to introduce a mere cadenza, followed by indefinite length of sentimental but serene cantabile!—so much of it that one began to wonder whether we were not already in the air (Andante) promised for the second movement. No, that came distinct and positive enough, with a pleasing melody of its own and quite expressive, till in its turn it grew prolix. The third movement is built on two melodies (Moderato and Allegretto), brings out the solo violinist with great brilliancy, has a long cadenza, greater fulness of orchestration, and ends with a tutti. Mr. Kneisel's achievement of the sustained, exacting task was masterly throughout; his tone always beautiful, refined and pure; and the music passed for all that it is worth through the hands of such an interpreter. He was applauded to the echo, and it must have cost him quite a little martyrdom to respond to the insatiable recalls.

The two melodies by Grieg had not a little beauty, especially the second. They sounded charmingly as played by all the strings, leaving off the double basses. It is surprising how much of tone color there is in strings alone.

The great Schumann Symphony in C was one of the signal triumphs of Nikisch and his orchestra. Schumann's first (B flat) Symphony was composed at the age of thirty-one in 1841. The same year witnessed the production of the greater part of the one in D minor, which was finished several years afterward and now counts as No. 4, besides the "Overture, Scherzo and Finale," which is almost equivalent to a symphony. This one in C is properly the third, written in 1845-46. The proper No. 4, in E flat, called the "Cologne" or "Rhenish" symphony, was written in 1850. The C-major Symphony, which was first ventured before a Boston audience in the first season of the Harvard concerts in 1866 was perhaps the most recondite and beyond the general comprehension of all Schumann's symphonies. It is now listened to with a sincere, unflagging interest. At that time it was contemptuously dismissed by all the London critics (Athenæum, Times, Musical World, etc.) as a long, elaborate, obscure work of the "mystical," "involved," "transcendental," "unintelligible" Schumann. It is very different now even there; while here all his four symphonies have long been sure of frequent welcome. This in C strikes a deeper and a graver chord of thought and feeling than the others. The first Allegro, with its sombre, brooding, stately and determined introduction, is found the least clear and satisfactory portion of the work. It is commonly understood, and we have Schumann's word for it, that he wrote it in a morbid period, when his brain was affected after illness, and that it even had its inspiration in the struggle of the will to overcome the physical infirmity. It is wonderfully worked out; with what a persistency of purpose is shown by the fact that nearly the whole work is kept in the key of C major, the Adagio, to be sure, beginning in C minor, but gravitating back midway to the major again, and the first Trio seeking a gayer atmosphere for awhile in G. The slow introduction quickens after a few bars into a brighter melody, anticipating the Allegro before it formally arrives. And here those "sudden twitches" of the first violins from very high to very low notes suggest neuralgic spasms. But once fairly launched upon the Allegro, the more main theme there gets the better of the restless elements and we realize the unity and

The Scherzo is the most telling movement, its half playful, half sad rapid subject, based on the chord of the diminished seventh is charmingly relieved by the cheery spring-like triplets of the first Trio, and again by the calm, even flow of the second Trio (at home once more in the key of C) offset by the running staccato prattle of the viola and 'cello parts, and led back by delicate and curious contrapuntal paths into the principal subject of the Scherzo.

The Adagio is divine: tender and profound in feeling, high and spiritual in thought, warm and delicate in color; the syncopated chords of the violas suggesting a half-suppressed flutter of agitation beneath the smoothly flowing heartfelt melody, which soars and soars into the highest heaven of the violins, and drops back semitone by semitone through long full bar trills as if in swooning spiritual ecstacy. It is one of the most beautiful, most noble, loftily conceived Adagios. How few could ever write a great Adagio!

The exceedingly swift finale (molto vivace) has an irrepressible, exhaustless energy. If the two middle movements are the most enchanting, this is the most exciting. It almost takes your breath away; Schumann had here what Beethoven might have called a "raptus." And Beethoven would not have disowned him. Steadily, by force of genius and of true and resolute devotion, he won admission into the august circle of the Dii majores of the art of music. Even Englishmen now own him.

It has been the fashion to speak slightingly of Schumann's instrumentation. Did it not sound impressively and grandly on Saturday evening? Did it lack color, richness, power and searching quality? Did it not bring great thoughts before us in a noble, brilliant and befitting dress? The execution and interpretation were of the best that we have had of any symphony (so far as we were under favor of a self-suppressing drummer).

There will be no symphony concert next week. On Saturday, the 20th, Miss Emma Thursby will sing, and the orchestral works will be the "Academic Overture" of Brahms, variations on a theme of Schubert by Richard Heuberger, and the "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart.

J. S. D.

Sunday Night Entertainments.

If unstinted applause is a measure of success, then the performers in the eighth concert in the Music Hall popular series had reason to be well satisfied last evening. The programme that contributed to this pleasing result was made up as follows:

Overture, "Martha".....Flotow
Boston Orchestral Club.
Aria, Di Provenza (from "La Traviata").....Verdi
Giuseppe Del Puente.
Jewel Song from "Faust".....Gounod
Miss Ida Klein.
Solo for violoncello.....
Leo Schulz.
Aria, Cielo e mar, from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Italo Campanini.
Serenade.....Hofman
Boston Orchestral Club.
Songs — "From flower to flower," and "Why?".....Del Puente
Mr. Del Puente.
Song—Vorrei Morire.....Tosti
Mr. Campanini.
Song—"Spring is here".....Jensen
Miss Klein.
Hungarian Dance.....Brahms
Boston Orchestral Club.
Trio from "I Lombardi".....Verdi
Miss Klein, Mr. Campanini, Mr. Del Puente.
Overture, "Pique Dame".....Suppe
Boston Orchestral Club.

The greatest favor was shown to Mr. Del Puente, whose artistic rendering of his two songs was rewarded with a double recall. Campanini's reception was but a trifle less cordial and his second number was accorded a similar compliment. Miss Klein gave Marguerite's song with a grace and archness of expression and a purity of tone that were very captivating and Mr. Schulz gave a fine exhibition of his skill. A feature of the evening was the first appearance of the Boston Orchestral Club, which at once won favor with the audience. The club is composed of the following-named gentlemen: E. Fiedler, J. Hoffman, violins; S. Goldstein, viola; L. Schulz, violoncello; A. Goldstein, contra-bass; E. M. Heindl, flute. There was an audience of good size, but not large enough to fill the hall.

Clipping from Transcript
Baltimore Md
Date 12-7.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

First Concert of the Series in This City to be Given Friday.

Finding it impossible to secure dates for a series of evening concerts at any of the theatres in Baltimore and there not being any hall large enough to accommodate the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the central portion of the city, Manager Ellis was about to abandon his contemplated series of concerts in Baltimore the present season, when he fortunately secured the Concordia Opera House for the needed dates.

The hall is well known as one of the best in the city for concert purposes, and with the additional stage room to be provided, will be well adapted to the requirements of this large organization. The hall has been refitted, and will be in fine trim for the first event, which takes place on Friday evening next.

The soloist will be Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, who is a great favorite among the musical people of Baltimore, as well as in New York and Boston. Among the other soloists to be heard during the season are Vladimir de Pachman, the Russian pianist, the unrivaled interpreter of Chopin, and Mme. Arthur Nikisch, the eminent prima donn. soprano from the Leipzig Grand Opera, who makes her first American concert tour during the present season.

The programmes to be offered are of the highest order, including some of the most effective modern works as well as the best of the Beethoven symphonies and other works of the strictly classic period.

For the first concert, on next Friday evening, a superb programme is offered, beginning with the Beethoven symphony in E flat, No. 3, (the Heroic). This is to be followed by Saint-Saens's concerto for piano, the soloist being Madam Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler. Then comes a brilliant scherzo capricioso, by Dvorak, the concert ending with Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso." The sale of single tickets will begin on Wednesday morning.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1890.

Eighth Symphony Concert.
Frank Kneisel, Soloist.

The programme of the eighth Symphony concert was:

Beethoven.....Overture, "Coriolanus"
Goldmark...Concerto for Violin, in A minor, Op. 28
Allegro moderato.
Air (Andante).
Moderato; Allegretto.
(First time in Boston.)
Grieg.....Two Melodies for String Orchestra
Schumann.....Symphony in C major, No. 2, Op. 61

Wagner thought Beethoven's "Coriolanus" a masterpiece among the masterpieces of a master. When Mr. Nikisch completed a reading of it at the first concert of last season it was admitted on all sides that never before here had the great dramatic force of the composition been so well displayed; the performance of last Saturday lacked but little of the stern incisiveness of the earlier one. The concerto is an ably written violin composition. Goldmark originally intended solely to pursue the study and practice of the violin, and although turned from his purpose by a not unkind decree of fate, his mastery of the instrument acquired during his youth enables him to write for it now with special effectiveness. The work had not been played in the country before Saturday evening. Its bright particular moment is the slow movement, which rests upon a single melodic idea simply treated. The finale is also an attractive portion, evincing rather more care and detail in the accompaniment than the composer shows elsewhere in the work. Thematically the allegro moderato is strong, and despite over development the musical interest in it is well sustained. A striking cadenza occurs in the last movement, which adds the finishing touch of virtuosity to a work which, lacking depth of idea, is interesting to hear, and as a vehicle for the display of technique most gratifying to the performer. Mr. Kneisel achieved the greatest popular success of his career here, and he played splendidly at all points; yet it is in such works as the Beethoven and Brahms concertos that this soulful artist is at his best. As a matter of record it should be said that he was recalled four times.

The pieces by Grieg were added to the programme at the last moment; the fact illustrates the indecision and lack of method of our conductor in the important item of programme-making. Before the season is over, Mr. Nikisch will, we dare say, have earned the verdict of having been a catholic conductor as regards schools—more so than Mr. Gericke—but it cannot so easily be prophesied that in the juxtaposition of representative compositions he proceeds with a proper amount of deliberation or taste. The Grieg pieces were played at the Boston Symphony concert of Feb. 3, 1883, Mr. Henschel conductor. They are respectively called "Heartwounds" and "Spring," and considering the limitations of the vehicle the composer chooses, are extremely expressive. As an interpreter of Schumann Mr. Nikisch is a master. Surpassing his reading of either the "Rhenish" or the D minor, was that of the more subtle symphony in C, played on Saturday. Lack of space prevents our writing at length of what was a masterly delineation of Schumann, who, perhaps, in this work more than any other puts his soul into music. The performance was noble; in expressive power great, in point of technique admirable. There will be no concert this week. Miss Emma Thursby will be the soloist on Dec. 20, when the orchestra will play Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony; Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture, and a Theme and Variations by a Viennese youngster named Henberger.

The Symphony Orchestra is away this week for five concerts. Mr. Kneisel will be the soloist in New Haven, New York and Philadelphia, playing the Goldmark concerto; Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler will play St. Saens's G minor, piano concerto in Baltimore and Washington.

At the Music Hall concert last night, Sig. Campanini, Sig. Del Puente, and Miss Ida Klein sang; Mr. Leo. Schultz, 'cellist, played, and there was instrumental music by a sextette, strings, and flute, which style themselves the Boston Orchestral Club. There is already an existing local organization having the name, we mean Mr. Chadwick's orchestra and chorus, and while on some accounts the adoption of the same name by the very excellent artists who made their debut last night may not occasion trouble,

Clipping from American Philadelphia Pa
Date 12-7

The programme of the second Boston Symphony Concert, which will take place at the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, consists entirely of music recognized as belonging to the romantic school. Schumann's symphony in B flat is indeed a classic, but Schumann is pre-eminently a romanticist, his music being distinguished by all that richness of color, complexity of instrumentation, fervor of sentiment and freedom of method which are the characteristic features of the modern or romantic school of composition. Liszt's "symphonic poem" of "Tasso" is of course musical romanticism in its extreme development, while Dvorak and Goldmark, who are represented respectively by a "Scherzo Capriccioso and a violin concerto, are two of the most eminent of the living composers who have sought to express in music the complex feeling and the passion for sensuous beauty which mark the intellectual and emotional tendencies of this "fin de siecle." The Goldmark Concerto is new here, and as it will be played by Mr. Franz Kneisel it is sure of a worthy interpretation. As the affinities of Mr. Nikisch are rather with the romantic than with the classic school, Wednesday's concert promises to be rarely interesting and enjoyable.

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, DEC. 10, 1890.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

It is a familiar assertion that Homer sometimes indulged in the questionable practice of nodding. When one becomes accustomed to see something very like perfection in a certain quarter the slightest lapse from it seems larger than considerable defects in places where deficiency is common. It is probably for this reason that the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given at Chickering Hall last night, did not afford that unmarred pleasure which the performances of this admirable organization usually do.

In the treatment of the Haydn symphony in D major, (No. 2 in the Breitkopf & Härtel edition,) with which the concert began, there seemed to be slight departures from the fine unity and precision which have come to be regarded as salient and unfailing characteristics of the playing of the gentlemen of Boston, and there were one or two unfortunate technical slips at critical moments in the wood and brass. In the last movement the band recovered its wonted spirit and played as it can play. Of Mr. Nikisch's reading of the pleasant composition only praise can be spoken. It was graceful, cheerful, smooth, and amiable; and these adjectives indicate the prominent qualities of the mass of Haydn's instrumental writing.

The Liszt symphonic poem, with which the concert closed, has certainly been played with greater finish by the Boston organization, and most New-York music lovers would be disposed to find some fault with any local orchestra which did not treat the work with more spirit than it was treated with last night. However, it is hardly worth while to mourn an imperfect performance of "Tasso." It is only buncombe, and very poor buncombe at that. The Dvorak "Scherzo Capriccioso," an orchestral virtuoso piece of genuine musical beauty, aroused the orchestra, and its performance was worthy of the warm and unqualified praise which is generally all that can be written of the playing of Mr. Nikisch's forces.

The soloist last evening was Franz Kneisel, the accomplished leader of the first violins. He chose for his efforts the new violin concerto in A minor, Opus 28, of Carl Goldmark, a composer whose activity and talent are making their impress on current musical thought. From the "Prometheus Bound" overture to the violin concerto, however, is a far cry. It is with genuine disappointment that the statement must be made that the new composition did not make a profound impression. It is extremely poor in thematic ideas, and the composer has vainly striven to give interest to his work by difficult and showy passages for the solo instrument, which bears the chief burden of the labor.

The three movements are cast in conventional mold, the first being an allegro built on a smoothly-innocuous bit of cantabile, the second an air, in which there is a tendency to imitate the Bach style without any of the Bach depth, and the third a feebly Mendelssohnian allegretto, which is provided with a troublesome, rhapsodic cadenza, full of technical obstacles, but devoid of real musical interest. It was quite natural that Mr. Kneisel should gladly seize upon what seemed a promising novelty for his instrument, but the Goldmark concerto will probably not find a permanent place in his répertoire. For the soloist's playing there can be nothing but words of praise. His tone, while not large, was delicious in its smoothness, roundness, and purity. His stopping was very accurate and his bowing excellent, and he performed the entire work with warm feeling and artistic finish. His rendering of the difficult cadenza above mentioned was a fine lesson in violin technics. He achieved a brilliant and well-merited success with the audience, being recalled enthusiastically four times.

NEW YORK HERALD,

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 10,

BOSTON'S SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A VIOLIN CONCERTO BY GOLDMARK MUCH APPLAUDED.

The second concert in the series of four given here this winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Chickering Hall last night in the presence of an enthusiastic audience that crowded the building.

When the Boston Orchestra first played here under Mr. Gericke's direction three years ago, New York's music lovers were surprised at the perfection shown, but rather averse to acknowledging that another American city possessed any musical organization of which the metropolis could be jealous. Such a feeling existed, and was perfectly natural. It did not, however, prevent the Boston Orchestra's concerts from receiving generous and constantly increasing support, for, while the first year's concerts were given at a loss, there was a substantial profit last winter, and this year the subscribers to the series practically take the whole house.

That there is every good reason for this remarkable patronage of an outside orchestra in a town already surfeited with good music I have had occasion to say many times before. In certain respects the work of the Boston orchestra under Mr. Nikisch surpasses even that of our far-famed Philharmonic Society. We have no such beauty of color in the strings and no such delicacy.

I doubt whether the Haydn symphony in D major was ever played better in this city than last night, certainly not in this generation, and yet Mr. Thomas has given some interpretations of these echoes of old fashioned daintiness which were all but perfection in spirit as well as execution.

Mr. Franz Kneisel, the excellent leader of this orchestra's violins, played a Goldmark concerto in A minor, a work of considerable but not extraordinary interest, and won much well deserved applause. Like everything of Goldmark, the concerto is technically admirable. Mr. Kneisel's tone is small, but it is pure, true and of exquisite quality. In the second of the concerto's three movements, an andante, and in a final cadenza of immense difficulty he was particularly successful and fairly earned the four recalls he received.

Divorak's brilliant and fascinating scherzo capriccioso, and Liszt's concoction of sound and fury, known as the "Lament and Triumph of Tasso," are both more than familiar to our concert goers.

The very perfection of the orchestra's work, which gave a new meaning to the quaint loveliness of the Haydn symphony, served to make the emptiness of Liszt's symphonic poem all the more apparent.

[56]

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Of all the programmes that have been interested in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra it may be questioned if any one has been as admirably fitted as yesterday's to place in the strongest light the sympathetic and plastic nature, and the technical proficiency of Mr. Nikisch's forces.

Content to rest for a while upon the impression wrought by his previous performance of the "Eroica," Mr. Nikisch last night made up his list of selections from works constructed on less majestic lines, and revealed himself and his band through the medium of Haydn's fluent and sparkling tunefulness, Goldmark's weird and changing harmonies, Dvorak's Oriental color, and Liszt's alternately sensuous and pompous strains. The four numbers rendered at Chickering Hall last evening were Haydn's D major, Symphony No. 2 (B. & H.), Goldmark's A minor concerto, Dvorak's "Scherzo Capriccioso," and Liszt's "Tasso."

An audience that filled every seat in the hall, and that, as to representative quality, has certainly not been seen in the concert room this season, was in attendance.

By reason of its novelty, Goldmark's violin concerto was awaited with most interest. A definite opinion of its worth can scarcely be expressed after a single hearing, the brief second movement, however, appealing at once to the listener through its melodiousness, which was brought out in the strongest manner by the perfect execution of Mr. Franz Kneisel. In this division of the work the composer does not depend solely upon restless harmonies and contrasts of instrumental timbres, and a happy and somewhat uncommon inspiration has enabled him to impart to it a sustained poetic charm that needs no analysis to diffuse itself with irresistible eloquence. This is not exactly the case with the opening allegro, or with the final moderato and allegretto. That should, all the same, be made familiar to the auditor through three or four performances. Their first impression is indefinite, the part of the solo instrument suggesting vividly a long series of violin exercises upon a harmonic background of that mystic and mournful tone distinguishing most of Goldmark's writings. In the first movement one was at a loss which to commend most enthusiastically—the virtuosity of the soloist or the exquisite delicacy of the orchestral accompaniment. The andante Mr. Kneisel had, so to speak, all to himself, and it was the flawless episode of his achievement.

The orchestra reached its highest point of perfection in the "Scherzo Capriccioso." This composition has often been rendered by resident musicians, and its slancio and brilliancy have, as a rule, had adequate exposition. It was reserved for Mr. Nikisch to present it as a tone-picture of intense richness, and, withal, faultless balance of color; to lose no particle of the brightness of the Eastern hues of the fabric, and to lay on with infinite lightness the softer tints; to combine, in a word, splendor and softness of color, and grace and swing of rhythm. The present generation of music lovers has enjoyed no orchestral playing to be compared with this effort of the band's last night, and Liszt's "Tasso," with its sharper contrasts and swift passages from elegiac song to martial clangor, was quite as felicitously given.

Haydn's symphony in D minor, with which the concert began, was rendered with precision and simplicity, and with no striving after theatric effect. Nothing would have been gained by imparting to it aught of the modern accent, and Mr. Nikisch judiciously kept to the traditional tempos and shading, leaving the composer to speak for himself. It is curious and edifying now and then to listen to Haydn, and to other ancient worthies, but there is no denying that retrogression, if instructive, is seldom impressive or inviting.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT.

Philadelphia, Thursday, Dec. 11, 1890.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Academy of Music was filled last night almost to its seating capacity by lovers of good music, and they were well rewarded for their attendance. The music of finely wrought bits that Schumann put together as his first (B-flat) symphony; the fanciful rhapsodic and highly characteristic "Scherzo Capriccioso" of Dvorak, and Liszt's "Tasso" symphonic poem, with its intense—not to say sensational contrasts—were played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with such precision, feeling and finish as that organization has rarely if ever before exhibited at any of its concerts. It would be a needless consumption of space and the reader's time to multiply praiseful terms over the superb effectiveness of the band in any particular portion of the list, as it would be ungenerous, almost hypercritical, indeed, to dwell upon the very few shortcomings that were to be noted. It need only be added that Mr. Nikisch, who again conducted the orchestral numbers without as much as glancing at a note, gave of each a reading that, while now and then marked by individual conceptions, was comprehensive, animated, and highly satisfying throughout.

The novelty was a violin concerto in A minor by Goldmark, the brilliant Austrian's twenty-eighth opus, which proved a fairly interesting entertainment, without having special fitness for the modern classics with which it was grouped. It is in three movements, each unnecessarily protracted considering the effects achieved, but all of delicate cut and musician-like workmanship. Franz Kneisel, the concert-meister of the band, was the soloist. He showed in every part of it the mastery of an accomplished artist, if not the brilliant distinction of a great one, playing with beauty and refinement rather than with warmth and breadth of tone. The hearty demonstrations that greeted him at the close of the concert compelled his reappearance repeatedly before the house.

[illegible]

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1890.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

An Excellent Concert at the Academy of Music Last Evening.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at the Academy to an audience surprisingly large considering that the holiday season is on. The concert was a thoroughly enjoyable one, although devoid of novelties with one exception. The symphony was Schumann's No. 1, in B flat (the Spring Symphony), the first of the composer's maturer works, and one which, although in some respects destitute of the finish of his later years, is free from the defects of those later works in which the themes become too much involved. Mr. Nikisch has his own ideas about this symphony. From the joyous paan which burst forth in the opening measures to the last note of the inspiring allegro he has shown originality in its treatment. Inconspicuous as is the bass in this orchestra, it is not made full use of in the andante, whereas we are accustomed to hear this feature predominate. It cannot be said that Mr. Nickish's ideas are open to criticism since, with the wealth of strings and wood wind at his command he gives the joyous theme and its variations with a richness and delicacy withal that leaves little to be desired. Mr. Nickish never allows one instrument to drown another and in this lies the great charm of his conducting. One is able to take in the whole orchestra, which few conductors are willing to permit us to do.

The concerto for violin and orchestra was in some respects a disappointment. Mr. Franz Kneisel is a thorough violinist, who plays with great purity and an excellent finish. But the work of the evening, Goldmark's concerto in A minor, was scarcely suited to illustrate his playing at his best. He played with extreme delicacy, but without dramatic fervor at any time. The orchestration is a portion of the original work and is more than a mere incidental accompaniment. In fact, the virtuoso part was little more than that of a first violin. It was delightful nevertheless and Mr. Kneisel was given four recalls.

The novelty of the evening was the Scherzo Capriccioso of Dvorak. Nowadays no concert is complete without a Slav number. This composition is strikingly original, wholly unconventional and full of Slavonic impetuosity.

The concluding number was Listz's familiar symphonic poem "Tasso," which was a favorite of Mr. Gericke. The trials and triumphs of the Italian poet, as narrated by the great German pianist, were admirably interpreted by the orchestra, ending in that grand swell of triumphant hope which closed a thoroughly delightful concert.

The Philadelphia Press.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

The audience that welcomed the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening was large and enthusiastic. From the beginning it was evident that the hearers were heartily in sympathy with the conductor and his admirably-drilled men. Schumann's Symphony in B flat, op. 23, which the composer himself calls his "Spring Symphony," was the first number. This was composed during the happiest period of Schumann's life, and his feelings are written in every principal theme. The work was dedicated to Adolph Bottger, as it was to one of that poet's works that Schumann felt he owed his inspiration for this his first effort in the line of symphonic work on a grand scale. It certainly is a marvel of beauty, and shows what strides the composer, who hated "theory pure and simple," had made. It was first performed under Mendelssohn's direction at the Gewandhaus, Leipzig, on March 31, 1841, having been composed but a short time before.

The ideas contained in the work are thoroughly Schumannesque, yet built up on a good classic foundation. The motto phrase, given out by the horns and trumpets, broke the stillness, which, entering in with the energetic leading subject was heard cropping out from time to time with a precision that was worthy of comment. The clarinets soon entered with the second subject, as plaintive and tender as the first was vigorous, thereby giving a beautiful contrast. The development with its subsidiary themes was beautifully played by the orchestra. The slow movement in E flat, in which the melody is given out first by the violins, then by the violoncellos, and lastly by the oboes and horns, was thoroughly enjoyable. The "Scherzo," with its two trios, was brim-full of happy feeling. The last movement, opening like the first, with a motto phrase, this time given with the full force of the orchestra, received an effective rendering. After listening to the work, it seems scarcely possible that Schumann could have penned all these beautiful thoughts in four days.

The expectancy of the audience was at its height when Franz Kneisel, the leading violinist of the orchestra, stepped upon the stage to interpret Goldmark's concerto for violin and orchestra in A minor, Op. 28. He omitted the first movement, and proceeded at once with the andante. Even the most critical must have been pleased with interpretation of this beautiful air, which, while not calling for the display of the last movement, was enjoyable on account of the lovely thought contained in the song-like theme itself. The last movement, partaking somewhat of a gypsy-like character, is brilliantly written for the solo instrument, and the scoring is more varied and interesting than in the remainder of the work. Mr. Kneisel played this tripping allegretto with ease, his long cadenza giving a chance for the display of his powers as a virtuoso. The orchestra sustained the player admirably.

Dvorak's Scherzo Capriccioso, Op. 66, with its peculiar color and rythms, made a pleasant break in the programme at this point, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo" was a brilliant ending to this delightful musical evening.

NORTH AMERICAN. PHILADELPHIA. THURSDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1890

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT THE ACADEMY.

MRS. KENDAL IN A NEW ROLE

What There Is to Be Seen and Enjoyed at the Various Theatres Just Now, With a Glance at Next Week's Programme.

The usual crowd of well-dressed and intelligent people who attend upon such occasions filled the Academy of Music last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, gave the second of its concerts for the current season. There were four numbers on the programme, every one of which was representative of the modern or romantic school of composition, and by the time the last selection had been reached most listeners must have had enough of the elaborate instrumentation, the constant straining after effect, the exaggerated emphasis and the chromatic restlessness distinctive of modern music in its latest development. After the extraordinary fire and passion of Dvorak's Scherzo Capricioso, which alternately suggests the wild revelry of a Walpurgis Night and the under-current of melancholy which attends the infrequent merry-making of a down-trodden and suffering people, after that piece of musical dissipation, something restful and soothing; some tranquil, pellucid stream of simple melody from the well-springs of Haydn or Mozart, would have been grateful and salutary. Instead of that, what followed was Liszt's symphonic poem of Tasso, with its high colors, its grandiloquent phrases, its insistent demand upon the attention and imagination of the audience, and so people went away feeling that modern music is one of those good things of which it is possible and even easy to have too much. There can, however, be nothing but praise for the work of the orchestra and its conductor. The symphony, that by Schumann in B flat, known as the "Spring" symphony, had a most sympathetic and effective rendering, and every number was played by the orchestra with all due effect. Perhaps the most brilliant work of the evening was done in the Dvorak Scherzo Capricioso. This composition, which had not before been heard here, is one of great difficulty, but it was given with splendid force and fire, and with all the abandonment, with all the ebb and flow of rhythmic impluse necessary to make clear its meaning and express its sentiment. The soloist was Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concert-master of the orchestra, who was heard in a not particularly interesting violin concerto by Goldmark. Mr. Kneisel has a beautifully smooth and delicate tone, and is a player of faultless technique, but a little more breadth and force are necessary to make his playing properly effective. Perhaps some of the trouble was with his instrument, which has the sweetness and the weakness of a Steiner.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, DECEMBER 11, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Performance Last Night and Some That Are to Come.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Academy of Music last night before a large audience. The programme opened with Schumann's first symphony in B flat, to which Mr. Nikisch gave a very delicate though somewhat colorless interpretation. Goldmark's recent violin concerto in A minor, a work of decided poetical quality, was played by Mr. Kneisel with absolutely faultless execution and an entire absence of animation. As an exhibition of the minute technics of the violin, the concertmeister's performance was admirable, but some light and shade, some accent or expression, would have been welcomed, even at the cost of an occasional faulty intonation. The other novelty was a "scherzo capriccioso" by Dvorak, something in the nature of the so-called rhapsody, and extremely bright, melodious and original. It was perhaps the more welcome last night because it absolutely required some animation in its performance. The concert closed with Liszt's meandering "Tasso."

The Adamowski Quartette will give its next concert in Haseltine's gallery on Saturday afternoon, when Mrs. Nikisch, the wife of the conductor, will make her first appearance here. Mrs. Nikisch was an operatic singer of rank at Cologne, Leipsic and Cassel, but retired from the stage upon her marriage, though she has continued to sing occasionally in concert. She will sing next Saturday a number of modern German songs. The instrumental programme includes a Beethoven quartette and one of Volkmann.

The concert of the Marine Band from Washington will take place at the Academy on Saturday evening, when Mr. Sousa will produce his new symphonic poem of "The Chariot Race." The soloists will be Camilla Urso and Mr. Auty.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, December 11, 1890.

Boston Symphony Concert.

Director Arthur Nikisch and his instrumentalists appeared at the Academy of Music last evening before an overflowing house. The fashionable element was out in full force, while balcony and galleries were crowded with the sincere lovers of harmony. For these latter there was Schumann's lovely B flat symphony, while Dvorak's gymnastic "Scherzo Capriccioso" and Liszt's "Tasso" symphonic poem supplied an equally artistic, if less tuneful, element to the programme. Franz Kneisel, a violinist of solid attainments and flawless technique, contributed the solo in Goldmark's concerto for violin and full orchestra. In this score the sensuous and fertile imagination of the composer runs riot among all the varied forms of harmony, and, as Mr. Kneisel's style is well adapted to florid compositions, his rendering of the work was well nigh faultless. Mr. Nikisch conducted with energy, and under his baton the band developed an explosive quality in the forte passages that was unknown in Mr. Gericke's time. The latter inclined to repression; Mr. Nikisch leans toward effusiveness.

BOSTON HERALD.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston public, which takes so much interest in the Symphony concerts given in this city, may be interested to learn what their late conductor, Mr. Gericke, says about their success since his return to his native Vienna. He states that in the first year of his enterprise Mr. Higginson lost $20,000, and during the second $40,000; but that the tide has now turned, and the profits of this season are estimated at $15,000 above the expenses. Last season almost $100,000 was spent on these concerts by Bostonians. Yet so great is their popularity that this amount is eagerly paid by the people, and enough besides to give that handsome profit above stated. No one will envy Mr. Higginson its possession; indeed, it will require several years, probably, for him to make up his early losses. He entered upon the enterprise with no thought or expectation of anything but pecuniary loss attending it, and he never has spared expense in any respect to give the public the series of concerts of the highest artistic character which has resulted.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, DEC. 12.

CAPTURED THE CAPITOL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Delight Washington Elite.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11.—An overflowing and extremely fashionable audience greeted Herr Nikisch this evening when he raised his baton over the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Members of the cabinet, senators, representatives and the elite of fashionable society formed the representative gathering.

The programme was as follows: Weber, overture, "Oberon;" Saint-Saens, concerto for piano and orchestra in G minor; Schubert, Symphony No. 8 in B minor (unfinished); Liszt, symphonic poem, "Tasso Lamento e Trionfo."

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler was the soloist, and her rendition of the Saint-Saens concerto created a furore. Her execution and phrasing are remarkable.

The Oberon overture was rendered with the most exquisite grace and delicacy, which brought out all its lights and shades in the most characteristic manner. But it is such a work as the Schubert symphony in which the orchestra appears to the best advantage.

Tribune, New York.

Date 12-16

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Unless one chooses to indulge in platitudes concerning the playing of the band, the sweet simplicity and cheeriness of Haydn's D-major symphony, the brilliancy of Dvorak's unique composition entitled "Scherzo Capriccioso" which is played in New-York quite as often as Beethoven's Symphony in C-minor, and that gorgeous, pompous, strutting and pretentious symphonic poem in which Liszt wished the world to recognize a lament for the sufferings of Tasso and a celebration of his tardy triumph, there is not much to be said about the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place in Chickering Hall last night. It is true there was a novelty in the list of pieces which invited a twofold interest from the fact that it was a violin concerto by Goldmark which had never been heard in public in New-York and was played by Mr. Kneisel, who stands high in the admiration of local music-lovers; but unhappily the work turned out to be one of such an indeterminate character that it made scarcely any impression, exciting neither a keen sensation of pleasure nor a profound feeling of disappointment. It was followed by several hearty rounds of applause, but these were plainly a tribute to the performer and were wholly deserved by the suave loveliness of his tone and the masterly manner in which he conquered the technical difficulties with which the solo part bristles. Solo violinists are harder put to it than any of their colleagues among musical virtuosi for new concert pieces, and it is small wonder that the work of so well equipped a composer as Goldmark should be taught up with eagerness, but we would hesitate to say that the new concerto is a valuable addition to violin literature, or one that will relieve the violinists of the embarrassment which they have labored under since Mendelssohn wrote his lovely concerto for Ferdinand David. It seems likely that the two works by Bruch will still be looked upon as going nearest to supplying the want. An excerpt [illegible] The last and very number was [illegible]

[57]

...WEDNESDAY
...DECEMBER 10, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Of all the programmes that have been interpreted in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra it may be questioned if any one has been as admirably fitted as yesterday's to place in the strongest light the sympathetic and plastic nature, and the technical proficiency of Mr. Nikisch's forces.

Content to rest for a while upon the impression wrought by his previous performance of the "Eroica," Mr. Nikisch last night made up his list of selections from works constructed on less majestic lines, and revealed himself and his band through the medium of Haydn's fluent and sparkling tunefulness, Goldmark's weird and changing harmonies, Dvorak's Oriental color, and Liszt's alternately sensuous and pompous strains. The four numbers rendered at Chickering Hall last evening were Haydn's D major, Symphony No. 2 (B. & H.), Goldmark's A minor concerto, Dvorak's "Scherzo Capriccioso," and Liszt's "Tasso."

An audience that filled every seat in the hall, and that, as to representative quality, has certainly not been seen in the concert room this season, was in attendance.

By reason of its novelty, Goldmark's violin concerto was awaited with most interest. A definite opinion of its worth can scarcely be expressed after a single hearing, the brief second movement, however, appealing at once to the listener through its melodiousness, which was brought out in the strongest manner by the perfect execution of Mr. Franz Kneisel. In this division of the work the composer does not depend solely upon restless harmonies and contrasts of instrumental timbres, and a happy and somewhat uncommon inspiration has enabled him to impart to it a sustained poetic charm that needs no analysis to diffuse itself with irresistible eloquence. This is not exactly the case with the opening allegro, or with the final moderato and allegretto. That should, all the same, be made familiar to the auditor through three or four performances. Their first impression is indefinite, the part of the solo instrument suggesting vividly a long series of violin exercises upon a harmonic background of that mystic and mournful tone distinguishing most of Goldmark's writings. In the first movement one was at a loss which to commend most enthusiastically—the virtuosity of the soloist or the exquisite delicacy of the orchestral accompaniment. The andante Mr. Kneisel had, so to speak, all to himself, and it was the flawless episode of his achievement.

The orchestra reached its highest point of perfection in the "Scherzo Capriccioso." This composition has often been rendered by resident musicians, and its slancio and brilliancy have, as a rule, had adequate exposition. It was reserved for Mr. Nikisch to present it as a tone-picture of intense richness, and, withal, faultless balance of color: to lose no particle of the brightness of the Eastern hues of the fabric, and to lay on with infinite lightness the softer tints; to combine, in a word, splendor and softness of color, and grace and swing of rhythm. The present generation of music lovers has enjoyed no orchestral playing to be compared with this effort of the band's last night, and Liszt's "Tasso," with its sharper contrasts and swift passages from elegiac song to martial clangor, was quite as felicitously given.

Haydn's symphony in D minor, with which the concert began, was rendered with precision and simplicity, and with no striving after theatric effect. Nothing would have been gained by imparting to it aught of the modern accent, and Mr. Nikisch judiciously kept to the traditional tempos and shading, leaving the composer to speak for himself. It is curious and edifying now and then to listen to Haydn, and to other ancient worthies, but there is no denying that retrogression, if instructive, is seldom impressive or inviting.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT.

Philadelphia, Thursday, Dec. 11, 1890.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Academy of Music was filled last night almost to its seating capacity by lovers of good music, and they were well rewarded for their attendance. The music of finely wrought bits that Schumann put together as his first (B-flat) symphony; the fanciful rhapsodic and highly characteristic "Scherzo Capriccioso" of Dvorak, and Liszt's "Tasso" symphonic poem, with its intense—not to say sensational contrasts—were played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with such precision, feeling and finish as that organization has rarely if ever before exhibited at any of its concerts. It would be a needless consumption of space and the reader's time to multiply praiseful terms over the superb effectiveness of the band in any particular portion of the list, as it would be ungenerous, almost hypercritical, indeed, to dwell upon the very few shortcomings that were to be noted. It need only be added that Mr. Nikisch, who again conducted the orchestral numbers without as much as glancing at a note, gave of each a reading that, while now and then marked by individual conceptions, was comprehensive, animated, and highly satisfying throughout.

The novelty was a violin concerto in A minor by Goldmark, the brilliant Austrian's twenty-eighth opus, which proved a fairly interesting entertainment, without having special fitness for the modern classics with which it was grouped. It is in three movements, each unnecessarily protracted considering the effects achieved, but all of delicate cut and musician-like workmanship. Franz Kneisel, the concert-meister of the band, was the soloist. He showed in every part of it the mastery of an accomplished artist, if not the brilliant distinction of a great one, playing with beauty and refinement rather than with warmth and breadth of tone. The hearty demonstrations that greeted him at the close of the concert compelled his reappearance repeatedly before the house.

Philadelphia Inquirer

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1890.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

An Excellent Concert at the Academy of Music Last Evening.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at the Academy to an audience surprisingly large considering that the holiday season is on. The concert was a thoroughly enjoyable one, although devoid of novelties with one exception. The symphony was Schumann's No. 1, in B flat (the Spring Symphony), the first of the composer's maturer works, and one which, although in some respects destitute of the finish of his later years, is free from the defects of those later works in which the themes become too much involved. Mr. Nikisch has his own ideas about this symphony. From the joyous pæan which burst forth in the opening measures to the last note of the inspiring allegro he has shown originality in its treatment. Inconspicuous as is the bass in this orchestra, it is not made full use of in the andante, whereas we are accustomed to hear this feature predominate. It cannot be said that Mr. Nickish's ideas are open to criticism since, with the wealth of strings and wood wind at his command he gives the joyous theme and its variations with a richness and delicacy withal that leaves little to be desired. Mr. Nickish never allows one instrument to drown another and in this lies the great charm of his conducting. One is able to take in the whole orchestra, which few conductors are willing to permit us to do.

The concerto for violin and orchestra was in some respects a disappointment. Mr. Franz Kneisel is a thorough violinist, who plays with great purity and an excellent finish. But the work of the evening, Goldmark's concerto in A minor, was scarcely suited to illustrate his playing at his best. He played with extreme delicacy, but without dramatic fervor at any time. The orchestration is a portion of the original work and is more than a mere incidental accompaniment. In fact, the virtuoso part was little more than that of a first violin. It was delightful nevertheless and Mr. Kneisel was given four recalls.

The novelty of the evening was the Scherzo Capriccioso of Dvorak. Nowadays no concert is complete without a Slav number. This composition is strikingly original, wholly unconventional and full of Slavonic impetuosity.

The concluding number was Listz's familiar symphonic poem "Tasso," which was a favorite of Mr. Gericke. The trials and triumphs of the Italian poet, as narrated by the great German pianist, were admirably interpreted by the orchestra, ending in that grand swell of triumphant hope which closed a thoroughly delightful concert.

The Philadelphia Press.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

The audience that welcomed the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening was large and enthusiastic. From the beginning it was evident that the hearers were heartily in sympathy with the conductor and his admirably-drilled men. Schumann's Symphony in B flat, op. 38, which the composer himself calls his "Spring Symphony," was the first number. This was composed during the happiest period of Schumann's life, and his feelings are written in every principal theme. The work was dedicated to Adolph Bottger, as it was to one of that poet's works that Schumann felt he owed his inspiration for this his first effort in the line of symphonic work on a grand scale. It certainly is a marvel of beauty, and shows what strides the composer, who hated "theory pure and simple," had made. It was first performed under Mendelssohn's direction at the Gewandhaus, Leipzig, on March 31, 1841, having been composed but a short time before.

The ideas contained in the work are thoroughly Schumannesque, yet built up on a good classic foundation. The motto phrase, given out by the horns and trumpets, broke the stillness, which, entering in with the energetic leading subject was heard cropping out from time to time with a precision that was worthy of comment. The clarinets soon entered with the second subject, as plaintive and tender as the first was vigorous, thereby giving a beautiful contrast. The development with its subsidiary themes was beautifully played by the orchestra. The slow movement in E flat, in which the melody is given out first by the violins, then by the violoncellos, and lastly by the oboes and horns, was thoroughly enjoyable. The "Scherzo," with its two trios, was brim-full of happy feeling. The last movement, opening like the first, with a motto phrase, this time given with the full force of the orchestra, received an effective rendering. After listening to the work, it seems scarcely possible that Schumann could have penned all these beautiful thoughts in four days.

The expectancy of the audience was at its height when Franz Kneisel, the leading violinist of the orchestra, stepped upon the stage to interpret Goldmark's concerto for violin and orchestra in A minor, Op. 28. He omitted the first movement, and proceeded at once with the andante. Even the most critical must have been pleased with interpretation of this beautiful air, which, while not calling for the display of the last movement, was enjoyable on account of the lovely thought contained in the song-like theme itself. The last movement, partaking somewhat of a gypsy-like character, is brilliantly written for the solo instrument, and the scoring is more varied and interesting than in the remainder of the work. Mr. Kneisel played this tripping allegretto with ease, his long cadenza giving a chance for the display of his powers as a virtuoso. The orchestra sustained the player admirably.

Dvorak's Scherzo Capriccioso, Op. 66, with its peculiar color and rythms, made a pleasant break in the programme at this point, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo" was a brilliant ending to this delightful musical evening.

NORTH AMERICAN, PHILADELPHIA, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1890.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT THE ACADEMY.

MRS. KENDAL IN A NEW ROLE

What There Is to Be Seen and Enjoyed at the Various Theatres Just Now, With a Glance at Next Week's Programme.

The usual crowd of well-dressed and intelligent people who attend upon such occasions filled the Academy of Music last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, gave the second of its concerts for the current season. There were four numbers on the programme, every one of which was representative of the modern or romantic school of composition, and by the time the last selection had been reached most listeners must have had enough of the elaborate instrumentation, the constant straining after effect, the exaggerated emphasis and the chromatic restlessness distinctive of modern music in its latest development. After the extraordinary fire and passion of Dvorak's Scherzo Capricioso, which alternately suggests the wild revelry of a Walpurgis Night and the under-current of melancholy which attends the infrequent merry-making of a down-trodden and suffering people, after that piece of musical dissipation, something restful and soothing; some tranquil, pellucid stream of simple melody from the well-springs of Haydn or Mozart, would have been grateful and salutary. Instead of that, what followed was Liszt's symphonic poem of Tasso, with its high colors, its grandiloquent phrases, its insistent demand upon the attention and imagination of the audience, and so people went away feeling that modern music is one of those good things of which it is possible and even easy to have too much. There can, however, be nothing but praise for the work of the orchestra and its conductor. The symphony, that by Schumann in B flat, known as the "Spring" symphony, had a most sympathetic and effective rendering, and every number was played by the orchestra with all due effect. Perhaps the most brilliant work of the evening was done in the Dvorak Scherzo Capricioso. This composition, which had not before been heard here, is one of great difficulty, but it was given with splendid force and fire, and with all the abandonment, with all the ebb and flow of rhythymic impluse necessary to make clear its meaning and express its sentiment. The soloist was Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concert-master of the orchestra, who was heard in a not particularly interesting violin concerto by Goldmark. Mr. Kneisel has a beautifully smooth and delicate tone, and is a player of faultless technique, but a little more breadth and force are necessary to make his playing properly effective. Perhaps some of the trouble was with his instrument, which has the sweetness and the weakness of a Steiner.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, DECEMBER 11, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Performance Last Night and Some That Are to Come.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Academy of Music last night before a large audience. The programme opened with Schumann's first symphony in B flat, to which Mr. Nikisch gave a very delicate though somewhat colorless interpretation. Goldmark's recent violin concerto in A minor, a work of decided poetical quality, was played by Mr. Kneisel with absolutely faultless execution and an entire absence of animation. As an exhibition of the minute technics of the violin, the concertmeister's performance was admirable, but some light and shade, some accent or expression, would have been welcomed, even at the cost of an occasional faulty intonation. The other novelty was a "scherzo capriccioso" by Dvorak, something in the nature of the so-called rhapsody, and extremely bright, melodious and original. It was perhaps the more welcome last night because it absolutely required some animation in its performance. The concert closed with Liszt's meandering "Tasso."

The Adamowski Quartette will give its next concert in Haseltine's gallery on Saturday afternoon, when Mrs. Nikisch, the wife of the conductor, will make her first appearance here. Mrs. Nikisch was an operatic singer of rank at Cologne, Leipsic and Cassel, but retired from the stage upon her marriage, though she has continued to sing occasionally in concert. She will sing next Saturday a number of modern German songs. The instrumental programme includes a Beethoven quartette and one of Volkmann.

The concert of the Marine Band from Washington will take place at the Academy on Saturday evening, when Mr. Sousa will produce his new symphonic poem of "The Chariot Race." The soloists will be Camilla Urso and Mr. Auty.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, December 11, 1890.

Boston Symphony Concert.

Director Arthur Nikisch and his instrumentalists appeared at the Academy of Music last evening before an overflowing house. The fashionable element was out in full force, while balcony and galleries were crowded with the sincere lovers of harmony. For these latter there was Schumann's lovely B flat symphony, while Dvorak's gymnastic "Scherzo Capricioso" and Liszt's "Tasso" symphonic poem supplied an equally artistic, if less tuneful, element to the programme. Franz Kneisel, a violinist of solid attainments and flawless technique, contributed the solo in Goldmark's concerto for violin and full orchestra. In this score the sensuous and fertile imagination of the composer runs riot among all the varied forms of harmony, and, as Mr. Kneisel's style is well adapted to florid compositions, his rendering of the work was well nigh faultless. Mr. Nikisch conducted with energy, and under his baton the band developed an explosive quality in the forte passages that was unknown in Mr. Gericke's time. The latter inclined to repression; Mr. Nikisch leans toward effusiveness.

BOSTON HERALD.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston public, which takes so much interest in the Symphony concerts given in this city, may be interested to learn what their late conductor, Mr. Gericke, says about their success since his return to his native Vienna. He states that in the first year of his enterprise Mr. Higginson lost $20,000, and during the second $40,000; but that the tide has now turned, and the profits of this season are estimated at $15,000 above the expenses. Last season almost $100,000 was spent on these concerts by Bostonians. Yet so great is their popularity that this amount is eagerly paid by the people, and enough besides to give that handsome profit above stated. No one will envy Mr. Higginson its possession; indeed, it will require several years, probably, for him to make up his early losses. He entered upon the enterprise with no thought or expectation of anything but pecuniary loss attending it, and he never has spared expense in any respect to give the public the series of concerts of the highest artistic character which has resulted.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, DEC. 12.

CAPTURED THE CAPITOL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Delight Washington Elite.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11.—An overflowing and extremely fashionable audience greeted Herr Nikisch this evening when he raised his baton over the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Members of the cabinet, senators, representatives and the elite of fashionable society formed the representative gathering.

The programme was as follows: Weber, overture, "Oberon;" Saint-Saens, concerto for piano and orchestra in G minor; Schubert, Symphony No. 8 in B minor (unfinished); Liszt, symphonic poem, "Tasso Lamento e Trionfo."

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler was the soloist, and her rendition of the Saint-Saens concerto created a furore. Her execution and phrasing are remarkable.

The Oberon overture was rendered with the most exquisite grace and delicacy, which brought out all its lights and shades in the most characteristic manner. But it is such a work as the Schubert symphony in which the orchestra appears to the best advantage.

Date 12-10

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Unless one chooses to indulge in platitudes concerning the playing of the band, the sweet simplicity and cheeriness of Haydn's D-major symphony, the brilliancy of Dvorak's unique composition entitled "Scherzo Capriccioso" which is played in New-York quite as often as Beethoven's Symphony in C-minor, and that gorgeous, pompous, strutting and pretentious symphonic poem in which Liszt wished the world to recognize a lament for the sufferings of Tasso and a celebration of his tardy triumph, there is not much to be said about the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place in Chickering Hall last night. It is true there was a novelty in the list of pieces which invited a twofold interest from the fact that it was a violin concerto by Goldmark which had never been heard in public in New-York and was played by Mr. Kneisel, who stands high in the admiration of local music-lovers; but unhappily the work turned out to be one of such an indeterminate character that it made scarcely any impression, exciting neither a keen sensation of pleasure nor a profound feeling of disappointment. It was followed by several hearty rounds of applause, but these were plainly a tribute to the performer and were wholly deserved by the suave loveliness of his tone and the masterly manner in which he conquered the technical difficulties with which the solo part bristles. Solo violinists are harder put to it than any of their colleagues among musical virtuosi for new concert pieces, and it is small wonder that the work of so well equipped a composer as Goldmark should be taught up with eagerness, but we would hesitate to say that the new concerto is a valuable addition to violin literature, or one that will relieve the violinists of the embarrassment which they have labored under since Mendelssohn wrote his lovely concerto for Ferdinand David. It seems likely that the two works by Bruch will still be looked upon as coming nearest to supplying the want. An exceedingly animated spirit prevailed among the audience that crowded the hall, and every number was greeted with bursts of delight.

[57]

Clipping from

Date 12-7

The Symphony Concerts.

The programme of the second Boston Symphony Concert, which will take place at the Academy of Music under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, next Wednesday evening, consists entirely of music recognized as belonging to the romantic school. Schumann's symphony in B flat is, indeed, a classic, but Schumann is pre-eminently a romancist, his music being distinguished by all that richness of color, complexity of instrumentation, fervor of sentiment and freedom of method which are the characteristic features of the modern or romantic school of composition. Liszt's "symphonic poem" of "Tasso" is, of course, musical romanticism in its extreme development, while Dvorak and Goldmark, who are represented respectively by a "Scherzo Capriccioso" and a violin concerto, are two of the most eminent of the living composers who have sought to express in music the complex feeling and the passion for sensuous beauty which mark the intellectual and emotional tendencies of this "fin de siecle." The Goldmark Concerto is new here, and as it will be played by Mr. Franz Kneisel it is sure of a worthy interpretation. As the affinities of Mr. Nikisch are rather with the romantic than with the classic school, Wednesday's concert promises to be rarely interesting and enjoyable. The concert will begin promptly at 8 o'clock, and ticket-holders are requested to be in their seats at that hour. The sale of seats is now progressing at 1119 Chestnut street.

Clipping from

Date 12-7

The Symphony Concerts.

The programme of the second Boston Symphony Concert, which will take place at the Academy of Music under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, next Wednesday evening, consists entirely of music recognized as belonging to the romantic school. Schumann's symphony in B flat is, indeed, a classic, but Schumann is pre-eminently a romancist, his music being distinguished by all that richness of color, complexity of instrumentation, fervor of sentiment and freedom of method which are the characteristic features of the modern or romantic school of composition. Liszt's "symphonic poem" of "Tasso" is, of course, musical romanticism in its extreme development, while Dvorak and Goldmark, who are represented respectively by a "Scherzo Capriccioso" and a violin concerto, are two of the most eminent of the living composers who have sought to express in music the complex feeling and the passion for sensuous beauty which mark the intellectual and emotional tendencies of this "fin de siecle." The Goldmark Concerto is new here, and as it will be played by Mr. Franz Kneisel it is sure of a worthy interpretation. As the affinities of Mr. Nikisch are rather with the romantic than with the classic school, Wednesday's concert promises to be rarely interesting and enjoyable. The concert will begin promptly at 8 o'clock, and ticket-holders are requested to be in their seats at that hour. The sale of seats is now progressing at 1119 Chestnut street.

Clipping from Press Phil. Pa.

Date 12/

Second of This Season's Concerts by the Boston Orchestra at the Academy.

Of leading importance among the musical happenings of this week will be the second of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening. The performance of the best music by such a complete and splendidly trained body of instrumentalists, under the guidance of a conductor possessed of such emotional force and intellectuality as are combined in Mr. Nikisch, makes every concert by the Boston Orchestra a notable event worthy the fine audiences which assemble to hear them. For the opening number of the programme the Schumanu Symphony in B flat has been chosen. Mr. Nikisch is especially happy in interpreting this composer, as he has shown on every occasion that he has presented a work by him. In speaking of a recent performance of this symphony in Boston, a high authority says: "Fire, poetry, dignity, and sentiment of the most impressive and delightful order colored it from beginning to end." The other orchestral numbers are Dvorak's Scherzo Capriccioso and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso."

Franz Kneisel, the concertmeister of the orchestra, is the soloist, and will play Goldmark's Concerto for Violin, which has not before been heard in this city. The concert will begin promptly at 8 o'clock.

Clipping No.

Clipping from Bulletin Philadelphia Pa

Date 12-6

The programme of the second Boston Symphony Concert, which will take place at the Academy of Music under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch next Wednesday evening, December 10, consists entirely of music recognized as belonging to the romantic school. Schumann's symphony in B flat is indeed a classic, but Schumann is pre-eminently a romancist, his music being distinguished by all that richness of color, complexity and instrumentation, fervor of sentiment and freedom of method which are the characteristic features of the modern or romantic school of composition. Liszt's "symphonic poem" of "Tasso" is of course musical romanticism in its extreme development, while Dvorak and Goldmark, who are represented respectively by a "Scherzo Capriccioso" and a violin concerto, are two of the most eminent of the living composers who have sought to express in music the complex feeling and the passion for sensuous beauty which mark the intellectual and emotional tendencies of this "fin de siècle." The Goldmark Concerto is new here, and as it will be played by Mr. Franz Kneisel, it is sure of a worthy interpretation. As the affinities of Mr. Nikisch are rather with the romantic than with the classic school, Wednesday's concert promises to be rarely interesting and enjoyable.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 13, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The eighth Symphony concert was too long by just the number which Mr. Nikisck added after the programme was first given out. It is strange that he cannot be made to comprehend that an hour and a half—or a hour and forty minutes at most—should be the limit, only to be exceeded for some specially good reason. On this occasion, the interpolation of two rather meaningless melodies for strings by Grieg, which had nothing in their setting to atone for their own thinness, compelled many people to lose the last movement of the Symphony, which is worth several hundred of the sketches which crowded it out for no other apparent reason than that they were new here. The overture was Beethoven's "Coriolanus," during the course of which Mr. Nikisch dealt too variably and sentimentally with the sweet, soothing second theme. The symphony was Schumann's second, in C major, exuberant in passionate energy, restless, eager, impatient and fitful, of which only one phrase—the adagio—so much as suggests peace, happiness and geniality; but this is as instinct with placid, hopeful beauty as the other movements are of contrasting emotion. The performance was kept well within proper bounds and the repeated and significant phrases for the brass were temperately given. There yet remains to mention the solo number of the evening, which was Goldmark's violin concerto in A minor, an entire novelty, presented by Mr. Kneisel. This composition, which has attracted already much attention and comment abroad, is in many respects quite different from what might be expected from the author of the "Sakuntala" overture and "The Queen of Sheba." Its manner, although most favorable, both for the virtuoso and for the feeling player, is generally quiet, and only in the finale is the author's fondness for Oriental imagery and color evident. The full orchestra is used, but the scoring is discreetly subordinated to the solo part, and the band is only really let out, as one might say, in the transitional or introductory passages. The work opens with a movement which promises to have the swing and speed of a march, but puts off that guise as soon as the leading instrument steps forward into its place. While this speaks, the composition is reserved and depends for its effect upon changes of tone-color; there are to be noted some delicate points made by the strings in high, keen harmonies and some strong episodic climaxes in reaching which the brass lends splendid sudden aid. If there be any objection to urge against the movement, it is that of undue length and elaboration. The andante is a sweet, appealing air, and the finale is brilliant, gay, and enriched with many nice conceits of scoring and some dainty bits of fantastic device. Mr. Kneisel played the solo so well that we cannot think of any violinist who could render it better. His tone has gained both in fulness and in warmth, and his execution, always clear and true, has all necessary ease and despatch; sincere artist that he is, he will never strive for volume at the expense of any finer element, and he was therefore occasionally over-weighted by the orchestra, which Mr. Nikisch not infrequently permitted to be rough and loud. The audience valued his performance rightly and called him forward a half a dozen times. There will be no concert tonight, but a week hence will be heard those good old friends, Brahms's "Academic" overture and Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, together with a novelty in the shape of a set of variations by Heuberger on a Schubert theme. Miss Emma Thursby, who has never yet sung in these concerts, will be the soloist.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1890

REVIEW OF THE WEEK.

He who cries out when the many remain careless and impassive is apt to accomplish nothing and gain the name of scold. He butts his head against a wall. Cozener or honest man, scholar or dunce, his hearers weary of him and answer his impassioned harangues by a yawn. For he bores them, he tires them out, and often when they know he speaks the truth, he exasperates them. Rarely do they follow in the footsteps of the judge "which feared not God, neither regarded man," but avenged the widow to stop her continual coming. A complaint is seldom pleasant to the ear, and when it appears at stated intervals, the reader might say "and it appears to me like a doleful old song, which a bewildered sick man goes on droning out to wearied listeners, and the attendants at the bedside say to themselves, 'If he were in health again he would sing to us some other song, for we have heard this a hundred times.'"

* * * * * *

And yet what can be said of the programs which have been presented to the subscribers to the Symphony concerts under the direction of the present conductor? Take the one of last Saturday:

Overture "Coriolanus"..... ....Beethoven
Concerto for violin in A minor, op. 28.....Goldmark
(first time.)
Two Melodies for string orchestra.....Grieg
(first time.)
Symphony in C Major, No. 2, op. 61.....Schumann

* * * * * *

Here is a respectable program. Nothing can be said against any number per se. The overture is a masterpiece, the symphony is certainly worth hearing, the melodies are pretty, the concerto gave an opportunity for the exhibition of the great skill of Mr. Kneisel. Why, then, should complaint be entered against this program?

* * * * * *

Because it is only one of many of similar character which are thrown together without care or thought. Because these programs are not well balanced or arranged with any eye to contrast. Because the "novelties" are chosen from the works of one school, and while they may be played for the first time at these concerts, they are not novelties of to-day. We find upon Saturday's program the words "first time" attached to the "Melodies" of Grieg. They have been played in this city upon at least two occasions; and I am told upon good authority that they were played by the Symphony orchestra under Mr. Henschel. Two weeks ago the program for December 5th as advertised did not include them; a day or two before the concert they were hastily pitched into the program. Nor is this the first time that Mr. Nikisch has shown this carelessness, this vacillation in selection as in performance. It would be well for the management henceforth to put at the bottom of proposed programs, "The management reserves the right of changing this schedule," as often appears upon the time-tables of railways.

* * * * * *

No one disputes the fact that the works of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and Schubert, Mendelssohn and Schumann are the staff of symphonic musical life. No one disputes the fact that the overtures of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Cherubini and Weber are works of surpassing merit. No one wishes that these masterpieces should be shelved. But to ignore the works of other men, to confine the selections to the writings of one nation, to continually give the same things over and over again,—these should not be the distinguishing marks of the conductor who is called upon to take charge of the Boston Symphony concerts. Such programs do not reflect credit upon the knowledge or experience of the director. Such programs do not make for the education of the public. We love perhaps the more devotedly the friends whom we only occasionally see. We often love them the more because we are forced to continually make new acquaintances. Does any one suppose that Beethoven will suffer if Godard and Saint-Saëns have a hearing? Will the overture to the "Hebrides" be less beautiful if we listen to Rubinstein or Cui?

* * * * * *

It is true that the arrangement of a program is no easy matter. It is doubtful if any three persons chosen at random in the audience to act as a committee of selection would agree perfectly upon any program proposed by one of them. Still by comparing our programs with the programs arranged by Thomas or Seidl in this country, or the programs of concerts given in Germany or France, it is plain to see that while the great works of dead masters always appear, the moderns are not neglected in other cities, and many compositions are performed and relished, of which we in Boston hardly know the names.

* * * * * *

Reasons have been given for the peculiar course adopted by the management. It has been said that Mr. Nikisch is feeling his way; that before he was invited to these shores he had had but limited experience as a director of concerts; for he led the opera, and an opera of the second class, which did not rank with the opera at Berlin, Dresden, Vienna, Munich, Frankfort, Cologne, Hanover or Hamburg; and so he is now educating himself for the position which he holds. But this, if true, is an unkind reflection upon the wisdom displayed by Mr. Higginson in calling Mr. Nikisch from his happy home in Leipzig. It is also said that the management cannot afford to buy the scores and parts of many modern works. Neither of these reasons is a sufficient one; and in view of the figures published in the Transcript September 20 and November 1 (the accuracy of which has never been disputed), the latter reason is absurd.

* * * * * *

Whatever be the reason, whether it be ignorance or parsimony, the fact remains that the programs given since the advent of Mr. Nikisch have been eminently unsatisfactory. And we owe a heavier debt to solo singers and players for the introduction of modern works of different schools than we do to the conductor whose duty it is to make us acquainted with all that is good in music, irrespective of nationality.

* * * * * *

Saturday's concert would not call for remark, were it not for the careful and finished performance of the Goldmark concerto by Mr. Kneisel. The work itself in spite of the great beauty of several of its themes and the skill shown in the working-up of detail, is not of the first order. Some of the material seems to have been introduced without a purpose. What business has the fughetta in the first movement? Why is it lugged in? The difficulties of the piece were played by Mr. Kneisel with apparent ease. His tone seemed broader and warmer than usual, and so far as technique and phrasing were alike concerned, it was a most musician-like performance. Still when Mr. Kneisel makes his appearance as a virtuoso, he cannot disguise the fact that he is first of all a quartet player of the highest rank, as he is a skilled leader of the violins. No one man can unite all the qualities of a virtuoso and a great quartet player. And to the musician the rare qualities which are found in Mr. Kneisel outweigh the dazzle and intoxication of the virtuoso's display.

There is but little to be said about the other numbers. Mr. Nikisch did not treat the second theme of the Overture so sentimentally as he did last year, and although his reading was in several respects slightly at variance with traditions which may or may not have been well established, it was not aggressively original. Nor was there anything worthy of special remark in the performance of the Symphony except the grotesque exhibition of the strength of the drummer who has won the cheap renown of being the funny-man of the orchestra.

* * * * * *

Clipping from Advertiser New York City

Date 12-10

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Boston should feel proud that from time to time it is able to teach New York a lesson. Not only has it shown us for the past years how an orchestra can successfully be kept together, and by this association achieve the highest musical results, but even, occasionally, as last evening, it is in a position gently to instruct us in the matter of taste. For the public of this city it cannot be gainsaid that "good Papa Haydn" has been relegated to the category of those masters who provide musical fare as light as it is antiquated. Even so great an authority as Theodore Thomas, with his impeccable musical judgment, is apt, when performing a symphony by Haydn, to add another, generally by a more modern master, in order to lend interest and substance to the program on which it figures. And yet Haydn deserves to be treated with as much respect and admiration as the greatest of his compeers. It is doubtful if a surer evidence of sound musical taste could be offered than an intelligent appreciation and fondness for his distinguishing characteristics. It needed a visit from the Boston Symphony Orchestra to demonstrate once more that a Haydn symphony could by itself be made sufficiently important and interesting to assume the place of honor on a program as dignified as that of last evening's concert, which occured at Chickering Hall, before the customary distinguished and numerous audience. Those who imagined that Mr. Nikisch's choice of this work foreshadowed the intention of any revolutionary reading, must have been disappointed. Even under Mr. Gericke there could not have been greater simplicity of interpretation, though in certain details there would certainly have been still greater finish. The symphony was followed by a novelty for New York, in the shape of Goldmark's Concerto, which although over a dozen years has not been played here before. Like all its sister works, by other more or less famous masters, it primarily makes us understand why violinists so persistently adhere to the two great and apparently never-to-be-supplanted concertos—Beethoven's and Mendelssohn's. The present work shows not only excellent workmanship in each of its three movements, but also Goldmark's special familiarity with the resources of the violin, which, in the beginning of his career, he had chosen as a means of acquiring wealth and fame. Of the concerto's three movements the last is not only the most grateful, though the most difficult, but also rhythmically and melodically the most pleasing. The ponderous opening phrases of the concerto are strikingly suggestive of the "Kaisermarsch," although the remainder of the movement, notably the violin part, is in no way Wagnerian. The andante is neither in its invention nor in its elaboration of more than ordinary interest. None the less, the concerto, in its entirety, made a distinctly pleasing impression, due in a great measure to its delightful performance by Herr Kneisel, the Concertmeister of the orchestra, who ere now has given proof of his rare talent and ability. He belongs to that extremely small category of soloists who never fail to please and satisfy. The Dvorak Scherzo Capriccioso is probably more familiar to New Yorkers than to the musical public of any other city in the world, thanks to the popularity which Mr. Thomas has insured for it since first he introduced it here—a popularity that has compelled it to be placed again and again on his programs. He has no composition in his apparently inexhaustible repertory that has deservedly brought him more plaudits or praise as a conductor, and so it was a bit venturesome on Mr. Nikisch's part to enter into what seemed such declared competition with one whom for only a short time to come we can call New York's leading conductor. While Mr. Nikisch in no way dispelled the impression originally received from the work, which seeks its equal for freshness, coloring and originality in modern orchestral literature, he nevertheless did full justice to its intoxicating measures. A distinguished characteristic of this, as of all Dvorak's most important compositions in particular, and of [illegible] of the greatest masters in general, it possesses pre-eminently the [illegible] humor which is spontaneous and irresistible. The set of orchestral variations on a Venetian gondolier's song which Liszt wrote in 1849 for the Goethe festival, and which he christened "Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo," by way of compliment to two great poets, is the second and one of the most popular of his symphonic poems. Its magnificent power as a show piece for any well drilled orchestra, especially when led by so fervent a follower of the gifted abbé's as Mr. Nikisch, cannot well be disputed even by the most violent opposers of Liszt, the composer. The D major symphony and the "Tasso" poem mark two extremes of musical inspiration, which was not made all too apparent, however, by reason of the intervening numbers, though they represented a sufficiently strong contrast. The third concert is set down for January 18.

[58]

Clipping from

Date 12-7

The Symphony Concerts.

The programme of the second Boston Symphony Concert, which will take place at the Academy of Music under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, next Wednesday evening, consists entirely of music recognized as belonging to the romantic school. Schumann's symphony in B flat is, indeed, a classic, but Schumann is pre-eminently a romancist, his music being distinguished by all that richness of color, complexity of instrumentation, fervor of sentiment and freedom of method which are the characteristic features of the modern or romantic school of composition. Liszt's "symphonic poem" of "Tasso" is, of course, musical romanticism in its extreme development, while Dvorak and Goldmark, who are represented respectively by a "Scherzo Capriccioso" and a violin concerto, are two of the most eminent of the living composers who have sought to express in music the complex feeling and the passion for sensuous beauty which mark the intellectual and emotional tendencies of this "fin de siecle." The Goldmark Concerto is new here, and as it will be played by Mr. Franz Kneisel it is sure of a worthy interpretation. As the affinities of Mr. Nikisch are rather with the romantic than with the classic school, Wednesday's concert promises to be rarely interesting and enjoyable. The concert will begin promptly at 8 o'clock, and ticket-holders are requested to be in their seats at that hour. The sale of seats is now progressing at 1119 Chestnut street.

Clipping from

Date 12-7

The Symphony Concerts.

The programme of the second Boston Symphony Concert, which will take place at the Academy of Music under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, next Wednesday evening, consists entirely of music recognized as belonging to the romantic school. Schumann's symphony in B flat is, indeed, a classic, but Schumann is pre-eminently a romancist, his music being distinguished by all that richness of color, complexity of instrumentation, fervor of sentiment and freedom of method which are the characteristic features of the modern or romantic school of composition. Liszt's "symphonic poem" of "Tasso" is, of course, musical romanticism in its extreme development, while Dvorak and Goldmark, who are represented respectively by a "Scherzo Capriccioso" and a violin concerto, are two of the most eminent of the living composers who have sought to express in music the complex feeling and the passion for sensuous beauty which mark the intellectual and emotional tendencies of this "fin de siecle." The Goldmark Concerto is new here, and as it will be played by Mr. Franz Kneisel it is sure of a worthy interpretation. As the affinities of Mr. Nikisch are rather with the romantic than with the classic school, Wednesday's concert promises to be rarely interesting and enjoyable. The concert will begin promptly at 8 o'clock, and ticket-holders are requested to be in their seats at that hour. The sale of seats is now progressing at 1119 Chestnut street.

Clipping from

Press Phil. Pa.

Date 12/

Second of This Season's Concerts by the Boston Orchestra at the Academy.

Of leading importance among the musical happenings of this week will be the second of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening. The performance of the best music by such a complete and splendidly trained body of instrumentalists, under the guidance of a conductor possessed of such emotional force and intellectuality as are combined in Mr. Nikisch, makes every concert by the Boston Orchestra a notable event worthy the fine audiences which assemble to hear them. For the opening number of the programme the Schumann Symphony in B flat has been chosen. Mr. Nikisch is especially happy in interpreting this composer, as he has shown on every occasion that he has presented a work by him. In speaking of a recent performance of this symphony in Boston, a high authority says: "Fire, poetry, dignity, and sentiment of the most impressive and delightful order colored it from beginning to end." The other orchestral numbers are Dvarak's Scherzo Cappriccioso and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso."

Franz Kneisel, the concertmeister of the orchestra, is the soloist, and will play Goldmark's Concerto for Violin, which has not before been heard in this city. The concert will begin promptly at 8 o'clock.

Clipping No.

Clipping from Bulletin Philadelphia Pa

Date 12 6

The programme of the second Boston Symphony Concert, which will take place at the Academy of Music under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch next Wednesday evening, December 10, consists entirely of music recognized as belonging to the romantic school. Schumann's symphony in B flat is indeed a classic, but Schumann is pre-eminently a romancist, his music being distinguished by all that richness of color, complexity and instrumentation, fervor of sentiment and freedom of method which are the characteristic features of the modern or romantic school of composition. Liszt's "symphonic poem" of "Tasso" is of course musical romanticism in its extreme development, while Dvorak and Goldmark, who are represented respectively by a "Scherzo Capriccioso" and a violin concerto, are two of the most eminent of the living composers who have sought to express in music the complex feeling and the passion for sensuous beauty which mark the intellectual and emotional tendencies of this "fin de siècle." The Goldmark Concerto is new here, and as it will be played by Mr. Franz Kneisel, it is sure of a worthy interpretation. As the affinities of Mr. Nikisch are rather with the romantic than with the classic school, Wednesday's concert promises to be rarely interesting and enjoyable.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 13, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The eighth Symphony concert was too long by just the number which Mr. Nikisck added after the programme was first given out. It is strange that he cannot be made to comprehend that an hour and a half—or a hour and forty minutes at most—should be the limit, only to be exceeded for some specially good reason. On this occasion, the interpolation of two rather meaningless melodies for strings by Grieg, which had nothing in their setting to atone for their own thinness, compelled many people to lose the last movement of the Symphony, which is worth several hundred of the sketches which crowded it out for no other apparent reason than that they were new here. The overture was Beethoven's "Coriolanus," during the course of which Mr. Nikisch dealt too variably and sentimentally with the sweet, soothing second theme. The symphony was Schumann's second, in C major, exuberant in passionate energy, restless, eager, impatient and fitful, of which only one phrase—the adagio—so much as suggests peace, happiness and geniality; but this is as instinct with placid, hopeful beauty as the other movements are of contrasting emotion. The performance was kept well within proper bounds and the repeated and significant phrases for the brass were temperately given. There yet remains to mention the solo number of the evening, which was Goldmark's violin concerto in A minor, an entire novelty, presented by Mr. Kneisel. This composition, which has attracted already much attention and comment abroad, is in many respects quite different from what might be expected from the author of the "Sakuntala" overture and "The Queen of Sheba." Its manner, although most favorable, both for the virtuoso and for the feeling player, is generally quiet, and only in the finale is the author's fondness for Oriental imagery and color evident. The full orchestra is used, but the scoring is discreetly subordinated to the solo part, and the band is only really let out, as one might say, in the transitional or introductory passages. The work opens with a movement which promises to have the swing and speed of a march, but puts off that guise as soon as the leading instrument steps forward into its place. While this speaks, the composition is reserved and depends for its effect upon changes of tone-color; there are to be noted some delicate points made by the strings in high, keen harmonies and some strong episodic climaxes in reaching which the brass lends splendid sudden aid. If there be any objection to urge against the movement, it is that of undue length and elaboration. The andante is a sweet, appealing air, and the finale is brilliant, gay, and enriched with many nice conceits of scoring and some dainty bits of fantastic device. Mr. Kneisel played the solo so well that we cannot think of any violinist who could render it better. His tone has gained both in fulness and in warmth, and his execution, always clear and true, has all necessary ease and despatch; sincere artist that he is, he will never strive for volume at the expense of any finer element, and he was therefore occasionally over-weighted by the orchestra, which Mr. Nikisch not infrequently permitted to be rough and loud. The audience valued his performance rightly and called him forward a half a dozen times. There will be no concert tonight, but a week hence will be heard those good old friends, Brahms's "Academic" overture and Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, together with a novelty in the shape of a set of variations by Heuberger on a Schubert theme. Miss Emma Thursby, who has never yet sung in these concerts, will be the soloist.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1890

REVIEW OF THE WEEK.

He who cries out when the many remain careless and impassive is apt to accomplish nothing and gain the name of scold. He butts his head against a wall. Cozener or honest man, scholar or dunce, his hearers weary of him and answer his impassioned harangues by a yawn. For he bores them, he tires them out, and often when they know he speaks the truth, he exasperates them. Rarely do they follow in the footsteps of the judge "which feared not God, neither regarded man," but avenged the widow to stop her continual coming. A complaint is seldom pleasant to the ear, and when it appears at stated intervals, the reader might say "and it appears to me like a doleful old song, which a bewildered sick man goes on droning out to wearied listeners, and the attendants at the bedside say to themselves, 'If he were in health again he would sing to us some other song, for we have heard this a hundred times.'"

* * * * *

And yet what can be said of the programs which have been presented to the subscribers to the Symphony concerts under the direction of the present conductor? Take the one of last Saturday:

Overture "Coriolanus"..... ....Beethoven
Concerto for violin in A minor, op. 28.....Goldmark
(first time.)
Two Melodies for string orchestra.....Grieg
(first time.)
Symphony in C Major, No. 2, op. 61.....Schumann

* * * * *

Here is a respectable program. Nothing can be said against any number per se. The overture is a masterpiece, the symphony is certainly worth hearing, the melodies are pretty, the concerto gave an opportunity for the exhibition of the great skill of Mr. Kneisel. Why, then, should complaint be entered against this program?

* * * * *

Because it is only one of many of similar character which are thrown together without care or thought. Because these programs are not well balanced or arranged with any eye to contrast. Because the "novelties" are chosen from the works of one school, and while they may be played for the first time at these concerts, they are not novelties of to-day. We find upon Saturday's program the words "first time" attached to the "Melodies" of Grieg. They have been played in this city upon at least two occasions; and I am told upon good authority that they were played by the Symphony orchestra under Mr. Henschel. Two weeks ago the program for December 5th as advertised did not include them; a day or two before the concert they were hastily pitched into the program. Nor is this the first time that Mr. Nikisch has shown this carelessness, this vacillation in selection as in performance. It would be well for the management henceforth to put at the bottom of proposed programs, "The management reserves the right of changing this schedule," as often appears upon the time-tables of railways.

* * * * *

No one disputes the fact that the works of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and Schubert, Mendelssohn and Schumann are the staff of symphonic musical life. No one disputes the fact that the overtures of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Cherubini and Weber are works of surpassing merit. No one wishes that these masterpieces should be shelved. But to ignore the works of other men, to confine the selections to the writings of one nation, to continually give the same things over and over again,—these should not be the distinguishing marks of the conductor who is called upon to take charge of the Boston Symphony concerts. Such programs do not reflect credit upon the knowledge or experience of the director. Such programs do not make for the education of the public. We love perhaps the more devotedly the friends whom we only occasionally see. We often love them the more because we are forced to continually make new acquaintances. Does any one suppose that Beethoven will suffer if Godard and Saint-Saëns have a hearing? Will the overture to the "Hebrides" be less beautiful if we listen to Rubinstein or Cui?

* * * * *

It is true that the arrangement of a program is no easy matter. It is doubtful if any three persons chosen at random in the audience to act as a committee of selection would agree perfectly upon any program proposed by one of them. Still by comparing our programs with the programs arranged by Thomas or Seidl in this country, or the programs of concerts given in Germany or France, it is plain to see that while the great works of dead masters always appear, the moderns are not neglected in other cities, and many compositions are performed and relished, of which we in Boston hardly know the names.

* * * * *

Reasons have been given for the peculiar course adopted by the management. It has been said that Mr. Nikisch is feeling his way; that before he was invited to these shores he had had but limited experience as a director of concerts; for he led the opera, and an opera of the second class, which did not rank with the opera at Berlin, Dresden, Vienna, Munich, Frankfort, Cologne, Hanover or Hamburg; and so he is now educating himself for the position which he holds. But this, if true, is an unkind reflection upon the wisdom displayed by Mr. Higginson in calling Mr. Nikisch from his happy home in Leipzig. It is also said that the management cannot afford to buy the scores and parts of many modern works. Neither of these reasons is a sufficient one; and in view of the figures published in the Transcript September 20 and November 1 (the accuracy of which has never been disputed), the latter reason is absurd.

* * * * *

Whatever be the reason, whether it be ignorance or parsimony, the fact remains that the programs given since the advent of Mr. Nikisch have been eminently unsatisfactory. And we owe a heavier debt to solo singers and players for the introduction of modern works of different schools than we do to the conductor whose duty it is to make us acquainted with all that is good in music, irrespective of nationality.

* * * * *

Saturday's concert would not call for remark, were it not for the careful and finished performance of the Goldmark concerto by Mr. Kneisel. The work itself in spite of the great beauty of several of its themes and the skill shown in the working-up of detail, is not of the first order. Some of the material seems to have been introduced without a purpose. What business has the fughetta in the first movement? Why is it lugged in? The difficulties of the piece were played by Mr. Kneisel with apparent ease. His tone seemed broader and warmer than usual, and so far as technique and phrasing were alike concerned, it was a most musician-like performance. Still when Mr. Kneisel makes his appearance as a virtuoso, he cannot disguise the fact that he is first of all a quartet player of the highest rank, as he is a skilled leader of the violins. No one man can unite all the qualities of a virtuoso and a great quartet player. And to the musician the rare qualities which are found in Mr. Kneisel outweigh the dazzle and intoxication of the virtuoso's display.

There is but little to be said about the other numbers. Mr. Nikisch did not treat the second theme of the Overture so sentimentally as he did last year, and although his reading was in several respects slightly at variance with traditions which may or may not have been well established, it was not aggressively original. Nor was there anything worthy of special remark in the performance of the Symphony except the grotesque exhibition of the strength of the drummer who has won the cheap renown of being the funny-man of the orchestra.

* * * * *

Clipping from Advertiser New York City

Date 12-10

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Boston should feel proud that from time to time it is able to teach New York a lesson. Not only has it shown us for the past years how an orchestra can successfully be kept together, and by this association achieve the highest musical results, but even, occasionally, as last evening, it is in a position gently to instruct us in the matter of taste. For the public of this city it cannot be gainsaid that "good Papa Haydn" has been relegated to the category of those masters who provide musical fare as light as it is antiquated. Even so great an authority as Theodore Thomas, with his impeccable musical judgment, is apt, when performing a symphony by Haydn, to add another, generally by a more modern master, in order to lend interest and substance to the program on which it figures. And yet Haydn deserves to be treated with as much respect and admiration as the greatest of his compeers. It is doubtful if a surer evidence of sound musical taste could be offered than an intelligent appreciation and fondness for his distinguishing characteristics. It needed a visit from the Boston Symphony Orchestra to demonstrate once more that a Haydn symphony could by itself be made sufficiently important and interesting to assume the place of honor on a program as dignified as that of last evening's concert, which occured at Chickering Hall, before the customary distinguished and numerous audience. Those who imagined that Mr. Nikisch's choice of this work foreshadowed the intention of any revolutionary reading, must have been disappointed. Even under Mr. Gericke there could not have been greater simplicity of interpretation, though in certain details there would certainly have been still greater finish. The symphony was followed by a novelty for New York, in the shape of Goldmark's [illegible] Concerto, which although over a dozen years [illegible] has not been played here before. Like all its sister works, by other more or less famous masters, it primarily makes us understand why violinists so persistently adhere to the two great and apparently never-to-be-supplanted concertos—Beethoven's and Mendelssohn's. The present work shows not only excellent workmanship in each of its three movements, but also Goldmark's special familiarity with the resources of the violin, which, in the beginning of his career, he had chosen as a means of acquiring wealth and fame. Of the concerto's three movements the last is not only the most grateful, though the most difficult, but also rhythmically and melodically the most pleasing. The ponderous opening phrases of the concerto are strikingly suggestive of the "Kaisermarsch," although the remainder of the movement, notably the violin part, is in no way Wagnerian. The andante is neither in its invention nor in its elaboration of more than ordinary interest. None the less, the concerto, in its entirety, made a distinctly pleasing impression, due in a great measure to its delightful performance by Herr Kneisel, the Concertmeister of the orchestra, who ere now has given proof of his rare talent and ability. He belongs to that extremely small category of soloists who never fail to please and satisfy. The Dvorak Scherzo Capriccioso is probably more familiar to New Yorkers than to the musical public of any other city in the world, thanks to the popularity which Mr. Thomas has insured for it since first he introduced it here—a popularity that has compelled it to be placed again and again on his programs. He has no composition in his apparently inexhaustible repertory that has deservedly brought him more plaudits or praise as a conductor, and so it was a bit venturesome on Mr. Nikisch's part to enter into what seemed such declared competition with one whom for only a short time to come we can call New York's leading conductor. While Mr. Nikisch in no way dispelled the impression originally received from the work, which seeks its equal for freshness, coloring and originality in modern orchestral literature, he nevertheless did full justice to its intoxicating measures. A distinguished characteristic of this, as of all Dvorak's most important compositions in particular, and of [illegible] of the greatest masters in general, it possesses pre-eminently the [illegible] humor which is spontaneous and irresistible. The set of orchestral variations on a Venetian gondolier's song which Liszt wrote in 1849 for the Goethe festival, and which he christened "Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo," by way of compliment to two great poets, is the second and one of the most popular of his symphonic poems. Its magnificent power as a show piece for any well drilled orchestra, especially when led by so fervent a follower of the gifted abbé's as Mr. Nikisch, cannot well be disputed even by the most violent opposers of Liszt, the composer. The D major symphony and the "Tasso" poem mark two extremes of musical inspiration, which was not made all too apparent, however, by reason of the intervening numbers, though they represented a sufficiently strong contrast. The third concert is set down for January 13.

[58]

Clipping from Baltimore
12-10

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

...ox office for the sale of single tickets ...reserved seats opens this morning at Tal...'s ticket office, 13 North Charles street. ...orchestra is the largest and best that has ...this city. The programme for the first ...rt, next Friday evening, is of the highest ... it includes the "Beethoven Heroic ...phony," composed in honor of Napoleon ...parte; "Saint-Saens," piano concerto, to ...ayed by the Baltimore favorite, Mme. ...e Bloomfield Zeisler; a beautiful scherzo ...rcioso by Dvorok, and Liszt's sublime ...honic poem on the Italian poet, Torquato ... either of the four numbers on the pro... will be worth the cost of the concert. ...rchestra numbers 75 artists, all in ex...lent trim, under the masterly direction of ...r Arthur Nikisch. There is still an oppor...nity to purchase season tickets, the holders ...which receive analytical programmes in book ...m by mail as an aid to a better understand...g of the works performed and to increase the ...yment of the concerts. Among the soloists ...ring the season will be Mme. Arthur Nikisch, ...of the Leipsic Grand Opera, and Mr. ...lair de Pachmann, the celebrated Russian ...oser and pianist and the unrivaled in...preter of Chopin's beautiful music. The ...son sale has already been large, and the ...ingle-ticket seats will be rapidly taken up.

Clipping from
New York Tribune
Date 12-11

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

...r. Nikisch opened the second concert of the ...ston Symphony Society in Chickering H... ...st evening by conducting one of Haydn's ...ymphonies, in D major (No. 2 in the Breitko... ...and Haertel edition). It was of course play... ...with precision and animation, yet it did n... ...interest the audience as much as the fo...owing numbers, although in a few places ...especially in the andante, Mr. Nikisch ...attempted in a cautious way to introduce some ...modern spirit by a slight modification of tempo. ...But it is useless to try to make of a Haydn sym...phony anything but dance-music, even in its ...slow movement; and those who consider this a ...paradoxical statement should remember that al...though we have only quick dances, correspond...ing with our nervous temperament, Haydn's ...contemporaries often danced to slow and state...ly measures which did not disarrange their pow...dered wigs. One observation obtruded itself ...in listening to this symphony—that Haydn has ...received credit as the father of instrumentation, ...which really belongs to Bach, who died when ...Haydn was only eighteen. Historians of music ...have with singular pertinacity repeated the as...sertion that Haydn first taught the different in...struments to speak their own idiomatic language ...(even Riemann, strange to say, echoes this senti...ment); whereas, in fact, Bach made the wood-...wind especially speak a much more definite ...motional language than Haydn. Last eve...ning, in listening to Haydn's symphony ...as played by one of the most admirably ...balanced and drilled orchestras in the world, one ...could not but reflect how much more variety of ...tone-color, we will not say Wagnér in the Sieg...fried Idyl, but such composers as Moszkowski or ...Grieg, can get out of a similar combination of in...struments, minus brass. Bach is in this respect, ...as well as in his harmonies and modulations, ...much more modern than Haydn, and it is to be ...regretted that Mr. Nikisch, in his desire to give ...us some antique music, did not go back a little ...further and give us some Bach. We believe that ...the New York public will yet be educated up to ...Bach—educated, that is, not only to understand ...him, but to love him dearly, as all great com...posers and gifted amateurs do.

Haydn was followed by Goldmark's new vio...lin concerto, which, as a composition, proved a ...disappointment, although it was admirably ...played by Mr. Kneisel, and most sympathetically ...accompanied by the orchestra. Goldmark may ...not be a literal follower of the Horatian maxim, ...Nonum prematur in annum, as far as keep...ing his MS. in his desk after completion ...is concerned, but he certainly does file ...and polish his work with a care and ...deliberation unusual to musicians. When ...his ideas are worth polishing, he there...fore does excellent work, but in the violin con...certo he has few definite ideas to polish, and al...though there are a few telling touches of drama...tic coloring, the composition as a whole is little ...better than a show-piece for the violin. Mr. ...Kneisel played with perfect technique, admira...ble spirit, and delightful purity of intonation, ...even in the most breakneck passages at ...giddy heights, and in the cadenza he ...held the audience spellbound and ...breathless, as could be remarked by ...the absolute silence which followed, and the ...suppressed commotion at its conclusion. He ...was most heartily applauded, and Mr. Nikisch is ...indeed most fortunate in having such an artist ...for his concertmeister. After his concerto, he ...took his place again at the head of the violins as ...if the playing of such a difficult number were a ...mere bagatelle. In this connection it may be ...said that Mr. Nikisch's unusual plan of placing ...the violas in front of the 'cellos seems to us ...somewhat injudicious, as the 'cellos often have ...solo passages, which do not have their full effect ...unless the tone vibrations can be sent out into ...the hall directly without any impediment.

The last two pieces on the programme, Dvo...rák's Scherzo Capriccioso and Liszt's "Tasso," ...which called for the full orchestra, were the ...most enjoyable of all, although both of them ...have been as well played here many a time be...fore. Some new striking details, however, ...were brought out in Dvorák's masterwork, and ...the close was delightfully agitated and exciting. ...This work may be placed on a level with Cho...pin's scherzos for piano, and when it is played as ...it was last evening, it makes one doubt whether, ...after all, a concert cannot be made as interesting ...as an opera. The audience, which occupied ...[illegible]

[59]

...Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Of all the programmes that have been interpreted in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra it may be questioned if any one has been as admirably fitted as yesterday's to place in the strongest light the sympathetic and plastic nature, and the technical proficiency of Mr. Nikisch's forces.

Content to rest for a while upon the impression wrought by his previous performance of the "Eroica," Mr. Nikisch last night made up his list of selections from works constructed on less majestic lines, and revealed himself and his band through the medium of Haydn's fluent and sparkling tunefulness, Goldmark's weird and changing harmonies, Dvorak's Oriental color, and Liszt's alternately sensuous and pompous strains. The four numbers rendered at Chickering Hall last evening were Haydn's D major, Symphony No. 2 (B. & H.), Goldmark's A minor concerto, Dvorak's "Scherzo Capriccioso," and Liszt's "Tasso."

An audience that filled every seat in the hall, and that, as to representative quality, has certainly not been seen in the concert room this season, was in attendance.

By reason of its novelty, Goldmark's violin concerto was awaited with most interest. A definite opinion of its worth can scarcely be expressed after a single hearing, the brief second movement, however, appealing at once to the listener through its melodiousness, which was brought out in the strongest manner by the perfect execution of Mr. Franz Kneisel. In this division of the work the composer does not depend solely upon restless harmonies and contrasts of instrumental timbres, and a happy and somewhat uncommon inspiration has enabled him to impart to it a sustained poetic charm that needs no analysis to diffuse itself with irresistible eloquence. This is not exactly the case with the opening allegro, or with the final moderato and allegretto. That should all the same, be made familiar to the auditor through three or four performances. Their first impression is indefinite, the part of the solo instrument suggesting vividly a long series of violin exercises upon a harmonic background of that mystic and mournful tone distinguishing most of Goldmark's writings. In the first movement one was at a loss which to commend most enthusiastically—the virtuosity of the soloist or the exquisite delicacy of the orchestral accompaniment. The andante Mr. Kneisel had, so to speak, all to himself, and it was the flawless episode of his achievement.

The orchestra reached its highest point of perfection in the "Scherzo Capriccioso." This composition has often been rendered by resident musicians, and its slancio and brilliancy have, as a rule, had adequate exposition. It was reserved for Mr. Nikisch to present it as a tone-picture of intense richness, and, withal, faultless balance of color; to lose no particle of the brightness of the Eastern hues of the fabric and to lay on with infinite lightness the softer tints; to combine, in a word, splendor and softness of color, and grace and swing of rhythm. The present generation of music lovers has enjoyed no orchestral playing to be compared with this effort of the band's last night, and Liszt's "Tasso," with its sharper contrasts and swift passages from elegiac song to martial clangor, was quite as felicitously given.

Haydn's symphony in D minor, with which the concert began, was rendered with precision and simplicity, and with no striving after theatric effect. Nothing would have been gained by imparting to it aught of the modern accent, and Mr. Nikisch judiciously kept to the traditional tempos and shading, leaving the composer to speak for himself. It is curious and edifying now and then to listen to Haydn, and to other ancient worthies, but there is no denying that retrogression, if instructive, is seldom impressive or inviting.

Clipping from Times
Date 12-11

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Performance That Elicited Only Praise on Every Hand.

The second concert of Mr. Arthur Nikisch's Boston symphony orchestra took place last night before an audience that completely filled Chickering Hall. The concert was in every way a brilliant success and in several respects a marked improvement upon the former one. Better judgment was displayed in the selection and arrangement of the programme, and the orchestra performed with unusual dash and spirit. This latter was particularly noticeable in Liszt's "Tasso," which closed the evening.

The opening selection was Haydn's symphony in D major, which was exquisitely rendered. Mr. Nikisch revealed ideas of his own concerning the interpretation of this well known symphony, and his method of treating the subject was particularly happy. The last movement, the allegro spiritoso, is worthy of special mention for its original and effective rendering.

The second selection introduced Mr. Franz Kneisel once more to a New York audience as a violin soloist—this time in Goldmark's delightful concerto in A minor. Mr. Kneisel has many admirers among the music lovers of this city, but even his best friends must have experienced a degree of agreeable surprise at his remarkably artistic work. Such fineness and purity of tone, sympathetic treatment and rare technical skill are seldom found in the same performer.

The scherzo capriccioso of Dvorak followed and displayed the capacities of the orchestra at their best. The rendering of this piece, as well as the symphonic poem "Tasso," must have sufficed to silence those who have taken exception to Mr. Nikisch on the score of "noisiness." A more effective performance of these two selections has certainly never been heard in this city for years. Mr. Nikisch's work was exceptionally good, his orchestra was never in better form and never more thoroughly under control, while throughout these latter pieces in particular there was conveyed an impression of reserved power which added materially to the effectiveness of the work.

Date 12-10

BOSTON'S SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A VIOLIN CONCERTO BY GOLDMARK MUCH APPLAUDED.

The second concert in the series of four given here this winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Chickering Hall last night in the presence of an enthusiastic audience that crowded the building.

When the Boston Orchestra first played here under Mr. Gericke's direction three years ago, New York's music lovers were surprised at the perfection shown, but rather averse to acknowledging that another American city possessed any musical organization of which the metropolis could be jealous. Such a feeling existed, and was perfectly natural. It did not, however, prevent the Boston Orchestra's concerts from receiving generous and constantly increasing support, for, while the first year's concerts were given at a loss, there was a substantial profit last winter, and this year the subscribers to the series practically take the whole house.

That there is every good reason for this remarkable patronage of an outside orchestra in a town already surfeited with good music I have had occasion to say many times before. In certain respects the work of the Boston orchestra under Mr. Nikisch surpasses even that of our far-famed Philharmonic Society. We have no such beauty of color in the strings and no such delicacy.

I doubt whether the Haydn symphony in D major was ever played better in this city than last night, certainly not in this generation, and yet Mr. Thomas has given some interpretations of these echoes of old fashioned daintiness which were all but perfection in spirit as well as execution.

Mr. Franz Kneisel, the excellent leader of this orchestra's violins, played a Goldmark concerto in A minor, a work of considerable but not extraordinary interest, and won much well deserved applause. Like everything of Goldmark, the concerto is technically admirable. Mr. Kneisel's tone is small, but it is pure, true and of exquisite quality. In the second of the concerto's three movements, an andante, and in a final cadenza of immense difficulty he was particularly successful and fairly earned the four recalls he received.

Dvorak's brilliant and fascinating scherzo capriccioso, and Liszt's concoction of wound and fury, known as the "Lament and Triumph of Tasso" are both more than familiar to our concert goers.

The very perfection of the orchestra's work which gave a new meaning to the quaint lovelin... of the Haydn symphony, served to make the em... ness of Liszt's symphonic poem all the more ... parent.

Clipping from Eagle Brooklyn N Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The second concert in Chickering hall by the Boston symphony orc... given last night and was attended by a large audience, including a considerable Brooklyn delegation that is faithful to good music wherever available and that has perhaps a special interest in this orchestra in view of the hint that it may succeed the Thomas forces in the Brooklyn Philharmonic concerts. It is a magnificent band—none better—and was in splendid form last night, responding to Mr. Nikisch's baton with absolute accuracy and fine spirit. Haydn's second symphony was played in a manner to oblige a new respect for this composer. He was never allowed to appear trivial, as he does when a small or commonplace orchestra attempts this work, but even when his gayety was childlike it was sincere and well expressed. Dvorak's familiar and delightful scherzo capriccioso was rendered with all the vim it demanded, and there was a dignified, sonorous and artistic reading of Liszt's "Lament and Triumph of Tasso." Franz Kneisel, kapellmeister of the band, played the violin part in a new concerto by Goldmark that was received with instant favor. Mr. Kneisel's tone is sweet and his execution brilliant, but there are soloists of more solidity and power. The concerto, which has more heart and more cause than most of Goldmark's writings, opens with a heavy, grandiose movement, of march like progress, to which succeeds a tender air and a brilliant closing number that more suggests in its swing and vivacity the Russian than the German author, though it contains a long and valueless cadenza. The support of the orchestra was delightful, and the two long notes that begin the andante took deep meaning from the rich, low chords of the strings. The next concert will be given on the night of January 1.

The Telegram.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE WEEK BY THE PROVIDENCE TELEGRAM PUBLISHING COMPANY.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Prominent among the musical happenings of the coming week is the third concert of the series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, which takes place on Wednesday evening at Infantry hall.

A notable feature of this concert will be the solo numbers by Miss Emma Thursby, the distinguished soprano, who has been specially engaged for the occasion, and who is sure to receive a cordial welcome from a host of admirers. Since her last appearance in this city Miss Thursby has spent much of her time in Europe, making several extended concert tours and meeting with the same success she always enjoys at home.

Mr. Nikish presents the following program:

Symphony in B flat No. 1.....Schumann
Polanaise from "Mignon".....A. Thomas
Miss Thursby.
Danse Macabre.....Saint Saens
Aria—"La Perle du Brosil".....David
Miss Thursby.
Scherzo Cappriccioso.....Dvorak

The advance sale of tickets insures a brilliant audience.

Baltimore American
AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1890.

THE CONCERT WAS GRAND.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT THE CONCORDIA.

Their First Concert an Unqualified Success—The Beethoven Eroica Was Superbly Rendered, as Were All the Numbers — A Fashionable Audience.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the largest organization of the kind that ever visited this city, or, in fact, has ever traveled in America, arrived yesterday from Washington, where they gave a concert on Thursday evening. The orchestra numbers over eighty persons in all, and the company nearly took possession of the Carrollton Hotel, where they occupied almost all the available places, and conversed in nearly all the known languages, as the ensemble is made up of many nationalities, prominent among whom were the German, French, Italian and Bohemian elements, with a number of English, Scotch, Irish, and not a few genuine native Americans.

dered about the city, admiring our new buildings and casting glances at the handsome ladies, on whose account the Monumental City is justly famous. Their first visit was to the Concordia Opera House to house and groom, as we may say, their musical instruments, which are always pets to the owners. After surveying the building to see that it was a safe depository for musical valuables, they sought out its rooms, and in snug corners, away from all suspicion of dampness, they carefully deposited the machines formed of wood, brass and catgut, on which so much esthetic enjoyment depends. They were delighted with the Concordia, and from the first moment felt themselves at home "under the genial Linden."

Needing no further rehearsals, they wan-

Before half-past seven the crowd began to gather for the choice of the remaining seats on admission tickets. The carriages soon began to arrive with delegations of the season-ticket holders, many of whom had not been inside of the Concordia for years. Some indiscreet maidens, enthusiastically reminiscing, were courageous enough to recall the shades of Richings, Hersee, Parepa-Rosa, Campbell, Habelmann, Carl Formes, and others of the departed, who formerly made the old hall of song vocal with melody, as well as to mention Nilsson, Capoul, Edith Abell and others, who graced its stage at later periods. Certainly, not since the days of Parepa has the Concordia contained such an elegant and fashionable audience as was present last evening, and it may be truly said that no other kind of a concert would have drawn them thither. But there was no choice. No other place of sufficient capacity was open to the orchestra, and so the fine, old hall, with its old-fashioned, but tasty, Greek frescoing and musical stucco work, was rehabilitated and repeopled with the beauty and fashion of the city.

Very soon after eight o'clock Herr Nikisch made his appearance, and, after bowing to a round of welcome from the audience, lifted his baton and began. The Beethoven Eroica Symphony is a very familiar work in Baltimore, having been frequently performed at the Peabody during its twenty-five years of symphony concerts. But, nevertheless, no work is more welcome. It is a fine specimen of the best classic form, and full of the inspiration arising from a noble subject wrought into the sublime poetry of true music by the greatest genius of his time. Beethoven wrote the work first in honor of Napoleon; but when, in his estimation, Napoleon fell, by becoming emperor, he changed the title of the symphony, and expressed its object as "to celebrate the memory of a great man." It is now a great musical monument, appropriate to the memory of every great man—more undying than any mortal fame and more enduring than any work in bronze or marble. Its production by this splendid orchestra gave unbounded satisfaction to the large audience, and Mr. Nikisch was compelled to bow his acknowledgments again and again.

Madame Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler also found that she had friends in Baltimore, when she appeared at the piano to play the Saint-Saens favorite G minor concerto. The work is not quite in the concerto form, which usually begins with an allegro, and has four movements. Saint-Saens begins with an andante sostentuo, which may have been composed originally as a second movement, or, perhaps, the composer has the French idea of form, as something exceedingly good, but more especially to revolutionize and rebel against. The work was superbly rendered, and Madame Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler several times recalled. If Saint-Saens departed from strict form in the composition of his G minor concerto, Dvorak has gone still farther off in his scherzo. This, in fact, has been the tendency of modern composers, until, perhaps, quite recently, when some of the best are beginning to return to the more ancient ways. Without some adherence to genuine and well-defined form, or conventional ground-plan, musical compositions become more and more rhapsodic and fantastic, until they cease to be comprehensible—at least, to the listener who is not in the composer's special secret. This work, however, is one of rare melodic beauty, and was enthusiastically enjoyed in spite of its lack of conventionality.

The concluding number was the well known Liszt symphonic poem, entitled "Tasso." The musical poet of passion wrote on the score of Tasso: "In Ferrara he loved and suffered; at Rome he was avenged. His glory still lives in the songs of Venice." These three points Liszt emphasizes in his music. The first in the "Lament," the second in the "Triumph," the third his "glory" in both. Three centuries after Tasso's death, the gondoliers still chant plaintive melodies, to the sentiment of Tasso, who wrote:

"I sing the pious arms, and him who gave Deliverance from heathen thrall to Christ's great grave."

In every sense, this symphonic poem is one of Liszt's best works. Starting with a noble subject, he has given it a wonderful embodiment. He employs all the instruments of the most modern orchestra, and does not hesitate, when occasion demands, to give them full occupation. The contrasts between lamentation, humiliation and despair on the one hand, and vindication, triumph and glory on the other, are quite unmistakable in Liszt's sympathetic, yet brilliant instrumentation. It was a great treat to hear the work given by this excellent orchestra, and all the more, because it was already familiar to our musical public, who naturally enjoy most that which they know best.

Altogether, the first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season in Baltimore has proved an unqualified success, and the four yet to come will, undoubtedly, be kept up to the same high standard.

Clipping from Herald Baltimore Md

Date 12-10

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The box sheet for the sale of single tickets with reserved seats opens this morning at Talbott's ticket office, 13 North Charles street. The orchestra is the largest and best that has visited this city. The programme for the first concert, next Friday evening, is of the highest order. It includes the "Beethoven Heroic Symphony," composed in honor of Napoleon Bonaparte; "Saint-Saens," piano concerto, to be played by the Baltimore favorite, Mme. Annie Bloomfield Zeisler; a beautiful scherzo capriccioso by Dovrok, and Liszt's sublime symphonic poem on the Italian poet, Torquato Tasso. Either of the four numbers on the programme will be worth the cost of the concert. The orchestra numbers 75 artists, all in excellent trim, under the masterly direction of Herr Arthur Nikisch. There is still an opportunity to purchase season tickets, the holders of which receive analytical programmes in book form by mail as an aid to a better understanding of the works performed and to increase the enjoyment of the concerts. Among the soloists during the season will be Mme. Arthur Nikisch, late of the Leipsic Grand Opera, and Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann, the celebrated Russian composer and pianist and the unrivaled interpreter of Chopin's beautiful music. The season sale has already been large, and the single-ticket seats will be rapidly taken up.

Clipping from Post New York City

Date 12-11

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Nikisch opened the second concert of the Boston Symphony Society in Chickering Hall last evening by conducting one of Haydn's 125 symphonies, in D major (No. 2 in the Breitkopf and Haertel edition). It was of course played with precision and animation, yet it did not interest the audience as much as the following numbers, although in a few places especially in the andante, Mr. Nikisch attempted in a cautious way to introduce some modern spirit by a slight modification of tempo. But it is useless to try to make of a Haydn symphony anything but dance-music, even in its slow movements; and those who consider this a paradoxical statement should remember that although we have only quick dances, corresponding with our nervous temperament, Haydn's contemporaries often danced to slow and stately measures which did not disarrange their powdered wigs. One observation obtruded itself in listening to this symphony—that Haydn has received credit as the father of instrumentation, which really belongs to Bach, who died when Haydn was only eighteen. Historians of music have with singular pertinacity repeated the assertion that Haydn first taught the different instruments to speak their own idiomatic language (even Riemann, strange to say, echoes this sentiment); whereas, in fact, Bach made the wood-wind especially speak a much more definite emotional language than Haydn. Last evening, in listening to Haydn's symphony as played by one of the most admirably balanced and drilled orchestras in the world, one could not but reflect how much more variety of tone-color, we will not say Wagner in the Siegfried Idyl, but such composers as Moszkowski or Grieg, can get out of a similar combination of instruments, minus brass. Bach is in this respect, as well as in his harmonies and modulations, much more modern than Haydn, and it is to be regretted that Mr. Nikisch, in his desire to give us some antique music, did not go back a little further and give us some Bach. We believe that the New York public will yet be educated up to Bach—educated, that is, not only to understand him, but to love him dearly, as all great composers and gifted amateurs do.

Haydn was followed by Goldmark's new violin concerto, which, as a composition, proved a disappointment, although it was admirably played by Mr. Kneisel, and most sympathetically accompanied by the orchestra. Goldmark may not be a literal follower of the Horatian maxim, Nonum prematur in annum, as far as keeping his MS. in his desk after completion is concerned, but he certainly does file and polish his work with a care and deliberation unusual to musicians. When his ideas are worth polishing, he therefore does excellent work, but in the violin concerto he has few definite ideas to polish, and although there are a few telling touches of dramatic coloring, the composition as a whole is little better than a show-piece for the violin. Mr. Kneisel played with perfect technique, admirable spirit, and delightful purity of intonation, even in the most breakneck passages at giddy heights, and in the cadenza he held the audience spellbound and breathless, as could be remarked by the absolute silence which followed, and the suppressed commotion at its conclusion. He was most heartily applauded, and Mr. Nikisch is indeed most fortunate in having such an artist for his concertmeister. After his concerto, he took his place again at the head of the violins as if the playing of such a difficult number were a mere bagatelle. In this connection it may be said that Mr. Nikisch's unusual plan of placing the violas in front of the 'cellos seems to us somewhat injudicious, as the 'cellos often have solo passages, which do not have their full effect unless the tone vibrations can be sent out into the hall directly without any impediment.

The last two pieces on the programme, Dvorák's Scherzo Capriccioso and Liszt's "Tasso," which called for the full orchestra, were the most enjoyable of all, although both of them have been as well played here many a time before. Some new striking details, however, were brought out in Dvorák's masterwork, and the close was delightfully agitated and exciting. This work may be placed on a level with Chopin's scherzos for piano, and when it is played as it was last evening, it makes one doubt whether, after all, a concert cannot be made as interesting as an opera. The audience, which [illegible] evidently thou[illegible]

Clipping from Sun, New York City.

Date 12-10

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Of all the programmes that have been interpreted in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra it may be questioned if any one has been as admirably fitted as yesterday's to place in the strongest light the sympathetic and plastic nature, and the technical proficiency of Mr. Nikisch's forces.

Content to rest for a while upon the impression wrought by his previous performance of the "Eroica," Mr. Nikisch last night made up his list of selections from works constructed on less majestic lines, and revealed himself and his band through the medium of Haydn's fluent and sparkling tunefulness, Goldmark's weird and changing harmonies, Dvorak's Oriental color, and Liszt's alternately sensuous and pompous strains. The four numbers rendered at Chickering Hall last evening were Haydn's D major, Symphony No. 2 (B. & H.), Goldmark's A minor concerto, Dvorak's "Scherzo Capriccioso," and Liszt's "Tasso."

An audience that filled every seat in the hall, and that, as to representative quality, has certainly not been seen in the concert room this season, was in attendance.

By reason of its novelty, Goldmark's violin concerto was awaited with most interest. A definite opinion of its worth can scarcely be expressed after a single hearing, the brief second movement, however, appealing at once to the listener through its melodiousness, which was brought out in the strongest manner by the perfect execution of Mr. Franz Kneisel. In this division of the work the composer does not depend solely upon restless harmonies and contrasts of instrumental timbres, and a happy and somewhat uncommon inspiration has enabled him to impart to it a sustained poetic charm that needs no analysis to diffuse itself with irresistible eloquence. This is not exactly the case with the opening allegro, or with the final moderato and allegretto. That should, all the same, be made familiar to the auditor through three or four performances. Their first impression is indefinite, the part of the solo instrument suggesting vividly a long series of violin exercises upon a harmonic background of that mystic and mournful tone distinguishing most of Goldmark's writings. In the first movement one was at a loss which to commend most enthusiastically—the virtuosity of the soloist or the exquisite delicacy of the orchestral accompaniment. The andante Mr. Kneisel had, so to speak, all to himself, and it was the flawless episode of his achievement.

The orchestra reached its highest point of perfection in the "Scherzo Capriccioso." This composition has often been rendered by resident musicians, and its slancio and brilliancy have, as a rule, had adequate exposition. It was reserved for Mr. Nikisch to present it as a tone-picture of intense richness, and, withal, faultless balance of color; to lose no particle of the brightness of the Eastern hues of the fabric and to lay on with infinite lightness the softer tints; to combine, in a word, splendor and softness of color, and grace and swing of rhythm. The present generation of music lovers has enjoyed no orchestral playing to be compared with this effort of the band's last night, and Liszt's "Tasso," with its sharper contrasts and swift passages from elegiac song to martial clangor, was quite as felicitously given.

Haydn's symphony in D minor, with which the concert began, was rendered with precision and simplicity, and with no striving after theatric effect. Nothing would have been gained by imparting to it aught of the modern accent, and Mr. Nikisch judiciously kept to the traditional tempos and shading, leaving the composer to speak for himself. It is curious and edifying now and then to listen to Haydn, and to other ancient worthies, but there is no denying that retrogression, if instructive, is seldom impressive or inviting.

Clipping from Press New York City

Date 12-11

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Performance That Elicited Only Praise on Every Hand.

The second concert of Mr. Arthur Nikisch's Boston symphony orchestra took place last night before an audience that completely filled Chickering Hall. The concert was in every way a brilliant success and in several respects a marked improvement upon the former one. Better judgment was displayed in the selection and arrangement of the programme, and the orchestra performed with unusual dash and spirit. This latter was particularly noticeable in Liszt's "Tasso," which closed the evening.

The opening selection was Haydn's symphony in D major, which was exquisitely rendered. Mr. Nikisch revealed ideas of his own concerning the interpretation of this well known symphony, and his method of treating the subject was particularly happy. The last movement, the allegro spiritoso, is worthy of special mention for its original and effective rendering.

The second selection introduced Mr. Franz Kneisel once more to a New York audience as a violin soloist—this time in Goldmark's delightful concerto in A minor. Mr. Kneisel has many admirers among the music lovers of this city, but even his best friends must have experienced a degree of agreeable surprise at his remarkably artistic work. Such fineness and purity of tone, sympathetic treatment and rare technical skill are seldom found in the same performer.

The scherzo capriccioso of Dovrák followed and displayed the capacities of the orchestra at their best. The rendering of this piece, as well as the symphonic poem "Tasso," must have sufficed to silence those who have taken exception to Mr. Nikisch on the score of "noisiness." A more effective performance of these two selections has certainly never been heard in this city for years. Mr. Nikisch's work was exceptionally good, his orchestra was never in better form and never more thoroughly under control, while throughout these latter pieces in particular there was conveyed an impression of reserved power which added materially to the effectiveness of its work.

Herald, New York City.

Date 12-10

BOSTON'S SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A VIOLIN CONCERTO BY GOLDMARK MUCH APPLAUDED.

The second concert in the series of four given here this winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Chickering Hall last night in the presence of an enthusiastic audience that crowded the building.

When the Boston Orchestra first played here under Mr. Gericke's direction three years ago, New York's music lovers were surprised at the perfection shown, but rather averse to acknowledging that another American city possessed any musical organization of which the metropolis could be jealous. Such a feeling existed, and was perfectly natural. It did not, however, prevent the Boston Orchestra's concerts from receiving generous and constantly increasing support, for, while the first year's concerts were given at a loss, there was a substantial profit last winter, and this year the subscribers to the series practically take the whole house.

That there is every good reason for this remarkable patronage of an outside orchestra in a town already surfeited with good music I have had occasion to say many times before. In certain respects the work of the Boston orchestra under Mr. Nikisch surpasses even that of our far-famed Philharmonic Society. We have no such beauty of color in the strings and no such delicacy.

I doubt whether the Haydn symphony in D major was ever played better in this city than last night, certainly not in this generation, and yet Mr. Thomas has given some interpretations of these echoes of old fashioned daintiness which were all but perfection in spirit as well as execution.

Mr. Faanz Kneisel, the excellent leader of this orchestra's violins, played a Goldmark concerto in A minor, a work of considerable but not extraordinary interest, and won much well deserved applause. Like everything of Goldmark, the concerto is technically admirable. Mr. Kneisel's tone is small, but it is pure, true and of exquisite quality. In the second of the concerto's three movements, an andante, and in a final cadenza of immense difficulty he was particularly successful and fairly earned the four recalls he received.

Dvorak's brilliant and fascinating scherzo capriccioso, and Liszt's concoction of sound and fury, known as the "Lament and Triumph of Tass are both more than familiar to our concert goer

The very perfection of the orchestra's w which gave a new meaning to the quaint lovelin of the Haydn symphony, served to make the em ness of Liszt's symphonic poem all the more parent.

Clipping from Eagle Brooklyn N Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The second concert in Chickering hall by the Boston symphony orchestra was given last night and was attended by a large audience, including a considerable Brooklyn delegation that is faithful to good music wherever available and that has perhaps a special interest in this orchestra in view of the hint that it may succeed the Thomas forces in the Brooklyn Philharmonic concerts. It is a magnificent band—none better—and was in splendid form last night, responding to Mr. Nikisch's baton with absolute accuracy and fine spirit. Haydn's second symphony was played in a manner to oblige a new respect for this composer. He was never allowed to appear trivial, as he does when a small or commonplace orchestra attempts this work, but even when his gayety was childlike it was sincere and well expressed. Dvorak's familiar and delightful scherzo capriccioso was rendered with all the vim it demanded, and there was a dignified, sonorous and artistic reading of Liszt's "Lament and Triumph of Tasso." Franz Kneisel, kapellmeister of the band, played the violin part in a new concerto by Goldmark that was received with instant favor. Mr. Kneisel's tone is sweet and his execution brilliant, but there are soloists of more solidity and power. The concerto, which has more heart and more cause than most of Goldmark's writings, opens with a heavy, grandiose movement, of march like progress, to which succeeds a tender air and a brilliant closing number that more suggests in its swing and vivacity the Russian than the German author, though it contains a long and valueless cadenza. The support of the orchestra was delightful, and the two long notes that begin the andante took deep meaning from the rich, low chords of the strings. The next concert will be given on the night of January 1.

The Telegram.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE WEEK BY THE PROVIDENCE TELEGRAM PUBLISHING COMPANY.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Prominent among the musical happenings of the coming week is the third concert of the series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, which takes place on Wednesday evening at Infantry hall.

A notable feature of this concert will be the solo numbers by Miss Emma Thursby, the distinguished soprano, who has been specially engaged for the occasion, and who is sure to receive a cordial welcome from a host of admirers. Since her last appearance in this city Miss Thursby has spent much of her time in Europe, making several extended concert tours and meeting with the same success she always enjoys at home.

Mr. Nikish presents the following program:

Symphony in B flat No. 1.....Schumann
Polanaise from "Mignon".....A. Thomas
Miss Thursby.
Danse Macabre.....Saint Saens
Aria—"La Perle du Bresil,".....David
Miss Thursby.
Scherzo Cappriccioso.....Dvorak

The advance sale of tickets insures a brilliant audience.

Baltimore American AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1890.

THE CONCERT WAS GRAND.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT THE CONCORDIA.

Their First Concert an Unqualified Success—The Beethoven Eroica Was Superbly Rendered, as Were All the Numbers — A Fashionable Audience.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the largest organization of the kind that ever visited this city, or, in fact, has ever traveled in America, arrived yesterday from Washington, where they gave a concert on Thursday evening. The orchestra numbers over eighty persons in all, and the company nearly took possession of the Carrollton Hotel, where they occupied almost all the available places, and conversed in nearly all the known languages, as the ensemble is made up of many nationalities, prominent among whom were the German, French, Italian and Bohemian elements, with a number of English, Scotch, Irish, and not a few genuine native Americans.

dered about the city, admiring our new buildings and casting glances at the handsome ladies, on whose account the Monumental City is justly famous. Their first visit was to the Concordia Opera House to house and groom, as we may say, their musical instruments, which are always pets to the owners. After surveying the building to see that it was a safe depository for musical valuables, they sought out its rooms, and in snug corners, away from all suspicion of dampness, they carefully deposited the machines formed of wood, brass and catgut, on which so much esthetic enjoyment depends. They were delighted with the Concordia, and from the first moment felt themselves at home "under the genial Linden."

Needing no further rehearsals, they wan-

Before half-past seven the crowd began to gather for the the choice of the remaining seats on admission tickets. The carriages soon began to arrive with delegations of the season-ticket holders, many of whom had not been inside of the Concordia for years. Some indiscreet maidens, enthusiastically reminiscing, were courageous enough to recall the shades of Richings, Hersee, Parepa-Rosa, Campbell, Habelmann, Carl Formes, and others of the departed, who formerly made the old hall of song vocal with melody, as well as to mention Nilsson, Capoul, Edith Abell and others, who graced its stage at later periods. Certainly, not since the days of Parepa has the Concordia contained such an elegant and fashionable audience as was present last evening, and it may be truly said that no other kind of a concert would have drawn them thither. But there was no choice. No other place of sufficient capacity was open to the orchestra, and so the fine, old hall, with its old-fashioned, but tasty, Greek frescoing and musical stucco work, was rehabilitated and repeopled with the beauty and fashion of the city.

Very soon after eight o'clock Herr Nikisch made his appearance, and, after bowing to a round of welcome from the audience, lifted his baton and began. The Beethoven Eroica Symphony is a very familiar work in Baltimore, having been frequently performed at the Peabody during its twenty-five years of symphony concerts. But, nevertheless, no work is more welcome. It is a fine specimen of the best classic form, and full of the inspiration arising from a noble subject wrought into the sublime poetry of true music by the greatest genius of his time. Beethoven wrote the work first in honor of Napoleon; but when, in his estimation, Napoleon fell, by becoming emperor, he changed the title of the symphony, and expressed its object as "to celebrate the memory of a great man." It is now a great musical monument, appropriate to the memory of every great man—more undying than any mortal fame and more enduring than any work in bronze or marble. Its production by this splendid orchestra gave unbounded satisfaction to the large audience, and Mr. Nikisch was compelled to bow his acknowledgments again and again.

Madame Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler also found that she had friends in Baltimore, when she appeared at the piano to play the Saint-Saens favorite G minor concerto. The work is not quite in the concerto form, which usually begins with an allegro, and has four movements. Saint-Saens begins with an andante sostentuo, which may have been composed originally as a second movement, or, perhaps, the composer has the French idea of form, as something exceedingly good, but more especially to revolutionize and rebel against. The work was superbly rendered, and Madame Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler several times recalled. If Saint-Saens departed from strict form in the composition of his G minor concerto, Dvorak has gone still farther off in his scherzo. This, in fact, has been the tendency of modern composers, until, perhaps, quite recently, when some of the best are beginning to return to the more ancient ways. Without some adherence to genuine and well-defined form, or conventional ground-plan, musical compositions become more and more rhapsodic and fantastic, until they cease to be comprehensible—at least, to the listener who is not in the composer's special secret. This work, however, is one of rare melodic beauty, and was enthusiastically enjoyed in spite of its lack of conventionality.

The concluding number was the well known Liszt symphonic poem, entitled "Tasso." The musical poet of passion wrote on the score of Tasso: "In Ferrara he loved and suffered; at Rome he was avenged. His glory still lives in the songs of Venice." These three points Liszt emphasizes in his music. The first in the "Lament," the second in the "Triumph," the third his "glory" in both. Three centuries after Tasso's death, the gondoliers still chant plaintive melodies, to the sentiment of Tasso, who wrote:

"I sing the pious arms, and him who gave Deliverance from heathen thrall to Christ's great grave."

In every sense, this symphonic poem is one of Liszt's best works. Starting with a noble subject, he has given it a wonderful embodiment. He employs all the instruments of the most modern orchestra, and does not hesitate, when occasion demands, to give them full occupation. The contrasts between lamentation, humiliation and despair on the one hand, and vindication, triumph and glory on the other, are quite unmistakable in Liszt's sympathetic, yet brilliant instrumentation. It was a great treat to hear the work given by this excellent orchestra, and all the more, because it was already familiar to our musical public, who naturally enjoy most that which they know best.

Altogether, the first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season in Baltimore has proved an unqualified success, and the four yet to come will, undoubtedly, be kept up to the same high standard.

[59]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, Dec. 17, at 8.

PROGRAMME

3

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION

The music performed at the eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was: Overture, "Coriolanus," Beethoven; Concerto for violin, A minor, op. 28, Goldmark; (first time) two melodies for string orchestra, Grieg; and Symphony C, No. 2, op. 61, Schumann. The Beethoven overture was read more in harmony with the generally received interpretation of the work than it was last season, and its performance was more enjoyable in due proportion. The orchestra acquitted itself spiritedly, but with over-much of that coarseness that has of late crept over its playing. In fact, there is a marked deterioration in the work of this fine body of artists, either from careless rehearsing or from relaxation in the discipline necessary to keep them up to the high point of efficiency of which they are capable. Roughness and noise are too frequent, and in the latter respect the new drummer is a prominent, and often an exasperatingly ludicrous, factor. The drum is not the most musical of instruments, and battering it until it gives forth a sound that is as sharp and as unvibratory as the report of a block of granite falling on a wooden pavement is not calculated to bring out its best qualities. The Grieg melodies, which were heard for the first time at these concerts, are very graceful and pretty, and were tenderly and expressively played. The Schumann symphony has never delighted us as have the other works in kind by the same composer, except in the lovely adagio, which is one of Schumann's divine inspirations. For the rest, there is much padding, many tiresome and apparently needless repetitions, a great deal of fire without warmth, and dry noisiness. The work is far less clear and interesting than is Schumann's first symphony. There was sufficient and to spare of passionate brilliancy in the performance, but at times there were also a harsh coarseness in the strings and a blatant vulgarity in the wind, especially the brasses, that were at cruel variance with the perfect playing of the orchestra in the past. The Goldmark concerto, though admirably written for the violin, and masterly in its rich and effective orchestration, will scarcely take its place among the violin concertos that have attained immortality. Its style is refined beyond question, its themes are graceful in conception and treatment, and it never falls from true artistic dignity; but it produces no effect that impresses by its force or its originality. The first movement is stately and large, and has a suave and easy flow that makes it very interesting until it begins to pall by its extreme length. The slow movement opens with a delightful motive, faintly recalling now the Handel largo from "Xerxes," and now the Bach air from the suite in D, but without suggesting plagiarism. The finale is a fiery allegro, strong in its rhythms, and is worked up to a remarkably effective climax. The musicianship and the workmanship of the concerto are perfect, but as a whole it is wanting in those essentials that distinguish the Beethoven and Mendelssohn concertos, and even the concertos of Bruch. The technical difficulties, which are immense, were overcome by Mr. Kneisel without seeming effort. The artist's perfect intonation is always a delight in itself. Faultless phrasing, breadth and purity of style and tone and the highest refinement of taste are always potent elements in Mr. Kneisel's playing, and they were shown in their best development and fulness in his interpretation and playing of this work. The slow movement was given with a graceful poetic delicacy and a glowing warmth that were delightful. Perhaps something more in respect to volume of tone and vigorous fire might have been desired in the other movements, but the shortcomings in these respects did not detract from the refined beauty of the artist's performance as a whole. He was almost frenziedly applauded, and was recalled again and again.

THE SUN.

BALTIMORE, SATURDAY, DEC. 13, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season here at the Concordia Opera House last night. It was predicted that the comparative inconvenience of the place would deter many persons from going, but the large audience showed that these fine performances are really appreciated by Baltimoreans, and that those who are genuinely fond of music would suffer any inconvenience rather than lose the rare musical treat that is afforded by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Indeed, it was a privilege to be present at such a concert. Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the leader, has identified himself thoroughly with the players, and comparison need no longer be made with his predecessor, Gericke. It is not what he has accomplished with Gericke's orchestra, but his own work with his own musicians that stands out boldly now on its own merit. In the work of the orchestra, which well-nigh reaches perfection, it is not only that each player is a competent performer, or as in many cases, an artist of ability, for even fine players may run riot when not guided by a strong influence. There is a spirit about it throughout, a spirit that shines out in the mighty, passionate, rough chords that stir the heart to its depths by their very roughness, or in the most delicate and graceful passages in which the orchestra subdues its immense power and breathes only of joy and brightness. The orchestra is not gradually deteriorating from its high standard under Nikisch, as many would have it. He is not undoing all of the admirable results of the patient toil of Gericke, most conscientious and artistic of conductors, but he is infusing a new life into the players, and especially in the rich works of the modern composers does he make the orchestra a tower of strength. In the "Eroica Symphony" of Beethoven, that great work which seems to embody every profound feeling, every lofty emotion that human nature can conceive, the orchestra showed its power as well as the earnestness of the leader, and the breathless silence that reigned during the movements, and the hearty outbursts of applause that followed each gave testimony of the impression produced on the hearers. Not less strong was the effect of the Dvorak "Scherzo-Capriccioso," so vigorous and brilliant in its treatment, and of the symphonic poem by Liszt—"Tasso," which perhaps gave the orchestra a better opportunity to show its resources than any other number. "Lamento e trionfo," the work is called, and in these two great contrasts of feeling are told the motive of the symphonic poem. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler was the soloist, and gave an admirable performance of the G minor piano-concerto by Saint-Saens. Mrs. Bloomfield enjoys an unusual popularity in Baltimore and as usual received an ovation. In her playing she shows the strength and vigor of a man allied to a woman's delicacy and tenderness, a rare combination in any player.

WASHINGTON, DECEMBER 12, 1890.

A MUSICAL TREAT.

The Boston Symphony Concert at Lincoln Hall Last Night.

There is no apparent limit to the capacity of the Washington public for good music well rendered, to judge from the size and components of the audience assembled in Lincoln Hall last evening at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Whatever seats by any chance were vacant at the very successful presentation of "The Messiah" by the Choral Society the evening previous, last night found eager occupants, and many musical enthusiasts tested the acoustic excellence of the pretty music hall in the outlying precincts sacred to "standing room only."

From its initial appearance in Washington the Symphony Orchestra has owned a devoted clientele in the Capital City, very justly proportioned to the superlative artistic merits of this matchless band and the appreciative intelligence of the community. Through every change of personnel and leadership its high standard of excellence has been not merely maintained, but advanced, and it is safe to say it has never presented a programme of more absorbing interest and alluring arrangement than that of last evening. It was a programme peculiarly cumulative and climacteric, which found the audience attentive and responsive, held it wrapt and well-nigh reverent, and left it in a state of happy and breathless exaltation.

The concert very discreetly opened with the fairly familiar measures of the Oberon overture, wherein the marvelous technique and method of Mr. Nikisch's virtuosos were none the less noticeable from our opportunities of contrast with less artistic interpretations. The second number of the programme, Saint Saens' Concerto for piano and orchestra, in G minor, introduced to the audience the soloist of the occasion, Mrs. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler, a young artiste whose fame is new to Washington, but whose exceptional merits of execution, even amid the almost embarrassing riches of her orchestral environment, fully justified the proud honor of her selection.

If any fault could be found with so enjoyable a performance it would be that the sumptuous weight of the accompaniment occasionally obscured the efforts of the pianist. The artistic apotheosis of the evening, however, was to come in the numbers which followed. If ever in a composition there breathed the immortal soul of genius, it is in the long-neglected, but now for all time memorable unfinished Eighth Symphony of Schubert. More pre-eminently even than the deaf Beethoven, Schubert "learned in sorrow what he taught in song," and this ever wonderful fragment might well have been the expiring sigh of his burdened spirit, whose sorrows were destined to become the lasting joy of nations.

Nothing could have been more eloquent than the lovely song of the 'cellos in the pathetic opening movement, the subdued wailing of the violins, the insistent appeal of the repeated dominant theme. It was in this that perhaps the superb virtuosity of the symphony players held the interest of its audience as never before.

The transition to the alluring and kaleidoscopic affects of the Liszt symphonic poem, "Tasso Lamento e Trionfo," was a transition of surprise, but, if possible, of enhanced power and charm. The versatility of the wonderful old Abbe, his originality and phenominal knowledge and command of the resources of the modern orchestra, are nowhere more appreciably manifest than in this superb creation.

The plaintive suggestion of the earlier movements yields at the close to a lofty, noble, and exalting choral of triumph, which fairly lifted the audience to its feet and sent them home with a regretful sigh that anything so beautiful should be necessarily so brief.

It will seem a long time, indeed, till we shall once more be confronted with the Van Dyke beard and Rembrandt bangs of Mr. Arthur Nikisch; contemplate the picturesque pose of his left thumb in his trouser pocket, and admire the resultant rythmic curves of his Pre-Raphaelite rear elevation. But until we do, the memory of the second concert of his unrivalled orchestra will linger long and gratefully in our memory.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 14, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

During the week just ended the Boston Symphony orchestra has concluded its second tour to the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, giving in each another in the series of concerts announced for the present season. It is very gratifying to know that the organization is on the top wave of success in all these cities, and that the conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, and the concert master, Mr. Franz Kneisel, are quite as popular with the musical publics of these other cities as they are in Boston. The patronage bestowed upon the concerts of this tour has again exceeded any previous record, and there are ample evidences that the concerts of the present season will exceed in the point of financial results any previously given outside of Boston by this orchestra. It may be interesting to many who heard the Goldmark concerto played by Mr. Kneisel to know that the critics of other cities failed to discover the beauties attributed to this composition by some authoritative writers nearer home, though the masterly skill shown by Mr. Kneisel in its performance has been universally praised. Next Saturday evening the ninth of the Boston series of concerts will be given, with Miss Emma Thursby as the soloist, the programme being Brahms' "Academic Overture," an aria, with orchestra; Richard Reuberger's variations on a theme by Schubert; some songs with piano, and Mozart's symphony in C major (Jupiter).

COMMONWEALTH.

ESTABLISHED IN 1862.

ON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1890.

A fit temple to the loveliest of the arts is Sanders Theatre. It is always a privilege to hear music there, and the audience, so eminently a part of the place, is in itself an inspiration. It was there, under the happiest of circumstances, that Mrs. Arthur Nikisch made her Cambridge and Boston début—for the occasion was of sufficient importance to attract the men of Boston who are making musical history for their respective publications. Mrs. Nikisch sang in public before her marriage, though only for a short time. Her voice is a sympathetic mezzo of ample range. It is no larger than Mrs. Henschel's, yet by reason of its warmer quality it seems fuller. Its training has been in a good school, though the singer is not so exact a vocalist, as regards production of the voice, as doubtless she was when her business was singing. Mrs. Nikisch is a true artist; in her, intelligence and sentiment are so well merged that her singing stirs the emotions and permits one to reason about it also. Added to these gifts are a charm of manner and a lovely face which reflects every mood of her composer. Knowing these things, it is not wonderful that Cambridge was delighted with her. Her selections were Raff's familiar song, with orchestra, "The Dream King and his Love," and three songs sung to the sympathetic piano accompaniment of her husband. The selections for orchestra given at the concert had been heard in Boston this season.

At the last Boston Symphony Concert an interesting novelty was brought forward by Mr. Kneisel, the concert-master of the orchestra. This was Goldmark's violin concerts in A minor, op. 28. It seems strange that so available a work as this should not have been played in the country before, especially as our native and visiting virtuosi are apparently tireless in their search for novelties. Though by no means a great work, it is one that affects the listener pleasantly and is most satisfactory to the performer. Goldmark set out to be a violinist and did not turn towards the broader goal of musician until he had mastered his early vocation; consequently in all his works the string parts will bear the closest scrutiny, and in the concerto the solo writing is the purest art. The concerto is a work for violin accompanied by orchestra; for, barring a unique fugato episode in the first movement, and of course the usual tutti, the instruments are generally used as a support and do not share equally with the solo violin, as is the case with some modern works of the kind, the burden of developing the composition. Doubtless the audience was most pleased with the charming slow movement, though the tripping finale, with the masterful performance of that rarely heard creation, an interesting cadenza, which Mr. Kneisel gave, and the thematic interest appertaining to the first movement, did not escape notice. Mr. Kneisel played the work with great beauty of tone, finish and breadth of style, and, in the virtuosic parts, with so masterly a technique—and the composition is full of difficulties—as to leave nothing to be desired. The orchestral numbers of this programme were Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture; two melodies for strings by Grieg, and Schumann's C major symphony. POCO A POCO.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 15, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra met with the most remarkable success during its tour last week in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore. Mr. Kneisel played on several occasions the violin concerto by Goldmark which was given at the last symphony at Boston, and the audiences were larger than at any previous trip by the orchestra. Next Wednesday night the orchestra appears in Providence, with Miss Emma Thursby as soloist. She is also to be the soloist for the concert of this week in Boston.

[60]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, Dec. 17, at 8.

PROGRAMME

3

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION

The music performed at the eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was: Overture, "Coriolanus," Beethoven; Concerto for violin, A-minor, op. 28, Goldmark; (first time) two melodies for string orchestra, Grieg; and Symphony C, No. 2, op. 61, Schumann. The Beethoven overture was read more in harmony with the generally received interpretation of the work than it was last season, and its performance was more enjoyable in due proportion. The orchestra acquitted itself spiritedly, but with over-much of that coarseness that has of late crept over its playing. In fact, there is a marked deterioration in the work of this fine body of artists, either from careless rehearsing or from relaxation in the discipline necessary to keep them up to the high point of efficiency of which they are capable. Roughness and noise are too frequent, and in the latter respect the new drummer is a prominent, and often an exasperatingly ludicrous, factor. The drum is not the most musical of instruments, and battering it until it gives forth a sound that is as sharp and as unvibratory as the report of a block of granite falling on a wooden pavement is not calculated to bring out its best qualities. The Grieg melodies, which were heard for the first time at these concerts, are very graceful and pretty, and were tenderly and expressively played. The Schumann symphony has never delighted us as have the other works in kind by the same composer, except in the lovely adagio, which is one of Schumann's divine inspirations. For the rest, there is much padding, many tiresome and apparently needless repetitions, a great deal of fire without warmth, and dry noisiness. The work is far less clear and interesting than is Schumann's first symphony. There was sufficient and to spare of passionate brilliancy in the performance, but at times there were also a harsh coarseness in the strings and a blatant vulgarity in the wind, especially the brasses, that were at cruel variance with the perfect playing of the orchestra in the past. The Goldmark concerto, though admirably written for the violin, and masterly in its rich and effective orchestration, will scarcely take its place among the violin concertos that have attained immortality. Its style is refined beyond question, its themes are graceful in conception and treatment, and it never falls from true artistic dignity; but it produces no effect that impresses by its force or its originality. The first movement is stately and large, and has a suave and easy flow that makes it very interesting until it begins to pall by its extreme length. The slow movement opens with a delightful motive, faintly recalling now the Handel largo from "Xerxes," and now the Bach air from the suite in D, but without suggesting plagiarism. The finale is a fiery allegro, strong in its rhythms, and is worked up to a remarkably effective climax. The musicianship and the workmanship of the concerto are perfect, but as a whole it is wanting in those essentials that distinguish the Beethoven and Mendelssohn concertos, and even the concertos of Bruch. The technical difficulties, which are immense, were overcome by Mr. Kneisel without seeming effort. The artist's perfect intonation is always a delight in itself. Faultless phrasing, breadth and purity of style and tone and the highest refinement of taste are always potent elements in Mr. Kneisel's playing, and they were shown in their best development and fulness in his interpretation and playing of this work. The slow movement was given with a graceful poetic delicacy and a glowing warmth that were delightful. Perhaps something more in respect to volume of tone and vigorous fire might have been desired in the other movements, but the shortcomings in these respects did not detract from the refined beauty of the artist's performance as a whole. He was almost frenziedly applauded, and was recalled again and again.

THE SUN.

BALTIMORE, SATURDAY, DEC. 13, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season here at the Concordia Opera House last night. It was predicted that the comparative inconvenience of the place would deter many persons from going, but the large audience showed that these fine performances are really appreciated by Baltimoreans, and that those who are genuinely fond of music would suffer any inconvenience rather than lose the rare musical treat that is afforded by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Indeed, it was a privilege to be present at such a concert. Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the leader, has identified himself thoroughly with the players, and comparison need no longer be made with his predecessor, Gericke. It is not what he has accomplished with Gericke's orchestra, but his own work with his own musicians that stands out boldly now on its own merit. In the work of the orchestra, which well-nigh reaches perfection, it is not only that each player is a competent performer, or as in many cases, an artist of ability, for even fine players may run riot when not guided by a strong influence. There is a spirit about it throughout, a spirit that shines out in the mighty, passionate, rough chords that stir the heart to its depths by their very roughness, or in the most delicate and graceful passages in which the orchestra subdues its immense power and breathes only of joy and brightness. The orchestra is not gradually deteriorating from its high standard under Nikisch, as many would have it. He is not undoing all of the admirable results of the patient toil of Gericke, most conscientious and artistic of conductors, but he is infusing a new life into the players, and especially in the rich works of the modern composers does he make the orchestra a tower of strength. In the "Eroica Symphony" of Beethoven, that great work which seems to embody every profound feeling, every lofty emotion that human nature can conceive, the orchestra showed its power as well as the earnestness of the leader, and the breathless silence that reigned during the movements, and the hearty outbursts of applause that followed each gave testimony of the impression produced on the hearers. Not less strong was the effect of the Dvorak "Scherzo-Capriccioso," so vigorous and brilliant in its treatment, and of the symphonic poem by Liszt—"Tasso," which perhaps gave the orchestra a better opportunity to show its resources than any other number. "Lamento e trionfo," the work is called, and in these two great contrasts of feeling are told the motive of the symphonic poem. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler was the soloist, and gave an admirable performance of the G minor piano-concerto by Saint-Saens. Mrs. Bloomfield enjoys an unusual popularity in Baltimore and as usual received an ovation. In her playing she shows the strength and vigor of a man allied to a woman's delicacy and tenderness, a rare combination in any player.

The Washington Post

WASHINGTON, DECEMBER 12, 1890.

A MUSICAL TREAT.

The Boston Symphony Concert at Lincoln Hall Last Night.

There is no apparent limit to the capacity of the Washington public for good music well rendered, to judge from the size and components of the audience assembled in Lincoln Hall last evening at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Whatever seats by any chance were vacant at the very successful presentation of "The Messiah" by the Choral Society the evening previous, last night found eager occupants, and many musical enthusiasts tested the acoustic excellence of the pretty music hall in the outlying precincts sacred to "standing room only."

From its initial appearance in Washington the Symphony Orchestra has owned a devoted clientele in the Capital City, very justly proportioned to the superlative artistic merits of this matchless band and the appreciative intelligence of the community. Through every change of personnel and leadership its high standard of excellence has been not merely maintained, but advanced, and it is safe to say it has never presented a programme of more absorbing interest and alluring arrangement than that of last evening. It was a programme peculiarly cumulative and climacteric, which found the audience attentive and responsive, held it wrapt and well-nigh reverent, and left it in a state of happy and breathless exaltation.

The concert very discreetly opened with the fairly familiar measures of the Oberon overture, wherein the marvelous technique and method of Mr. Nikisch's virtuosos were none the less noticeable from our opportunities of contrast with less artistic interpretations. The second number of the programme, Saint Saens' Concerto for piano and orchestra, in G minor, introduced to the audience the soloist of the occasion, Mrs. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler, a young artiste whose fame is new to Washington, but whose exceptional merits of execution, even amid the almost embarrassing riches of her orchestral environment, fully justified the proud honor of her selection.

If any fault could be found with so enjoyable a performance it would be that the sumptuous-weight of the accompaniment occasionally obscured the efforts of the pianist. The artistic apotheosis of the evening, however, was to come in the numbers which followed. If ever in a composition there breathed the immortal soul of genius, it is in the long-neglected, but now for all time memorable unfinished Eighth Symphony of Schubert. More pre-eminently even than the deaf Beethoven, Schubert "learned in sorrow what he taught in song," and this ever wonderful fragment might well have been the expiring sigh of his burdened spirit, whose sorrows were destined to become the lasting joy of nations.

Nothing could have been more eloquent than the lovely song of the 'cellos in the pathetic opening movement, the subdued wailing of the violins, the insistent appeal of the repeated dominant theme. It was in this that perhaps the superb virtuosity of the symphony players held the interest of its audience as never before.

The transition to the alluring and kaleidoscopic affects of the Liszt symphonic poem, "Tasso Lamento e Trionfo," was a transition of surprise, but, if possible, of enhanced power and charm. The versatility of the wonderful old Abbe, his originality and phenominal knowledge and command of the resources of the modern orchestra, are nowhere more appreciably manifest than in this superb creation.

The plaintive suggestion of the earlier movements yields at the close to a lofty, noble, and exalting choral of triumph, which fairly lifted the audience to its feet and sent them home with a regretful sigh that anything so beautiful should be necessarily so brief.

It will seem a long time, indeed, till we shall once more be confronted with the Van Dyke beard and Rembrandt bangs of Mr. Arthur Nikisch; contemplate the picturesque pose of his left thumb in his trouser pocket, and admire the resultant rythmic curves of his Pre-Raphaelite rear elevation. But until we do, the memory of the second concert of his unrivalled orchestra will linger long and gratefully in our memory.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 14, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

During the week just ended the Boston Symphony orchestra has concluded its second tour to the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, giving in each another in the series of concerts announced for the present season. It is very gratifying to know that the organization is on the top wave of success in all these cities, and that the conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, and the concert master, Mr. Franz Kneisel, are quite as popular with the musical publics of these other cities as they are in Boston. The patronage bestowed upon the concerts of this tour has again exceeded any previous record, and there are ample evidences that the concerts of the present season will exceed in the point of financial results any previously given outside of Boston by this orchestra. It may be interesting to many who heard the Goldmark concerto played by Mr. Kneisel to know that the critics of other cities failed to discover the beauties attributed to this composition by some authoritative writers nearer home, though the masterly skill shown by Mr. Kneisel in its performance has been universally praised. Next Saturday evening the ninth of the Boston series of concerts will be given, with Miss Emma Thursby as the soloist, the programme being Brahms' "Academic Overture," an aria, with orchestra; Richard Heuberger's variations on a theme by Schubert; some songs with piano, and Mozart's symphony in C major (Jupiter).

COMMONWEALTH.

ESTABLISHED IN 1862.

ON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1890.

A fit temple to the loveliest of the arts is Sanders Theatre. It is always a privilege to hear music there, and the audience, so eminently a part of the place, is in itself an inspiration. It was there, under the happiest of circumstances, that Mrs. Arthur Nikisch made her Cambridge and Boston début—for the occasion was of sufficient importance to attract the men of Boston who are making musical history for their respective publications. Mrs. Nikisch sang in public before her marriage, though only for a short time. Her voice is a sympathetic mezzo of ample range. It is no larger than Mrs. Henschel's, yet by reason of its warmer quality it seems fuller. Its training has been in a good school, though the singer is not so exact a vocalist, as regards production of the voice, as doubtless she was when her business was singing. Mrs. Nikisch is a true artist; in her, intelligence and sentiment are so well merged that her singing stirs the emotions and permits one to reason about it also. Added to these gifts are a charm of manner and a lovely face which reflects every mood of her composer. Knowing these things, it is not wonderful that Cambridge was delighted with her. Her selections were Raff's familiar song, with orchestra, "The Dream King and his Love," and three songs sung to the sympathetic piano accompament of her husband. The selections for orchestra given at the concert had been heard in Boston this season.

At the last Boston Symphony Concert an interesting novelty was brought forward by Mr. Kneisel, the concert-master of the orchestra. This was Goldmark's violin concerts in A minor, op. 28. It seems strange that so available a work as this should not have been played in the country before, especially as our native and visiting virtuosi are apparently tireless in their search for novelties. Though by no means a great work, it is one that affects the listener pleasantly and is most satisfactory to the performer. Goldmark set out to be a violinist and did not turn towards the broader goal of musician until he had mastered his early vocation; consequently in all his works the string parts will bear the closest scrutiny, and in the concerto the solo writing is the purest art. The concerto is a work for violin accompanied by orchestra; for, barring a unique fugato episode in the first movement, and of course the usual tutti, the instruments are generally used as a support and do not share equally with the solo violin, as is the case with some modern works of the kind, the burden of developing the composition. Doubtless the audience was most pleased with the charming slow movement, though the tripping finale, with the masterful performance of that rarely heard creation, an interesting cadenza, which Mr. Kneisel gave, and the thematic interest appertaining to the first movement, did not escape notice. Mr. Kneisel played the work with great beauty of tone, finish and breadth of style, and, in the virtuosic parts, with so masterly a technique—and the composition is full of difficulties—as to leave nothing to be desired. The orchestral numbers of this programme were Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture; two melodies for strings by Grieg, and Schumann's C major symphony.

Poco a Poco.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 15, 1890.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra met with the most remarkable success during its tour last week in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore. Mr. Kneisel played on several occasions the violin concerto by Goldmark which was given at the last symphony at Boston, and the audiences were larger than at any previous trip by the orchestra. Next Wednesday night the orchestra appears in Providence, with Miss Emma Thursby as soloist. She is also to be the soloist for the concert of this week in Boston.

[60]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

...DAY, DECEMBER 11, 1890.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Excellent Concert at the Academy of Music Last Evening.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at the Academy to an audience surprisingly large, considering that the holiday season is on. The concert was a thoroughly enjoyable one, though devoid of novelties with one exception. The symphony was Schumann's No. 1, in B flat (the Spring Symphony), one of the composer's maturer works, but one which, although in some respects a substitute of the finish of his later years, is free from the defects of those later works in which the themes become too much involved. Mr. Nikisch has his own ideas about this symphony. From the joyous pæan which burst forth in the opening measures to the last note of the inspiring allegro he has shown originality in its treatment. Inconspicuous as is the bass in this orchestra, it is not made full use of in the andante, whereas we are accustomed to hear this feature predominate. It cannot be said that Mr. Nikisch's ideas are open to criticism since, with the wealth of strings and wood wind at his command he gives the joyous theme and its variations with a richness and delicacy withal that leaves little to be desired. Mr. Nikisch never allows one instrument to drown another and in this lies the great charm of his conducting. One is able to take in the whole orchestra, which few conductors are willing to permit us to do.

The concerto for violin and orchestra was in some respects a disappointment. Mr. Franz Kneisel is a thorough violinist, who plays with great purity and an excellent finish. But the work of the evening, Goldmark's concerto in A minor, was scarcely suited to illustrate his playing at his best. He played with extreme delicacy, but without dramatic fervor at any time. The orchestration is a portion of the original work and is more than a mere incidental accompaniment. In fact, the virtuoso part was little more than that of a first violin. It was delightful nevertheless and Mr. Kneisel was given four recalls.

The novelty of the evening was the Scherzo Capriccioso of Dvorak. Nowadays no concert is complete without a Slav number. This composition is strikingly original, wholly unconventional and full of Slavonic impetuosity.

The concluding number was Liszt's familiar symphonic poem "Tasso," which was a favorite of Mr. Gericke. The trials and triumphs of the Italian poet, as narrated by the great German pianist, were admirably interpreted by the orchestra, ending in that grand swell of triumphant hope which closed a thoroughly delightful concert.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1890.

INFANTRY HALL - - - NIKISCH

"The present generation of music lovers has enjoyed no orchestral playing to be compared with this effort of the band's last night."—N. Y. Sun, Dec. 10, '90.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH - - - CONDUCTRO.

THIRD CONCERT

WEDNESDAY EV'G, DEC. 17, AT 8.

Special engagement of the favorite soprano,

MISS EMMA THURSBY,

Who will make her reappearance on the concert stage after an absence of several years.

PROGRAMME:

Symphony in B flat, No. 1.....Schumann
Polonaise from "Mignon".....A. Thomas
Miss THURSBY.
Danse Macabre.....Saint Saëns
Aria, "La Perle du Bresil".....David
Miss THURSBY.
Scherzo Cappriccioso.....Dvorak

Tickets now on sale at M. STEINERT & SONS' Music Store, 176 and 178 Westminster street.

(6) C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The Symphony Concert.—Miss Emma Thursby, Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, visited the cities on the Atlantic seaboard during the past week and won fresh laurels by their superb performances in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. The third concert of its series in this city takes place at Infantry Hall next Wednesday evening. A feature of extraordinary interest will be the reappearance of Miss Emma Thursby on the concert stage, after an absence of several years. Miss Thursby will sing with orchestra the Polonaise from "Mignon," Thomas, and an aria from "La Perle du Bresil," David. Mr. Nikisch has chosen for the orchestral numbers the symphony in B flat, Schumann; "Danse Macabre," Saint-Saëns, and the "Scherzo Capriccioso," Dvorak. Contrary to the usual custom the symphony will be placed at the beginning instead of at the end of the programme, an arrangement that will please many persons. Tickets are on sale at Steinert's.

Hyperion Theatre, - New Haven,

Monday Evening, Dec. 8, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1890-91

PROGRAMME

2

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Press Phil. Pa.

Date 12-11

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

The audience that welcomed the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening was large and enthusiastic. From the beginning it was evident that the hearers were heartily in sympathy with the conductor and his admirably-drilled men. Schumann's Symphony in B flat, op. 38, which the composer himself calls his "Spring Symphony," was the first number. This was composed during the happiest period of Schumann's life, and his feelings are written in every principal theme. The work was dedicated to Adolph Bottger, as it was to one of that poet's works that Schumann felt he owed his inspiration for this his first effort in the line of symphonic work on a grand scale. It certainly is a marvel of beauty, and shows what strides the composer, who hated "theory pure and simple," had made. It was first performed under Mendelssohn's direction at the Gewandhaus, Leipzig, on March 31, 1841, having been composed but a short time before.

The ideas contained in the work are thoroughly Schumannesque, yet built up on a good classic foundation. The motto phrase, given out by the horns and trumpets, broke the stillness, which, entering in with the energetic leading subject was heard cropping out from time to time with a precision that was worthy of comment. The clarinets soon entered with the second subject, as plaintive and tender as the first was vigorous, thereby giving a beautiful contrast. The development with its subsidiary themes was beautifully played by the orchestra. The slow movement in E flat, in which the melody is given out first by the violins, then by the violoncellos, and lastly by the oboes and horns, was thoroughly enjoyable. The "Scherzo" with its two trios, was brim-full of happy feeling. The last movement, opening like the first, with a motto phrase, this time given with the full force of the orchestra, received an effective rendering. After listening to the work, it seems scarcely possible that Schumann could have penned all these beautiful thoughts in four days.

The expectancy or the audience was at its height when Franz Kneisel, the leading violinist of the orchestra, stepped upon the stage to interpret Goldmark's concerto for violin and orchestra in A minor, Op. 28. He omitted the first movement, and proceeded at once with the andante. Even the most critical must have been pleased with interpretation of this beautiful air, which, while not calling for the display of the last movement, was enjoyable on account of the lovely thought contained in the song-like theme itself. The last movement, partaking somewhat of a gypsy-like character, is brilliantly written for the solo instrument, and the scoring is more varied and interesting than in the remainder of the work. Mr. Kneisel played this tripping allegretto with ease, his long cadenza giving a chance for the display of his powers as a virtuoso. The orchestra sustained the player admirably.

Dvorak's Scherzo Capriccioso, Op. 66, with its peculiar color and rythms, made a pleasant break in the programme at this point, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo" was a brilliant ending to this [illegible]

THE MORNING HERALD

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR BY THE HERALD PUBLISHING COMPANY, Baltimore and Charles Sts.. A. BECHHOFER, General Manager.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Delightful Evening With Mr. Nikisch's Talented Musicians.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening gave the first of its series of six concerts in this city at the Concordia Opera House. Past seasons have demonstrated how delightful these concerts are, and last night's experience simply confirmed a record already established. It was a genuine musical treat. The wonder was that the hall was not crowded. It ought to have been so, and the fact that it was not is far from being creditable to a community which ascribes to itself so much culture and wealth. Some art-loving philanthropist might take a hint from last night's vacant seats, buy up a few score next time and present the tickets to meritorious students of music who are not so fortunate financially.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch again handled the baton. He needs no compliment other than the appreciative applause bestowed upon his orchestra. A better trained band of musicians would be hard to find. It certainly has no superior in America. To many its playing must be a revelation.

Beethoven's wonderful "Heroic Symphony" was the first number. Only those who have heard an orchestra like Mr. Nikisch's can know what the symphony is—words cannot translate it. It runs the whole gamut of human emotion, it penetrates the deepest recesses of the human soul, it is the sublimity of musical expression. Mr. Nikisch's musicians played it in a masterly manner.

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler was the soloist of the evening. She played as the second number a concerto of Saint Sæns (G minor, Op. 22). Mrs. Zeisler was most cordially received, being well and favorably known here. Her playing showed the patient, faithful student. She is not possessed of a deal of physical strength, and in some passages a lack of power was apparent. Nevertheless, she acquitted herself with credit and fairly earned an enthusiastic recall.

The other two numbers of the programme were a charming "Scherzo Capriccioso" by Dvorak, which pleased the audience immensely, and Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso," which is not unknown to Baltimore musical audiences. Both were rendered admirably, the Tasso being very impressively done. The music, it may be remarked, was heard with excellent effect in the Concordia. The acoustics appear to be well adapted to orchestral performances. The chairs, however, might be a little more comfortable. But one can't have everything, and you forget the trifling physical discomfort while you are Mr. Nikisch's guest.

Clipping from Post
Washington D.
Date 12-11

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, have found favor with the musical public in a remarkable degree, fully merited by the superb performances of the organization. The second concert of the series takes place at Lincoln Hall this evening. Mme. Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler is the soloist, and will play with orchestra the Saint-Saens concerto for painoforte. The orchestral programme includes the overture "Oberon," Weber—the unfinished symphony, Schubert and Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso." The advance sale of seats ensures a very large attendance.

Clipping from Herald
Baltimore Md
Date 12-12

Boston Orchestra Concert.

The first concert of the present season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given this evening in Concordia Opera House. The orchestra numbers 75 artists and has attained a high degree of perfection under the rehearsal of Mr. Nikisch. The programme is the best the orchestra has ever presented in Baltimore, and the musical public is highly delighted with this evening's promise. The sale of both season and single tickets has been large, but there is still an opportunity for seats or admission tickets.

THE DAILY NEWS.

BALTIMORE, SATURDAY, DEC. 13, 1890.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Splendid Performance Before a Large Audience at the Concordia.

The picturesque and artistic figure of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared for the first time this season in Baltimore at the Concordia Opera House last night. The programme consisted of Beethoven's "Heroic Symphony" (No. 3 in E flat); Saint-Saens' concerto for piano and orchestra in G minor, opus 22; Dvorak's Scherzo Capriccioso, opus 66, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso." There was a large audience and the fine performance was exquisitely enjoyed. The pianist was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

The magnificent work of the orchestra and the leader's perfect control of it was shown principally in the first number, the Beethoven symphony, which was performed with skill and precision through all its four movements. In the allegro the ideas of the composer were enthusiastically interpreted, and the peculiarities of the work fully displayed. The solemnity of the adagio would not have been more intense nor could the vivacity of the scherzo have had greater brilliancy. The concluding movement was finished to a degree of musical perfection rarely heard. Mr. Nikisch had reason to feel proud of the work of himself and his fellow-musicians when he turned, bowing to acknowledge the applause which followed.

In the Saint-Saens concerto the chief work fell to the piano and Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler worthily performed it. In the light and graceful passages she was wonderful and her fingers flew over the keys with a rapid accuracy that made her hearers' eyes light with enthusiasm while whispers of approval passed between them during the continuous ripple of notes. Her execution was at times almost marvellous, and the triple round of applause given her was won by merit in every bar. The orchestra did splendidly, maintaining its subordination and being well kept under control by its conductor during the pianist's solos.

The remainder of the programme was executed with the same unfaltering skill that marked the preceding portion. The scherzo by Dvorak is a surprising thing and is as full of caprice as its name indicates. The key and the time change again and again until the listener wonders when the end will come and where and how. The piece abounds in sweet melodies and it proved popular. The Liszt number, which ended the evening, might be compared to some of the lengthy declensions in the German grammar, marvellous but rather wearying to most persons. It was artistically played and those who appreciated it, and perhaps not a few who didn't, signified their approval of the orchestral performance by heartily applauding when Mr. Nikisch and his co-workers bowed a good-night.

Regret is often expressed that the Peabody Hall is the only one in Baltimore peculiarly fitted for large concerts. When the theatres are unobtainable, it is regarded as impossible to secure a suitable place for a musical event. The fact that the Concordia is not more frequently used seems singular. It is regarded by many persons as too out-of-the-way for the purpose. Yet it is only about two blocks from Ford's Opera House, is within easy reach of most of the street car lines, and in acoustic properties is so admirable that it is a favorite hall with political speakers. Last night's concert afforded a fine exposition of the musical excellence of the Concordia. The most delicate passages of the violins and of the piano were everywhere clearly audible and the vigorous outbursts of the instruments showed that there were no annoying echoes. The other concerts to be given at the same place by the same orchestra later in the season will no doubt attract thither even more music admirers than were present last night.

[61]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Hyperion Theatre, - New Haven,

Monday Evening, Dec. 8, at 8.

PROGRAMME

2

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Philadelphia Inquirer

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1890.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

An Excellent Concert at the Academy of Music Last Evening.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at the Academy to an audience surprisingly large considering that the holiday season is on. The concert was a thoroughly enjoyable one, although devoid of novelties with one exception. The symphony was Schumann's No. 1, in B flat (the Spring Symphony), the first of the composer's maturer works, and one which, although in some respects destitute of the finish of his later years, is free from the defects of those later works in which the themes become too much involved. Mr. Nikisch has his own ideas about this symphony. From the joyous pæan which burst forth in the opening measures to the last note of the inspiring allegro he has shown originality in its treatment. Inconspicuous as is the bass in this orchestra, it is not made full use of in the andante, whereas we are accustomed to hear this feature predominate. It cannot be said that Mr. Nickisch's ideas are open to criticism since, with the wealth of strings and wood wind at his command he gives the joyous theme and its variations with a richness and delicacy withal that leaves little to be desired. Mr. Nickish never allows one instrument to drown another and in this lies the great charm of his conducting. One is able to take in the whole orchestra, which few conductors are willing to permit us to do.

The concerto for violin and orchestra was in some respects a disappointment. Mr. Franz Kneisel is a thorough violinist, who plays with great purity and an excellent finish. But the work of the evening, Goldmark's concerto in A minor, was scarcely suited to illustrate his playing at his best. He played with extreme delicacy, but without dramatic fervor at any time. The orchestration is a portion of the original work and is more than a mere incidental accompaniment. In fact, the virtuoso part was little more than that of a first violin. It was delightful nevertheless and Mr. Kneisel was given four recalls.

The novelty of the evening was the Scherzo Capriccioso of Dvorak. Nowadays no concert is complete without a Slav number. This composition is strikingly original, wholly unconventional and full of Slavonic impetuosity.

The concluding number was Liszt's familiar symphonic poem "Tasso," which was a favorite of Mr. Gericke. The trials and triumphs of the Italian poet, as narrated by the great German pianist, were admirably interpreted by the orchestra, ending in that grand swell of triumphant hope which closed a thoroughly delightful concert.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1890.

INFANTRY HALL - - - NIKISCH

"The present generation of music lovers has enjoyed no orchestral playing to be compared with this effort of the band's last night."—N. Y. Sun, Dec. 10, '90.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH - - - CONDUCTRO.

THIRD CONCERT

WEDNESDAY EV'G, DEC. 17, AT 8.

Special engagement of the favorite soprano,

MISS EMMA THURSBY,

Who will make her reappearance on the concert stage after an absence of several years.

PROGRAMME:

Symphony in B flat, No. 1.....Schumann
Polonaise from "Mignon".....A. Thomas
Miss THURSBY.
Danse Macabre.....Saint Saëns
Aria, "La Perle du Bresil".....David
Miss THURSBY.
Scherzo Cappriccioso.....Dvorak

Tickets now on sale at M. STEINERT & SONS' Music Store, 176 and 178 Westminster street.

(6) C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The Symphony Concert—Miss Emma Thursby, Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, visited the cities on the Atlantic seaboard during the past week and won fresh laurels by their superb performances in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. The third concert of its series in this city takes place at Infantry Hall next Wednesday evening. A feature of extraordinary interest will be the reappearance of Miss Emma Thursby on the concert stage, after an absence of several years. Miss Thursby will sing with orchestra the Polonaise from "Mignon," Thomas, and an aria from "La Perle du Bresil," David. Mr. Nikisch has chosen for the orchestral numbers the symphony in B flat, Schumann; "Danse Macabre," Saint-Saens, and the "Scherzo Capriccioso," Dvorak.

Contrary to the usual custom the symphony will be placed at the beginning instead of at the end of the programme, an arrangement that will please many patrons. Tickets are on sale at Steinert's.

Press Phil. Pa.

Date 12-11

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

The audience that welcomed the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening was large and enthusiastic. From the beginning it was evident that the hearers were heartily in sympathy with the conductor and his admirably-drilled men. Schumann's Symphony in B flat, op. 38, which the composer himself calls his "Spring Symphony," was the first number. This was composed during the happiest period of Schumann's life, and his feelings are written in every principal theme. The work was dedicated to Adolph Bottger, as it was to one of that poet's works that Schumann felt he owed his inspiration for this his first effort in the line of symphonic work on a grand scale. It certainly is a marvel of beauty, and shows what strides the composer, who hated "theory pure and simple," had made. It was first performed under Mendelssohn's direction at the Gewandhaus, Leipzig, on March 31, 1841, having been composed but a short time before.

The ideas contained in the work are thoroughly Schumannesque, yet built up on a good classic foundation. The motto phrase, given out by the horns and trumpets, broke the stillness, which, entering in with the energetic leading subject was heard cropping out from time to time with a precision that was worthy of comment. The clarinets soon entered with the second subject, as plaintive and tender as the first was vigorous, thereby giving a beautiful contrast. The development with its subsidiary themes was beautifully played by the orchestra. The slow movement in E flat, in which the melody is given out first by the violins, then by the violoncellos, and lastly by the oboes and horns, was thoroughly enjoyable. The "Scherzo," with its two trios, was brim-full of happy feeling. The last movement, opening like the first, with a motto phrase, this time given with the full force of the orchestra, received an effective rendering. After listening to the work, it seems scarcely possible that Schumann could have penned all these beautiful thoughts in four days.

The expectancy of the audience was at its height when Franz Kneisel, the leading violinist of the orchestra, stepped upon the stage to interpret Goldmark's concerto for violin and orchestra in A minor, Op. 28. He omitted the first movement, and proceeded at once with the andante. Even the most critical must have been pleased with interpretation of this beautiful air, which, while not calling for the display of the last movement, was enjoyable on account of the lovely thought contained in the song-like theme itself. The last movement, partaking somewhat of a gypsy-like character, is brilliantly written for the solo instrument, and the scoring is more varied and interesting than in the remainder of the work. Mr. Kneisel played this tripping allegretto with ease, his long cadenza giving a chance for the display of his powers as a virtuoso. The orchestra sustained the player admirably.

Dvorak's Scherzo Capriccioso, Op. 66, with its peculiar color and rythms, made a pleasant break in the programme at this point, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo" was a brilliant ending to this delight-

---

THE MORNING HERALD

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR BY THE HERALD PUBLISHING COMPANY, Baltimore and Charles Sts.. A. BECHHOFER, General Manager.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1890.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Delightful Evening With Mr. Nikisch's Talented Musicians.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening gave the first of its series of six concerts in this city at the Concordia Opera House. Past seasons have demonstrated how delightful these concerts are, and last night's experience simply confirmed a record already established. It was a genuine musical treat. The wonder was that the hall was not crowded. It ought to have been so, and the fact that it was not is far from being creditable to a community which ascribes to itself so much culture and wealth. Some art-loving philanthropist might take a hint from last night's vacant seats, buy up a few score next time and present the tickets to meritorious students of music who are not so fortunate financially.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch again handled the baton. He needs no compliment other than the appreciative applause bestowed upon his orchestra. A better trained band of musicians would be hard to find. It certainly has no superior in America. To many its playing must be a revelation.

Beethoven's wonderful "Heroic Symphony" was the first number. Only those who have heard an orchestra like Mr. Nikisch's can know what the symphony is—words cannot translate it. It runs the whole gamut of human emotion, it penetrates the deepest recesses of the human soul, it is the sublimity of musical expression. Mr. Nikisch's musicians played it in a masterly manner.

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler was the soloist of the evening. She played as the second number a concerto of Saint Saëns (G minor, Op. 22). Mrs. Zeisler was most cordially received, being well and favorably known here. Her playing showed the patient, faithful student. She is not possessed of a deal of physical strength, and in some passages a lack of power was apparent. Nevertheless, she acquitted herself with credit and fairly earned an enthusiastic recall.

The other two numbers of the programme were a charming "Scherzo Capriccioso" by Dvorak, which pleased the audience immensely, and Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso," which is not unknown to Baltimore musical audiences. Both were rendered admirably, the Tasso being very impressively done. The music, it may be remarked, was heard with excellent effect in the Concordia. The acoustics appear to be well adapted to orchestral performances. The chairs, however, might be a little more comfortable. But one can't have everything, and you forget the trifling physical discomfort while you are Mr. Nikisch's guest.

Clipping No. —

Clipping from Post Washington D.

Date 12-11

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, have found favor with the musical public in a remarkable degree, fully merited by the superb performances of the organization. The second concert of the series takes place at Lincoln Hall this evening. Mme. Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler is the soloist, and will play with orchestra the Saint-Saens concerto for painoforte. The orchestral programme includes the overture "Oberon," Weber—the unfinished symphony, Schubert and Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso." The advance sale of seats ensures a very large attendance.

Clipping from Herald Baltimore Md

Date 12-12

Boston Orchestra Concert.

The first concert of the present season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given this evening in Concordia Opera House. The orchestra numbers 75 artists and has attained a high degree of perfection under the rehearsal of Mr. Nikisch. The programme is the best the orchestra has ever presented in Baltimore, and the musical public is highly delighted with this evening's promise. The sale of both season and single tickets has been large, but there is still an opportunity for seats or admission tickets.

THE DAILY NEWS.

BALTIMORE, SATURDAY, DEC. 13, 1890.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Splendid Performance Before a Large Audience at the Concordia.

The picturesque and artistic figure of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared for the first time this season in Baltimore at the Concordia Opera House last night. The programme consisted of Beethoven's "Heroic Symphony" (No. 3 in E flat); Saint-Saens' concerto for piano and orchestra in G minor, opus 22; Dvorak's Scherzo Capriccioso, opus 66, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso." There was a large audience and the fine performance was exquisitely enjoyed. The pianist was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

The magnificent work of the orchestra and the leader's perfect control of it was shown principally in the first number, the Beethoven symphony, which was performed with skill and precision through all its four movements. In the allegro the ideas of the composer were enthusiastically interpreted, and the peculiarities of the work fully displayed. The solemnity of the adagio would not have been more intense nor could the vivacity of the scherzo have had greater brilliancy. The concluding movement was finished to a degree of musical perfection rarely heard. Mr. Nikisch had reason to feel proud of the work of himself and his fellow-musicians when he turned, bowing to acknowledge the applause which followed.

In the Saint-Saens concerto the chief work fell to the piano and Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler worthily performed it. In the light and graceful passages she was wonderful and her fingers flew over the keys with a rapid accuracy that made her hearers' eyes light with enthusiasm while whispers of approval passed between them during the continuous ripple of notes. Her execution was at times almost marvellous, and the triple round of applause given her was won by merit in every bar. The orchestra did splendidly, maintaining its subordination and being well kept under control by its conductor during the pianist's solos.

The remainder of the programme was executed with the same unfaltering skill that marked the preceding portion. The scherzo by Dvorak is a surprising thing and is as full of caprice as its name indicates. The key and the time change again and again until the listener wonders when the end will come and where and how. The piece abounds in sweet melodies and it proved popular. The Liszt number, which ended the evening, might be compared to some of the lengthy declensions in the German grammar, marvellous but rather wearying to most persons. It was artistically played and those who appreciated it, and perhaps not a few who didn't, signified their approval of the orchestral performance by heartily applauding when Mr. Nikisch and his co-workers bowed a good-night.

Regret is often expressed that the Peabody Hall is the only one in Baltimore peculiarly fitted for large concerts. When the theatres are unobtainable, it is regarded as impossible to secure a suitab e place for a musical event. The fact that the Concordia is not more frequently used seems singular. It is regarded by many persons as too out-of-the-way for the purpose. Yet it is only about two blocks from Ford's Opera House, is within easy reach of most of the street car lines, and in acoustic properties is so admirable that it is a favorite hall with political speakers. Last night's concert afforded a fine exposition of the musical excellence of the Concordia. The most delicate passages of the violins and of the piano were everywhere clearly audible and the vigorous outbursts of the instruments showed that there were no annoying echoes. The other concerts to be given at the same place by the same orchestra later in the season will no doubt attract thither even more music admirers than were present last night.

[61]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Chickering Hall, - - New York,

Tuesday Evening, Dec. 9, at 8.

PROGRAMME

2

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

F. A. SCHWAB, Acting Manager of New York Concerts.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Lincoln Music Hall, - Washington.

Thursday Evening, Dec. 11, at 8.

PROGRAMME

2

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Academy of Music, - Philadelphia.

Wednesday Evening, Dec. 10, at 8.

PROGRAMME

2

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Concordia Opera House, Baltimore,

Friday Evening, Dec. 12, at 8.

PROGRAMME

1

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

[62]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

The+ Telegram.

304 E. Baltimore St., Baltimore Md.

Saturday Morning, December 6.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A series of concerts is announced to be given in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra that promise to be of the highest enjoyment to patrons of the best class of music. These concerts will be given at the Concordia Opera House on the evenings of Friday, December 12th, January 16th, February 27th, and Tuesday evenings, March 24th, and April 28, making five great musical events, and with an entirely new programme at each. The Orchestra comprises seventy-five performers under the distinguished composer and conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, and may well claim to be the most perfect musical organization in the United States. At each of the concerts eminent vocal and instrumental soloists will also appear. Reserved seats at Talbott's, 18 North Charles street.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1890.

Hauslick on Gericke.

In the Vienna New Free Press for Nov. 27, we find Eduard Hauslick welcoming Wilhelm Gericke back to Vienna in a charming article, extracts from which Mrs. Amy Blandy Wood has translated for readers of the Traveller Monday ar ticle:

In the first Gesellschaft's concert, Handel's oratorio, "Israel in Egypt," was performed with care and praiseworthy results by the Vienna Choral Union, and the soloists, Fraulein v. Artner, Fraulein Standthastner, Frau Körner, and Herren Neidl, Grengg and Erxleben. Of Handel's masterpiece, so often heard and written upon, I have nothing new to say. One feature of the concert was new, however, though not wholly a novelty, namely, the presence of Herr Wilhelm Gericke as conductor. He was greeted with loud applause.

After five years' sojourn in America, he has returned to Vienna and resumed his former position as artistic director of the "Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde," (Association of the Friends of Music). From his restless activity in the new world, Gericke has brought with him a wealth of experience and observation. A new world, indeed, especially in musical affairs! How rapidly and greatly, out of insignificance and recent beginnings, concert life in Boston and New York has developed! Boston, which now holds the first rank in the Union as a concert city, arrived at this through unusually favorable conditions. In spite of, or rather because of the fact that this city possesses no opera of its own, the whole enthusiastic music love of the inhabitants is lavished on the great concerts. Of that which Gericke relates of Boston's love of music much may excite our wonder, some our envy, also. Have we indeed a manifold millionaire who would, like Mr. Higginson, of his own free will, and from a pure love of art, give a hundred thousand for the culture of music in his native city?

After reciting at length the history of the development of the orchestra, the inception of the annual tours, etc., incidentally mentioning that the losses of the first season were $20,000, those of the second $40,000, Mr. Hauslick proceeds:

As proof of the rare attractive power of these Symphony concerts, it may be mentioned that in Boston on no Saturday is there to be found in any house an evening company. It is understood that everybody goes to the concert. The interest in music there is not only great, but true and genuine. Apart from the regular attendance at concerts, there is an extraordinary amount of music made at home; the young people play the whole week through on the piano the programme of the next concert, and come well prepared to the performance. Quiet and attentive as the audience is during the music, ever so stormily does it express its approval when a piece has pleased it. Especially the fifth and seventh symphonies of Beethoven arouse every time wild enthusiasm. In their programmes, as well as in the duration of the performances, the Boston concerts are quite analagous to our Philharmonics. Four or five symponies of Beethoven must not be wanting in any season. Together with the classical repertory, Gericke brought out many novelties, as concerts of so wide a scope demanded.... Gericke, who did great service to the musical culture of Boston, left overwhelmed with honors, and amid universal regret. Such unremitting activity in America has also its dark side—the merciless overtaxing of body and mind. For example, in the season of 1887 88, Gericke conducted 250 concerts, and in a five weeks' tour covered 5000 miles. In last season, he directed not less than 108 concerts. During the five seasons he conducted in all 457 concerts and weekly three even four rehearsals. The strongest conductor would become weary under such a strain, above all one so accurate and conscientious as Gericke. So then he decided after five years of labor in America to try his strength in the Alterthümer of German concert life. His good over his return to Vienna, we were not less rejoiced heartily bid him

[63]

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra gives us Haydn, Goldmark, Dvorak and Liszt at Chickering Hall.

The second Boston Symphony Concert, which took place at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening, proved far more enjoyable than the first. The programme was very happily chosen, the audience was large and friendly, and the music was well within the scope of both leader and orchestra, although it is only fair to add that with such a superbly-trained orchestra a skillful leader need not limit his scope.

The opening number, Haydn's Symphony in D-major, was delightfully rendered. The daintily tripping measures were as tenderly expressed by the orchestra as by one performer whose exquisite sensibilities found vent in every phrase. The melodious adagio, with its soft refrain winding in and out of the numerous changes that Haydn loved to ring upon his themes, and the gentle turns, staccatos, trills and runs with which it is all adorned, provoked an amount of applause that we would hardly have thought possible from a New York audience. The minuetto fared nearly as well, and the final allegro spirituoso was given with such fire and brilliancy that the enthusiasm of the hearers awoke into lively demonstration. It was a performance to make the musician lose his faith in modern music, and declare that nothing worth hearing had been created since the good old classic age of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven.

But if their faith wavered for a moment the cunningly-arranged programme brought around a healthy balance by introducing to us a masterly composition by Goldmark, a Concerto for violin and orchestra in A minor Op. 28, performed by deft and skillful Franz Kneisel, the concert-master of the orchestra. We do not hear Mr. Kneisel very frequently, but with each occasion his reputation goes higher and higher.

The Goldmark Concerto proved to be a work of great value, and the performer gave a magnificent interpretation of it. Goldmark is a scholarly composer, but he does not invariably create an interesting piece of music. This time he was really inspired, as was demonstrated by the beautifully consecutive flow of his ideas, the unlabored effect of the unwinding of the themes and the abandoning of the ornamentations, whithout which a violin piece were valueless, and which must not smack too palpably of mere technical studies This latter evil Goldmark has entirely avoided with most excellent results

The andante is a lovely bit of harmony and tone color, the air being a touching piece of pure melody, in which Mr. Kneisel exhibited his refined and elegant style. Although he is never intense or passionate in his playing, his purity of tone, musical intelligence and sympathetic qualities, make us forget the lack of the warmer moods. The last movement affords more opportunity for display than the others, and here Mr. Kneisel played with a brilliancy and technical certainty and skill that we have never heard him equal. A beautiful cadenza, which does not betray its origin to have been outside the sweeping abandon of the whole movement, and appears to be an outgrowth of the regular development of the themes, made a very attractive episode and formed a strikingly effective climax to what is, without doubt, one of the finest pieces in the repertoire of violin music.

A charming selection followed from Dvorak, whose music always savors of strange scenes and northern skies. The "Scherzo Capriccioso" is a new style of form invented by this composer, who wanted to be able to write something in which he could throw aside all restraints for the free play of his fancy. It is something between a Scherzo and a Rhapsodie, and the result justifies Dvorak's venture. Light, airy, graceful and sparkling, the music is replete with charm, and delighted all who heard it.

The more sombre and massive music of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo," was the closing number. The first part, sombre, distrustful, and dissonant in character, tells us of the unhappy poet whose fate was one of intense and prolonged suffering. The music wails and laments with a gloomy beauty that brings vividly to one's imagination the prison bars behind which the immortal soul of Tasso languished during that dreary time of torture.

Liszt has succeeded admirably in catching the spirit of the subject, and as he leads up gradually to the triumphant strains that mark the never ending glory and greatness of Tasso, that came when his sufferings were ended, the music arises to a height of grandeur that is as impressive as it is beautiful.

Altogether the evening was an occasion of hearty musical enjoyment, in which there was nothing to mar the supreme pleasure arising from hearing good music well played.

EVERY SATURDAY

328 E. Baltimore Street,

BALTIMORE, DECEMBER 6, 1890.

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch with his superb organization, The Boston Symphony Orchestra, will inaugurate the season of 1890-91 by a concert next Friday evening, December 12, at the Concordia Opera House, South Eutaw street. Of the excellence of this orchestra there is little need of praise. It is so well and so favorably known here that to say aught in praise would be supererogation. Under Mr. Nikisch's directorship it has attained a prominence unexceeded by any similar organization in the world. Its concerts are revelations of the power, rhythem and perfection of music. Among the soloists to appear are Mme. Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, the distinguished pianiste, and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, prima donna soprano. The sale of seats are now in progress at Talbott, 13 N. Charles street.

Concordia Opera House.

BOSTON

Symphony ✻ Orchestra,

(75 PERFORMERS,)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISH, CONDUCTOR.

FIVE GRAND CONCERTS.

Friday Evening, Dec. 12, '90.
Friday Evening, Jan. 16, 91.
Friday Evening, Feb. 27, '91.
Tuesday Evening, Mar. 24, '91.
Tuesday Evening, April 28, '91.

Reserved seats at Talbott's ticket office, 18 N. Charles street.

Buffalo Courier.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1890.

SUCCESS ASSURED.

The Musical Association Raises $40,000 in Less Than a Week.

Last night it was announced with pardonable elation by a member of the Buffalo Musical Association that the guarantee fund for the May festival of '91, which was auspiciously started last Monday night by the subscription of $11,000 almost as rapidly as names could be written down, had now swelled to over $40,000, a sum adequate to meet any possible exigency.

The members of the music committee of the Association are now in New York, for the purpose of engaging first-class solo artists for the festival, the success of which is now assured.

The members of the Musical Association are to be congratulated upon the prompt return for their efforts in behalf of the musical culture of Buffalo, and have reason to feel pride that such faith is put in their executive powers, and confidence that popular support will be no less generous when the sale of tickets shall open next spring. Under such flattering auspices, that the the festival can be other than an exalted success, there can be no room for doubt.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 21, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY.

Richard Heuberger's variations in D minor, opus 11, on a theme by Franz Schubert, constituted the novelty of the ninth programme of the Symphony concerts. Heuberger is a Viennese, and is said to have written operas, symphonies, and other vocal and instrumental works. Unquestionably, the variations, in construction, treatment, and musical feeling, indicate unusual ability and a mind that cares for something more than mere mechanical invention. The work is scored for the orchestra that was generally employed by Beethoven; calling for no trombones, tubas, or other instruments more peculiar to modern scores, excepting the English horn, which appears once. Throughout the composer has confined himself largely to combinations of the strings and wood-wind. The melodious and expressive theme is announced with much simplicity by the strings alone, without even the help of the double basses, until the final measure, when two deep notes heighten the effect of the closing chords. Among the nine variations are many charming passages, while numbers six and eight, in adagio, and andante time respectively, are wholly beautiful. The long, lively finale is also attractive, disclosing kaleidoscopic bits of the theme here and there, while the movement hurries restlessly on toward the end, in a tarantelle-like fashion. At the close, the theme reappears intact, but broadly harmonized for full orchestra, thus making a consistent and effective ending. Like the Academic overture of Brahms, and Mozart's Jupiter symphony, that marked the commencement and close of the concert, these variations belong to that class of music in which Mr. Gericke so long and fondly and thoroughly drilled the players he brought together. Therefore, it was only natural that they should have felt entirely at home, notwithstanding the extreme novelty of the work; and it is needless to add that they gave it a fine performance. The overture is one of Brahm's really delightful inspirations. His happy, masterly treatment of the German student songs not only compels attention, but creates keen pleasure that remains unimpaired to the end. It was played with finish and spirit, the skilfully varied tempi bringing out the several themes most admirably. In Mozart's last symphony the splendid corps of strings again held full sway, doing some beautifully clear and refined playing, which, however, was hardly sustained with the ease and security of former times. The exquisite minuet, the gem of the work, was exquisitely given, and in its trio was to be noticed none of the helter-skelter playing for which Wagner, in his spicy book on conducting, condemned the leaders of his early days. Miss Emma Thursby was the soloist. "Mia speranza adorata," the recitative and aria that Mozart wrote for concert use, was her first number. The music is well suited to her slender, flexible voice; but it must be said that her singing caused disappointment, owing to a too prevalent faulty intonation. For her second number she sang, with pianoforte the hackneyed mazurka of Chopin, "Love me," in a manner that lacked the essentials necessary to make it tolerable to the concert-goer of today.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DEC. 21, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

NINTH CONCERT.

Last evening the programme was;

Brahms, Overture, "Academic Festival," Op. 80
Mozart, Recit. and Rondo, "Mia Speranza Adorata" (K 416)
Richard Heuberger, Variations on a Theme by Schubert, Op. 11, (First time in Boston.)
David.....Aria, "La Perle du Bresil"
Chopin.....Mazurka
Mozart.....Symphony in C major (Jupiter)

Soloist, Miss Emma Thursby.

The Brahms overture, taking into consideration that the concert began with it, while the familiar and time-honored symphony Mozart's "Jupiter" was the final work performed, was almost unwelcome. The overture is a masterly work in all its technical details, but as it is based on the student songs of the Fatherland, the necessity of its having been made so "academic," in the narrow sense of the term, and so generally void of the gay and festive spirit which its title implies is by no means apparent. At all events the work is heard here too often to enable it to hold its own among the very best concert overtures.

Miss Emma Thursby, soloist for the concert, was admirable in her phrasing of the Mozart recitative and rondo, but no other feature of her singing can be so heartily commended, as her voice is altogether too light, and likewise too much worn to be of any real service in a large concert hall.

The tempi of the "Jupiter" symphony were generally well taken and the performance as a whole was well worthy of the orchestra's high reputation.

The novelty of the concert was Heuberger's Variations on a theme by Schubert. Mr. Heuberger writes in a very professor-like manner and his variations are quite evenly uninteresting, and as if skilfully so throughout; so that the conspicuous merit of the work that justified its performance must have been with its having been composed by a Vienna music teacher.

The+ Telegram.

304 E. Baltimore St., Baltimore Md.

Saturday Morning, December 6.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A series of concerts is announced to be given in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra that promise to be of the highest enjoyment to patrons of the best class of music. These concerts will be given at the Concordia Opera House on the evenings of Friday, December 12th, January 16th, February 27th, and Tuesday evenings, March 24th, and April 28, making five great musical events, and with an entirely new programme at each. The Orchestra comprises seventy-five performers under the distinguished composer and conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, and may well claim to be the most perfect musical organization in the United States. At each of the concerts eminent vocal and instrumental soloists will also appear. Reserved seats at Talbott's, 13 North Charles street.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1890.

Hauslick on Gericke.

In the Vienna New Free Press for Nov. 27, we find Eduard Hauslick welcoming Wilhelm Gericke back to Vienna in a charming article, extracts from which Mrs. Amy Blandy Wood has translated for readers of the Traveller Monday article:

In the first Gesellschaft's concert, Handel's oratorio, "Israel in Egypt," was performed with care and praiseworthy results by the Vienna Choral Union, and the soloists, Fraulein v. Artner, Fraulein Standthastner, Frau Körner, and Herren Neidl, Grengg and Erxleben. Of Handel's masterpiece, so often heard and written upon, I have nothing new to say. One feature of the concert was new, however, though not wholly a novelty, namely, the presence of Herr Wilhelm Gericke as conductor. He was greeted with loud applause.

After five years' sojourn in America, he has returned to Vienna and resumed his former position as artistic director of the "Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde," (Association of the Friends of Music). From his restless activity in the new world, Gericke has brought with him a wealth of experience and observation. A new world, indeed, especially in musical affairs! How rapidly and greatly, out of insignificance and recent beginnings, concert life in Boston and New York has developed! Boston, which now holds the first rank in the Union as a concert city, arrived at this through unusually favorable conditions. In spite of, or rather because of the fact that this city possesses no opera of its own, the whole enthusiastic music love of the inhabitants is lavished on the great concerts. Of that which Gericke relates of Boston's love of music much may excite our wonder, some our envy, also. Have we indeed a manifold millionaire who would, like Mr. Higginson, of his own free will, and from a pure love of art, give a hundred thousand for the culture of music in his native city?

After reciting at length the history of the development of the orchestra, the inception of the annual tours, etc., incidentally mentioning that the losses of the first season were $20,000, those of the second $40,000, Mr. Hauslick proceeds:

As proof of the rare attractive power of these Symphony concerts, it may be mentioned that in Boston on no Saturday is there to be found in any house an evening company. It is understood that everybody goes to the concert. The interest in music there is not only great, but true and genuine. Apart from the regular attendance at concerts, there is an extraordinary amount of music made at home; the young people play the whole week through on the piano the programme of the next concert, and come well prepared to the performance. Quiet and attentive as the audience is during the music, ever so stormily does it express its approval when a piece has pleased it. Especially the fifth and seventh symphonies of Beethoven arouse every time a wild enthusiasm. In their programmes, as well as in the duration of the performances, the Boston concerts are quite analagous to our Philharmonics. Four or five symponies of Beethoven must not be wanting in any season. Together with the classical repertory, Gericke brought out many novelties, as concerts of so wide a scope demanded.... Gericke, who did great service to the musical culture of Boston, left overwhelmed with honors, and amid universal regret. Such unremitting activity in America has also its dark side—the merciless overtaxing of body and mind. For example, in the season of 1887-88, Gericke conducted 101 concerts, and in a five weeks' tour travelled 3400 miles. In last season, 1888-89, he directed not less than 108 concerts. During the five seasons he conducted in all 457 concerts and weekly three, even four rehearsals. The strongest conductor would become weary under such a strain, above all one so accurate and conscientious as Gericke. So then he desired after five years of labor in America to try his strength in the Allegretto non troppo of German concert life. He rejoiced over his return to Vienna, and we not less rejoiced heartily bid him

[63]

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra gives us Haydn, Goldmark, Dvorak and Liszt at Chickering Hall.

The second Boston Symphony Concert, which took place at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening, proved far more enjoyable than the first. The programme was very happily chosen, the audience was large and friendly, and the music was well within the scope of both leader and orchestra, although it is only fair to add that with such a superbly-trained orchestra a skillful leader need not limit his scope.

The opening number, Haydn's Symphony in D-major, was delightfully rendered. The daintily tripping measures were as tenderly expressed by the orchestra as by one performer whose exquisite sensibilities found vent in every phrase. The melodious adagio, with its soft refrain winding in and out of the numerous changes that Haydn loved to ring upon his themes, and the gentle turns, staccatos, trills and runs with which it is all adorned, provoked an amount of applause that we would hardly have thought possible from a New York audience. The minuetto fared nearly as well, and the final allegro spirituoso was given with such fire and brilliancy that the enthusiasm of the hearers awoke into lively demonstration. It was a performance to make the musician lose his faith in modern music, and declare that nothing worth hearing had been created since the good old classic age of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven.

But if their faith wavered for a moment the cunningly-arranged programme brought around a healthy balance by introducing to us a masterly composition by Goldmark, a Concerto for violin and orchestra in A minor Op. 28, performed by deft and skillful Franz Kneisel, the concert-master of the orchestra. We do not hear Mr. Kneisel very frequently, but with each occasion his reputation goes higher and higher.

The Goldmark Concerto proved to be a work of great value, and the performer gave a magnificent interpretation of it. Goldmark is a scholarly composer, but he does not invariably create an interesting piece of music. This time he was really inspired, as was demonstrated by the beautifully consecutive flow of his ideas, the unlabored effect of the unwinding of the themes and the abandoning of the ornamentations, whithout which a violin piece were valueless, and which must not smack too palpably of mere technical studies. This latter evil Goldmark has entirely avoided with most excellent results.

The andante is a lovely bit of harmony and tone color, the air being a touching piece of pure melody, in which Mr. Kneisel exhibited his refined and elegant style. Although he is never intense or passionate in his playing, his purity of tone, musical intelligence and sympathetic qualities, make us forget the lack of the warmer moods. The last movement affords more opportunity for display than the others, and here Mr. Kneisel played with a brilliancy and technical certainty and skill that we have never heard him equal. A beautiful cadenza, which does not betray its origin to have been outside the sweeping abandon of the whole movement, and appears to be an outgrowth of the regular development of the themes, made a very attractive episode and formed a strikingly effective climax to what is, without doubt, one of the finest pieces in the repertoire of violin music.

A charming selection followed from Dvorak, whose music always savors of strange scenes and northern skies. The "Scherzo Capriccioso" is a new style of form invented by this composer, who wanted to be able to write something in which he could throw aside all restraints for the free play of his fancy. It is something between a Scherzo and a Rhapsodie, and the result justifies Dvorak's venture. Light, airy, graceful and sparkling, the music is replete with charm, and delighted all who heard it.

The more sombre and massive music of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo," was the closing number. The first part, sombre, distrustful, and dissonant in character, tells us of the unhappy poet whose fate was one of intense and prolonged suffering. The music wails and laments with a gloomy beauty that brings vividly to one's imagination the prison bars behind which the immortal soul of Tasso languished during that dreary time of torture.

Liszt has succeeded admirably in catching the spirit of the subject, and as he leads up gradually to the triumphant strains that mark the never ending glory and greatness of Tasso, that came when his sufferings were ended, the music arises to a height of grandeur that is as impressive as it is beautiful.

Altogether the evening was an occasion of hearty musical enjoyment, in which there was nothing to mar the supreme pleasure arising from hearing good music well played.

EVERY SATURDAY

228 E. Baltimore Street,

BALTIMORE, DECEMBER 6, 1890.

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch with his superb organization, The Boston Symphony Orchestra, will inaugurate the season of 1890-91 by a concert next Friday evening, December 12, at the Concordia Opera House, South Eutaw street. Of the excellence of this orchestra there is little need of praise. It is so well and so favorably known here that to say aught in praise would be supererogation. Under Mr. Nikisch's directorship it has attained a prominence unexceeded by any similar organization in the world. Its concerts are revelations of the power, rhythem and perfection of music. Among the soloists to appear are Mme. Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, the distinguished pianiste, and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, prima donna soprano. The sale of seats are now in progress at Talbott, 13 N. Charles street.

Concordia Opera House.

BOSTON

Symphony ✻ Orchestra,

(75 PERFORMERS,)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISH, CONDUCTOR.

FIVE GRAND CONCERTS.

Friday Evening, Dec. 12, '90.
Friday Evening, Jan. 16, 91.
Friday Evening, Feb. 27, '91.
Tuesday Evening, Mar. 24, '91.
Tuesday Evening, April 28, '91.

Reserved seats at Talbott's ticket office, 13 N. Charles street.

Buffalo Courier.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1890.

SUCCESS ASSURED.

The Musical Association Raises $40,000 in Less Than a Week.

Last night it was announced with pardonable elation by a member of the Buffalo Musical Association that the guarantee fund for the May festival of '91, which was auspiciously started last Monday night by the subscription of $11,000 almost as rapidly as names could be written down, had now swelled to over $40,000, a sum adequate to meet any possible exigency.

The members of the music committee of the Association are now in New York, for the purpose of engaging first-class solo artists for the festival, the success of which is now assured.

The members of the Musical Association are to be congratulated upon the prompt return for their efforts in behalf of the musical culture of Buffalo, and have reason to feel pride that such faith is put in their executive powers, and confidence that popular support will be no less generous when the sale of tickets shall open next spring. Under such flattering auspices, that the the festival can be other than an exalted success, there can be no room for doubt.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 21, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY.

Richard Heuberger's variations in D minor, opus 11, on a theme by Franz Schubert, constituted the novelty of the ninth programme of the Symphony concerts. Heuberger is a Viennese, and is said to have written operas, symphonies, and other vocal and instrumental works. Unquestionably, the variations, in construction, treatment, and musical feeling, indicate unusual ability and a mind that cares for something more than mere mechanical invention. The work is scored for the orchestra that was generally employed by Beethoven; calling for no trombones, tubas, or other instruments more peculiar to modern scores, excepting the English horn, which appears once. Throughout the composer has confined himself largely to combinations of the strings and wood-wind. The melodious and expressive theme is announced with much simplicity by the strings alone, without even the help of the double basses, until the final measure, when two deep notes heighten the effect of the closing chords. Among the nine variations are many charming passages, while numbers six and eight, in adagio, and andante time respectively, are wholly beautiful. The long, lively finale is also attractive, disclosing kaleidoscopic bits of the theme here and there, while the movement hurries restlessly on toward the end, in a tarantelle-like fashion. At the close, the theme reappears intact, but broadly harmonized for full orchestra, thus making a consistent and effective ending. Like the Academic overture of Brahms, and Mozart's Jupiter symphony, that marked the commencement and close of the concert, these variations belong to that class of music in which Mr. Gericke so long and fondly and thoroughly drilled the players he brought together. Therefore, it was only natural that they should have felt entirely at home, notwithstanding the extreme novelty of the work; and it is needless to add that they gave it a fine performance. The overture is one of Brahm's really delightful inspirations. His happy, masterly treatment of the German student songs not only compels attention, but creates keen pleasure that remains unimpaired to the end. It was played with finish and spirit, the skilfully varied tempi bringing out the several themes most admirably. In Mozart's last symphony the splendid corps of strings again held full sway, doing some beautifully clear and refined playing, which, however, was hardly sustained with the ease and security of former times. The exquisite minuet, the gem of the work, was exquisitely given, and in its trio was to be noticed none of the helter-skelter playing for which Wagner, in his spicy book on conducting, condemned the leaders of his early days. Miss Emma Thursby was the soloist. "Mia speranza adorata," the recitative and aria that Mozart wrote for concert use, was her first number. The music is well suited to her slender, flexible voice; but it must be said that her singing caused disappointment, owing to a too prevalent faulty intonation. For her second number she sang, with pianoforte the hackneyed mazurka of Chopin, "Love me," in a manner that lacked the essentials necessary to make it tolerable to the concert-goer of today.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DEC. 21, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

NINTH CONCERT.

Last evening the programme was;

Brahms, Overture, "Academic Festival," Op. 80
Mozart, Recit. and Rondo, "Mia Speranza Adorata" (K 416)
Richard Heuberger, Variations on a Theme by Schubert, Op. 11, (First time in Boston.)
David.....Aria, "La Perle du Bresil"
Chopin.....Mazurka
Mozart.....Symphony in C major (Jupiter)
Soloist, Miss Emma Thursby.

The Brahms overture, taking into consideration that the concert began with it, while the familiar and time-honored symphony Mozart's "Jupiter" was the final work performed, was almost unwelcome. The overture is a masterly work in all its technical details, but as it is based on the student songs of the Fatherland, the necessity of its having been made so "academic," in the narrow sense of the term, and so generally void of the gay and festive spirit which its title implies is by no means apparent. At all events the work is heard here too often to enable it to hold its own among the very best concert overtures.

Miss Emma Thursby, soloist for the concert, was admirable in her phrasing of the Mozart recitative and rondo, but no other feature of her singing can be so heartily commended, as her voice is altogether too light, and likewise too much worn to be of any real service in a large concert hall.

The tempi of the "Jupiter" symphony were generally well taken and the performance as a whole was well worthy of the orchestra's high reputation.

The novelty of the concert was Heuberger's Variations on a theme by Schubert. Mr. Heuberger writes in a very professor-like manner and his variations are quite evenly uninteresting, and as if skilfully so throughout; so that the conspicuous merit of the work that justified its performance must have been with its having been composed by a Vienna music teacher.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
—A WEEKLY PAPER—
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

IT is one of the most pleasant duties of a conscientious music critic to write about the concerts given by the doubtlessly best orchestra now existing in this country, the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Our visitors from the Hub appeared at Chickering Hall for the second time this season on Tuesday night of last week and were again welcomed by a musical, appreciative and enthusiastic audience of large number.

The program opened with Haydn's D major symphony (No. 2 in the Breitkopf & Härtel edition), which, though familiar to every concert goer through not unfrequent performance, was adorned with considerable new charm through the absolutely flawless playing of the orchestra and Mr. Arthur Nikisch's intelligent, musical, refined and chaste reading. No striving after effect, no vulgar outbreak of uncalled for fortissimi—everything smooth, simple and noble.

A novelty of more than usual piquancy was Goldmark's difficult violin concerto in A minor, op. 28, which, though in print nearly a couple of decades, has never before been heard here. The first movement opens with a rhythmically pregnant and quite original theme, which is worked out in masterly manner, and altogether this first movement seems to us by far the best of the three. The slow movement (curiously enough in the somewhat distant key of G major) is a skillful nothing; that is to say, through beautiful tone coloring and orchestration, as well as interesting harmonic progressions, it represents a tonal picture of considerable beauty of color, but with absolutely no definite outlines of design.

The last movement, the tonality of which again alternates between A minor and G major, is brilliant, though anything but deep, and the whole work is thoroughly characteristic of Goldmark and his Oriental intervals and harmonies, as well as gorgeous orchestration, which latter in the last movement is of such sensuous richness that it was found necessary to do away with some of the over luxuriance and doubling of parts, especially in the woodwind, in order not to drown the solo instrument.

The solo violin part is bristling with technical difficulties, which were enhanced in the last movement through the interpolation of Franz Kneisel's own cadenza in place of the one written by Goldmark, which, though horribly difficult, is not quite as effective. Kneisel surmounted these difficulties with a sovereign certainty and faultlessness, and he played, moreover, with the most exquisite, mellow, golden tinged tone that can be imagined. His purity of intonation is absolutely marvelous and particularly gratifying to cultivated ears, and his conception was refined as well as thoroughly musical. He received a perfect ovation at the close of the performance and most generous applause on the part of his colleagues in the orchestra, which latter fact is in praiseworthy contrast to the usual behavior of their New York confrères when one of their number happens to distinguish himself as a soloist.

Dvorak's fanciful and rhythmical, thematically healthy and in point of orchestration interesting but now, through frequent performance, quite familiar "Scherzo Capriccioso," as well as Liszt's second best symphonic poem, "Tasso," received a most finished and highly enjoyable interpretation, the Liszt number especially sounding almost like an improvisation on the orchestra, so thoroughly did Nikisch have his forces under his command and will power.

Real Music in Baltimore.

BALTIMORE, December 15, 1890.

WHO would have thunk it? A classical concert at the Concordia Hall! What reminiscences this occasion brought forward. I am getting old and losing much of that precious faculty, the memory, having even forgotten the initials of that great musical critic, Mr. Day, and there is not a musical dictionary in which I can find them. However, to return to reminiscences. The dates do not survive in my mind, but I do remember a series of three concerts given at the Concordia many years ago, in the early '70s, by J. H. Rosewald, native, violinist, conductor and, best of all, musician. A talented man he was, who possessed the gift of absolute pitch, without which I can hardly understand how anyone can conduct. Rosewald gave three orchestral concerts, and at each he had a soloist from out of town. That created prejudice at once.

Two of the soloists I remember. One was Dr. Leopold Damrosch, who played Spohr's "Gesangacene;" the other was Charles Jarvis, the Philadelphia pianist, who tickled the ivories with old time unction and gave some of the audience the impression that Philadelphia was really a musical city. I did not think much of Jarvis' playing except that he could probably do justice in ensemble playing in trio or piano quartets on a Sunday afternoon in the parlor of a private family where the sons are amateur fiddlers—unless people are arrested in Philadelphia for doing that kind of thing. Sometimes the police are justified.

The third soloist I cannot remember. Rosewald made no money, and the receipts of all three concerts were probably not as large as the receipts of the one concert given last Friday night at the Concordia by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the inimitable Nikisch—with Rembrandt bangs.

Before I lose more of my memory I desire to make record of the fact that I heard Nilsson for the first time in concert at the Concordia Hall. Brignoli, or Capoul, was, I believe, the tenor; Cary the alto; Verger the baritone and Vieuxtemps played the fiddle; and how he did play it! It must have been about 1874, for in 1873 Nilsson made her appearance with Campanini in "Les Huguenots" at Ford's Opera House. But as I have forgotten Day's initials I may be wrong about other minor matters.

The concert last Friday night was a marvelous boon to every music lover of this city who attended. The advance sales were equal to those of the first Nikisch concert last year, and the sales of tickets on the evening of the concert were ahead of last year's sales at any of the Nikisch concerts. This means business, which happens to be allied to art by some mysterious bands. Even the divine Richard himself needed pelf to advance his theories and to promulgate them so that they would penetrate. Then why shouldn't money be needed in order to give Nikisch concerts? And why shouldn't Baltimoreans emulate other good people and pay big money to hear Nikisch's band? The success of the first concerts ensures the series at the Concordia and may result in a resuscitation of that hall for concert purposes. It is an excellent hall and there is transit sufficient to get people to it readily from all parts of the city.

You have said so much about Nikisch's interpretation of the "Eroica" that I merely desire to call attention to the fact that it constituted the symphony number of the program, and its performance here stamps your position in the debate on that question as unassailable—at least, as an old symphony fiend, that is my opinion. The Baltimore "American," one of the best advertising mediums in this State, says that "it is a fine specimen of the best classic form," which should give Mr. Beethoven quite a boom in this town, where the sale of his works has been somewhat interfered with by the Hamerick suites (special discounts for boys' knee breeches).

The Dvorak's "Scherzo Capriccioso" and Liszt's "Tasso" were finished orchestral performances, Mr. Nikisch being an adherent of the theory that makes dynamic effects in modern works a matter of first importance. I never took any stock in Liszt's boisterous, illogical, "pianistic," orchestral "racket" called "Tasso." It verges upon the vulgar and is devoid of musical form or musical ideas. As for the Dvorák number, a repetition of the same would be received with thanks by everyone who heard it, which is praise of the right kind.

Much disappointment was expressed at Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler for playing the G minor Saint-Saëns from the notes. It is not difficult to memorize and it detracted much from the lady's reputation as a virtuoso and an artist, for it has become a sine qua non for virtuosi to print upon their memories every work they perform in public, and to be so thoroughly au fait with their repertory as to be able to rewrite it in case it should not be available—if such a conjunction should ever be within the possibilities of chance. She played well and she played with greater repose, but, alas, she played from the notes.

Other performances took place during the week, but I must refrain from mentioning them, as they are not well fitted in a letter that comprises a reference to these concerts.

Oh, for a Higginson of Baltimore! Then the pallor of death would become visible on the impudent and hardened checks of the promoters of our cursed amateur orchestral concerts. Not physical death, of course, for most of these people are individually harmless, but their deeds are rank, and their crimes against music will never be forgiven in Nirwana.

HANS SLICK.

The Beacon.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 20, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMMES.

The esteemed Transcript comes with a long leader to its own defence against our comment upon that one of its "Jottings" which lauded the programmes of the present Symphony season for their "novelty and catholicity." This labored reply only makes the matter worse; for it admits that thus far in the season sixteen composers and twenty-four works have been German against six composers and six compositions from all the rest of the world! Of the things set down as novelties, a part were merely unfamiliar music from the classics, a part had been heard in Boston and elsewhere before, and a large proportion were presented by the soloists and are not therefore to be credited to the Symphony management. If putting forward German music as against that of all other countries in the proportion of four to one, be catholicity in the Transcript's view, our contemporary has either a different dictionary or a different kind of understanding from those which we share with a large majority of the Symphony audiences. Our friend adds, as a sockdolager at the close of its dissertation, this paragraph:—

> The truth is, however, that very much of this continual fault-finding—which has been a constant experience here ever since the days of the Germania Musical Society—arises from ignorance of both the history and the æsthetics of music.

But to the impartial mind this bit of would-be severity appears to be more of a boomerang than any other sort of weapon; for whoever can find Mr. Nikisch's programmes of this season indicative of catholicity, of research, of enterprise or general musical reading, is the person who needs instruction in the history and æsthetics of music—not those who know that better programmes are easily possible and who insist that such should be supplied. In point of fact, the Transcript concedes the justice of our criticism in its remark that at the Sunday concerts last year at the Paris Conservatory, the names of German masters "were as thick upon the programmes as were those of French writers of high class works." Why not? "As thick!" yes; but four times as thick as the names, not only of French writers, but also as of the composers of all other nationalities—oh, no! The world is to Germany in Mr. Nikisch's programmes as was Falstaff's bread to his sack; and all the denials and sophistries of prejudiced admirers cannot alter this plain fact.

...ing from ...
Jour... Pos...

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert in Infantry Hall this evening, and the favorite soprano, Miss Emma Thursby, has been specially engaged, after an absence of several years from the concert stage. The selections include the "Polonaise" from "Mignon," and the aria, "La Perle do Bresil," "David."

THE NEWS.
SATURDAY, DEC. 20, 1890.
STONEHAM, MASS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

BY W. A. FIELD.

That the state of Massachusetts in its capital city has the finest musical organization in the whole country—in fact an orchestra that by competent judges is acknowledged to be equal to any in the world, is something that we should all be proud of, whether as actual residents of Boston or otherwise. This grand and superb orchestra, composed as it is of 85 picked musicians, made its second tour of the season last week, giving one concert each in the following cities: New Haven, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, and Baltimore, the last concert of this trip being given at the latter place. It can be truthfully said and without exaggeration, that it was one of the most successful tours known in its history. The houses in every place being literally packed with the most refined and enthusiastic audiences, is of itself sufficient evidence of the rapidly increasing popularity of this organization, as well as that of its admirable, efficient, and in fact wonderful conductor and drill master, Mr. Arthur Nickish, who, the moment he steps upon the stage is greeted with outbursts of deafening applause. But there is another to whom much credit is due, a comparatively silent but very efficient worker. I refer to Mr. Charles A. Ellis, the young but enterprising and thoroughly successful business manager, who by his persevering but quiet and gentlemanly qualities, has won the good will and respect of all who ever had personal dealings with him.

Also, Mr. F. R. Comee, Mr. Ellis' faithful lieutenant, the assistant manager, to whose tender mercies the "boys" are consigned when on the road, and who has a two-fold duty to perform, the first being to execute the plans so carefully laid out previously, by his superior officer Mr. Ellis, regarding the concerts. The second (as was before started in a homely way) to lookout for the welfare and comfort of the gentlemen of the orchestra. Right well are his duties performed especially the latter, as the writer can testify. The pleasure of the trips are very much enhanced by the presence and labors of "Fred," who surely is "the right man in the right place." That the above is not an overdrawn or a mere visionary statement I will add as a proof a few brief extracts copied from extended press comments.

New York Sun.

An audience that filled every seat in the (Chickering) Hall, and that, as to representative quality, has certainly not been seen in the concert room this season, was in attendance. The orchestra reached its highest point of perfection in the "Scherzo Capriccioso." This composition has often been rendered by resident musicians. But it was reserved for Mr. Nickish to present it as a tone picture of intense richness. In fact the present generation of music lovers has enjoyed no orchestral playing to be compared with their effort of the orchestra last night.

New York World.

The playing of the Goldmark concerto by Mr. Kneisel and the Nikisch orchestra will long be remembered as an example of splendid artistic achievement. It is a long time in fact since composer and executant together gave such unalloyed artistic delight to a New York audience. Mr. Kneisel's tone is always true and pure. He is an absolute master of tecnique, which is submerged in artistic truthfulness.

The Washington Post.

There is no apparent limit to the capacity of the Washington public for good music well rendered, to judge from the size of the audience assembled in Lincoln hall last evening at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. From its initial appearance in Washington the Boston Symphony Orchestra has owned a devoted clientele in the capital city, very justly proportioned to the superlative artistic merits of this matchless band and the appreciative intelligence of the community.

The New Haven, Philadelphia and Baltimore papers, were equally enthusiastic in their praise regarding the work of Mr. Nikisch. Mr. Kneisel and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NOTE.—There is one whose face and form, so long familiar to the Boston public and the members of the orchestra, himself a member of long standing, who has been sadly missed this season by all. I refer to Mr. Wm. C. Nichols, the veteran librarian of the Orchestra. A tried and true friend of the writer, who for some time past has been quite ill, at his home in Dorchester. All connected with the orchestra are united in their sympathy for him and are glad to learn that there are at present great hopes of his early recovery.

Journal, Post ...
Date ... 12-8

THIRD SYMPHONY.

The Boston Orchestra and Miss Thursby at Infantry Hall.

Last night's concert finished the first half of the symphony season. This was the very fit holiday programme:

Schumann	Symphony, No. 1, in B-flat
		Andante un peco maestoso
		Allegro molto vivace.
		Larghetto.
		Scherzo.
		Allegro animato e grazioso
A. Thomas	Polonaise "Io son Titania" from "Mignon."
Saint-Saens	Symphonic poem "Danse
		Macabre."
David	Aria from "La Perlo du Bresil."
Dvorak	Scherzo Capriccioso op. 66

It was delightful to find and to hear the Symphony, by grace of Mr. Nikisch, first on the programme, where it could be joyed with fresh and unwearied faculties.

This symphony Schumann wrote when he was most supremely happy in the love of a beautiful young wife. So if it breathes as much of a blissful symphonic honeymoon as it does of the tender passing season of spring, the cause is right at hand. It was his earliest symphony, and perhaps the one which came nearest to being a hearty spontaneous effusion. Mr. Nikisch displayed its delicious lightsome spirit with finest art. From the startling bursting forth of the horns and trumpets in the "motto" phrase which opens the work, he carried it thoroughly its several movements with that sensitive capability which ever distinguishes his performance with the Boston Orchestra. There was a singularly pretty passage in the second part of the first movement—a passage for the strings alone—that contrasted nicely with what had gone before. It was simple, and sweet, and churchly, and the strings almost sung those words which, properly or improperly, have come to be known as its title—"A little song of thankfulness." The slow, expressive larghetto was emotionally delivered in all the changes. Violins had the first statement of the melody, and with charming and ever-increasing amplifications it was taken up by the plaintive 'cellos, and by the horns and oboes. Doubtless it was the unfailing melodic character of his themes that made Schumann's First Symphony so immensely popular with the audience, or it may have been its general buoyant hey-day nature.

Saint-Saens's pungent piece of instrumentation was redemanded with unusual fervor. Somehow the most uncanny of the sights it conjured up were never wholly horrible, a precious element of ridiculousness in them saved the composition from being anything but a strong and enjoyable stimulant to the imagination. It is the weirdest kind of a dancing party which plays in and out among the grim tombstones at midnight. The bell was beautifully imitated. Then the whirling dance of shrouded skeletons began. Perhaps the castanets might have been tempered to better effect in furnishing the suggestion of cracking bones, but that is a very little thing, and the sport was depicted altogether with wonderful realism, if this dance of death be in any earthly sense realism. This and Miss Thursby's aria from "La Perle du Brasil," were the things which had to be repeated. The last on the programme, Dvorak's "Scherzo Capriccioso," was rich and brilliant, having a tropical splendor of coloring, and a prodigal, riotous display of contrast and combination. Its moods were difficult to understand. Out of the labyrinthine mass of curious instrumentation little could be drawn but a vision of splendid formlessness, though the analysis of Mr. Henry implies a certain method in it. That it was interesting, in a manner, and was played brilliantly.

Miss Emma Thursby was the soloist. Even after Miss De Vere, who sang from "La Perle du Brasil," the night before on the same platform, she scored a genuine triumph. There is a wide difference between the singers, and each will have her devoted following. It is enough to say that Miss Thursby is thoroughly artistic, true in intonation, and has a lovely voice in perfect taste. Its quality with the audience was very surprising, and three recalls and a bunch of flowers [illegible] satisfaction [illegible]

[64]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
—A WEEKLY PAPER—
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

IT is one of the most pleasant duties of a conscientious music critic to write about the concerts given by the doubtlessly best orchestra now existing in this country, the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Our visitors from the Hub appeared at Chickering Hall for the second time this season on Tuesday night of last week and were again welcomed by a musical, appreciative and enthusiastic audience of large number.

The program opened with Haydn's D major symphony (No. 2 in the Breitkopf & Härtel edition), which, though familiar to every concert goer through not unfrequent performance, was adorned with considerable new charm through the absolutely flawless playing of the orchestra and Mr. Arthur Nikisch's intelligent, musical, refined and chaste reading. No striving after effect, no vulgar outbreak of uncalled for fortissimi—everything smooth, simple and noble.

A novelty of more than usual piquancy was Goldmark's difficult violin concerto in A minor, op. 28, which, though in print nearly a couple of decades, has never before been heard here. The first movement opens with a rhythmically pregnant and quite original theme, which is worked out in masterly manner, and altogether this first movement seems to us by far the best of the three. The slow movement (curiously enough in the somewhat distant key of G major) is a skillful nothing; that is to say, through beautiful tone coloring and orchestration, as well as interesting harmonic progressions, it represents a tonal picture of considerable beauty of color, but with absolutely no definite outlines of design.

The last movement, the tonality of which again alternates between A minor and G major, is brilliant, though anything but deep, and the whole work is thoroughly characteristic of Goldmark and his Oriental intervals and harmonies, as well as gorgeous orchestration, which latter in the last movement is of such sensuous richness that it was found necessary to do away with some of the over luxuriance and doubling of parts, especially in the woodwind, in order not to drown the solo instrument.

The solo violin part is bristling with technical difficulties, which were enhanced in the last movement through the interpolation of Franz Kneisel's own cadenza in place of the one written by Goldmark, which, though horribly difficult, is not quite as effective. Kneisel surmounted these difficulties with a sovereign certainty and faultlessness, and he played, moreover, with the most exquisite, mellow, golden tinged tone that can be imagined. His purity of intonation is absolutely marvelous and particularly gratifying to cultivated ears, and his conception was refined as well as thoroughly musical. He received a perfect ovation at the close of the performance and most generous applause on the part of his colleagues in the orchestra, which latter fact is in praiseworthy contrast to the usual behavior of their New York confrères when one of their number happens to distinguish himself as a soloist.

Dvorak's fanciful and rhythmical, thematically healthy and in point of orchestration interesting but now, through frequent performance, quite familiar "Scherzo Capriccioso," as well as Liszt's second best symphonic poem, "Tasso," received a most finished and highly enjoyable interpretation, the Liszt number especially sounding almost like an improvisation on the orchestra, so thoroughly did Nikisch have his forces under his command and will power.

Real Music in Baltimore.

BALTIMORE, December 15, 1890.

WHO would have thunk it? A classical concert at the Concordia Hall! What reminiscences this occasion brought forward. I am getting old and losing much of that precious faculty, the memory, having even forgotten the initials of that great musical critic, Mr. Day, and there is not a musical dictionary in which I can find them. However, to return to reminiscences. The dates do not survive in my mind, but I do remember a series of three concerts given at the Concordia many years ago, in the early '70s, by J. H. Rosewald, native, violinist, conductor and, best of all, musician. A talented man he was, who possessed the gift of absolute pitch, without which I can hardly understand how anyone can conduct. Rosewald gave three orchestral concerts, and at each he had a soloist from out of town. That created prejudice at once.

Two of the soloists I remember. One was Dr. Leopold Damrosch, who played Spohr's "Gesangscene;" the other was Charles Jarvis, the Philadelphia pianist, who tickled the ivories with old time unction and gave some of the audience the impression that Philadelphia was really a musical city. I did not think much of Jarvis' playing except that he could probably do justice in ensemble playing in trio or piano quartets on a Sunday afternoon in the parlor of a private family where the sons are amateur fiddlers—unless people are arrested in Philadelphia for doing that kind of thing. Sometimes the police are justified.

The third soloist I cannot remember. Rosewald made no money, and the receipts of all three concerts were probably not as large as the receipts of the one concert given last Friday night at the Concordia by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the inimitable Nikisch—with Rembrandt bangs.

Before I lose more of my memory I desire to make record of the fact that I heard Nilsson for the first time in concert at the Concordia Hall. Brignoli, or Capoul, was, I believe, the tenor; Cary the alto; Verger the baritone and Vieuxtemps played the fiddle; and how he did play it! It must have been about 1874, for in 1873 Nilsson made her appearance with Campanini in "Les Huguenots" at Ford's Opera House. But as I have forgotten Day's initials I may be wrong about other minor matters.

The concert last Friday night was a marvelous boon to every music lover of this city who attended. The advance sales were equal to those of the first Nikisch concert last year, and the sales of tickets on the evening of the concert were ahead of last year's sales at any of the Nikisch concerts. This means business, which happens to be allied to art by some mysterious bands. Even the divine Richard himself needed pelf to advance his theories and to promulgate them so that they would penetrate. Then why shouldn't money be needed in order to give Nikisch concerts? And why shouldn't Baltimoreans emulate other good people and pay big money to hear Nikisch's band? The success of the first concerts ensures the series at the Concordia and may result in a resuscitation of that hall for concert purposes. It is an excellent hall and there is transit sufficient to get people to it readily from all parts of the city.

You have said so much about Nikisch's interpretation of the "Eroica" that I merely desire to call attention to the fact that it constituted the symphony number of the program, and its performance here stamps your position in the debate on that question as unassailable—at least, as an old symphony fiend, that is my opinion. The Baltimore "American," one of the best advertising mediums in this State, says that "it is a fine specimen of the best classic form," which should give Mr. Beethoven quite a boom in this town, where the sale of his works has been somewhat interfered with by the Hamerick suites (special discounts for boys' knee breeches).

The Dvorak's "Scherzo Capriccioso" and Liszt's "Tasso" were finished orchestral performances, Mr. Nikisch being an adherent of the theory that makes dynamic effects in modern works a matter of first importance. I never took any stock in Liszt's boisterous, illogical, "pianistic," orchestral "racket" called "Tasso." It verges upon the vulgar and is devoid of musical form or musical ideas. As for the Dvorák number, a repetition of the same would be received with thanks by everyone who heard it, which is praise of the right kind.

Much disappointment was expressed at Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler for playing the G minor Saint-Saëns from the notes. It is not difficult to memorize and it detracted much from the lady's reputation as a virtuoso and an artist, for it has become a sine qua non for virtuosi to print upon their memories every work they perform in public, and to be so thoroughly au fait with their repertory as to be able to rewrite it in case it should not be available—if such a conjunction should ever be within the possibilities of chance. She played well and she played with greater repose, but, alas, she played from the notes.

Other performances took place during the week, but I must refrain from mentioning them, as they are not well fitted in a letter that comprises a reference to these concerts.

Oh, for a Higginson of Baltimore! Then the pallor of death would become visible on the impudent and hardened checks of the promoters of our cursed amateur orchestral concerts. Not physical death, of course, for most of these people are individually harmless, but their deeds are rank, and their crimes against music will never be forgiven in Nirwana.

HANS SLICK.

The Beacon.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 20, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMMES.

The esteemed Transcript comes with a long leader to its own defence against our comment upon that one of its "lottings" which lauded the programmes of the present Symphony season for their "novelty and catholicity." This labored reply only makes the matter worse; for it admits that thus far in the season sixteen composers and twenty-four works have been German against six composers and six compositions from all the rest of the world! Of the things set down as novelties, a part were merely unfamiliar music from the classics, a part had been heard in Boston and elsewhere before, and a large proportion were presented by the soloists and are not therefore to be credited to the Symphony management. If putting forward German music as against that of all other countries in the proportion of four to one, be catholicity in the Transcript's view, our contemporary has either a different dictionary or a different kind of understanding from those which we share with a large majority of the Symphony audiences. Our friend adds, as a sockdolager at the close of its dissertation, this paragraph:—

> The truth is, however, that very much of this continual fault-finding—which has been a constant experience here ever since the days of the Germania Musical Society—arises from ignorance of both the history and the æsthetics of music.

But to the impartial mind this bit of would-be severity appears to be more of a boomerang than any other sort of weapon; for whoever can find Mr. Nikisch's programmes of this season indicative of catholicity, of research, of enterprise or general musical reading, is the person who needs instruction in the history and æsthetics of music—not those who know that better programmes are easily possible and who insist that such should be supplied. In point of fact, the Transcript concedes the justice of our criticism in its remark that at the Sunday concerts last year at the Paris Conservatory, the names of German masters "were as thick upon the programmes as were those of French writers of high class works." Why not? "As thick!" yes; but four times as thick as the names, not only of French writers, but also as of the composers of all other nationalities—oh, no! The world is to Germany in Mr. Nikisch's programmes as was Falstaff's bread to his sack; and all the denials and sophistries of prejudiced admirers cannot alter this plain fact.

...ing from ...

> The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert in Infantry Hall, this evening, and the favorite soprano, Miss Emma Thursby, has been specially engaged, after an absence of several years from the concert stage. The selections include the "Polonaise" from "Mignon," and the aria, "La Perle do Bresil," "David."

THE NEWS.
SATURDAY, DEC. 20, 1890.
STONEHAM, MASS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

BY W. A. FIELD.

That the state of Massachusetts in its capital city has the finest musical organization in the whole country—in fact an orchestra that by competent judges is acknowledged to be equal to any in the world, is something that we should all be proud of, whether as actual residents of Boston or otherwise. This grand and superb orchestra, composed as it is of 85 picked musicians, made its second tour of the season last week, giving one concert each in the following cities: New Haven, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, and Baltimore, the last concert of this trip being given at the latter place. It can be truthfully said and without exaggeration, that it was one of the most successful tours known in its history. The houses in every place being literally packed with the most refined and enthusiastic audiences, is of itself sufficient evidence of the rapidly increasing popularity of this organization, as well as that of its admirable, efficient, and in fact wonderful conductor and drill master, Mr. Arthur Nickish, who, the moment he steps upon the stage is greeted with outbursts of deafening applause. But there is another to whom much credit is due, a comparatively silent but very efficient worker. I refer to Mr. Charles A. Ellis, the young but enterprising and thoroughly successful business manager, who by his persevering but quiet and gentlemanly qualities, has won the good will and respect of all who ever had personal dealings with him.

Also, Mr. F. R. Comee, Mr. Ellis' faithful lieutenant, the assistant manager, to whose tender mercies the "boys" are consigned when on the road, and who has a two-fold duty to perform, the first being to execute the plans so carefully laid out previously, by his superior officer Mr. Ellis, regarding the concerts. The second (as was before started in a homely way) to lookout for the welfare and comfort of the gentlemen of the orchestra. Right well are his duties performed especially the latter, as the writer can testify. The pleasure of the trips are very much enhanced by the presence and labors of "Fred," who surely is "the right man in the right place," That the above is not an overdrawn or a mere visionary statement I will add as a proof a few brief extracts copied from extended press comments.

New York Sun.

An audience that filled every seat in the (Chickering) Hall, and that, as to representative quality, has certainly not been seen in the concert room this season, was in attendance. The orchestra reached its highest point of perfection in the "Scherzo Capriccioso." This composition has often been rendered by resident musicians. But it was reserved for Mr. Nickish to present it as a tone picture of intense richness. In fact the present generation of music lovers has enjoyed no orchestral playing to be compared with their effort of the orchestra last night.

New York World.

The playing of the Goldmark concerto by Mr. Kneisel and the Nikisch orchestra will long be remembered as an example of splendid artistic achievement. It is a long time in fact since composer and executant together gave such unalloyed artistic delight to a New York audience Mr. Kneisel's tone is always true and pure. He is an absolute master of tecnique, which is submerged in artistic truthfulness.

The Washington Post.

There is no apparent limit to the capacity of the Washington public for good music well rendered, to judge from the size of the audience assembled in Lincoln hall last evening at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. From its initial appearance in Washington the Boston Symphony Orchestra has owned a devoted clientele in the capital city, very justly proportioned to the superlative artistic merits of this matchless band and the appreciative intelligence of the community.

The New Haven, Philadelphia and Baltimore papers, were equally enthusiastic in their praise regarding the work of Mr. Nikisch. Mr. Kneisel and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NOTE.—There is one whose face and form, so long familiar to the Boston public and the members of the orchestra, himself a member of long standing, who has been sadly missed this season by all. I refer to Mr. Wm. C. Nichols, the veteran librarian of the Orchestra. A tried and true friend of the writer, who for some time past has been quite ill, at his home in Dorchester. All connected with the orchestra are united in their sympathy for him and are glad to learn that there are at present great hopes of his early recovery.

Date 12-15

THIRD SYMPHONY.

The Boston Orchestra and Miss Thursby at Infantry Hall.

Last night's concert finished the first half of the symphony season. This was the very fit holiday programme:

Schumann.....Symphony, No. 1, in B-flat
Andante un peco maestoso
Allegro molto vivace.
Larghetto.
Scherzo.
Allegro animato e grazioso
A-Thomas.....Polonsise "Io son Titania"
.....from "Mignon."
Saint-Saens.....Symphonic poem "Danse
.....Macabre."
David.....Aria from "La Perlo du Bresil."
Dvorak.....Scherzo Capriccioso op. 66

It was delightful to find and to hear the Symphony, by grace of Mr. Nikisch, first on the programme, where it could be joyed with fresh and unwearied faculties.

This symphony Schumann wrote when he was most supremely happy in the love of a beautiful young wife. So if it breathes as much of a blissful symphonic honeymoon as it does of the tender passing season of spring, the cause is right at hand. It was his earliest symphony, and perhaps the one which came nearest to being a hearty spontaneous effusion. Mr. Nikisch displayed its delicious lightsome spirit with finest art. From the startling bursting forth of the horns and trumpets in the "motto" phrase which opens the work, he carried it through its several movements with that sensitive capability which ever distinguishes his performance with the Boston Orchestra. There was a singularly pretty passage in the second part of the first movement—a passage for the strings alone—that contrasted nicely with what had gone before. It was simple, and sweet, and churchly, and the strings almost sung those words which, properly or improperly, have come to be known as its title—"A little song of thankfulness." The slow, expressive larghetto was emotionally delivered in all the changes. Violins had the first statement of the melody, and with charming and ever-increasing amplifications it was taken up by the plaintive 'cellos, and by the horns and oboes. Doubtless it was the unfailing melodic character of his themes that made Schumann's First Symphony so immensely popular with the audience, or it may have been its general buoyant hey-day nature.

Saint-Saens's pungent piece of instrumentation was redemanded with unusual fervor. Somehow the most uncanny of the sights it conjured up were never wholly horrible, a precious element of ridiculousness in them saved the composition from being anything but a strong and enjoyable stimulant to the imagination. It is the weirdest kind of a dancing party which plays in and out among the grim tombstones at midnight. The bell was beautifully imitated. Then the whirling dance of shrouded skeletons began. Perhaps the castanets might have been tempered to better effect in furnishing the suggestion of cracking bones, but that is a very little thing, and the sport was depicted altogether with wonderful realism, if this dance of death be in any earthly sense, realism. This and Miss Thursby's aria from "La Perle du Brasil," were the things which had to be repeated. The last on the programme, Dvorak's "Scherzo Capriccioso," was rich and brilliant, having a tropical splendor of coloring, and a prodigal, riotous display of contrast and combination. Its moods were difficult to understand. Out of the labyrinthine mass of curious instrumentation little could be drawn but a vision of splendid formlessness, though the analysis of Mr. Barry implies a certain method in it. Thus it was interesting, in a manner, and was played brilliantly.

Miss Emma Thursby was the soloist. Even after Miss De Vere, who sang from "La Perle du Brasil," the night before on the same platform, she scored a definite triumph. There is a wide difference between the singers, and each will have her devoted following. It is enough to say that Miss Thursby is thoroughly artistic, true in intonation, and uses her lovely voice in perfect taste. Her success with the audience was very sure. She had three recalls and a bunch of flowers after the aria, before she came out to render the satisfaction of it all over again.

[64]

1890

S SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Third of the Series of Concerts at Infantry Hall, Last Night.

Booth and Barrett as Othello and Iago—Mr. Stoddard's Lecture.

The third concert this season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Infantry Hall last night, attracted a large audience, despite the raging storm. The program was one of the most enjoyable the orchestra has ever presented in this city, and the occasion was made notable in that Herr Nikisch condescended to heed an enthusiastic encore and repeat one number in full. The program follows:

Schumann.....Symphony No. 1, in B-flat
- Andante un poco maestoso.
- Allegro molto vivace.
- Larghetto.
- Scherzo.
- Allegro animato e graziose.

A. Thomas—Polonaise.....
....."Io son Titania," from "Mignon"
Miss Thursby.
Saint-Saens—Symphonic Poem.....
....."Danse Macabre"
David.....Aria from "La Perle du Bresil"
Miss Thursby.
Dvorak.....Scherzo Capriccioso, Op. 66

Miss Emma Thursby was the soloist, and she had two of the five numbers on the program. In the first she received hearty and merited applause and a handsome bouquet of roses. The second she was obliged to repeat, after having repeatedly bowed her thanks for the rapturous applause. Such of the audience as heard Mlle. DeVere sing the same selection the previous night were enabled to compare the work of the older and the younger artist, and there were so many points of difference in method that such comparison simply resulted in a choice between them based upon the taste of the auditor rather than upon musical merit. Miss Thursby sang in English, which is a distinct advantage with a popular audience, and she sang with feeling, spirit and accuracy, which is advantageous with any audience. The audience was well pleased with her—so well pleased that it insisted on a repetition, which Miss Thursby gracefully acceded to. The artiste was beautifully dressed, and displayed a dazzling array of diamonds.

The orchestra carried the audience with them from the first strains of the extremely fine introduction to Schumann's first symphony to the last note of Dvorak's Scherzo Capriccioso. Never did the symphony please a Providence audience as well. During one of the prolonged bursts of applause an extraordinary phenomenon occurred. Herr Arthur Nikisch smiled. It was a genuine smile, and it played about the maestro's severe lips and lighted up his sombre eyes for a moment or two, and then he mounted his stand and gave the signal to repeat the extremely clever and taking "symphonic poem" by Saint-Saens—the "Danse

---

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

BOSTON, DEC. 21, 1890.

The Symphony Concerts.

Last night's concert in Music Hall, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented the following programme: Academic Overture, Brahms; variations by Heuberger on a theme by Schubert; and Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony. The soloist was Miss Emma Thursby, who sang Mozart's concert aria, "Mia Speranza Adorata," and the favorite soprano air from "La Perle du Brezil," by F. David. The genial Brahms overture received admirable treatment, and obtained, on the whole, one of the clearest and best performances it has had here. The variations by the young Viennese composer, though undoubtedly clever enough in their way, are of no permanent musical value. They are studiously made and well put together, but are not especially attractive. It was scarcely worth while to have gone all the way to Vienna for such work, when quite as good, if not better, could have been found nearer home; and after all, the works of our best young American composers could scarcely prove any more monotonous or less interesting than was this composition of the young Viennese. It was well played, the strings acquitting themselves brilliantly. The ever fresh and ever wonderful Mozart symphony was again an unalloyed delight in the hearing. It was sympathetically read; the tempi were judicious, and the coloring throughout was just. The andante was given with exquisite delicacy and the minuet was beautifully read and played. Miss Thursby sang with all of her former grace and refinement of style, phrasing artistically and showing a thorough appreciation of her music. Her voice is still sweet and pure, but it has lost much of its freshness and limpidity and some of its volume. Her Mozart singing was her best. In the David selection, she was less pleasing. There were occasional lapses in intonation, and something was lacking in warmth and clearness. The artist was cordially applauded, and recalled after each effort. At the next concert will be played Beethoven's Symphony, No. 8; Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and the overture, scherzo, nocturne and wedding march from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream." There will be no soloist.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 22, 1890.

NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the ninth Symphony concert, given at Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Overture, Academic Festival.....Brahms
Recit. and Rondo, Mia Speranza Adorata.....Mozart
Variations on a Theme by Schubert.....Heuberger
(First time in Boston.)
Aria, La Perle du Brésil.....David
Symphony in C major (Jupiter).....Mozart

Richard Heuberger, whose variations were played Saturday evening, was born in 1850, and he devoted himself to the study of engineering. Not until he was twenty-six years old did he turn professional musician. These variations show the influence of his early training, for they are laid out as though by rule and compasses; the plans of the designer are faithfully carried out, and all the mathematical computations are found to be scrupulously correct. But where is the music? The members of the orchestra, armed with their instruments, go out upon this road, so carefully constructed by the engineer, and hunt for it, but they return, empty handed and choked with dust. The theme is better adapted to lend itself to the devices of counterpoint than to give pleasure by any intrinsic beauty. The variations are nine in number, with a long drawn out finale. Now, the present generation has little taste for this form of music once so dear to concert-goers. Varied airs which once delighted the public are forgotten; and we read with deep emotion of the sufferings of those who were obliged in concert after concert to listen to such virtuosos as Moscheles, who insisted upon playing "Alexander" and compositions of that class. To make orchestral variations endurable in these days there must be, besides a display of contrapuntal ingenuity, a lavish use of color, surprising contrasts and piquant harmonies. While Heuberger's Variations are correctly made, they are lacking in the above-named essential qualities. The eighth variation is certainly the most pleasing and the one which is most truly musical; though the seventh is interesting from its strongly marked rhythm, and in the fourth the muted first violins have an effective part against the theme. The other variations are uninteresting, and the finale is welcomed simply because it is the finale. The work as a whole is dull, very dull; and it is not unlike a music school exhibition piece which shows the faithful attention paid by a plodding student to text book and teacher. Nor does the fact that "it has been played at the Gewandhaus concerts, Leipzig," give it a fictitious beauty nor does it render it the more endurable, though it may stamp it with the hallmark of oppressive respectability.

The other orchestral numbers, Brahms's "Academic" overture and the "Jupiter" symphony, were familiar. The first, a potpourri of German student songs, may be of peculiar interest to Germans who remember the careless, jolly days spent at the university. Nor is it to be denied that it is well put together. Nevertheless, it is a potpourri pure and simple, only of a higher rank than the ordinary collection of airs, strung together according to an approved formula. The noble symphony of Mozart will ever stand as a triumph of genius, where the most astounding knowledge of all technical resources is employed for purely musical ends. Never was there a more complete concealment of almost superhuman art than the finale; never was the beauty of an andante expressed by such apparently simple means. But why speak of each movement or of the complete symphony? As Schumann finely said, "There are things in the world about which nothing can be said; as Mozart's C major Symphony with the fugue, much of Shakspere, and passages of Beethoven." Portions of the symphony were exceedingly well played, noticeably the minuet, the tempo of which was happily taken. The finale was played with more spirit than discrimination.

The arias by Mozart and David were sung by Miss Emma Thursby. Whether she suffered from temporary indisposition or from the cruelty of Time, the fact remains that her singing was a disappointment, for her voice was thin and weak and her intonation was not sure. Yet she often showed herself the musician by admirable phrasing and artistic appreciation of the composer's intentions.

The programme for next Saturday, Dec. 27, seems to have been chosen as Judge Bridlegoose decided causes and controversies in law, by the chance and fortune of the dice. It is made up of Beethoven's eighth symphony, Schubert's unfinished symphony and the overture, scherzo, notturno and wedding march from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream."

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC. 21, 1890.

Echoes of the Symphony Rehearsal.

There was a feeling of disappointment in the minds of a good many who were numbered with the throng in Music Hall at the last Symphony rehearsal. Miss Emma C. Thursby, although her singing was facile, did not appear to be in her best condition. Her voice seemed to be veiled, and accordingly neither in the Mozart rondo, "O My Adored One," nor in the Chopin mazurka, arranged for song, did she gain the effect that one expects from this artist. Apparently matters had not gone altogether to Mr. Nikisch's satisfaction on that day. At any rate, the Mozart "Jupiter" symphony, excepting the lovely andante, did not make the impression one counted upon. Brahms' "Academic" overture was beautifully played, but the Henvarger variations on a Schubert theme were wearisome—they have no legitimate claim on the attention of a symphony audience while so many noble modern works are left unrepresented on the programme. This week's concert provides for the hearing of two symphonies—Beethoven's eighth and Schubert's "unfinished" symphony, with excerpts from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," to send the audience home in a holiday mood.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and Mr. Arthur Whiting are to be the soloists at the Kneisel concert in Union Hall tomorrow evening.

[illegible]

BOSTON, DECEMBER 21, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Miss Emma Thursby.

The Christmas "Messiah" Performance—Rossini's "Stabat Mater" at Tonight's Philharmonic—A Wagner Matinee Announced Under Director Nikisch—Noted Pianists Coming.

The reappearance of Miss Emma Thursby, the soprano, made the most interesting feature of the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening, and the lady, always a favorite with the Boston public, had a very cordial greeting upon her entrance.

She chose Mozart's recitative and ronda, "Mia Speranza Adorata," and the "Pearl of Brazil" aria for her numbers, both with orchestral accompaniment. The Mozart composition was admirably suited to display the style of the singer, who has always been distinguished for the sympathetic quality of her voice, her excellent taste and the rare purity and accuracy of her tones. Although her voice lacks something of the fulness and strength of former years, she sang the number with so much expression, delicacy and refinement that she quite charmed her audience and gained a marked expression of their approval at its close.

It will be remembered that Miss Thursby was the singer who introduced the lovely "Pearl of Brazil" aria to the American concert stage, and no one has ever quite realized all its beauties as she has done. It shows the flute-like purity of her tones and her facility in the technique of her art to perfection, and she gave great delight to her hearers by her singing of this selection, the orchestral accompaniment to which was excellently played.

Mr. Nikisch gave a hearing of Richard Heuberger's variations on a theme by Schubert, op. 11, as the orchestral novelty of the evening, and it was again apparent that the conductor's admiration of such studies for orchestra is not shared by his Boston audiences to any considerable extent. The skill, originality and ability of the work done by Heuberger, who is one of the Viennese composers of the day, may be admitted without question, but a more tedious duty than that of patiently listening to these 10 variations has not been imposed upon a Boston audience of late. The playing of the orchestra and the virtuosity of the organization was, however, prominently shown in this test of endurance.

A thoroughly good performance of Brahm's "Academic" overture, and an equally satisfying reading of Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, made up the programme of the evening. The programme for next Saturday evening consists of Beethoven's symphony No. 8, Schubert's unfinished symphony and Mendelssohn's overture, scherzo, notturno, and wedding march from the "Midsummer-Night's Dream."

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch makes her first appearance with the Symphony orchestra at Music Hall in the rehearsal and concert of Jan. 30 and 31.

The Adamowski string quartet is fast gaining prominence in the musical life of the larger eastern cities, and under its eminently well fitted leader, Mr. T. Adamowski of the Symphony orchestra, is establishing its concerts in the favor of the publics of Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. The quartet is now engaged for a series of concerts in each of these cities, as well as for others in and about Boston. At the last concert of the Philadelphia series Mrs. Arthur Nikisch was the soloist, and she repeated the successes she has made at each and allof her appearances in America.

The next concert of the series by the Kneisel quartet will be given at Union Hall on Monday evening, Dec. 29. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will be the singer making her first appearance in Boston on that occasion. The quartet will also have the assistance of Mr. Arthur Whiting. Tickets are being rapidly taken at Music Hall.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 22, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

The principal interest in the Symphony Concert Saturday evening was the appearance—or more properly speaking—reappearance on the concert platform of Miss Emma Thursby. Miss Thursby is pleasantly remembered and has many warm friends in this city, and her true, sympathetic voice and admirable technique have charmed her hearers many times in the past. Remembering this she was warmly received on her entrance. Both numbers chosen by her were given with orchestral accompaniment, the first being the recitative and rondo, "Mia speranza adorata," by Mozart, and the second the "Perle of Brazil" aria. This latter was a substitution for the number given at the Friday afternoon rehearsal, but it is a favorite piece of Miss Thursby, and her facile execution, her pure tones and admirable method were here displayed to the best advantage. It was the better selection, and her audience was the more favorably impressed. Her voice, never large, appeared unusually light Saturday evening, and she was unable to close the "Perle of Brazil" aria with that telling effect given to it by artists whose voices are larger. In the Mozart number the accompaniment of the orchestra, light and evidently subdued as it was, was entirely overpowering in many passages, and often the hearer was able to discern, by the movement of the lips only, that she was singing. There was no enthusiasm about her recalls, though a Boston audience could hardly fail of courtesy toward such an artist.

The orchestral numbers included Brahm's overture, "Academic Festival," which was fairly well delivered, though there were many uneven places, some variations on a theme by Schubert by Heuberger, which served to show the marvelous technique of the members of the orchestra, but was very far from being interesting to the audience, and the Jupiter Symphony of Mozart, which was really something enjoyable, and the orchestra settled down to some good, substantial work. It was an admirable close to the concert, and was by far the best thing of the evening, not only from the intrinsic merit of the symphony itself, but from the masterly playing of the orchestra. Vacant seats are still quite noticeable, despite the fact that the house is sold, and there was abundant room around the sides of the hall. For the next concert the programme is Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and the overture, scherzo, notturno and wedding march from Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream—a programme which will give more pleasure, even without a soloist, than Mr. Nikisch has offered for many weeks.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1890.

Ninth Symphony Concert, Miss Thursby, Soloist.

The programme of the ninth symphony concert was:

Brahms.....Overture, "Academic Festival" op. 80
Mozart.....Recit. and Rondo, "Mia Speranza Adorata," (K 416).
Richard Heuberger.....Variations on a theme by Schubert, op. 11.
(First time in Boston.)
David.....Air, "Thou Brilliant Bird."
Mozart.....Symphony in C major (Jupiter)

The singer was Miss Emma Thursby. It is safe to say that eleven-tenths of our symphony audiences would prefer a singer as soloist. But because the market is more plethoric of instrumentalists, pianists and fiddlers are oftenest called upon to fill the position. It becomes then almost a calamity when the singer chosen disappoints. Formerly Miss Thursby was an able artist with a voice. Today it pains us to say she is an able artist without a voice. The Mozart aria is one of the many show pieces for sopranos that belong to the early Vienna period when Mozart was hand and glove with the artists of the local theatre and concert stage. It is not forceful even as Mozart's tunes are forceful, but it is a good test of a singer's range of voice and technique, and is also melodious. Miss Thursby sang it with cuts. So far as phrasing goes, her performance was commendable; but her tone is thinner and slighter than formerly, and its carrying quality is diminished. The voice itself is pleasant, and in a small hall our impressions as to its size might change; but in Miss Thursby's work at this concert is there a reason why she has not been heard in leading concerts of the country the past few years. She sang the familiar bravura aria, from "The Pearl of Brazil," to the charming flute obligato of Mr. Molé. After each appearance Miss Thursby was recalled.

The novelty by Heuberger was not worth crossing the Danube for. Mr. Heuberger has taken a supple theme of Schubert's, and disguised it not uninterestingly. Had he omitted the long and rather cheap finale the total impression of the work would be more artistic, for there is in the instrumentation and structural variety of the nine variations some musicianly writing, though he cannot be compared in point of effect with those masters of the variation form, Dvorák and Brahms. Heuberger wants color and spontaneity. The performance of the variations was excellent.

The "Academic Festival" overture and the "Jupiter" symphony appeared together upon one of Mr. Gericke's programmes. Brahms wrote the overture after the University of Bremen had threatened to make a Doctor of Philosophy of him. It is a wonder that such a fate did not make a naturally contemplative and serious musician like Brahms more recondite and abstruse, but the opposite was the fact, for in the "Academic Festival" the great scientist becomes even merry, and works popular student songs into a composition of brilliancy and interest. Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony received a very careful reading. The scoring is not thick, but Mr. Nikisch's care that each part should have just the prominence the composer intended was evident at all points; and as Mozart was the neatest and most skilful "adjuster," the admirable balance of the performance can be easily imagined.

Though the concert was scarcely more than 90 minutes in length, a great many people left the hall between the movements of the symphony, which is an indication that they found it (the concert) dull. Curfew in Boston does not ring until 9.45. If Mr. Nikisch, instead of intoxicating us with Wagner, as he intends doing on the 31st, would make us, say, fortnightly tipsy by playing the music of the master, he would confer just about as big a favor as the management of the concerts would were they to provide more vocalists as soloists.

The programme for next Saturday evening consists of Beethoven's symphony No. 8, Schubert's unfinished symphony, and Mendelssohn's overture, scherzo, notturno, and wedding march from the "Midsummer Night's Dream."

AT the Symphony Concert.—He: "I suppose you're fond of music. Coming to the concerts must be a great help to you in your lessons." She: "Yes, I enjoy coming very much. My teacher says it's worth coming just to listen to the rhythm—the division of the measures, you know—even if I can't understand the melody—the tunes, you know"

---

[65]

[illegible] R.I.

Date 12/18

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Third of the Series of Concerts at Infantry Hall, Last Night.

Booth and Barrett as Othello and Iago—Mr. Stoddard's Lecture.

The third concert this season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Infantry hall last night, attracted a large audience, despite the raging storm. The program was one of the most enjoyable the orchestra has ever presented in this city, and the occasion was made notable in that Herr Nikisch condescended to heed an imperative encore and repeat one number in full. The program follows:

Schumann.....Symphony No. 1, in B-flat
{ Andante un poco maestoso.
{ Allegro molto vivace.
Larghetto.
Scherzo.
Allegro animato e grazioso.
A. Thomas—Polonaise.....
....."Io son Titania," from "Mignon"
Miss Thursby.
Saint-Saens—Symphonic Poem .....
....."Danse Macabre"
David.....Aria from "La Perle du Bresil"
Miss Thursby.
Dvorak.....Scherzo Capriccioso, Op. 66

Miss Emma Thursby was the soloist, and she had two of the five numbers on the program. In the first she received hearty and merited applause and a handsome bouquet of roses. The second she was obliged to repeat, after having repeatedly bowed her thanks for the rapturous applause. Such of the audience as heard Mlle. DeVere sing the same selection the previous night were enabled to compare the work of the older and the younger artist, and there were so many points of difference in method that such comparison simply resulted in a choice between them, based upon the taste of the auditor rather than upon musical merit. Miss Thursby sang in English, which is a distinct advantage with a popular audience; and she sang with feeling, spirit and accuracy, which is advantageous with any audience. The audience was well pleased with her—so well pleased that it insisted on a repetition, which Miss Thursby gracefully acceded to. The artiste was beautifully dressed, and displayed a dazzling array of diamonds.

The orchestra carried the audience with it from the first strains of the extremely taking introduction to Schumann's first symphony to the last note of Dvorak's Scherzo Capriccioso. Never did the symphony please a Providence audience as well. During one of the prolonged spasms of applause an extraordinary phenomenon occurred. Herr Arthur Nikirsh smiled. It was a genuine smile, and it played about the maestro's severe lips and lighted up his somtre eyes for a moment or two, and then he mounted his stand and gave the signal to repeat the extremely clever and taking "symphonic poem" by Saint-Saens—the "Danse Macabre."

Gazette SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

BOSTON, DEC. 21, 1890.

The Symphony Concerts.

Last night's concert in Music Hall, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented the following programme: Academic Overture, Brahms; variations by Heuberger on a theme by Schubert; and Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony. The soloist was Miss Emma Thursby, who sang Mozart's concert aria, "Mia Speranza Adorata," and the favorite soprano air from "La Perle du Brezil," by F. David. The genial Brahms overture received admirable treatment, and obtained, on the whole, one of the clearest and best performances it has had here. The variations by the young Viennese composer, though undoubtedly clever enough in their way, are of no permanent musical value. They are studiously made and well put together, but are not especially attractive. It was scarcely worth while to have gone all the way to Vienna for such work, when quite as good, if not better, could have been found nearer home; and after all, the works of our best young American composers could scarcely prove any more monotonous or less interesting than was this composition of the young Viennese. It was well played, the strings acquitting themselves brilliantly. The ever fresh and ever wonderful Mozart symphony was again an unalloyed delight in the hearing. It was sympathetically read; the tempi were judicious, and the coloring throughout was just. The andante was given with exquisite delicacy and the minuet was beautifully read and played. Miss Thursby sang with all of her former grace and refinement of style, phrasing artistically and showing a thorough appreciation of her music. Her voice is still sweet and pure, but it has lost much of its freshness and limpidity and some of its volume. Her Mozart singing was her best. In the David selection, she was less pleasing. There were occasional lapses in intonation, and something was lacking in warmth and clearness. The artist was cordially applauded, and recalled after each effort. At the next concert will be played Beethoven's Symphony, No. 8; Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and the overture, scherzo, nocturne and wedding march from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream." There will be no soloist.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 22, 1890

NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the ninth Symphony concert, given at Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Overture, Academic Festival.....Brahms
Recit. and Rondo, Mia Sperenza Adorata.....Mozart
Variations on a Theme by Schubert.....Heuberger
(First time in Boston.)
Aria, La Perle du Brésil.....David
Symphony in C major (Jupiter).....Mozart

Richard Heuberger, whose variations were played Saturday evening, was born in 1850, and he devoted himself to the study of engineering. Not until he was twenty-six years old did he turn professional musician. These variations show the influence of his early training, for they are laid out as though by rule and compasses; the plans of the designer are faithfully carried out, and all the mathematical computations are found to be scrupulously correct. But where is the music? The members of the orchestra, armed with their instruments, go out upon this road, so carefully constructed by the engineer, and hunt for it, but they return, empty handed and choked with dust. The theme is better adapted to lend itself to the devices of counterpoint than to give pleasure by any intrinsic beauty. The variations are nine in number, with a long drawn out finale. Now, the present generation has little taste for this form of music once so dear to concert-goers. Varied airs which once delighted the public are forgotten; and we read with deep emotion of the sufferings of those who were obliged in concert after concert to listen to such virtuosos as Moscheles, who insisted upon playing "Alexander" and compositions of that class. To make orchestral variations endurable in these days there must be, besides a display of contrapuntal ingenuity, a lavish use of color, surprising contrasts and piquant harmonies. While Heuberger's Variations are correctly made, they are lacking in the above-named essential qualities. The eighth variation is certainly the most pleasing and the one which is most truly musical; though the seventh is interesting from its strongly marked rhythm, and in the fourth the muted first violins have an effective part against the theme. The other variations are uninteresting, and the finale is welcomed simply because it is the finale. The work as a whole is dull, very dull; and it is not unlike a music school exhibition piece which shows the faithful attention paid by a plodding student to text book and teacher. Nor does the fact that "it has been played at the Gewandhaus concerts, Leipzig," give it a fictitious beauty nor does it render it the more endurable, though it may stamp it with the hallmark of oppressive respectability.

The other orchestral numbers, Brahms's "Academic" overture and the "Jupiter" symphony, were familiar. The first, a potpourri of German student songs, may be of peculiar interest to Germans who remember the careless, jolly days spent at the university. Nor is it to be denied that it is well put together. Nevertheless, it is a potpourri pure and simple, only of a higher rank than the ordinary collection of airs, strung together according to an approved formula. The noble symphony of Mozart will ever stand as a triumph of genius, where the most astounding knowledge of all technical resources is employed for purely musical ends. Never was there a more complete concealment of almost superhuman art than the finale; never was the beauty of an andante expressed by such apparently simple means. But why speak of each movement or of the complete symphony? As Schumann finely said, "There are things in the world about which nothing can be said; as Mozart's C major Symphony with the fugue, much of Shakspere, and passages of Beethoven." Portions of the symphony were exceedingly well played, noticeably the minuet, the tempo of which was happily taken. The finale was played with more spirit than discrimination.

The arias by Mozart and David were sung by Miss Emma Thursby. Whether she suffered from temporary indisposition or from the cruelty of Time, the fact remains that her singing was a disappointment, for her voice was thin and weak and her intonation was not sure. Yet she often showed herself the musician by admirable phrasing and artistic appreciation of the composer's intentions.

The programme for next Saturday, Dec. 27, seems to have been chosen as Judge Bridlegoose decided causes and controversies in law, by the chance and fortune of the dice. It is made up of Beethoven's eighth symphony, Schubert's unfinished symphony and the overture, scherzo, notturno and wedding march from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream."

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC. 21, 1890.

Echoes of the Symphony Rehearsal.

There was a feeling of disappointment in the minds of a good many who were numbered with the throng in Music Hall at the last Symphony rehearsal. Miss Emma C. Thursby, although her singing was facile, did not appear to be in her best condition. Her voice seemed to be veiled, and accordingly neither in the Mozart rondo, "O My Adored One," nor in the Chopin mazurka, arranged for song, did she gain the effect that one expects from this artist. Apparently matters had not gone altogether to Mr. Nikisch's satisfaction on that day. At any rate, the Mozart "Jupiter" symphony, excepting the lovely andante, did not make the impression one counted upon. Brahms' "Academic" overture was beautifully played, but the Henvarger variations on a Schubert theme were wearisome—they have no legitimate claim on the attention of a symphony audience while so many noble modern works are left unrepresented on the programme. This week's concert provides for the hearing of two symphonies—Beethoven's eighth and Schubert's "unfinished" symphony, with excerpts from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," to send the audience home in a holiday mood.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and Mr. Arthur Whiting are to be the soloists at the Kneisel concert in Union Hall tomorrow evening.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 21, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Miss Emma Thursby

The Christmas "Messiah" Performance—Rossini's "Stabat Mater" at Tonight's Philharmonic—A Wagner Matinee Announced Under Director Nikisch—Noted Pianists Coming.

The reappearance of Miss Emma Thursby, the soprano, made the most interesting feature of the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening, and the lady, always a favorite with the Boston public, had a very cordial greeting upon her entrance.

She chose Mozart's recitative and ronda, "Mia Speranza Adorata," and the "Pearl of Brazil" aria for her numbers, both with orchestral accompaniment. The Mozart composition was admirably suited to display the style of the singer, who has always been distinguished for the sympathetic quality of her voice, her excellent taste and the rare purity and accuracy of her tones. Although her voice lacks something of the fulness and strength of former years, she sang the number with so much expression, delicacy and refinement that she quite charmed her audience and gained a marked expression of their approval at its close.

It will be remembered that Miss Thursby was the singer who introduced the lovely "Pearl of Brazil" aria to the American concert stage, and no one has ever quite realized all its beauties as she has done. It shows the flute-like purity of her tones and her facility in the technique of her art to perfection, and she gave great delight to her hearers by her singing of this selection, the orchestral accompaniment to which was excellently played.

Mr. Nikisch gave a hearing of Richard Heuberger's variations on a theme by Schubert, op. 11, as the orchestral novelty of the evening, and it was again apparent that the conductor's admiration of such studies for orchestra is not shared by his Boston audiences to any considerable extent. The skill, originality and ability of the work done by Heuberger, who is one of the Viennese composers of the day, may be admitted without question, but a more tedious duty than that of patiently listening to these 10 variations has not been imposed upon a Boston audience of late. The playing of the orchestra and the virtuosity of the organization was, however, prominently shown in this test of endurance.

A thoroughly good performance of Brahm's "Academic" overture, and an equally satisfying reading of Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, made up the programme of the evening. The programme for next Saturday evening consists of Beethoven's symphony No. 8, Schubert's unfinished symphony and Mendelssohn's overture, scherzo, notturno, and wedding march from the "Midsummer-Night's Dream."

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch makes her first appearance with the Symphony orchestra at Music Hall in the rehearsal and concert of Jan. 30 and 31.

The Adamowski string quartet is fast gaining prominence in the musical life of the larger eastern cities, and under its eminently well fitted leader, Mr. T. Adamowski of the Symphony orchestra, is establishing its concerts in the favor of the publics of Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. The quartet is now engaged for a series of concerts in each of these cities, as well as for others in and about Boston. At the last concert of the Philadelphia series Mrs. Arthur Nikisch was the soloist, and she repeated the successes she has made at each and allof her appearances in America.

The next concert of the series by the Kneisel quartet will be given at Union Hall on Monday evening, Dec. 29. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will be the singer making her first appearance in Boston on that occasion. The quartet will also have the assistance of Mr. Arthur Whiting. Tickets are being rapidly taken at Music Hall.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 22, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

The principal interest in the Symphony Concert Saturday evening was the appearance—or more properly speaking—reappearance on the concert platform of Miss Emma Thursby. Miss Thursby is pleasantly remembered and has many warm friends in this city, and her true, sympathetic voice and admirable technique have charmed her hearers many times in the past. Remembering this she was warmly received on her entrance. Both numbers chosen by her were given with orchestral accompaniment, the first being the recitative and rondo, "Mia speranza adorata," by Mozart, and the second the "Perle of Brazil" aria. This latter was a substitution for the number given at the Friday afternoon rehearsal, but it is a favorite piece of Miss Thursby, and her facile execution, her pure tones and admirable method were here displayed to the best advantage. It was the better selection, and her audience was the more favorably impressed. Her voice, never large, appeared unusually light Saturday evening, and she was unable to close the "Perle of Brazil" aria with that telling effect given to it by artists whose voices are larger. In the Mozart number the accompaniment of the orchestra, light and evidently subdued as it was, was entirely overpowering in many passages, and often the hearer was able to discern, by the movement of the lips only, that she was singing. There was no enthusiasm about her recalls, though a Boston audience could hardly fail of courtesy toward such an artist.

The orchestral numbers included Brahm's overture, "Academic Festival," which was fairly well delivered, though there were many uneven places, some variations on a theme by Schubert by Heuberger, which served to show the marvelous technique of the members of the orchestra, but was very far from being interesting to the audience, and the Jupiter Symphony of Mozart, which was really something enjoyable, and the orchestra settled down to some good, substantial work. It was an admirable close to the concert, and was by far the best thing of the evening, not only from the intrinsic merit of the symphony itself, but from the masterly playing of the orchestra. Vacant seats are still quite noticeable, despite the fact that the house is sold, and there was abundant room around the sides of the hall. For the next concert the programme is Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and the overture, scherzo, notturno and wedding march from Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream—a programme which will give more pleasure, even without a soloist, than Mr. Nikisch has offered for many weeks.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1890.

Ninth Symphony Concert. Miss Thursby, Soloist.

The programme of the ninth symphony concert was:

Brahms.....Overture, "Academic Festival" op. 80
Mozart.....Recit. and Rondo, "Mia Sp ranza Adorata," (K. 416).
Richard Heu erger.....Variations on a theme by Schubert, op. 11.
(First time in Boston.)
David.....Air, "Thou Brilliant Bird."
Mozart.....Symp ony in C major (Jupite)

The singer was Miss Emma Thursby. It is safe to say that eleven-tenths of our symphony audiences would prefer a singer as soloist. But because the market is more plethoric of instrumentalists, pianists and fiddlers are oftenest called upon to fill the position. It becomes then almost a calamity when the singer chosen disappoints. Formerly Miss Thursby was an able artist with a voice. Today it pains us to say she is an able artist without a voice. The Mozart aria is one of the many show pieces for sopranos that belong to the early Vienna period when Mozart was hand and glove with the artists of the local theatre and concert stage. It is not forceful even as Mozart's tunes are forceful, but it is a good test of a singer's range of voice and technique, and is also melodious. Miss Thursby sang it with cuts. So far as phrasing goes, her performance was commendable; but her tone is thinner and slighter than formerly, and its carrying quality is diminished. The voice itself is pleasant, and in a small hall our impressions as to its size might change; but in Miss Thursby's work at this concert is there a reason why she has not been heard in leading concerts of the country the past few years. She sang the familiar bravura aria, from "The Pearl of Brazil," to the charming flute obligato of Mr. Molé. After each appearance Miss Thursby was recalled.

The novelty by Heuberger was not worth crossing the Danube for. Mr. Heuberger has taken a supple theme of Schubert's, and disguised it not uninterestingly. Had he omitted the long and rather cheap finale the total impression of the work would be more artistic, for there is in the instrumentation and structural variety of the nine variations some musicianly writing, though he cannot be compared in point of effect with those masters of the variation form, Dvorák and Brahms. Heuberger wants color and spontaneity. The performance of the variations was excellent.

The "Academic Festival" overture and the "Jupiter" symphony appeared together upon one of Mr. Gericke's programmes. Brahms wrote the overture after the University of Bremen had threatened to make a Doctor of Philosophy of him. It is a wonder that such a fate did not make a naturally contemplative and serious musician like Brahms more recondite and abstruse, but the opposite was the fact, for in the "Academic Festival" the great scientist becomes even merry, and works popular student songs into a composition of brilliancy and interest. Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony received a very careful reading. The scoring is not thick, but Mr. Nikisch's care that each part should have just the prominence the composer intended was evident at all points; and as Mozart was the neatest and most skilful "adjuster," the admirable balance of the performance can be easily imagined.

Though the concert was scarcely more than 90 minutes in length, a great many people left the hall between the movements of the symphony, which is an indication that they found it (the concert) dull. Curfew in Boston does not ring until 9.45. If Mr. Nikisch, instead of intoxicating us with Wagner as he intends doing on the 31st, would make us, say, fortnightly tipsy by playing the music of the master, he would confer just about as big a favor as the management of the concerts would were they to provide more vocalists as soloists.

The programme for next Saturday evening consists of Beethoven's symphony No. 8, Schubert's unfinished symphony, and Mendelssohn's overture, scherzo, notturno, and wedding march from the "Midsummer Night's Dream."

AT the Symphony Concert.—He: "I suppose you're fond of music. Coming to the concerts must be a great help to you in your lessons." She: "Yes, I enjoy coming very much. My teacher says it's worth coming just to listen to the rhythm—the division of the measures, you know—even if I can't understand the melody—the tunes, you know."

[65]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The ninth concert, Saturday evening, Dec. 20, had an attractive programme, as follows:

Brahms—Overture, "Academic Festival," op. 80.
Mozart—Recit. and Rondo, "Mia Speranza Adorata" (Koche, 416.)
Richard Heuberger—Op. 11, Variations on a Theme by Schubert. (First time in Boston.)
Felicien D vid—Aria from "La P rle du Bresil."
Mozart—Symphony in C ("Jup ter.")
Solo st, Miss Emma Thursby.

Brahms's Overture marks the occasion of his being made doctor of philosophy at Bremen in January, 1881. Its companion piece, the "Tragic Overture," was also produced at Bremen, and both were written in the summer of 1880. It is founded on well-known student songs: some grandiose, reserved for great academic or patriotic festivals, like "Wor hatten gabauet ein stattliches Haus" (we had built a stately house) and "Der Landesvater" (the father of his country); and some rollicking and full of fun, like "Das Fuchslied" (the Song of the Fox, or Freshman's song.) It ends with the most popular of German student songs, "Gaudeamus igitur." The commoner and nobler ones are hard to associate with artistic music in a classical form. But they are artistically and most ingeniously worked in here. The instrumentation is remarkable, the orchestra very full, and strange combinations of instruments produce unique and startling effects. Cymbals sometimes strike in like the clink of glasses; the bassoons lead off comically in the "Fuchslied;" the overture opens with a staccato tramp as of a merry procession of students; there is fine variety and contrast as the different themes are handled with characteristic humor and finesse; it waxes riotous at times, and the stopped horn tones lend an uncanny effect in the midst of it. Much of it is noble, much grotesque, and it all reaches a fine festal climax in the "Gaudeamus," all the wood and brass united, with a jubilant florid accompaniment of the strings. On the whole it is one of the most genial, bright, attractive works of Brahms. It was splendidly performed; indeed it grows upon us.

The reappearance of Miss Thursby recalled many charming experiences in the concert life of the past sixteen years. "La mia Speranza,' one of Mozart's twelve concert arias, written for special singers of the different classes of voice, with limited orchestral accompaniment, was the piece in which she made her début, fresh from her teacher, Mme. Rudersdorff, at a Harvard symphony concert on Jan. 22, 1876. Many will remember the delicate and sympathetic quality of her pure soprano voice, particularly clear and sweet in the upper register, its large compass, her artistic phrasing, her musical expression, and her unaffected beauty and grace of manner. The aria is a difficult one and requires a finished artist in the singer. It runs very high sometimes, like the airs of the Queen of the Night in the "Magic Flute," touching E flat and F above the staff. These passages Mme. Rudersdorff had modified for her, reducing them a note or two. This time we felt the old delicacy, grace and beauty of the voice and singing; but not quite the same ease and freshness. The style was beautiful, the execution sure and true; but the breath seemed to labor somewhat. All was done, but not so easily. Her runs were smooth and clear and even throughout a large compass, and the highest tones as sweet and bright and musical as ever. In the florid aria from David's comic opera she seemed not quite so much at home; but in the duet with M. Molé's flute, at the close, her voice competed well and her staccato notes were clean and bright.

Richard Heuberger is one of the younger Viennese composers of today, who has written operas and symphonies, choruses and songs. These nine variations on a rather simple, serious theme from Schubert, showed great ingenuity, audacity, power of transforming a theme until you almost lose track of it, skill in instrumental masquerading (we might call it), skill, too, in composition, in assigning the subject now to this instrument, now to that. There are passages of much beauty. There are surprises not a few. It is a clever achievement, but is it a positive addition to the stock of real and enduring music? We must say we found the variations, as a whole, monotonous—a monotony not relieved by a pompous conclusion. There was certainly no fault in the orchestra; carefully rehearsed by such musicians it could but go well. Such elaborate variations, unless a ray of genius light them up, seem like a waste of time and labor. They do not appear to illustrate the Schubert theme, so much as they do to pick it uselessly to pieces.

The great old Mozart symphony, always fresh, revealing new charms, radiant with genius, came like a perfect summer day after all that. His orchestra, to be sure, lacked clarinets, trombones and two of the four horns to which our ears are now accustomed. But every note, every instrumental color, timbre, tells! How the whole work seems to have sprung at once like Minerva from the brain of Jove! What exquisite delicacy, warmth and brightness in the commingling of the sounds! What inexhaustible and luscious melody! What positive commanding power! What refreshing, unfailing variety and novelty in its unbroken unity and wholeness! All this you feel before you begin to wonder at the marvellous musical resources drawn from in it, at the learning it displays, the interweaving skill in counterpoint and imitation, the plastic moulding mastery of form, the exhaustless wealth of musical ideas, the poetic inventiveness, the all-pervading fusing beauty; in short, the inspiration. How the four movements hold together by an inward sympathy, while they are so different and individual! That immensely complex, labyrinthine finale (Allegro molto), with its four distinct fugue subjects, all worked out together, challenging, replying, intertwining, struggling in close embrace, and getting free, yet always clear, always tending to one end and reaching it, one of the world's greatest masterpieces in such art, is yet in clearly felt relationship to the stately and triumphal opening Allegro vivace, to the exquisite Andante cantabile (which was exquisitely read and played, too), and to the beautiful Minuet and Trio, which we enjoyed none the less for the comparatively slow old tempo di minuetto in which it was taken. We risk little in assuming that the "Jupiter" symphony was to the larger half of the audience, the really musical half, the grand delight of the concert. What a privilege to hear it played [illegible] Symphony of Schubert, and the Overture, Scherzo, Notturno and Wedding March from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream." For Wednesday afternoon of next week, a side show of Wagnerian selections is announced by the same orchestra (from Tannhäuser," "Siegfried," "Götterdämmerung"), and Mr. Kneisel will play a violin solo from the "Albumblatt." J. S. D.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 22, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

The "Academic" overture by Brahms began the concert Saturday night. It was a jovial and pleasant beginning, this work wherein the great composer has paid homage to the university which gave to him the degree of doctor, and a greater contrast to the "Tragic" overture which preceded it can scarcely be imagined. What American composer, graduating from Harvard, would dare to write a classical work in which "Unidos" should be a prominent theme! Yet this is exactly what Brahms has done here, for "Was kommt dort von der Höh" is as rollickingly Bohemian as the transpontine melody. The foreign student-repertoire is, however, supplied with many dignified and solemn melodies as well, and Brahms has blended three of these with the bacchanalian theme aforesaid, the result being an idealization of student music such as it has never received elsewhere. Of course the gemüthlichkeit of the work counts for nothing with an audience ignorant of the associations of the themes thus interwoven, but the work is strong enough to win its way even while foregoing this advantage. Its performance was a worthy one, and Mr. Nikisch brought out the themes in well-balanced relationship.

Then came Miss Emma Thursby in a Mozart number. The people in the rear of the hall may have noticed her upon the stage while the orchestra was playing the accompaniment to the song, but I doubt whether they heard her, for she was almost obliterated by the instrumental support. Her voice is not strong enough for such a work, and even under more favorable circumstances could scarcely fill the large hall. Nevertheless the flexibility attained, the clear and crisp staccato effects, the purity and delicacy of the tones in alt. made some passages of the number very acceptable, and were displayed to yet greater advantage in the subsequent aria by David, in which the oboe work also deserves a word of recognition, and the duet between voice and flute was excellently performed. It was not the fault of the orchestra that the accompaniment overweighted the singer, as noted above.

Heuberger's variations on a theme by Schubert were good examples of modern orchestration and of musicianly writing. Such works are educational to the student part of the audience, from the fact that each department of the orchestra passes in review and the result is a good lesson in the matter of tone color. The details of this work were well attended to, and praise can be accorded to all the instruments, but especially to the strings in their passages con sordine.

The "Jupiter" symphony does not sound very Jovian when judged by the standard of modern scoring, but it is certainly the greatest symphony of the last century. In 1804 this Jupiter was dethroned by Napoleon Bonaparte as represented in the "Heroic" symphony. But what a delight it is to listen to such natural and normal music as this! The non-musician can enjoy tune here to his heart's content, while the classicist is charmed by symmetry, by wonderful skill of combination, by counterpoint of the highest character. Mozart was the one great master who could make the severest forms of composition attractive to the general public, as witness the fugal work here or in the "Magic Flute" overture. The symphony received a good and conservative reading, and in fact throughout the entire concert the orchestra roared as gently as a sucking dove.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 27, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMMES.

Last Saturday's Symphony concert was not all satisfactory to the unprejudiced either in programme or performance; the defects of the former were proved by the usual number of vacant seats and the paucity of "standees," while the half-hearted applause proved those of the latter. The concert began with a fair rendering of Brahms's German university overture, the "Academic," that olla podrida of student songs, which the orchestra played without enthusiasm and even without constant adhesion to the conductor's beat. Their second number was the new thing of the evening, which may have gratified the Transcript's sense of "novelty and catholicity," but fell like lead on the patient audience, which received it in deadly silence. It was a long-winded set of variations on a theme by Schubert, well enough studied out by the Viennese writer, Heuberger, but about as fit for such a concert as a set of problems in trigonometry and surveying would be for a lecture by Kennan or Stanley. Such laborious and purely mechanical things have their place in a scientific musical education and they are proper enough for conservatorium concerts, but they do not belong in the Music Hall. The public, by its apathy, and the press, by its criticism, have expressed this again and again, and it is high time that Mr. Nikisch learned the lesson which had to be taught also to his predecessor. The third number was Mozart's immortally beautiful and noble "Jupiter" symphony, portions of which were read conservatively and elegantly, the minuet showing particular care and finish, and the andante having quietude and grace. The last movement was rather roughly and irregularly given by all the orchestra, and the kettle drummers' onslaught upon the general effect was scarcely less than brutal; a Chinese tom-tom beater could hardly be more noisy and egotistic. Between these works there were placed two airs with orchestral accompaniment for Miss Emma Thursby—Mozart's "Mia Speranza Adorata" and the "Couplets de Mysoli" from David's "Pearl of Brazil." In these the singer showed that her voice was still pearly in its upper register and obedient in execution; but there was missing something of the freedom, the fulness and the ease of former years, and the music failed to charm or satisfy fully. The Mozart air, exquisitely written though it be, will sound (like many of its fellows) insincere and formal now-a-days and Miss Thursby can hardly be blamed for not making it more effective. Although less applauded for the David air, she deserved more credit for success, and in the roulades with Mr. Molé's swift and sweet flute, there were purity, grace and facility.

The programme for tonight is more promising, and consists of Beethoven's eighth symphony, Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, and the chief orchestral numbers from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music; there is to be no soloist.

A WAGNER AFTERNOON.

The first Wednesday afternoon concert of the Symphony Orchestra for this season is appointed for next week. The programme is to be drawn entirely from the works of Wagner, which bear, as everybody knows, translation from the theatre to the concert hall especially well, because instruments can gratify the ear with the vocal parts about as well as singers in most of his episodes, although the eye must miss the scenic display upon which he depended so much. "Tannhäuser," "Siegfried," and the Nibelung dramas will be drawn from and Mr. Kneisel will play an engaging trifle for violin. Mr. Nikisch has generally a happy sympathy for the dramatic side of Wagner's music and this concert ought to be a popular and enjoyable one.

The Kneisel Quartette will give another concert next Monday evening in Union Hall. Mr. Arthur Whiting will play and Mrs. Nikisch will sing if she is well enough, for the variable Boston climate has been afflicting her.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert a Triumph for Director Nikisch.

Director Nikisch scored another triumph at last evening's Symphony concert, and the patrons of the Boston orchestra again gave most unmistakable evidence of their love of the melodious Mendelssohn music to the "Midsummer Night's Dream." The overture, scherzo, notturno and wedding march were played as the final selection for the evening, and only upon rare occasions has a Boston audience given such an extravagant expression of its approval of the work of the body of men under the baton of Mr. Nikisch. The several movements were most delightfully played, the airy grace of the measures being caught most happily in the readings, and the dainty dream like composition has seldom had all its beauties more artistically interpreted. At the conclusion of the concert the conductor was given a grand ovation, and the audience went away from the hall filled with a sense of satisfaction that has been all too uncommon in the earlier Saturday nights of the present season.

Director Nikisch began his programme with the eighth Beethoven symphony, the reading of which, either by contrast with that of the Schubert unfinished symphony which followed, or from some other cause, failed to give general satisfaction, the work of the orchestra appearing somewhat ragged at times, and lacking in delicacy and refinement.

The beautiful unfinished symphony was played with admirable effect, however, and the merits of the performance of this part of the evening's programme were readily appreciated and heartily applauded.

Next Saturday evening Mr. Richard Burmeister will be the solo pianist, the visit of Mme. Hopekirk to America having been postponed, and the programme will consist of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso"; Burmeister's concerto for piano and orchestra in D minor, and Raff's symphony, "Im Walde."

THE WAGNER MATINEE.

The programme of selections from the Wagner concert repertoire announced by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, at Music Hall next Wednesday afternoon, has attracted very general attention, and a large audience is already assured. Italo Campanini and Franz Kneisel will be the solo performers, and this is the programme: Overture and Vermsberg music from "Tannhauser," Paris version; prize song from "Die Meistersinger"; prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"; "Albumblatt," violin solo, Kneisel; Siegfried's passage to Brunnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn, and Rhine Journey, from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," as arranged by Hans Richter; love song from "Die Walkure"; vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger."

The illness of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch not only necessitates her withdrawal from the Kneisel concert of tomorrow evening, but compels her to delay her appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall until the week of Feb. 14.

Mrs. Ziffer Campanari, mezzo soprano, the wife of Guiseppe Campanari, the talented 'cello player and baritone singer, who is among the notable singers of the Marchesi school, will soon make her American debut in this city.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC. 28, 1890.

Mr. Nikisch's Appropriate Christmas Offering.

Symphony Orchestra's Wagner Matinee—Stepniak—Preludes and Echoes.

Such generous applause as that accorded Mr. Nikisch's Chrismastide concert is seldom vouchsafed by a symphony assemblage. It was a tribute of pleasure and appreciation that should carry something to endure in the popular director's memory. Classics are never unwelcome, though variations long drawn out may be wearisome to the flesh; and there was a great deal of appropriateness in yesterday's programme, coming as it did with thoughts and joys of the great holiday season fresh in mind.

Beethoven's eighth symphony, the very musical embodiment of cheerfulness and hope, was beautifully performed. It has often been remarked that Mr. Nikisch is exceptionally fortunate in revealing the beauties of the great master's work; and yesterday the Symphony Orchestra gave most vivid illustration of this pleasant fact. In marked contrast, yet admirably in place, was the second offering, Schubert's "unfinished symphony, that high, poetic achievement, so singularly interesting and enthralling, in which, as in no other work, speaks the composer's very soul. Here, too, the interpretation was so delicate and so appreciative that commendation can hardly go too far.

Echoes of Mendelssohn's music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" went home with the audience. Assuredly the familiar wedding march was never given with more brilliancy; the overture was a delight from beginning to end with its fairy strains; and the scherzo, too, gave great pleasure. Mr. Nikisch was less successful with the nocturne, but the impression left by the whole concert was one of the pleasantest of all symphony recollections.

Mr. Richard Burmeister, the pianist, is to take the solo part in a concert of his own for pianoforte and orchestra in the symphony concert this week. Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," and Raff's symphony, "In the Woods," are also to be expected.

The Kneisel quartet, with the assistance of Mr. Arthur Whiting, give the third concert of their series at Union Hall tomorrow evening. The programme includes a sonata for piano and violin (mss.) by Mr. Whiting to be played by the composer and Mr. Kneisel, a quartet movement, Schubert and the quintet in C major, Beethoven. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who has been announced to sing at this concert, is prevented by illness and will appear at a later concert in the course.

[66]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The ninth concert, Saturday evening, Dec. 20, had an attractive programme, as follows:

Brahms—Overture, "Academic Festival," op. 80.
Mozart—Recit. and Rondo, "Mia Speranza Adorata" (Köche, 416.)
Richard Heuberger—Op. 11, Variations on a Theme by Schubert. (First time in Boston.)
Felicien David—Aria from "La Perle du Bresil."
Mozart—Symphony in C ("Jupiter.")
Solo st, Miss Emma Thursby.

Brahms's Overture marks the occasion of his being made doctor of philosophy at Bremen in January, 1881. Its companion piece, the "Tragic Overture," was also produced at Bremen, and both were written in the summer of 1880. It is founded on well-known student songs: some grandiose, reserved for great academic or patriotic festivals, like "Wor hatten gebauet ein stattliches Haus" (we had built a stately house) and "Der Landesvater" (the father of his country); and some rollicking and full of fun, like "Das Fuchslied" (the Song of the Fox, or Freshman's song.) It ends with the most popular of German student songs, "Gaudeamus igitur." The commoner and noisier ones are hard to associate with artistic music in a classical form. But they are artistically and most ingeniously worked in here. The instrumentation is remarkable, the orchestra very full, and strange combinations of instruments produce unique and startling effects. Cymbals sometimes strike in like the clink of glasses; the bassoons lead off comically in the "Fuchslied;" the overture opens with a staccato tramp as of a merry procession of students; there is fine variety and contrast as the different themes are handled with characteristic humor and finesse; it waxes riotous at times, and the stopped horn tones lend an uncanny effect in the midst of it. Much of it is noble, much grotesque, and it all reaches a fine festal climax in the "Gaudeamus," all the wood and brass united, with a jubilant florid accompaniment of the strings. On the whole it is one of the most genial, bright, attractive works of Brahms. It was splendidly performed; indeed it grows upon us.

The reappearance of Miss Thursby recalled many charming experiences in the concert life of the past sixteen years. "La mia Speranza,' one of Mozart's twelve concert arias, written for special singers of the different classes of voice, with limited orchestral accompaniment, was the piece in which she made her début, fresh from her teacher, Mme. Rudersdorff, at a Harvard symphony concert on Jan. 22, 1876. Many will remember the delicate and sympathetic quality of her pure soprano voice, particularly clear and sweet in the upper register, its large compass, her artistic phrasing, her musical expression, and her unaffected beauty and grace of manner. The aria is a difficult one and requires a finished artist in the singer. It runs very high sometimes, like the airs of the Queen of the Night in the "Magic Flute," touching E flat and F above the staff. These passages Mme. Rudersdorff had modified for her, reducing them a note or two. This time we felt the old delicacy, grace and beauty of the voice and singing; but not quite the same ease and freshness. The style was beautiful, the execution sure and true; but the breath seemed to labor somewhat. All was done, but not so easily. Her runs were smooth and clear and even throughout a large compass, and the highest tones as sweet and bright and musical as ever. In the florid aria from David's comic opera she seemed not quite so much at home; but in the duet with M. Molé's flute, at the close, her voice competed well and her staccato notes were clean and bright.

Richard Heuberger is one of the younger Viennese composers of today, who has written operas and symphonies, choruses and songs. These nine variations on a rather simple, serious theme from Schubert, showed great ingenuity, audacity, power of transforming a theme until you almost lose track of it, skill in instrumental masquerading (we might call it), skill, too, in composition, in assigning the subject now to this instrument, now to that. There are passages of much beauty. There are surprises not a few. It is a clever achievement, but is it a positive addition to the stock of real and enduring music? We must say we found the variations, as a whole, monotonous—a monotony not relieved by a pompous conclusion. There was certainly no fault in the orchestra; carefully rehearsed by such musicians it could but go well. Such elaborate variations, unless a ray of genius light them up, seem like a waste of time and labor. They do not appear to illustrate the Schubert theme, so much as they do to pick it uselessly to pieces.

The great old Mozart symphony, always fresh, revealing new charms, radiant with genius, came like a perfect summer day after all that. His orchestra, to be sure, lacked clarinets, trombones and two of the four horns to which our ears are now accustomed. But every note, every instrumental color, timbre, tells! How the whole work seems to have sprung at once like Minerva from the brain of Jove! What exquisite delicacy, warmth and brightness in the commingling of the sounds! What inexhaustible and luscious melody! What positive commanding power! What refreshing, unfailing variety and novelty in its unbroken unity and wholeness! All this you feel before you begin to wonder at the marvellous musical resources drawn from in it, at the learning it displays, the interweaving skill in counterpoint and imitation, the plastic moulding mastery of form, the exhaustless wealth of musical ideas, the poetic inventiveness, the all-pervading fusing beauty; in short, the inspiration. How the four movements hold together by an inward sympathy, while they are so different and individual! That immensely complex, labyrinthine finale (Allegro molto), with its four distinct fugue subjects, all worked out together, challenging, replying, intertwining, struggling in close embrace, and getting free, yet always clear, always tending to one end and reaching it, one of the world's greatest masterpieces in such art, is yet in clearly felt relationship to the stately and triumphal opening Allegro vivace, to the exquisite Andante cantabile (which was exquisitely read and played, too), and to the beautiful Minuet and Trio, which we enjoyed none the less for the comparatively slow old tempo di minuetto in which it was taken. We risk little in assuming that the "Jupiter" symphony was to the larger half of the audience, the really musical half, the grand delight of the concert. What a privilege to hear it played [illegible] selection of delicate, choice things: Beethoven's sunshiny Eighth Symphony; the "Unfinished Symphony" of Schubert, and the Overture, Scherzo, Notturno and Wedding March from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream." For Wednesday afternoon of next week, a side show of Wagnerian selections is announced by the same orchestra (from Tannhäuser," "Siegfried," "Götterdämmerung"), and Mr. Kneisel will play a violin solo from the "Albumblatt." J. S. D.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 22, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

The "Academic" overture by Brahms began the concert Saturday night. It was a jovial and pleasant beginning, this work wherein the great composer has paid homage to the university which gave to him the degree of doctor, and a greater contrast to the "Tragic" overture which preceded it can scarcely be imagined. What American composer, graduating from Harvard, would dare to write a classical work in which "Upidee" should be a prominent theme! Yet this is exactly what Brahms has done here, for "Was kommt dort von der Höh" is as rollickingly Bohemian as the transpontine melody. The foreign student-repertoire is, however, supplied with many dignified and solemn melodies as well, and Brahms has blended three of these with the bacchanalian theme aforesaid, the result being an idealization of student music such as it has never received elsewhere. Of course the gemüthlichkeit of the work counts for nothing with an audience ignorant of the associations of the themes thus interwoven, but the work is strong enough to win its way even while foregoing this advantage. Its performance was a worthy one, and Mr. Nikisch brought out the themes in well-balanced relationship.

Then came Miss Emma Thursby in a Mozart number. The people in the rear of the hall may have noticed her upon the stage while the orchestra was playing the accompaniment to the song, but I doubt whether they heard her, for she was almost obliterated by the instrumental support. Her voice is not strong enough for such a work, and even under more favorable circumstances could scarcely fill the large hall. Nevertheless the flexibility attained, the clear and crisp staccato effects, the purity and delicacy of the tones in alt, made some passages of the number very acceptable, and were displayed to yet greater advantage in the subsequent aria by David, in which the oboe work also deserves a word of recognition, and the duet between voice and flute was excellently performed. It was not the fault of the orchestra that the accompaniment overweighted the singer, as noted above.

Heuberger's variations on a theme by Schubert were good examples of modern orchestration and of musicianly writing. Such works are educational to the student part of the audience, from the fact that each department of the orchestra passes in review and the result is a good lesson in the matter of tone color. The details of this work were well attended to, and praise can be accorded to all the instruments, but especially to the strings in their passages con sordine.

The "Jupiter" symphony does not sound very Jovian when judged by the standard of modern scoring, but it is certainly the greatest symphony of the last century. In 1804 this Jupiter was dethroned by Napoleon Bonaparte as represented in the "Heroic" symphony. But what a delight it is to listen to such natural and normal music as this! The non-musician can enjoy tune here to his heart's content, while the classicist is charmed by symmetry, by wonderful skill of combination, by counterpoint of the highest character. Mozart was the one great master who could make the severest forms of composition attractive to the general public, as witness the fugal work here or in the "Magic Flute" overture. The symphony received a good and conservative reading, and in fact throughout the entire concert the orchestra roared as gently as a sucking dove.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 27, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMMES.

Last Saturday's Symphony concert was not all satisfactory to the unprejudiced either in programme or performance; the defects of the former were proved by the usual number of vacant seats and the paucity of "standees," while the half-hearted applause proved those of the latter. The concert began with a fair rendering of Brahms's German university overture, the "Academic," that olla podrida of student songs, which the orchestra played without enthusiasm and even without constant adhesion to the conductor's beat. Their second number was the new thing of the evening, which may have gratified the Transcript's sense of "novelty and catholicity," but fell like lead on the patient audience, which received it in deadly silence. It was a long-winded set of variations on a theme by Schubert, well enough studied out by the Viennese writer, Heuberger, but about as fit for such a concert as a set of problems in trigonometry and surveying would be for a lecture by Kennan or Stanley. Such laborious and purely mechanical things have their place in a scientific musical education and they are proper enough for conservatorium concerts, but they do not belong in the Music Hall. The public, by its apathy, and the press, by its criticism, have expressed this again and again, and it is high time that Mr. Nikisch learned the lesson which had to be taught also to his predecessor. The third number was Mozart's immortally beautiful and noble "Jupiter" symphony, portions of which were read conservatively and elegantly, the minuet showing particular care and finish, and the andante having quietude and grace. The last movement was rather roughly and irregularly given by all the orchestra, and the kettle drummers' onslaught upon the general effect was scarcely less than brutal; a Chinese tom-tom beater could hardly be more noisy and egotistic. Between these works there were placed two airs with orchestral accompaniment for Miss Emma Thursby—Mozart's "Mia Speranza Adorata" and the "Couplets de Mysoli" from David's "Pearl of Brazil." In these the singer showed that her voice was still pearly in its upper register and obedient in execution; but there was missing something of the freedom, the fulness and the ease of former years, and the music failed to charm or satisfy fully. The Mozart air, exquisitely written though it be, will sound (like many of its fellows) insincere and formal now-a-days and Miss Thursby can hardly be blamed for not making it more effective. Although less applauded for the David air, she deserved more credit for success, and in the roulades with Mr. Molé's swift and sweet flute, there were purity, grace and facility.

The programme for tonight is more promising, and consists of Beethoven's eighth symphony, Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, and the chief orchestral numbers from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music; there is to be no soloist.

A WAGNER AFTERNOON.

The first Wednesday afternoon concert of the Symphony Orchestra for this season is appointed for next week. The programme is to be drawn entirely from the works of Wagner, which bear, as everybody knows, translation from the theatre to the concert hall especially well, because instruments can gratify the ear with the vocal parts about as well as singers in most of his episodes, although the eye must miss the scenic display upon which he depended so much. "Tannhäuser," "Siegfried," and the Nibelung dramas will be drawn from and Mr. Kneisel will play an engaging trifle for violin. Mr. Nikisch has generally a happy sympathy for the dramatic side of Wagner's music and this concert ought to be a popular and enjoyable one.

The Kneisel Quartette will give another concert next Monday evening in Union Hall. Mr. Arthur Whiting will play and Mrs. Nikisch will sing if she is well enough, for the variable Boston climate has been afflicting her.

SUNDAY HERALD,

BOSTON, DECEMBER 28, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert a Triumph for Director Nikisch.

Director Nikisch scored another triumph at last evening's Symphony concert, and the patrons of the Boston orchestra again gave most unmistakable evidence of their love of the melodious Mendelssohn music to the "Midsummer Night's Dream." The overture, scherzo, notturno and wedding march were played as the final selection for the evening, and only upon rare occasions has a Boston audience given such an extravagant expression of its approval of the work of the body of men under the baton of Mr. Nikisch. The several movements were most delightfully played, the airy grace of the measures being caught most happily in the readings, and the dainty dream like composition has seldom had all its beauties more artistically interpreted. At the conclusion of the concert the conductor was given a grand ovation, and the audience went away from the hall filled with a sense of satisfaction that has been all too uncommon in the earlier Saturday nights of the present season.

Director Nikisch began his programme with the eighth Beethoven symphony, the reading of which, either by contrast with that of the Schubert unfinished symphony which followed, or from some other cause, failed to give general satisfaction, the work of the orchestra appearing somewhat ragged at times, and lacking in delicacy and refinement.

The beautiful unfinished symphony was played with admirable effect, however, and the merits of the performance of this part of the evening's programme were readily appreciated and heartily applauded.

Next Saturday evening Mr. Richard Burmeister will be the solo pianist, the visit of Mme. Hopekirk to America having been postponed, and the programme will consist of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso"; Burmeister's concerto for piano and orchestra in D minor, and Raff's symphony, "Im Walde."

THE WAGNER MATINEE.

The programme of selections from the Wagner concert repertoire announced by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, at Music Hall next Wednesday afternoon, has attracted very general attention, and a large audience is already assured. Italo Campanini and Franz Kneisel will be the solo performers, and this is the programme: Overture and Vermsberg music from "Tannhauser," Paris version; prize song from "Die Meistersinger"; prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"; "Albumblatt," violin solo, Kneisel; Siegfried's passage to Brunnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn, and Rhine Journey, from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," as arranged by Hans Richter; love song from "Die Walkure"; vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger."

The illness of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch not only necessitates her withdrawal from the Kneisel concert of tomorrow evening, but compels her to delay her appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall until the week of Feb. 14.

Mrs. Ziffer Campanari, mezzo soprano, the wife of Guiseppe Campanari, the talented 'cello player and baritone singer, who is among the notable singers of the Marchesi school, will soon make her American debut in this city.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC. 28, 1890.

Mr. Nikisch's Appropriate Christmas Offering.

Symphony Orchestra's Wagner Matinee —Stepniak—Preludes and Echoes.

Such generous applause as that accorded Mr. Nikisch's Chrismastide concert is seldom vouchsafed by a symphony assemblage. It was a tribute of pleasure and appreciation that should carry something to endure in the popular director's memory. Classics are never unwelcome, though variations long drawn out may be wearisome to the flesh; and there was a great deal of appropriateness in yesterday's programmé, coming as it did with thoughts and joys of the great holiday season fresh in mind.

Beethoven's eighth symphony, the very musical embodiment of cheerfulness and hope, was beautifully performed. It has often been remarked that Mr. Nikisch is exceptionally fortunate in revealing the beauties of the great master's work; and yesterday the Symphony Orchestra gave most vivid illustration of this pleasant fact. In marked contrast, yet admirably in place, was the second offering, Schubert's "unfinished symphony, that high, poetic achievement, so singularly interesting and enthralling, in which, as in no other work, speaks the composer's very soul. Here, too, the interpretation was so delicate and so appreciative that commendation can hardly go too far.

Echoes of Mendelssohn's music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" went home with the audience. Assuredly the familiar wedding march was never given with more brilliancy; the overture was a delight from beginning to end with its fairy strains; and the scherzo, too, gave great pleasure. Mr. Nikisch was less successful with the nocturne, but the impression left by the whole concert was one of the pleasantest of all symphony recollections.

Mr. Richard Burmeister, the pianist, is to take the solo part in a concert of his own for pianoforte and orchestra in the symphony concert this week. Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," and Raff's symphony, "In the Woods," are also to be expected.

The Kneisel quartet, with the assistance of Mr. Arthur Whiting, give the third concert of their series at Union Hall tomorrow evening. The programme includes a sonata for piano and violin (mss.) by Mr. Whiting to be played by the composer and Mr. Kneisel, a quartet movement, Shubert and the quintet in C major, Beethoven. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who has been announced to sing at this concert, is prevented by illness and will appear at a later concert in the same series.

[66]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 29, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday—A Feast for Music Lovers.

The programme of Saturday was neutral ground where classicist and tune lover, musician and non-musician, could meet and enjoy themselves. It was not a heavy tonal feast, nor one that required much thinking to enjoy; its chief element was humor, and it was pleasant to watch the composers at play. "A little nonsense now and then," etc. is a saying that emphatically applies to composers, and all of the great masters have at one time or another indulged in musical fun. With Bach this element is represented by the "Coffee Cantata" and the "Peasant's Cantata," with Mozart it bubbles out all the way from opera to certain canons which are not fit for ears polite, in Wagner it found glorious outlet in "The Mastersingers," and with Beethoven in comic songs (!) with burlesque incidents in the Pastoral symphony, but most of all in the symphony which began this concert — the eighth. If any title were to be given to this work, as has been done with the third and sixth symphonies, it might easily receive the name of the "Humorous Symphony," for Beethoven's most informal mood ("aufgeknopft," he called it), is in every movement and almost in every measure. The reading and performance of the work were commendable; in the first theme the capricious toyings with tempo were admirably caught up and the bassoon gave its comical little octave figure with good effect; in the second movement the brusque interruptions were well carried out, and the comically commonplace ending finely contrasted with the preceding passages. This same ending has been a stumblingblock to many of the reviewers in the days gone by; it is probable that the composer here caught a little of that tricksy spirit which so often moved Heine to end an earnest verse with whimsical drollery. One can call to mind the verses where the poet wishes that his stanzas were flowers that they might grow at the feet of his love, or birds that they might fly to her, and finally that they were peas, that he might cook for himself a good pea soup—such an ending is that of the second movement of the eighth symphony.

The return to minuet form in this symphony shows how Beethoven could have eclipsed Haydn even in his own school; it was probably used because the scherzo in the developed state in which Beethoven employed it (excepting on its first appearance in his second symphony) would have been too ambitious for the third movement of this little symphony, and because something of the spirit of the scherzo pervades the finale. The horns and clarinets played very finely in this part of the work. The rollicking fun of the last movement was done full justice to, although the explosion on the important C sharp could have been still more emphatic. What a comical bit of mockery it is when the chief figure appears on the flutes, and is suddenly and grotesquely mocked by the contrabasses! A skip from the garret to the cellar of the orchestra! It is seldom that this touch is so clearly brought out as on this occasion; the contrabasses deserve much praise. Not less effective is the reiterated octave for bassoon and kettle-drum, and this also was well-rendered, the kettle-drummer paying good attention to ensemble effect not only here but throughout the entire concert. Altogether then, this performance of the most genial of all Beethoven's works was one of the best it has been my good fortune to hear. Now followed a bit of tenderness and pathos in the shape of Schubert's unfinished symphony, which came in proper contrast with the work which preceded and that which followed it, so that this concert, so enjoyable in its separate selections, and so well executed, was also excellent in the order of its numbers. The reading of the work calls for the most unmitigated praise; never has Mr. Nikisch given better proof of the poetry that is in him. One might, perhaps, take slight exception to the prolongation of the horn tone which ushers in the second theme of the allegro, but this is a minor fault, if it is a fault at all. The working up of the climaxes was noble beyond description. I found the passages of the woodwind, in the second movement, rather too languishing, although very finely shaded and played. The superb oboe work, and the playing of the cellos in the first movement must not be passed over in silence.

With another class of musical humor, in the shape of Mendelssohn's music to "Midsummer Night's Dream" the concert ended. There is as much difference between the humor of Mendelssohn and that of Beethoven as between their personalities. The Mendelssohn who was able to jest at his critics with lines like

"If composers earnest are
Critics go to sleep,
If they take a lively style
Then they're voted cheap."
"Let a man write as he will
Still the critics fight
Therefore let him please himself
And he will be right."

the man who could give such dainty pleasantry was very different from the Beethoven who pelted his cook with the stale eggs she had brought from market or gave the unfortunate waiter in a Viennese restaurant a cold shower bath with the soup he had brought him. Beethoven's musical humor is brusque, half savage, a sort of tonal horseplay and practical joking which exhilarates one by its animal spirits and heartiness; Mendelssohn's is the airy badinage of a witty man of the world and if in this subject he has gone further lengths than usual it is because Shakespeare has led the way. But Shakespeare is not absent from the overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream" [illegible] dancing elves could never, [illegible] portrayed than by the [illegible] violins which were played with just the right delicacy on this occasion. In broader style of humor is the braying of the bassoon, which intimates that Bottom has entered into his asinine phase, and the snoring of the same drunken weaver which Mendelssohn gave to the ophicleide, but as this instrument is obsolete almost everywhere except in England and France, is always given in America on the bass tuba, a faulty (although necessary) substitution, since the tuba has not the raw, rasping tone of the ophicleide, which pictures a snore to the life. The mock-heroic vein of the music which portrays the entrance of the actors is a most natural touch, and this was most excellently played, and so by the way was the afore-mentioned tuba. The beauty of the coda is one of Mendelssohn's most perfect touches, and corrects the effect of the preceding buffoonery. Spite of a slight, temporary faultiness of intonation in the woodwind in the scherzo, that department of the orchestra did fine work in very trying passages, and the flute playing was especially meritorious at the close. In the nocturne the horns did excellently, and gave Mendelssohn's best theme for these instruments with appropriate beauty. A single slip made later on by the first horn did not mar the general effect.

The Wedding March brought the concert to a popular close. Its triumphant measures, to which so many couples have marched, perchance to combat, were especially attractive, because they had, possibly for the first time among us, the advantage of real trumpet fanfares. The cornet, which in America replaces the trumpet, is as much like it as a chromo is like an oil painting, and while the trumpet suggests martial ardor or the clangor of pompous festivity, the cornet suggests "Home, Sweet Home" (afflicted with ague-stricken variations) at Coney Island or Nantasket. I believe, however, that our trumpets could attain even a more characteristic tone were they to adopt shallower mouth pieces. They played better than ever, and every auditor seemed interested in the concert even to the last note.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, DEC. 28, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TENTH CONCERT.

Last night's programme was in three parts, as follows:

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 8 in F
Schubert....Symphony (unfinished) in B Minor
Mendelssohn....Overture, Scherzo, and Finale from The Midsummer Night's Dream.

The arrangement of the programme was capital and the selections themselves, though somewhat venerably well-worn, especially Schubert's great master-piece, were in every respect welcome. The Beethoven symphony was admirably given, and into the Schubert symphony Conductor Nikisch entered con amore and with exceptional integrity of thought and feeling. The first movement was broadly played, and with artistic effects that brought the audience into a delightful state of unanimity, that seemed to be no less felt and appreciated by all present. The conductor seemed carefully to avoid any undue originality of conception in the simple and unaffected justice with which the master's divine music was performed, and the second movement received similar treatment, the performance of each part being applauded perhaps with more zest and enthusiasm than any orchestral work has received here this season. The fact of there being no soloist in the concert again, did not prevent the usual large attendance. It is doubtful if any solo number whatsoever could have in any way enhanced the superior merit of the programme. The concert brilliantly ended with the always entrancing music of Mendelssohn from the "Midsummer Night's Dream." With this work the orchestra and conductor again triumphed in one of the very ablest, and most gratifying programmes that has been heard here this season. At the next concert, Saturday evening, Jan. 2d, the programme will consist of Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Tasso;" Burmeister's Concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra, and Raff's symphony "Im Waldi." Mr. Burmeister who will take part in the performance of his own work, is a Baltimore pianist, but was heard here last winter in an admirable recital of pianoforte music given by him in the Meionaon.

The first matinee concert of the Symphony orchestra for this season will take place next Wednesday. The programme is to be drawn entirely from the works of Wagner. "Tannhauser," "Siegfried," and the Nibelung dramas will be drawn from. The soloists will be Sig. I. Campanini and Franz Kneisel, and a thoroughly enjoyable concert is sure to result.

The next concert of the series by the Kneisel quartette will be given at Union hall tomorrow evening. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will be the singer, making her first appearance in Boston on that occasion. The quartette will have the assistance of Mr. Arthur Whiting. Tickets have sold very rapidly the past week.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 28, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY.

It is claimed that there is nothing new under the sun. Therefore it is barely possible that the plan of the programme of the tenth rehearsal and concert did not originate in the brain of Mr. Nikisch. Whether it did or not the scheme was an exceedingly happy one, bearing strong testimony to the musical susceptibilities of its author. A programme made up of the eighth symphony, the unfinished symphony, and the music to "Midsummer Night's Dream" is not only almost unique, but well designed to soothe the savage breast of the most abandoned fault-finder. What a delightful combination! How beautifully the yearning, mournful, passionate music of Schubert contrasted with the absolute joyousness of Beethoven, and the irrepressibly exuberant imagination of the boy genius, Mendelssohn!

Beethoven had reached the age of forty-two, was sick and disheartened, when he wrote what he called his "little" symphony. When these circumstances are considered, one can only marvel at its youthful freshness, light-heartedness, and humor, its exquisite themes and buoyant, elastic treatment. Scarcely a shadow is discernible. Yet the strong grasp of the man of maturity is plainly to be felt throughout the work. No youth even of genius could have worked out and put together this symphony with the skill and keen sense of the artistic fitness of things that are displayed in the score.

The four movements were sympathetically read and finely performed. The strings were heard at their best in the many crisp staccato passages of the opening and final allegros, attaining a delicate piannissimo that was virtuoso-like in its perfection. The allegretto scherzando seemed a thought too slow in tempo, and its humorous qualities somewhat injured in consequence. The deliberateness of the minuet, on the contrary, seemed entirely appropriate; and the horn passages in the trio were given with great smoothness and purity of tone.

There are few things that appear more strongly to the admirers of great personages than stories relating to their eccentricities and general habits of life. It is not often that anything new comes to light concerning one who died sixty odd years ago. But here is an incident illustrating Schubert's temperament, and representing him in a mood startlingly in contrast with that which is so painfully apparent in the symphony given laat evening. It comes to us from one who heard it from the lips of Vincenz, brother of Franz Lachner, the eminent musician. The latter was an intimate friend of Schubert, and the two were often boon companions. They sometimes were up and out late o' nights; and after such occasions Schubert frequently passed the remaining hours at the Lachner's house, making his bed on a sofa in the sitting room. One morning when Vincenz was about to open the door of this room where Schubert had slept the night before, he heard the latter chuckling to himself, apparently in great glee over something. He entered and glanced curiously at the great composer. There he sat, scantily dressed, holding out at arm's length a pair of tattered nether undergarments, in which he was about to enrobe himself, and which were the cause of his careless merriment!

The details of Schubert's poverty and distresses are sufficiently saddening to those who love his music, (and who does not love it); but it is a satisfaction to learn even through the medium of such a trifling incident that he could sometimes make light of his misfortunes.

In the unfinished symphony, Schubert gives vent to his emotions with great force and originality. But somehow these expressions of sorrow, moving as they are, seem to be rather the outcome of a highly impressible, imaginative nature, than of harrowing, unforgetable life experiences. However that may be, the music at least is unforgetable. What can be more mysterious and affecting than the opening measures of the allegro, or more haunting than the second theme, as it appears in the 'cellos, its tones scarcely less thrilling than those of the human voice! The andante, although beautiful and dignified with all its plaintiveness, does not impress itself on the mind so ineffaceably as does its companion movement. Here again the strings and the wood-wind did some exquisite work; and the splendid tuttis, as well as those passages where the resonant tones of the trombones are heard above all, came out broadly and impressively.

The Midsummer Night's music is still enchanting, notwithstanding the fact that at each succeeding performance it seems just a little more aged. Of necessity, possessing nothing in the nature of depth, the graceful superficiality of its more serious parts were rendered especially apparent from its position on the programme. Its pale, elegant phrases seemed gray with coldness after the sensuous warmth and passion of Schubert. But in the fairy element lies its strength and fascination, and nothing, unless it be a bad performance, could render it in that respect unenjoyable. Happily, this was far from the case at the performance under consideration. Mr. Nikisch seemingly did everything with the music that could be done; and the players, one and all, apparently infused into their parts an unusual amount of spirit. For once also the sometimes unmusical efforts of the tympani player became humorously effective, the dull thumping sounds that he evoked from his instruments at the point in the overture where Bottom and his companions are supposed to enter being laughably suggestive. The scherzo went trippingly and the nocturne serenely. A modern acquaintance with diminished chords imparts to the wedding march a tinge of staleness; although everyone doubtless remembers how imposing its opening measures once appeared. Louis Ehlert, that charming, yet keenly discriminative writer on musical subjects, passes a just criticism on this march.

After praising its festival splendor, and its stately, sparkling effects, he thinks that "its contour is too realistic for the frame of this exquisitely poetical score. Would it not have been possible for this hand, so wonderfully gifted with the power of proportion, to write a wedding march, in which, without detriment to its festive character, our minds, but lately made familiar with the supernatural, might have been spared the trivial colors of reality?"

However, it made a brilliant ending to this popular concert. And now the holidays are over, the long-looked-for procession of new works by eminent composers is confidently expected to be on the move. In fact, a solitary policeman is already in sight, as may be seen by reference to next week's programme.

An unusually attractive performance will be the Wagner matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, which will be given at Music Hall on Wednesday afternoon. The programme includes selections from "Tannhauser," "Siegfried," "Die Meistersinger" and "Gotterdammerung." The soloists are Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. Italo Campanini.

Boston Post
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 29, 1890

MUSIC.

TENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the tenth symphony concert, given at Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Symphony No. 8, in F.....Beethoven
Symphony No. 8, in B minor (unfinished).....Schubert
Overture, Scherzo, Notturno, and Wedding March from the "Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn

An old-fashioned and hearty Christmas greeting was given to the three friends who were the honored guests at Saturday's feast. They brought no new stories; we have heard their jests and anecdotes and tales of love and adventure, yes, and their lay-sermons, from childhood; but they never tire us, for they speak clearly and sensibly though sometimes with an abundance of detail and with much repetition, as though the points of their discourse were only to be driven in by repeated blows. Perhaps one of them with a comparative stranger might have furnished more amusement by the contrasts in conversation. They came together, however, and they sat down and talked, and the hearers forgot the momentary disappointment of not seeing a new face, for they did not perplex by smart paradoxes, they did not baffle or stun by enigmas or bombast, they did not surprise by ominous shoulder shrugs incapable of explanation.

Although the guests were in the main unchanged, their behavior at times was curious, provoking comment. Beethoven is often rough, with the rough manliness of the lobster-catcher or the tamer of oxen; but Saturday evening he was boisterous, and his spirits were animal rather than mental. He even indulged in noisy practical jokes, instead of the fanciful humor which he has shown on former occasions, and when he danced the minuet his feet moved clumsily and he almost lost his balance. Nor did he end matters by shaking his head rudely at the leader of the band and putting the blame upon him. Schubert, who was in a melancholy mood, at the remembrance, perhaps, of feasters of last year, who would have welcomed him had they not arisen from the table and gone into the next room, instead of sighing out his woes, declaimed them so loudly that he became theatrical; and although his words were beautiful and heavy with grief, they were lost sight of in his wild gesturing and self-dishevelled hair. Yet the changes in their behavior were only upon the surface; at heart they were the same noble and tender friends as of old.

But the exquisite, almost effeminate Mendelssohn was sadly altered, and from loss of temper his delicate voice became hard and rough. He had brought his box of puppets with him for the entertainment of children, young and old. At the very start the fairies would not play together; they quarrelled; they sulked; and their tiny voices were swollen out of proportion. The instruments designed for the accompaniment of their sports should have been played by gnats and grasshoppers "the violins should have been strung with cobwebs and the flutes been cut out of slender reeds"; but instruments and players had been left behind, and the fairies were frightened during the overture as it was played by the orchestra which was substituted. And Mendelssohn grew angry, and the strings which controlled the puppets dropped from his hands. "I wrote this music," he said, "for the frolics of Oberon and Titania, who lived with their subjects in a wood near Athens, the home of great Duke Theseus; but this music as I hear it is better suited to the wild landscape where all was made of metal, clouds, earth, vegetation and creeping things, the landscape which Baudelaire once saw and told me of the other day. This music is not fantastic enough; I miss the moonshine. And I wish the first flute would play in tune, and I think the brass makes too much noise." Nor was he pleased with the Notturno, and only with the Wedding March did he recover his spirits and equanimity of mind.

The programme for the concert of Saturday evening, Jan. 3, is made up of Liszt's "Tasso," Raff's symphony "Im Walde" and Burmeister's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, in D minor, which will be played for the first time in Boston. The pianoforte part will be played by the composer.

PHILIP HALE.

MUSIC NOTES.

The programme for the Kneisel Quartette concert which takes place this evening at Union Hall is as follows: Sonata for pianoforte and violin (MS.), Arthur Whiting (first time); quartette-satz, Schubert; quintette in C major, Beethoven. Mr. Whiting will be the pianist. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will not be able to sing a group of songs on account of illness, and she will appear at a later concert in the same series. Any who have purchased tickets and desire it, can have their money refunded by applying at Music Hall.

.....

Messrs. Campanini and Kneisel will appear in solo numbers at the Wagner matinee to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall Wednesday afternoon. The programme consists of overture and Venusberg music from "Tannhaeuser" (Paris version); Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger"; prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"; "Albumblatt," violin solo; Siegfried's passage to Brunhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey from "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung" as arranged by Richter; Love Song from "Die Walküre," and prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

.....

The first of the extra matinees by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which proved so popular last season, will be given at Music Hall next Wednesday afternoon. Mr. Nikisch will offer a programme made up entirely of selections from the Wagner operas, with solo numbers by Signor Campanini and Mr. Kneisel. Programmes may be obtained at Music Hall, where the sale of seats is now progressing.

[67]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 29, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday—A Feast for Music Lovers.

The programme of Saturday was neutral ground where classicist and tune lover, musician and non-musician, could meet and enjoy themselves. It was not a heavy tonal feast, nor one that required much thinking to enjoy; its chief element was humor, and it was pleasant to watch the composers at play. "A little nonsense now and then," etc. is a saying that emphatically applies to composers, and all of the great masters have at one time or another indulged in musical fun. With Bach this element is represented by the "Coffee Cantata" and the "Peasant's Cantata," with Mozart it bubbles out all the way from opera to certain canons which are not fit for ears polite, in Wagner it found glorious outlet in "The Mastersingers," and with Beethoven in comic songs (!) with burlesque incidents in the Pastoral symphony, but most of all in the symphony which began this concert — the eighth. If any title were to be given to this work, as has been done with the third and sixth symphonies, it might easily receive the name of the "Humorous Symphony," for Beethoven's most informal mood ("aufgeknopft," he called it), is in every movement and almost in every measure. The reading and performance of the work were commendable; in the first theme the capricious toyings with tempo were admirably caught up and the bassoon gave its comical little octave figure with good effect; in the second movement the brusque interruptions were well carried out, and the comically commonplace ending finely contrasted with the preceding passages. This same ending has been a stumblingblock to many of the reviewers in the days gone by; it is probable that the composer here caught a little of that tricksy spirit which so often moved Heine to end an earnest verse with whimsical drollery. One can call to mind the verses where the poet wishes that his stanzas were flowers that they might grow at the feet of his love, or birds that they might fly to her, and finally that they were peas, that he might cook for himself a good pea soup—such an ending is that of the second movement of the eighth symphony.

The return to minuet form in this symphony shows how Beethoven could have eclipsed Haydn even in his own school; it was probably used because the scherzo in the developed state in which Beethoven employed it (excepting on its first appearance in his second symphony) would have been too ambitious for the third movement of this little symphony, and because something of the spirit of the scherzo pervades the finale. The horns and clarinets played very finely in this part of the work. The rollicking fun of the last movement was done full justice to, although the explosion on the important C sharp could have been still more emphatic. What a comical bit of mockery it is when the chief figure appears on the flutes, and is suddenly and grotesquely mocked by the contrabasses! A skip from the garret to the cellar of the orchestra! It is seldom that this touch is so clearly brought out as on this occasion; the contrabasses deserve much praise. Not less effective is the reiterated octave for bassoon and kettle-drum, and this also was well-rendered, the kettle-drummer paying good attention to ensemble effect not only here but throughout the entire concert. Altogether then, this performance of the most genial of all Beethoven's works was one of the best it has been my good fortune to hear. Now followed a bit of tenderness and pathos in the shape of Schubert's unfinished symphony, which came in proper contrast with the work which preceded and that which followed it, so that this concert, so enjoyable in its separate selections, and so well executed, was also excellent in the order of its numbers. The reading of the work calls for the most unmitigated praise; never has Mr. Nikisch given better proof of the poetry that is in him. One might, perhaps, take slight exception to the prolongation of the horn tone which ushers in the second theme of the allegro, but this is a minor fault, if it is a fault at all. The working up of the climaxes was noble beyond description. I found the passages of the woodwind, in the second movement, rather too languishing, although very finely shaded and played. The superb oboe work, and the playing of the cellos in the first movement must not be passed over in silence.

With another class of musical humor, in the shape of Mendelssohn's music to "Midsummer Night's Dream" the concert ended. There is as much difference between the humor of Mendelssohn and that of Beethoven as between their personalities. The Mendelssohn who was able to jest at his critics with lines like

"If composers earnest are
Critics go to sleep,
If they take a lively style
Then they're voted cheap."
"Let a man write as he will
Still the critics fight
Therefore let him please himself
And he will be right."

the man who could give such dainty pleasantry was very different from the Beethoven who pelted his cook with the stale eggs she had brought from market or gave the unfortunate waiter in a Viennese restaurant a cold shower bath with the soup he had brought him. Beethoven's musical humor is brusque, half savage, a sort of tonal horseplay and practical joking which exhilarates one by its animal spirits and heartiness; Mendelssohn's is the airy badinage of a witty man of the world, and if in this subject he has gone to further lengths than usual it is because Shakespeare has led the way. But daintiness is not absent from the overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream" [illegible] and the dancing elves could never be better portrayed than by the [illegible] violin which were played with just the right delicacy on this occasion. In broader style of humor is the braying of the bassoon, which intimates that Bottom has entered into his asinine phase, and the snoring of the same drunken weaver which Mendelssohn gave to the ophicleide, but as this instrument is obsolete almost everywhere except in England and France, is always given in America on the bass tuba, a faulty (although necessary) substitution, since the tuba has not the raw, rasping tone of the ophicleide, which pictures a snore to the life. The mock-heroic vein of the music which portrays the entrance of the actors is a most natural touch, and this was most excellently played, and so by the way was the afore-mentioned tuba. The beauty of the coda is one of Mendelssohn's most perfect touches, and corrects the effect of the preceding buffoonery. Spite of a slight, temporary faultiness of intonation in the woodwind in the scherzo, that department of the orchestra did fine work in very trying passages, and the flute playing was especially meritorious at the close. In the nocturne the horns did excellently, and gave Mendelssohn's best theme for these instruments with appropriate beauty. A single slip made later on by the first horn did not mar the general effect.

The Wedding March brought the concert to a popular close. Its triumphant measures, to which so many couples have marched, perchance to combat, were especially attractive, because they had, possibly for the first time among us, the advantage of real trumpet fanfares. The cornet, which in America replaces the trumpet, is as much like it as a chromo is like an oil painting, and while the trumpet suggests martial ardor or the clangor of pompous festivity, the cornet suggests "Home, Sweet Home" (afflicted with ague-stricken variations) at Coney Island or Nantasket. I believe, however, that our trumpets could attain even a more characteristic tone were they to adopt shallower mouth pieces. They played better than ever, and every auditor seemed interested in the concert even to the last note.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, DEC. 28, 1890.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TENTH CONCERT.

Last night's programme was in three parts, as follows:

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 8 in F
Schubert....Symphony (unfinished) in B Minor
Mendelssohn....Overture, Scherzo, and Finale from The Midsummer Night's Dream.

The arrangement of the programme was capital and the selections themselves, though somewhat venerably well-worn, especially Schubert's great master-piece, were in every respect welcome. The Beethoven symphony was admirably given, and into the Schubert symphony Conductor Nikisch entered con amore and with exceptional integrity of thought and feeling. The first movement was broadly played, and with artistic effects that brought the audience into a delightful state of unanimity, that seemed to be no less felt and appreciated by all present. The conductor seemed carefully to avoid any undue originality of conception in the simple and unaffected justice with which the master's divine music was performed, and the second movement received similar treatment, the performance of each part being applauded perhaps with more zest and enthusiasm than any orchestral work has received here this season. The fact of there being no soloist in the concert again, did not prevent the usual large attendance. It is doubtful if any solo number whatsoever could have in any way enhanced the superior merit of the programme. The concert brilliantly ended with the always entrancing music of Mendelssohn from the "Midsummer Night's Dream." With this work the orchestra and conductor again triumphed in one of the very ablest, and most gratifying programmes that has been heard here this season. At the next concert, Saturday evening, Jan. 2d, the programme will consist of Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Tasso;" Burmeister's Concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra, and Raff's symphony "Im Waldi." Mr. Burmeister who will take part in the performance of his own work, is a Baltimore pianist, but was heard here last winter in an admirable recital of pianoforte music given by him in the Meionaon.

The first matinee concert of the Symphony orchestra for this season will take place next Wednesday. The programme is to be drawn entirely from the works of Wagner. "Tannhauser," "Siegfried," and the Nibelung dramas will be drawn from. The soloists will be Sig. I. Campanini and Franz Kneisel, and a thoroughly enjoyable concert is sure to result.

The next concert of the series by the Kneisel quartette will be given at Union hall tomorrow evening. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will be the singer, making her first appearance in Boston on that occasion. The quartette will have the assistance of Mr. Arthur Whiting. Tickets have sold very rapidly the past week.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 28, 1890.

THE SYMPHONY.

It is claimed that there is nothing new under the sun. Therefore it is barely possible that the plan of the programme of the tenth rehearsal and concert did not originate in the brain of Mr. Nikisch. Whether it did or not the scheme was an exceedingly happy one, bearing strong testimony to the musical susceptibilities of its author. A programme made up of the eighth symphony, the unfinished symphony, and the music to "Midsummer Night's Dream" is not only almost unique, but well designed to soothe the savage breast of the most abandoned fault-finder. What a delightful combination! How beautifully the yearning, mournful, passionate music of Schubert contrasted with the absolute joyousness of Beethoven, and the irrepressibly exuberant imagination of the boy genius, Mendelssohn!

Beethoven had reached the age of forty-two, was sick and disheartened, when he wrote what he called his "little" symphony. When these circumstances are considered, one can only marvel at its youthful freshness, light-heartedness, and humor, its exquisite themes and buoyant, elastic treatment. Scarcely a shadow is discernible. Yet the strong grasp of the man of maturity is plainly to be felt throughout the work. No youth even of genius could have worked out and put together this symphony with the skill and keen sense of the artistic fitness of things that are displayed in the score.

The four movements were sympathetically read and finely performed. The strings were heard at their best in the many crisp staccato passages of the opening and final allegros, attaining a delicate piannissimo that was virtuoso-like in its perfection. The allegretto scherzando seemed a thought too slow in tempo, and its humorous qualities somewhat injured in consequence. The deliberateness of the minuet, on the contrary, seemed entirely appropriate; and the horn passages in the trio were given with great smoothness and purity of tone.

There are few things that appear more strongly to the admirers of great personages than stories relating to their eccentricities and general habits of life. It is not often that anything new comes to light concerning one who died sixty odd years ago. But here is an incident illustrating Schubert's temperament, and representing him in a mood startlingly in contrast with that which is so painfully apparent in the symphony given laat evening. It comes to us from one who heard it from the lips of Vincenz, brother of Franz Lachner, the eminent musician. The latter was an intimate friend of Schubert, and the two were often boon companions. They sometimes were up and out late o' nights; and after such occasions Schubert frequently passed the remaining hours at the Lachner's house, making his bed on a sofa in the sitting room. One morning when Vincenz was about to open the door of this room where Schubert had slept the night before, he heard the latter chuckling to himself, apparently in great glee over something. He entered and glanced curiously at the great composer. There he sat, scantily dressed, holding out at arm's length a pair of tattered nether undergarments, in which he was about to enrobe himself, and which were the cause of his careless merriment!

The details of Schubert's poverty and distresses are sufficiently saddening to those who love his music, (and who does not love it); but it is a satisfaction to learn even through the medium of such a trifling incident that he could sometimes make light of his misfortunes.

In the unfinished symphony, Schubert gives vent to his emotions with great force and originality. But somehow these expressions of sorrow, moving as they are, seem to be rather the outcome of a highly impressible, imaginative nature, than of harrowing, unforgetable life experiences. However that may be, the music at least is unforgetable. What can be more mysterious and affecting than the opening measures of the allegro, or more haunting than the second theme, as it appears in the 'cellos, its tones scarcely less thrilling than those of the human voice! The andante, although beautiful and dignified with all its plaintiveness, does not impress itself on the mind so ineffaceably as does its companion movement. Here again the strings and the wood-wind did some exquisite work; and the splendid tuttis, as well as those passages where the resonant tones of the trombones are heard above all, came out broadly and impressively.

The Midsummer Night's music is still enchanting, notwithstanding the fact that at each succeeding performance it seems just a little more aged. Of necessity, possessing nothing in the nature of depth, the graceful superficiality of its more serious parts were rendered especially apparent from its position on the programme. Its pale, elegant phrases seemed gray with coldness after the sensuous warmth and passion of Schubert. But in the fairy element lies its strength and fascination, and nothing, unless it be a bad performance, could render it in that respect unenjoyable. Happily, this was far from the case at the performance under consideration. Mr. Nikisch seemingly did everything with the music that could be done; and the players, one and all, apparently infused into their parts an unusual amount of spirit. For once also the sometimes unmusical efforts of the tympani player became humorously effective, the dull thumping sounds that he evoked from his instruments at the point in the overture where Bottom and his companions are supposed to enter being laughably suggestive. The scherzo went trippingly and the nocturne serenely. A modern acquaintance with diminished chords imparts to the wedding march a tinge of staleness; although everyone doubtless remembers how imposing its opening measures once appeared. Louis Ehlert, that charming, yet keenly discriminative writer on musical subjects, passes a just criticism on this march.

After praising its festival splendor, and its stately, sparkling effects, he thinks that "its contour is too realistic for the frame of this exquisitely poetical score. Would it not have been possible for this hand, so wonderfully gifted with the power of proportion, to write a wedding march, in which, without detriment to its festive character, our minds, but lately made familiar with the supernatural, might have been spared the trivial colors of reality?"

However, it made a brilliant ending to this popular concert. And now the holidays are over, the long-looked-for procession of new works by eminent composers is confidently expected to be on the move. In fact, a solitary policeman is already in sight, as may be seen by reference to next week's programme.

An unusually attractive performance will be the Wagner matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, which will be given at Music Hall on Wednesday afternoon. The programme includes selections from "Tannhauser," "Siegfried," "Die Meistersinger" and "Gotterdammerung." The soloists are Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. Italo Campanini.

Boston Post
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 29, 1890.

MUSIC.

TENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the tenth symphony concert, given at Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Symphony No. 8, in F.....Beethoven
Symphony No. 8, in B minor (unfinished).....Schubert
Overture, Scherzo, Notturno, and Wedding March from the "Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn

An old-fashioned and hearty Christmas greeting was given to the three friends who were the honored guests at Saturday's feast. They brought no new stories; we have heard their jests and anecdotes and tales of love and adventure, yes, and their lay-sermons, from childhood; but they never tire us, for they speak clearly and sensibly though sometimes with an abundance of detail and with much repetition, as though the points of their discourse were only to be driven in by repeated blows. Perhaps one of them with a comparative stranger might have furnished more amusement by the contrasts in conversation. They came together, however, and they sat down and talked, and the hearers forgot the momentary disappointment of not seeing a new face, for they did not perplex by smart paradoxes, they did not baffle or stun by enigmas or bombast, they did not surprise by ominous shoulder shrugs incapable of explanation.

Although the guests were in the main unchanged, their behavior at times was curious, provoking comment. Beethoven is often rough, with the rough manliness of the lobster-catcher or the tamer of oxen; but Saturday evening he was boisterous, and his spirits were animal rather than mental. He even indulged in noisy practical jokes, instead of the fanciful humor which he has shown on former occasions, and when he danced the minuet his feet moved clumsily and he almost lost his balance. Nor did he end matters by shaking his head rudely at the leader of the band and putting the blame upon him. Schubert, who was in a melancholy mood, at the remembrance, perhaps, of feasters of last year, who would have welcomed him had they not arisen from the table and gone into the next room, instead of sighing out his woes, declaimed them so loudly that he became theatrical; and although his words were beautiful and heavy with grief, they were lost sight of in his wild gesturing and self-dishevelled hair. Yet the changes in their behavior were only upon the surface; at heart they were the same noble and tender friends as of old.

But the exquisite, almost effeminate Mendelssohn was sadly altered, and from loss of temper his delicate voice became hard and rough. He had brought his box of puppets with him for the entertainment of children, young and old. At the very start the fairies would not play together; they quarrelled; they sulked; and their tiny voices were swollen out of proportion. The instruments designed for the accompaniment of their sports should have been played by gnats and grasshoppers "the violins should have been strung with cobwebs and the flutes been cut out of slender reeds"; but instruments and players had been left behind, and the fairies were frightened during the overture as it was played by the orchestra which was substituted. And Mendelssohn grew angry, and the strings which controlled the puppets dropped from his hands. "I wrote this music," he said, "for the frolics of Oberon and Titania, who lived with their subjects in a wood near Athens, the home of great Duke Theseus; but this music as I hear it is better suited to the wild landscape where all was made of metal, clouds, earth, vegetation and creeping things, the landscape which Baudelaire once saw and told me of the other day. This music is not fantastic enough; I miss the moonshine. And I wish the first flute would play in tune, and I think the brass makes too much noise." Nor was he pleased with the Notturno, and only with the Wedding March did he recover his spirits and equanimity of mind.

The programme for the concert of Saturday evening, Jan. 3, is made up of Liszt's "Tasso," Raff's symphony "Im Walde" and Burmeister's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, in D minor, which will be played for the first time in Boston. The pianoforte part will be played by the composer.

PHILIP HALE.

MUSIC NOTES.

The programme for the Kneisel Quartette concert which takes place this evening at Union Hall is as follows: Sonata for pianoforte and violin (MS.), Arthur Whiting (first time); quartette-satz, Schubert; quintette in C major, Beethoven. Mr. Whiting will be the pianist. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will not be able to sing a group of songs on account of illness, and she will appear at a later concert in the same series. Any who have purchased tickets and desire it, can have their money refunded by applying at Music Hall.

.....

.....

Messrs. Campanini and Kneisel will appear in solo numbers at the Wagner matinee to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall Wednesday afternoon. The programme consists of overture and Venusberg music from "Tannhaeuser" (Paris version); Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger"; prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"; "Albumblatt," violin solo; Siegfried's passage to Brunhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey from "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung" as arranged by Richter; Love Song from "Die Walküre," and prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

.....

.....

The first of the extra matinees by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which proved so popular last season, will be given at Music Hall next Wednesday afternoon. Mr. Nikisch will offer a programme made up entirely of selections from the Wagner operas, with solo numbers by Signor Campanini and Mr. Kneisel. Programmes may be obtained at Music Hall, where the sale of seats is now progressing.

[67]

The [illegible] concert.

The production of our last week in this column of the programme of Saturday evening would have given great pleasure to Mr. Nikisch's audience in Music Hall than anything he had given us for several weeks, was abundantly borne out by the result of the concert. If we are not in error, it is the first time this season that the conductor has been the object of double recalls for the work of the orchestra. This happened Saturday evening not only once, but continuously, and there was the largest number of interested "standees" that has been noticed this year. And all this without the attraction of a soloist. Is it not an object lesson for the director?

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, the "little symphony," so called, opened the programme. It was beautifully played, and was a fitting opening for the concert. Its joyous words, its variety of movement, with the lovely theme of the allegretto, were readily understood by the ordinary auditor, and Mr. Nikisch's reading was conservative and careful. This led up to the less jovial measures of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony. Mr. Nikisch is an admirable interpreter of Schubert, and the applause which followed the delivery of the two movements was spontaneous, hearty and deserved. The concert closed with the overture, Scherzo, notturno and wedding march from Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream, and if the conductor had any lingering doubts as to its reception, even by a classical Boston audience, they were doubtless dispelled by the result. The movements were excellently rendered—save that a little more of dash and marked accent could have been given to the march, but all in all it was an interpretation which is seldom heard—and this is always a characteristic of the more familiar orchestral works when given by this organization. And is not this an educational influence? Is it not worth the trouble, even at an occasional departure from the most highly artistic programmes, to thus interest, delight and instruct the symphony audiences? At the next concert Richard Burmeister of Baltimore, who was heard a few years ago at a piano recital in Bumstead Hall, is to play a piano concerto of his own composition, and the orchestra will render Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," and Raff's symphony, "Im Walde."

Mr. Arthur Whiting is to be the soloist at the third concert of the Kneisel Quartette this evening. He will play a sonata of his own composition for violin and piano, Mr. Kneisel taking the violin part. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch is prevented from appearing at this concert, as had been announced, but will be heard later in the series.

The first afternoon concert by the Symphony Orchestra is to be given Wednesday afternoon, and will be devoted entirely to the works of Wagner. It cannot, strictly speaking, be called a "Young People's Popular," for Wagner's music is not popular in any sense. Yet there will be a large audience and solos will be given by Signor Campanini and Mr. Kneisel, and this is the programme: Overture and Vermaberg music from "Tannhauser," Paris version; prize song from "Die Meistersinger;" prelude to "Tristan and Isolde;" "Albumblatt," violin solo, Kneisel; Siegfried's Passage to Brunnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn, and Rhine Journey, from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," as arranged by Hans Richter; love song from "Die Walkure;" vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger."

On account of the illness of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, her engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been postponed until February.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1890-91.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

GRAND

WAGNER MATINEE,

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 31, AT 2.30.

SOLOISTS:

SIG. ITALO CAMPANINI.

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

Tickets with reserved seats, 50 cents, 75 cents and $1, according to location, now on sale at the Box Office.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston symphony public does appreciate a good programme, although it is sometimes carried away by a love of novelty, forgetting the incongruity between the elements which make up an evening's miscellaneous bill of fare. But an experience like that of Saturday evening's concert shows that, in spite of itself, our audience loves a programme of the best of music, however often heard before, works of genius, by the greatest masters, brought together with a poetic sense of true affinity and fitness. Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn, in three of their loveliest creations, works of uninterrupted and unsullied beauty! At the Friday afternoon rehearsal, when the furious snowstorm was at its height, many were turned away from the Music Hall for want of room; it was the largest, most enthusiastic audience of the season! And well might such a programme, composed of three works sure to give delight, sure not to offend or clog the most artistic taste, appeal to the best musical susceptibility of all of us. The three numbers were:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 8, in F.
Schubert—Symphony No. 8, in B minor (unfinished.)
Mendelssohn—Overture, Scherzo, Notturno and Wedding March, from the "Midsummer Night's Dream."

The shortest, lightest symphony of Beethoven is also the happiest, while at the same time it shows his ripest and most subtle art. It is full of sunshine. Written at the age of forty-two, in the summer of 1812, in perhaps the darkest period of his life, it seems the glad expression of a brief heavenly visitation to his grieved, long-suffering, clouded soul. His heart leaps up with a new-born joy and sense of health. He is a child once more in spirit, but with a man's self-knowledge and consummate art. This Eighth Symphony is pastoral, and it is fairy-like. It is in the key of F, like his Pastoral Symphony. It has phrases, figures, cadences reminding you of that.

With what an inspiring, pungent, penetrating and uplifting quality of sound, what perfect, lifesome harmony, the first theme sets in with full orchestra! How quickening, delightful, bright and fresh the instrumentation! Have Berlioz or Wagner, with their crowded orchestras, surpassed or equalled that? Whenever the superiority of the most modern instrumentation is harped on in our hearing our thoughts go back to the first bars of the Eighth Symphony for a more perfect model which may be found anywhere in Beethoven. The buoyancy and blitheness of that opening seems to lift you from the earth. And the sure fulfilment of the promise as the idea unfolds, the exquisite beauty of the second subject, which comes in so soon, the striking figures of the accompaniment, the bold, strong passages out of which the sweet melodies melt again, the original, exciting working up, the satisfactory development and conclusion of the movement [illegible] put one in the best [illegible] that was to follow. It was all [illegible] the life; strings, flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and horns, all charming admira-

The ever popular Allegretto Scherzando, commonly called the "clock" movement, was taken at a tempo which some would call too slow. But the deliberate and regular beat of it soon wins upon the hearer. Besides, it must be considered, this is the only approach to a slow movement in the symphony, and this is the place, if any, to resist "rapid transit." How fine and delicate the alternate staccato and legato of the violin! With what sweet warmth of tone the wood-wind instruments met and mingled! How much humor in it all, and most refined n quality! What free and hearty outburst of fortissimo at times!

The Minuet was naturally taken at the moderate rate of the old Tempo di Menuetto, and with the right nervous accent. But we could not account for the very marked reining in of the movement in the Trio, at the entrance of the fascinating horn theme, on the staccato triplets of the 'cello solo, followed by the fine solo of the clarinet. The finale, Allegro vivace, was played very fast, as it always is; that movement is as imaginative and fairy-like as anything of Mendelssohn's; and we soon had opportunity to make the comparison. The crepitant, crisp pianissimo of the opening and principal subject, the startling and mysterious entrance of a thundering C sharp in all the instruments, which leaves the basses rocking in octaves on the keynote (F), while the first theme is resumed fortissimo in the upper instruments; presently a new theme of entrancing beauty in A flat; a recurrence of the strange C-sharp unison; a passage of graver flowing melody of equal half-notes—these are a few salient points in the continual transformations of this wonderful movement, which never loses the thematic thread with which it opened. In "Oberon," in "Midsummer Night's Dream," no finer fairies tread the grass than here, none more Shakspearian.

If the eighth of Beethoven is all joy and sunshine, the eighth of Schubert, the "unfinished," is the musical expression of unconquerable sadness, "most musical, most melancholy." True, what lingers mostly in the memory after hearing is the comforting and cheering second theme in the Allegro, which enters in the 'celli, and is taken up more strongly in the violins,—a lovely theme with syncopated short-breathed accompaniment. The opening bars, a gloomy soliloquy of the deep basses, prelude to the melancholy first theme, sung by oboe and clarinet; then a loud outburst of despair; then this heavenly second theme in the major falls in like a godsend, comforting and clung to, taking possession (at least the second half of it) of all the orchestra. But in vain. After the repeat, the dark soliloquy of the basses comes back again; and the movement grows to a strong tragic climax, impatient and impassioned, struggling madly against fate, which prevails over the returning theme of comfort and all the sweet suggestions of the movement to the end. The music is extremely beautiful, but there is no victory, as there would certainly have been with Beethoven. The other movement, Andante con moto, in E, is also beautiful and touchingly pathetic, full of haunting bits of melody, now dying down to ppp, now swelling to overpowering climaxes and subsiding gently at the close, but it has not the freshness and [illegible] which relieve the gloom of the Allegro. Why did he leave the symphony unfinished? Was it possible to finish it? To warrant a Minuet or Scherzo, and the bright solution of a Finale, the depressed and stricken spirit must first rise and overcome itself, shaking off its burthen. This a Beethoven would have done, with glorious sense of power. Beethoven himself, his soul, his will, his genius and his faith, you feel in all his music to be greater than his music, even at its greatest and sublimest reach. Schubert is possessed by his music, spell-bound, mastered by it. Only once, in his great symphony in C, does he seem to grasp the means of freedom to be master of himself. Hence the prolixity so characteristic of his music. A great genius undoubtedly, of wonderful and inexhaustible invention, in whose mind melodies most exquisite sprung up and multiplied like wild flowers; yet you feel his genius falls far short of the sovereign power you own in Bach or Handel or Beethoven. There is a certain weakness, after all, in all his music (with the one exception above named), in spite of all its originality and marvellous wealth and variety of beauty. In the sense we have endeavored to express, nearer than Schubert to Beethoven Schumann seems to stand.

The "Midsummer Night's Dream" music is a soothing, lovely and delightful escort after any concert to home peace and rest. The overture, that wonderful inspiration of boy genius, is now sixty years old, yet sounds as fresh as ever played by such master musicians as control the vibrations of strings and wood and brass in this accomplished orchestra. The fine fairy figures of the violins, the exquisite opaline coloring of reeds and flutes, the warm, mellow tones of the horns, the honest pastoral discourse of the bassoons, the humorous allusions to the snore of the "translated" Bottom, the thumping, clumsy dance of clowns, all reproduce the dream of Shakspeare with the cleverness of genius. The Scherzo, too, a piece most difficult of execution, went to a charm. The sweet and dreamy musing melody, in which the horns are always prominent, of the Notturno sang itself most sweetly. And never have we heard the Wedding March given with more royal festal pomp and splendor.

When played like that, it is the most exciting and blood-tingling of all nuptial music. Can it ever fade to commonplace? Such strains might lift the gouty and rheumatic, even the paralytic, on their feet. It was a witching presentment of the fairy music. We only wondered that it did not include the Intermezzo, that fine piece of musical hide and seek, so vividly suggestive of the weary lovers pursuing each other blindly through the labyrinthine forest. Perhaps it would have made the concert too long.

Very different is the promise of this week's programme! Liszt's "Tasso," a new piano concerto composed and played by Richard Burmeister, and Raff's "In the Woods" symphony.

J. S. D.

[68]

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1890-91.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

GRAND

WAGNER MATINEE,

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 31, AT 2.30.

SOLOISTS:

SIG. ITALO CAMPANINI.

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

Tickets with reserved seats, 50 cents, 75 cents and $1, according to location, now on sale at the Box Office.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 29, 1890.

The Symphony Concert.

The prediction made last week in this column, that the programme of Saturday evening would give more real pleasure to Mr. Nikisch's audience in Music Hall than anything he had given for several weeks, was abundantly borne out by the result of the concert. If we are not in error, it is the first time this season that the conductor has been the object of double recalls for the work of the orchestra. This happened Saturday evening not only once, but continuously, and there was the largest number of interested "standees" that has been noticed this year. And all this without the attraction of a soloist. Is it not an object lesson for the director?

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, the "little symphony," so called, opened the programme. It was beautifully played, and was a fitting opening for the concert. Its joyous words, its variety of movement, with the lovely theme of the allegretto, were readily understood by the ordinary auditor, and Mr. Nikisch's reading was conservative and careful. This led up to the less jovial measures of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony. Mr. Nikisch is an admirable interpreter of Schubert, and the applause which followed the delivery of the two movements was spontaneous, hearty and deserved. The concert closed with the overture, Scherzo, notturno and wedding march from Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream, and if the conductor had any lingering doubts as to its reception, even by a classical Boston audience, they were doubtless dispelled by the result. The movements were excellently rendered—save that a little more of dash and marked accent could have been given to the march, but all in all it was an interpretation which is seldom heard—and this is always a characteristic of the more familiar orchestral works when given by this organization. And is not this an educational influence? Is it not worth the trouble, even at an occasional departure from the most highly artistic programmes, to thus interest, delight and instruct the symphony audiences? At the next concert Richard Burmeider of Baltimore, who was heard a few years ago at a piano recital in Bumstead Hall, is to play a piano concerto of his own composition, and the orchestra will render Lizt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," and Raff's symphony, "Im Walde."

Mr. Arthur Whiting is to be the soloist at the third concert of the Kneisel Quartette this evening. He will play a sonata of his own composition for violin and piano, Mr. Kneisel taking the violin part. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch is prevented from appearing at this concert, as had been announced, but will be heard later in the series.

The first afternoon concert by the Symphony Orchestra is to be given Wednesday afternoon, and will be devoted entirely to the works of Wagner. It cannot, strictly speaking, be called a "Young People's Popular," for Wagner's music is not popular in any sense. Yet there will be a large audience and solos will be given by Signor Campanini and Mr. Kneisel, and this is the programme: Overture and Vermaberg music from "Tannhauser," Paris version; prize song from "Die Meistersinger;" prelude to "Tristan and Isolde;" "Albumblatt," violin solo, Kneisel; Siegfried's Passage to Brunnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn, and Rhine Journey, from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," as arranged by Hans Richter; love song from "Die Walkure;" vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger."

On account of the illness of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, her engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been postponed until February.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1890.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston symphony public does appreciate a good programme, although it is sometimes carried away by a love of novelty, forgetting the incongruity between the elements which make up an evening's miscellaneous bill of fare. But an experience like that of Saturday evening's concert shows that, in spite of itself, our audience loves a programme of the best of music, however often heard before, works of genius, by the greatest masters, brought together with a poetic sense of true affinity and fitness. Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn, in three of their loviest creations, works of uninterrupted and unsullied beauty! At the Friday afternoon rehearsal, when the furious snowstorm was at its height, many were turned away from the Music Hall for want of room; it was the largest, most enthusiastic audience of the season! And well might such a programme, composed of three works sure to give delight, sure not to offend or clog the most artistic taste, appeal to the best musical susceptibility of all of us. The three numbers were:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 8, in F.
Schubert—Symphony No. 8, in B minor (unfinished.)
Mendelssohn—Overture, Scherzo, Nocturne and Wedding March, from the "Midsummer Night's Dream."

The shortest, lightest symphony of Beethoven is also the happiest, while at the same time it shows his ripest and most subtle art. It is full of sunshine. Written at the age of forty-two, in the summer of 1812, in perhaps the darkest period of his life, it seems the glad expression of a brief heavenly visitation to his grieved, long-suffering, clouded soul. His heart leaps up with a new-born joy and sense of health. He is a child once more in spirit, but with a man's self-knowledge and consummate art. This Eighth Symphony is pastoral, and it is fairy-like. It is in the key of F, like his Pastoral Symphony. It has phrases, figures, cadences reminding you of that.

With what an inspiring, pungent, penetrating and uplifting quality of sound, what perfect, lifesome harmony, the first theme sets in with full orchestra! How quickening, delightful bright and fresh the instrumentation! Have Berlioz or Wagner, with their crowded orchestras, surpassed or equalled that? Whenever the superiority of the most modern instrumentation is harped on in our hearing our thoughts go back to the first bars of the Eighth Symphony for a more perfect model which may be found anywhere in Beethoven. The buovancy and blitheness of that opening seems to lift you from the earth. And the sure fulfilment of the promise as the idea unfolds, the exquisite beauty of the second subject, which comes in so soon, the striking figures of the accompaniment, the bold, strong passages out of which the sweet melodies melt again, the original, exciting working up, the satisfactory development and conclusion of the movement (allegro vivace e con brio) put one in the best mood for all that was to follow. It was all brought out to the life; strings, flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and brass, all claiming admiration.

The ever popular Allegretto Scherzando, commonly called the "clock" movement, was taken at a tempo which some would call too slow. But the deliberate and regular beat of it soon wins upon the hearer. Besides, it must be considered, this is the only approach to a slow movement in the symphony, and this is the place, if any, to resist "rapid transit." How fine and delicate the alternate staccato and legato of the violin! With what sweet warmth of tone the wood-wind instruments met and mingled! How much humor in it all, and most refined n quality! What free and hearty outburst of fortissimo at times!

The Minuet was naturally taken at the moderate rate of the old Tempo di Menuetto, and with the right nervous accent. But we could not account for the very marked reining in of the movement in the Trio, at the entrance of the fascinating horn theme, on the staccato triplets of the 'cello solo, followed by the fine solo of the clarinet. The finale, Allegro vivace, was played very fast, as it always is; that movement is as imaginative and fairy-like as anything of Mendelssohn's; and we soon had opportunity to make the comparison. The crepitant, crisp pianissimo of the opening and principal subject, the startling and mysterious entrance of a thundering C sharp in all the instruments, which leaves the basses rocking in octaves on the keynote (F), while the first theme is resumed fortissimo in the upper instruments; presently a new theme of entrancing beauty in A flat; a recurrence of the strange C-sharp unison; a passage of graver flowing melody of equal half-notes—these are a few salient points in the continual transformations of this wonderful movement, which never loses the thematic thread with which it opened. In "Oberon," in "Midsummer Night's Dream," no finer fairies tread the grass than here, none more Shakspearian.

If the eighth of Beethoven is all joy and sunshine, the eighth of Schubert, the "unfinished," is the musical expression of unconquerable sadness, "most musical, most melancholy." True, what lingers mostly in the memory after hearing is the comforting and cheering second theme in the Allegro, which enters in the 'celli, and is taken up more strongly in the violins,—a lovely theme with syncopated short-breathed accompaniment. The opening bars, a gloomy soliloquy of the deep basses, prelude to the melancholy first theme, sung by oboe and clarinet; then a loud outburst of despair; then this heavenly second theme in the major falls in like a godsend, comforting and clung to, taking possession (at least the second half of it) of all the orchestra. But in vain. After the repeat, the dark soliloquy of the basses comes back again, and the movement grows to a strong tragic climax, impatient and impassioned, struggling madly against fate, which prevails over the returning theme of comfort and all the sweet suggestions of the movement to the end. The music is extremely beautiful, but there is no victory, as there would certainly have been with Beethoven. The other movement, Andante con moto, in E, is also beautiful and touchingly pathetic, full of haunting bits of melody, now dying down to ppp, now swelling to overpowering climaxes, and subsiding gently at the close; but it has none of the sweeter and more hopeful inspirations which relieve the gloom of the Allegro. Why did he leave the symphony unfinished? Was it possible to finish it? To warrant a Minuet or Scherzo, and the bright solution of a Finale, the depressed and stricken spirit must first rise and overcome itself, shaking off its burthen. This a Beethoven would have done, with glorious sense of power. Beethoven himself, his soul, his will, his genius and his faith, you feel in all his music to be greater than his music, even at its greatest and sublimest reach. Schubert is possessed by his music, spell-bound, mastered by it. Only once, in his great symphony in C, does he seem to grasp the means of freedom to be master of himself. Hence the prolixity so characteristic of his music. A great genius undoubtedly, of wonderful and inexhaustible invention, in whose mind melodies most exquisite sprung up and multiplied like wild flowers; yet you feel his genius falls far short of the sovereign power you own in Bach or Handel or Beethoven. There is a certain weakness, after all, in all his music (with the one exception above named), in spite of all its originality and marvellous wealth and variety of beauty. In the sense we have endeavored to express, nearer than Schubert to Beethoven Schumann seems to stand.

The "Midsummer Night's Dream" music is a soothing, lovely and delightful escort after any concert to home peace and rest. The overture, that wonderful inspiration of boy genius, is now sixty years old, yet sounds as fresh as ever played by such master musicians as control the vibrations of strings and wood and brass in this accomplished orchestra. The fine fairy figures of the violins, the exquisite opaline coloring of reeds and flutes, the warm, mellow tones of the horns, the honest pastoral discourse of the bassoons, the humorous allusions to the snore of the "translated" Bottom, the thumping, clumsy dance of clowns, all reproduce the dream of Shakspeare with the cleverness of genius. The Scherzo, too, a piece most difficult of execution, went to a charm. The sweet and dreamy musing melody, in which the horns are always prominent, of the Notturno sang itself most sweetly. And never have we heard the Wedding March given with more royal festal pomp and splendor.

When played like that, it is the most exciting and blood-tingling of all nuptial music. Can it ever fade to commonplace? Such strains might lift the gouty and rheumatic, even the paralytic, on their feet. It was a witching presentment of the fairy music. We only wondered that it did not include the Intermezzo, that fine piece of musical hide and seek, so vividly suggestive of the weary lovers pursuing each other blindly through the labyrinthine forest. Perhaps it would have made the concert too long.

Very different is the promise of this week's programme! Liszt's "Tasso," a new piano concerto composed and played by Richard Burmeister, and Raff's "In the Woods" symphony.

J. S. D.

[68]

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE AND BACCHANALE from "TANNHÆUSER."

PRIZE SONG from "DIE MEISTERSINGER."

Sig. CAMPANINI.

PRELUDE. "TRISTAN UND ISOLDE."

ALBUMBLATT for VIOLIN.

Mr. KNEISEL.

"SIEGFRIED'S PASSAGE TO BRUNNHILDE'S ROCK, MORNING DAWN AND RHINE JOURNEY," from "SIEGFRIED" AND "DIE GÖTTERDAMMERUNG."

(Arranged by Dr. HANS RICHTER.)

SIEGMUND'S LOVE SONG, from "DIE WALKURE."

Sig. CAMPANINI.

VORSPIEL. "DIE MEISTERSINGER."

---

our audience loves a programme of the best of music, however often heard before, works of genius, by the greatest masters, brought together with a poetic sense of true affinity and fitness. Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn, in three of their loveliest creations, works of uninterrupted and unsullied beauty! At the Friday afternoon rehearsal, when the furious snowstorm was at its height, many were turned away from the Music Hall for want of room; it was the largest, most enthusiastic audience of the season! And well might such a programme, composed of three works sure to give delight, sure not to offend or clog the most artistic taste, appeal to the best musical susceptibility of all of us. The three numbers were:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 8, in F.
Schubert—Symphony No. 8, in B minor (unfinished.)
Mendelssohn—Overture, Scherzo, Notturno and Wedding March, from the "Midsummer Night's Dream."

The shortest, lightest symphony of Beethoven is also the happiest, while at the same time it shows his ripest and most subtle art. It is full of sunshine. Written at the age of forty-two, in the summer of 1812, in perhaps the darkest period of his life, it seems the glad expression of a brief heavenly visitation to his grieved, long-suffering, clouded soul. His heart leaps up with a new-born joy and sense of health. He is a child once more in spirit, but with a man's self-knowledge and consummate art. This Eighth Symphony is pastoral, and it is fairy-like. It is in the key of F, like his Pastoral Symphony. It has phrases, figures, cadences reminding you of that.

With what an inspiring, pungent, penetrating and uplifting quality of sound, what perfect, lifesome harmony, the first theme sets in with full orchestra! How quickening, delightful bright and fresh the instrumentation! Have Berlioz or Wagner, with their crowded orchestras, surpassed or equalled that? Whenever the superiority of the most modern instrumentation is harped on in our hearing our thoughts go back to the first bars of the Eighth Symphony for a more perfect model which may be found anywhere in Beethoven. The buoyancy and blitheness of that opening seems to lift you from the earth. And the sure fulfilment of the promise as the idea unfolds, the exquisite beauty of the second subject, which comes in so soon, the striking figures of the accompaniment, the bold, strong passages out of which the sweet melodies melt again, the original, exciting working up, the satisfactory development and conclusion of the movement (allegro vivace e con brio) put one in the best mood for all that was to follow. It was all [illegible] the first strings, flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and brass, all clamoring admira ver popular Allegretto Scherzando, com- called the "clock" movement, was taken tempo which some would call ow. But the deliberate and regular of it soon wins upon the hearer. s, it must be considered, this is the only ch to a slow movement in the symphony. his is the place, if any, to resist "rapid tran- How fine and delicate the alternate stac- and legato of the violin! With what sweet nth of tone the wood-wind instruments and mingled! How much humor in it all, and most refined n quality! What free and hearty outburst of fortissimo at times!

The Minuet was naturally taken at the moderate rate of the old Tempo di Menuetto, and with the right nervous accent. But we could not account for the very marked reining in of the movement in the Trio, at the entrance of the fascinating horn theme, on the staccato triplets of the 'cello solo, followed by the fine lo of the clarinet. The finale, Allegro vivace, was played very fast, as it always is; that movement is as imaginative and fairy-like as anything of Mendelssohn's; and we soon had opportunity to make the comparison. The crepitant, crisp pianissimo of the opening and principal subject, the startling and mysterious entrance of a thundering C sharp in all the instruments, which leaves the basses rocking in octaves on the keynote (F), while the first theme is resumed fortissimo in the upper instruments; presently a new theme of entrancing beauty in A flat; a recurrence of the strange C-sharp unison; a passage of graver flowing melody of equal half-notes—these are a few salient points in the continual transformations of this wonderful movement, which never loses the thematic thread with which it opened. In "Oberon," in "Midsummer Night's Dream," no finer fairies tread the grass than here, none more Shakspearian.

If the eighth of Beethoven is all joy and sunshine, the eighth of Schubert, the "unfinished," is the musical expression of unconquerable sadness, "most musical, most melancholy." True, what lingers mostly in the memory after hearing is the comforting and cheering second theme in the Allegro, which enters in the 'celli, and is taken up more strongly in the violins,—a lovely theme with syncopated short-breathed accompaniment. The opening bars, a gloomy soliloquy of the deep basses, prelude to the melancholy first theme, sung by oboe and clarinet; then a loud outburst of despair; then this heavenly second theme in the major falls in like a godsend, comforting and clung to, taking possession (at least the second half of it) of all the orchestra. But in vain. After the repeat, the dark soliloquy of the basses comes back again; and the movement grows to a strong tragic climax, impatient and impassioned, struggling madly against fate, which prevails over the returning theme of comfort and all the sweet suggestions of the movement to the end. The music is extremely beautiful, but there is no victory, as there would certainly have been with Beethoven. The other movement, Andante con moto, in E, is also beautiful and touchingly pathetic, full of haunting bits of melody, now dying down to ppp, now swelling to overpowering climaxes, and ending gently at the close; but it has [illegible] sweeter and more [illegible] gloom of the Allegro. Why did he leave the symphony unfinished? Was it possible to finish it? To warrant a Minuet or Scherzo, and the bright solution of a Finale, the depressed and stricken spirit must first rise and overcome itself, shaking off its burthen. This a Beethoven would have done, with glorious sense of power. Beethoven himself, his soul, his will, his genius and his faith, you feel in all his music to be greater than his music, even at its greatest and sublimest reach. Schubert is possessed by his music, spell-bound, mastered by it. Only once, in his great symphony in C, does he seem to grasp the means of freedom to be master of himself. Hence the prolixity so characteristic of his music. A great genius undoubtedly, of wonderful and inexhaustible invention, in whose mind melodies most exquisite sprung up and multiplied like wild flowers; yet you feel his genius falls far short of the sovereign power you own in Bach or Handel or Beethoven. There is a certain weakness, after all, in all his music (with the one exception above named), in spite of all its originality and marvellous wealth and variety of beauty. In the sense we have endeavored to express, nearer than Schubert to Beethoven Schumann seems to stand.

The "Midsummer Night's Dream" music is a soothing, lovely and delightful escort after any concert to home peace and rest. The overture, that wonderful inspiration of boy genius, is now sixty years old, yet sounds as fresh as ever played by such master musicians as control the vibrations of strings and wood and brass in this accomplished orchestra. The fine fairy figures of the violins, the exquisite opaline coloring of reeds and flutes, the warm, mellow tones of the horns, the honest pastoral discourse of the bassoons, the humorous allusions to the [illegible] of the "translated" Bottom, the thumping, clumsy dance of clowns, all reproduce the dream of Shakspeare with the cleverness of genius. The Scherzo, too, a piece most difficult of execution, went to a charm. The sweet and dreamy musing melody, in which the horns are always prominent, of the Notturno sang itself most sweetly. And never have we heard the Wedding March given with more royal festal pomp and splendor.

When played like that, it is the most exciting and blood-tingling of all nuptial music. Can it ever fade to commonplace? Such strains might lift the gouty and rheumatic, even the paralytic, on their feet. It was a witching presentment of the fairy music. We only wondered that it did not include the Intermezzo, that fine piece of musical hide and seek, so vividly suggestive of the weary lovers pursuing each other blindly through the labyrinthine forest. Perhaps it would have made the concert too long.

Very different is the promise of this week's programme! Liszt's "Tasso," a new piano concerto composed and played by Richard Burmeister, and Raff's "In the Woods" symphony.

J. S. D.

[68]

UNION HALL, 18 BOYLSTON STREET.

SIXTH SEASON 1890-91.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. ARTHUR WHITING, Pianist.

III. CONCERT.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 29TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

ARTHUR WHITING. SONATA FOR PIANO AND VIOLIN, in G major. op. 7. (MS.)
Vivace. 6-4.
Larghetto. 4-4
Allegro Impetuoso. (alla breve).
(First performance.)

SCHUBERT. QUARTET-SATZ in C minor. (No. 9, Peters.)
(Allegro assai.)
(First time in Boston.)

BEETHOVEN. QUINTET in C major, op. 29.
Allegro moderato.—Adagio molto espressivo.—Scherzo.—Presto.
Second Viola: Mr. DANIEL KUNZ.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 30, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert of Last Evening.

It seems that the fates have decided that no season of the Kneisel Quartette concerts shall take place without at least one postponement or departure from the printed prospectus. Last night it was the severe cold of Mrs. Nikisch which occasioned this departure, and those who had waited with pleasant anticipation for the opportunity of hearing this attractive and popular lady were doomed to suffer from hope deferred. Fortunately, however, the indisposition had made its appearance early enough to be publicly announced, and most of the audience had been notified of the necessary change of programme. Besides there was abundant consolation in the always excellent work of the quartette itself, and the concert was a most attractive one even thus handicapped. Beethoven's quintette in C major, Schubert's single movement of a quartette, which he unfortunately never completed, and a new sonata for violin and piano by Mr. Arthur Whiting, with the composer at the piano, were surely enough for any but the most exorbitant auditor.

The merit of these works and of their execution was in the order given above, which reverses the order in which they appeared on the programme. This is tantamount to saying that the programme grew stronger as it progressed, and is emphatically true, for Mr. Whiting's sonata was at a terrible disadvantage heard in such company. It spoke of labor rather than of inspiration, and the study lamp seemed to shine through all its measures—the only thing that shone in the work. Ingenuity and skill and successful efforts at originality were there, but emotion had vanished, feeling had been smothered by the sonata form. It must be added, however, that the second subject of the finale was an exception to the generally spasmodic style, and had real beauty and tenderness. Mr. Whiting has done far better work than this, and this only made the disappointment in it greater. The unfinished quartette by Schubert is not quite such a gem as the unfinished symphony, but it is a beautiful movement, nevertheless. It attempts some very dramatic episodes, but the spontaneous Schubert melody is not lacking, nor the "heavenly length," either. It was finely played, the shading being marvellously effective.

But the crowning glory of the concert was the Beethoven quintette, op. 29. Never have the beauties of this rather slighted work been so thoroughly displayed in Boston. In the first movement the imitations of the chief figure were tossed from violins to cello, from cello to viola, with exquisite clearness, and the subsequent interweaving with the triplet figures (this latter theme is rather trivial in itself) was altogether charming, while the return of the chief theme interrupted by saucy little staccato notes in the accompaniment was very attractive. The adagio, the gem of the entire work, was perfect in every way, the acme of quartette playing. The scherzo is a less effective movement. It is interesting as being contemporaneous with Beethoven's Symphonic Scherzo—the first ever written—in the second symphony, and like that movement it is concise and not far remote from either the minuet or the two scherzos which Haydn had employed in his string quartettes; the first true scherzo came two years later, in the Heroic Symphony. The brunt of the work in the finale falls upon the first violin and the cello, who have some very rapid passages to execute, and right nobly did Messrs. Kneisel and Hekking fulfil their task; there was not a slip to excuse, not a blur to condone. Altogether it was the very best concerted playing one could expect to hear this side of Europe or heaven, and I doubt if it could have been excelled in the former place.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 30, 1890.

MUSIC.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The Kneisel Quartette, assisted by Mr. Daniel Kunz, viola, and Mr. Arthur Whiting, pianist, gave the third concert of the series at Union Hall last evening. The programme was as follows:

Sonata for pianoforte and violin in G major, op. 7 (MS.).....Arthur Whiting
(First performance.)
Quartette-Satz in C minor.....Schubert
(First time in Boston.)
Quintette in C major, op. 29.....Beethoven

Mr. Whiting's sonata for violin and pianoforte is an eminently serious work. It belongs to the modern school and to that branch of the modern school which is headed by Brahms. It has evidently been written with great care and with a high aim; it therefore should be treated with respect. It is in three movements—a vivace, a larghetto and an allegro impetuoso. In the first movement there is but little to arouse the imagination or gratify the ear. Neither the chief theme nor the side theme is well defined or beautiful, and, as is too often the case when the composer is a pianist, the pianoforte is greedy and claims the lion's share. The larghetto is more pleasing and more purely musical than either the first or third movement, although the beauty contained therein would not appeal to a careless or superficial hearer. It is free from passion; it is devoid of sensuousness. Its melody is suggested to the hearer instead of being clearly exhibited to him. The final movement, the allegro, contains a tune which is to be played with passion (according to the direction of the composer as expressed in the programme); but the emotions must be supplied by the performer and his imagination must be drawn upon, for the notes themselves are colorless notes and nothing more. The pianissimo close seems at first hearing illogical, which in a composition where intellectuality rises superior to spontaneous melody is a grievous fault. As a whole, the sonata, with the exception of the larghetto, is dry, and while one must often admire the skill of Mr. Whiting in putting his notes together, the hearer cannot be blamed for wishing that the notes had a more defined meaning. The sonata was admirably played by Mr. Kneisel and the composer.

The Schubert fragment, played here for the first time, is an extremely fascinating piece of music, which does not suffer from diffuseness and vain repetitions as do many of the Schubert allegros for strings. This composition and the noble quintette by Beethoven were played exceedingly well.

The next concert of the series will be given Jan. 26, 1891.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Daily Traveller

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1890.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Programme of Last Night's Concert.—The Star Course Entertainment.

The Kneisel programme was: Sonata for piano and violin, in G major, op. 7, Arthur Whiting; Quartet movement in C minor, Schubert; Quintet in C op. 29, Beethoven. Mr. Whiting's sonata was heard for the first time. It is scholastic, rather than emotional, music, but so well made as to command respect, and to deserve permanent place in the concert repertory. The slow movement is at once the most melodic and the warmest. Conciseness of treatment marks every portion of the work, but the composer's brevity is not a cloak for paucity of idea, he simply says what he desires without padding. There are frequent indications of originality in the harmonies used, and the themes themselves are serviceable. The balance between the instruments is well preserved, neither being unduly favored. The performance was earnest and effective, Mr. Kneisel and the composer being the players. The Schubert movement is from an unfinished quartet lately published by Peters, as No. 9. It is interesting, melodic, of course, but has no striking characteristics. The beautiful quintet was faultlessly played by the quartet and Mr. Daniel Kuntz. If Beethoven ever told a lie he did concerning the editions of this work, which was a subject of litigation in Vienna for something like 30 years.

The first of the extra afternoon concerts in the Music Hall, by the Symphony Orchestra, is announced for tomorrow, with a programme composed entirely of works by Richard Wagner. Italo Campanini and Franz Kneisel will be the solo performers, and this is the programme: Overture and Vermsburg Music from "Tannhäuser," Paris version; Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger"; Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"; Albumblatt, violin solo, Kneisel; Siegfried's Passage to Brünnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn, and Rhine Journey, from "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung," as arranged by Hans Richter; Love Song from "Die Walküre"; Vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger."

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1890.

Symphony Concert --- An Orchestral Programme.

The programme of the tenth Symphony concert was:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, in F.
Schubert, Symphony No. 8, in B minor (unfinished).
Mendelssohn, Overture, Scherzo, Notturno and Wedding March from the "Midsummer Night's Dream."

Of one tint, it is true, but a charming one. There is no alloy in the above, all is pure music, and its juxtaposition is a happy effort. And the playing was of the very best, barring some rough edges in the Mendelssohn music. Any performance of the Eighth Symphony brings up the everlasting subject of the proper tempi of the second and third movements. Those adopted by Mr. Nikisch at this concert gave the pianists no cause for alarm; the allegretto scherzando was read as if it were the slow movement, and the tempo di minuetto was taken in the tempo of a minuet. Mr. Seidl is probably the only conductor in this country who has attempted wide departures from the best usage regarding these movements; and after he treated the allegretto as if it were a presto, the minuet as a dirge, he was so unmercifully impelled by the best New York critics that he has not dared to repeat the feat. It is strange that Mr. Seidl should be so far astray, when Wagner, his idol in art matters, used invariably to conduct the third movement a minuet time. Mr. Nikisch in his readings of both these movements adopts Wagner's interpretation, which is traced from Beethoven through Richard Mendelssohn, and Spohr, who sat with the fiddles when the eighth was brought out.

When London Mendelssohn took the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture at what was probably an unprecedented tempo, demonstrated with, he explained his tempo by saying "he felt it that way." In the remark lies a profound contempt for the old fossils in music, who stick up on the metronome. On Saturday Mr. Nikisch felt it fast, but the delicate spirit of the picture was not lost. The scherzo was as skittish and graceful as could be asked. In the Nocturne Mr. Hackebarth played the violin solo with delicate perfectly. Of Schubert's "Unfinished" the vocabulary of praise has long since been exhausted in Boston. Throughout the concert there was a vast audience, and the lovers of music at this season of the year are not to be found in such numbers.

Richard Barmeister of Baltimore, will play his pianoforte concerto, which has been heard with pleasure in New York. The orchestra will play Liszt's "Tasso," and Raff's "Im Walde."

The Kneisel concert will be given without the assistance of Mrs. Nikisch, who, but for a severe cold, would have sung. At one of the later concerts of the series she will appear. Tonight's programme is made interesting because Arthur Whiting's new piano and violin sonata will be played; the performers will be Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Whiting. The quartet will play a novelty by Schubert, his quartet satz in C minor, one movement. The other ensemble number is Beethoven's quintet in C. At Mr. Baermann's concert the programme will consist of a Trio for Piano, Violin and 'Cello in C minor, op. 7, by H. von Sahr, and Brahms's Piano Quartet in A major, op. 26. Miss Franklin will sing the Beethoven song cyclus, "An die ferne Geliebte."

At last Mr. Nikisch will appear as a Wagner conductor. For some reason or other he has refrained from performing the works of the master he honors above all others; but on Wednesday full compensation will be made in the following amply sufficient programme: Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser" (Paris version); Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger" (Mr. Italo Campanini); Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde"; Albumblatt for Violin (Mr. Franz Kneisel); "Seigfried's Passage to Brünnhilde, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and Die Götterdämmerung" (Richter's arrangement); Siegmund's Love Song from "Die Walkure" (Mr. Campanini); Prelude, "Die Meistersinger."

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1890.

Local Announcements.

The first of the extra afternoon concerts in Music Hall, by the Symphony Orchestra, is announced for tomorrow, with a programme composed entirely of works by Wagner. Mr. Campanini and Mr. Kneisel will be the solo performers, and this is the programme: Overture and Venusberg Music from "Tannhäuser," Paris version; Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger"; Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"; Albumleaf, violin solo; Siegfried's Passage to Brünnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn, and Rhine Journey, from "Siegfried" and "Die Götterdämmerung"; Love Song from "Die Walküre"; Vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger."

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1890.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The patrons of the Kneisel quartet concerts enjoyed a very pleasing concert at Union Hall last evening, notwithstanding the disappointment caused by the postponement of the appearance of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch on account of her illness. The selections of the evening were the sonata for pianoforte and violin (MS.), Arthur Whiting; quartet-satz, Schubert, and quintet in C major, Beethoven, Mr. Whiting taking the pianoforte in his own composition. Much interest was naturally felt in the new sonata by Mr. Whiting, which had its first hearing on this occasion. It is a composition of excellent parts, tuneful and well written, giving ample evidence of the sterling worth of Mr. Whiting, both as a composer and musician. The sonata was played with fine effect, and the art of Mr. Whiting at the piano left no cause for adverse criticism upon its performance. The remaining compositions were well chosen, and Mr. Kneisel and his associates gave their usual [illegible] and critical endeavors in their [illegible]

[69]

UNION HALL, 18 BOYLSTON STREET.

SIXTH SEASON 1890-91.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, [illegible]

Mr. [illegible]

Mr. [illegible], Viola.

Mr. [illegible] HEKKING, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. [illegible], Pianist.

III. CONCERT.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 29TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

ARTHUR WHITING. SONATA FOR PIANO AND VIOLIN, in G major, op. 7. (MS.)
Vivace, G-4.
Larghetto, E-3
Allegro impetuoso, (alla breve).
(First performance.)

SCHUBERT. QUARTETT SATZ in C minor. (No. 9, Peters.)
(Allegro assai.)
(First time in Boston.)

BEETHOVEN. QUINTETT in C major, op. 29.
Allegro moderato.—Adagio molto espressivo.
Scherzo.—Presto.
Second Viola: Mr. DANIEL KUNZ.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1890.

Symphony Concert --- An Orchestral Programme.

The programme of the tenth Symphony concert was:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, in F.
Schubert, Symphony No. 8, in B minor (unfinished).
Mendelssohn, Overture, Scherzo, Notturno and Wedding March from the "Midsummer Night's Dream."

Of one tint, it is true, but a charming one. There is no alloy in the above, all is pure music, and its juxtaposition is a happy effort. And the playing was of the very best, barring some rough edges in the Mendelssohn music. Any performance of the Eighth Symphony brings up the everlasting subject of the proper tempi of the second and third movements. Those adopted by Mr. Nikisch at this concert gave the pianists no cause for alarm; the allegretto scherzando was read as if it were the slow movement, and the tempo di minuetto was taken in the tempo of a minuet. Mr. Seidl is probably the only conductor in this country who has attempted wide departures from the best usage regarding these movements; and after he treated the allegretto as if it were a presto, the minuet as a dirge, he was so unmercifully cudgelled by the best New York critics that he has not dared to repeat the jest. It is strange that Mr. Seidl should be so far astray, when Wagner, his idol in art matters, used invariably to conduct the third movement in minuet time. Mr. Nikisch in his readings of both these movements adopts Wagner's interpretation, which is traced back to Beethoven through Richard Pohl, Mendelssohn, and Spohr, who sat among the fiddlers when the eighth was first brought out.

Once in London Mendelssohn took the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture at what was probably an unprecedented rate; remonstrated with, he explained his tempo by saying "he felt it that way." In the remark lies a profound nugget for the old fossils in music, brought up on the metronome. On Saturday Mr. Nikisch felt it fast, but the delicious spirit of the picture was not marred. The scherzo was as skittish and frolicksome as could be asked. In the notturno Mr. Hackebarth played the horn solo well nigh perfectly. Of Schubert's "Unfinished" the vocabulary of praise has long since been exhausted in paying it tribute. Throughout the concert, which was heard by a vast audience, the work of the woodwind players was at [illegible] time. Because of his artistic re- [illegible] set in the Mendelssohn [illegible] never stood here-

Richard Barmeister of Baltimore, will play his pianoforte concerto, which has been heard with pleasure in New York. The orchestra will play Liszt's "Tasso," and Raff's "Im Walde."

The Kneisel concert will be given without the assistance of Mrs. Nikisch, who, but for a severe cold, would have sung. At one of the later concerts of the series she will appear. Tonight's programme is made interesting because Arthur Whiting's new piano and violin sonata will be played; the performers will be Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Whiting. The quartet will play a novelty by Schubert, his quartet satz in C minor, one movement. The other ensemble number is Beethoven's quintet in C. At Mr. Baermann's concert the programme will consist of a Trio for Piano, Violin and 'Cello in C minor, op. 7, by H. von Sahr, and Brahms's Piano Quartet in A major, op. 26. Miss Franklin will sing the Beethoven song cyclus, "An die ferne Geliebte."

At last Mr. Nikisch will appear as a Wagner conductor. For some reason or other he has refrained from performing the works of the master he honors above all others; but on Wednesday full compensation will be made in the following amply sufficient programme: Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser" (Paris version); Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger" (Mr. Italo Campanini); Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde"; Albumblatt for Violin (Mr. Franz Kneisel); "Seigfried's Passage to Brünnhilde, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and Die Götterdämmerung" (Richter's arrangement); Siegmund's Love Song from "Die Walkure" (Mr. Campanini); Prelude, "Die Meistersinger."

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1890.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The patrons of the Kneisel quartet concerts enjoyed a very pleasing concert at Union Hall last evening, notwithstanding the disappointment caused by the postponement of the appearance of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch on account of her illness. The selections of the evening were the sonata for pianoforte and violin (MS.), Arthur Whiting; quartet-satz, Schubert, and quintet in C major, Beethoven, Mr. Whiting taking the pianoforte in his own composition. Much interest was naturally felt in the new sonata by Mr. Whiting, which had its first hearing on this occasion. It is a composition of excellent parts, tuneful and well written, giving ample evidence of the sterling worth of Mr. Whiting, both as a composer and musician. The sonata was played with fine effect, and the aid of Mr. Whiting at the piano left no cause for adverse criticism upon its performance. The remaining compositions were well chosen, and Mr. Kneisel and his associates gave their usual conscientious and artistic endeavors in their performance. It is announced that Mrs. Nikisch will make her appearance at these concerts later in the season.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 30, 1890.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert of Last Evening.

It seems that the fates have decided that no season of the Kneisel Quartette concerts shall take place without at least one postponement or departure from the printed prospectus. Last night it was the severe cold of Mrs. Nikisch which occasioned this departure, and those who had waited with pleasant anticipation for the opportunity of hearing this attractive and popular lady were doomed to suffer from hope deferred. Fortunately, however, the indisposition had made its appearance early enough to be publicly announced, and most of the audience had been notified of the necessary change of programme. Besides there was abundant consolation in the always excellent work of the quartette itself, and the concert was a most attractive one even thus handicapped. Beethoven's quintette in C major, Schubert's single movement of a quartette, which he unfortunately never completed, and a new sonata for violin and piano by Mr. Arthur Whiting, with the composer at the piano, were surely enough for any but the most exorbitant auditor.

The merit of these works and of their execution was in the order given above, which reverses the order in which they appeared on the programme. This is tantamount to saying that the programme grew stronger as it progressed, and is emphatically true, for Mr. Whiting's sonata was at a terrible disadvantage heard in such company. It spoke of labor rather than of inspiration, and the study lamp seemed to shine through all its measures—the only thing that shone in the work. Ingenuity and skill and successful efforts at originality were there, but emotion had vanished, feeling had been smothered by the sonata form. It must be added, however, that the second subject of the finale was an exception to the generally spasmodic style, and had real beauty and tenderness. Mr. Whiting has done far better work than this, and this only made the disappointment in it greater. The unfinished quartette by Schubert is not quite such a gem as the unfinished symphony, but it is a beautiful movement, nevertheless. It attempts some very dramatic episodes, but the spontaneous Schubert melody is not lacking, nor the "heavenly length," either. It was finely played, the shading being marvellously effective.

But the crowning glory of the concert was the Beethoven quintette, op. 29. Never have the beauties of this rather slighted work been so thoroughly displayed in Boston. In the first movement the imitations of the chief figure were tossed from violins to cello, from cello to viola, with exquisite clearness, and the subsequent interweaving with the triplet figures (this latter theme is rather trivial in itself) was altogether charming, while the return of the chief theme interrupted by saucy little staccato notes in the accompaniment was very attractive. The adagio, the gem of the entire work, was perfect in every way, the acme of quartette playing. The scherzo is a less effective movement. It is interesting as being contemporaneous with Beethoven's Symphonic Scherzo—the first ever written—in the second symphony, and like that movement it is concise and not far remote from either the minuet or the two scherzos which Haydn had employed in his string quartettes; the first true scherzo came two years later, in the Heroic Symphony. The brunt of the work in the finale falls upon the first violin and the cello, who have some very rapid passages to execute, and right nobly did Messrs. Kneisel and Hekking fulfil their task; there was not a slip to excuse, not a blur to condone. Altogether it was the very best concerted playing one could expect to hear this side of Europe or heaven, and I doubt if it could have been excelled in the former place.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1890.

Local Announcements.

The first of the extra afternoon concerts in Music Hall, by the Symphony Orchestra, is announced for tomorrow, with a programme composed entirely of works by Wagner. Mr. Campanini and Mr. Kneisel will be the solo performers, and this is the programme: Overture and Venusberg Music from "Tannhäuser," Paris version; Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger"; Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"; Albumleaf, violin solo; Siegfried's Passage to Brünnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn, and Rhine Journey, from "Siegfried" and "Die Götterdämmerung"; Love Song from "Die Walküre"; Vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger."

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 30, 1890

MUSIC.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The Kneisel Quartette, assisted by Mr. Daniel Kunz, viola, and Mr. Arthur Whiting, pianist, gave the third concert of the series at Union Hall last evening. The programme was as follows:

Sonata for pianoforte and violin in G major, op. 7 (MS.).....Arthur Whiting
(First performance.)
Quartette-Satz in C minor.....Schubert
(First time in Boston.)
Quintette in C major, op. 29.....Beethoven

Mr. Whiting's sonata for violin and pianoforte is an eminently serious work. It belongs to the modern school and to that branch of the modern school which is headed by Brahms. It has evidently been written with great care and with a high aim; it therefore should be treated with respect. It is in three movements—a vivace, a larghetto and an allegro impetuoso. In the first movement there is but little to arouse the imagination or gratify the ear. Neither the chief theme nor the side theme is well defined or beautiful, and, as is too often the case when the composer is a pianist, the pianoforte is greedy and claims the lion's share. The larghetto is more pleasing and more purely musical than either the first or third movement, although the beauty contained therein would not appeal to a careless or superficial hearer. It is free from passion; it is devoid of sensuousness. Its melody is suggested to the hearer instead of being clearly exhibited to him. The final movement, the allegro, contains a tune which is to be played with passion (according to the direction of the composer as expressed in the programme); but the emotions must be supplied by the performer and his imagination must be drawn upon, for the notes themselves are colorless notes and nothing more. The pianissimo close seems at first hearing illogical, which in a composition where intellectuality rises superior to spontaneous melody is a grievous fault. As a whole, the sonata, with the exception of the larghetto, is dry, and while one must often admire the skill of Mr. Whiting in putting his notes together, the hearer cannot be blamed for wishing that the notes had a more defined meaning. The sonata was admirably played by Mr. Kneisel and the composer.

The Schubert fragment, played here for the first time, is an extremely fascinating piece of music, which does not suffer from diffuseness and vain repetitions as do many of the Schubert allegros for strings. This composition and the noble quintette by Beethoven were played exceedingly well.

The next concert of the series will be given Jan. 26, 1891.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Daily Traveller

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1890.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Programme of Last Night's Concert.—The Star Course Entertainment.

The Kneisel programme was: Sonata for piano and violin, in G major, op. 7, Arthur Whiting; Quartet movement in C minor, Schubert; Quintet in C op. 29, Beethoven. Mr. Whiting's sonata was heard for the first time. It is scholastic, rather than emotional, music, but so well made as to command respect, and to deserve permanent place in the concert repertory. The slow movement is at once the most melodic and the warmest. Conciseness of treatment marks every portion of the work, but the composer's brevity is not a cloak for paucity of idea, he simply says what he desires without padding. There are frequent indications of originality in the harmonies used, and the themes themselves are serviceable. The balance between the instruments is well preserved, neither being unduly favored. The performance was earnest and effective, Mr. Kneisel and the composer being the players. The Schubert movement is from an unfinished quartet lately published by Peters, nr. No. 9. It is interesting, melodic, of course, but has no striking characteristics. The beautiful quintet was faultlessly played by the quartet and Mr. Daniel Kuntz. If Beethoven ever told a lie he did concerning the editions of this work, which was a subject of litigation in Vienna for something like 30 years.

The first of the extra afternoon concerts in the Music Hall, by the Symphony Orchestra, is announced for tomorrow, with a programme composed entirely of works by Richard Wagner. Italo Campanini and Franz Kneisel will be the solo performers, and this is the programme: Overture and Vermsburg Music from "Tannhäuser," Paris version; Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger"; Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"; Albumblatt, violin solo, Kneisel; Siegfried's Passage to Brünhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn, and Rhine Journey, from "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung," as arranged by Hans Richter; Love Song from "Die Walküre"; Vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger."

[69]

Mr. Whiting's larger compositions include an overture, piano concerto, both of which have been performed in Boston, at Boston Symphony Concerts, and a piano trio. The new work played today is the latest product of his artistic deliberation. The first movement, Vivace, opens with the principal theme in the violin, which is repeated afterward in a somewhat broader manner by the piano. That instrument also introduces a modulating figure which appears frequently during the rest of the movement. The second subject, in E minor, is presented by the violin, and is followed by a codetta (scherzando) in E major. After repetition of the first part "development" proceeds with different phases of the principal subject, interspersed with the modulating figure. The "return" is brought about by a suggestion of the second subject and is continued with some variation of the original. The second movement, larghetto, is begun by the piano, with two measures of the theme which is carried on by the violin, and after a second subject (Piu Animato) is repeated with rhythmical variation in the piano part. The Allegro Impetuoso consists of a melody (appassionato) in the violin accompanied by the piano in sixteenth motion, followed by a second subject (12-8) and the development of the first. The movement ends with a part of the first period which diminishes in rhythm and dynamic power into pianissimo tranquillo.

The quartet movement by Schubert, numbered 9 in the Peters edition, was written in December, 1820, and was designed to be the first movement of a quartet in C minor. Brahms possessed the autograph manuscript, which included a few bars of an andante in A flat. Like the symphony in B minor, the quartet was never finished. The completed movement was published long after Schubert's death.

Beethoven was involved in an annoying controversy over an alleged spurious edition of the C major quintet. He wrote the work in 1802, for Count Fries, who in apparent good faith gave permission to publish it to the Vienna house of Artaria and Co. Beethoven himself had previously given Breitkopf and Härtel a similar privilege. When the Artaria edition appeared, Beethoven proclaimed in the Vienna papers that it was incorrect and calculated to do him harm as an artist. Thereupon Artaria and Co. issued an indignant reply, charging that their plates were from proofs corrected by Beethoven himself. The controversy waxed warm and finally reached the courts, where the Artarias evidently made the best showing, for Beethoven was summoned to retract his first published statement regarding the falsity of the Artaria edition. If he demurred, the courts assured the grieved publishers that "every assistance will be given to the plaintiffs to obtain legal redress." But Beethoven was an obstinate and a great man, and after twenty-four years the Artarias were still asking for justice of the Vienna Polizeyhochstelle. Perhaps Mr. A. W. Thayer's next volume of Beethoven's Life will tell us if they were successful. The work has been rightly named the "Storm Quintet." The autograph title on the MS. of this quintet, in the possession of Herr Paul Mendelssohn of Berlin, is simply "Quintetto da L. v. Beethoven, 1801." It was first published by Breitkopf and Härtel in December, 1802, and advertised, as arranged for four hands on the pianoforte, in the Intelligenz-Blatt of the Leipsiger Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung, for March, 1803.

One writer says of the quintet: "This remarkable production, which, had he given nothing else of the kind to the world, would have placed its author on a level with Mozart himself as a composer of chamber music, is marked "opus 29 in the catalogue of Beethoven's works. Written in 1802, about four years before the opera "Fidelio", it is the second, last and best of his quintets for stringed instruments. An interval of six years elapsed between the publication of the two quintets. The first appeared in 1796, and is principally distinguished by its third movement (quasi allegretto), a minuet with two trios, which may be regarded as the origin of the genuine scherzo before the Rubicon had been crossed that conducted Beethoven to a still more original and daring innovation. As a whole, however, the quintet in C is of a much higher stamp than its predecessor, and ranks among the capital works of the composer. Every one of the four movements is masterly; but perhaps the most interesting, and certainly the most striking and individual of the series, is the finale. Of this, one of Beethoven's most enthusiastic panegyrists speaks in the following strain:—"The finale is one of the most poetically fantastic conceptions of Beethoven. I have had twenty ideas of interpreting the sense of it, but find them all too mediocre to be submitted to the public. This marvelous presto is twice interrupted by an andante con moto scherzoso, of 18 bars, which the first time appears in A, and the second in C—a sort of recitative, casting as it were, defiance among the world of light-footed fairies." The episode, which the late Herr Lenz pictures to himself as "a kind of recitative, casting defiance among the world of light-footed fairies," does not make its début until the "free fantasia"—here a forcible and at the same time important element—is considerably advanced. It then comes forth, with the chief fiddle as interpreter; and if only by reason of its speaking melody and unpretentious character, easily gains its point. The theme, of bucolic character, tells its story simply enough. Some time before the coda and after the recapitulation of the chief themes and their tributaries, it appears again, now in C major, the primary key of the quintet, and loses none of its persuasiveness on that account. (First performance at Kneisel Concerts.)

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Kneisel Quartette Concert of Last Evening.

It seems that the fates have decided t no season of the Kneisel Quartette certs shall take place without at least postponement or departure from the nted prospectus. Last night it was the re cold of Mrs. Nikisch which occa-
ed this departure, and those who had ted with pleasant anticipation for the ortunity of hearing this attractive and ular lady were doomed to suffer from e deferred. Fortunately, however, the isposition had made its appearance
y enough to be publicly annced, and most of the audience
been notified of the necessary change programme. Besides there was abundant olation in the always excellent work
the quartette itself, and the concert
a most attractive one even thus handi-
ped. Beethoven's quintette in C
jor, Schubert's single movement of a rtette, which he unfortunately never pleted, and a new sonata for violin piano by Mr. Arthur Whiting, with composer at the piano, were surely ugh for any but the most exorbitant itor.

he merit of these works and of ir execution was in the order given ve, which reverses the order in which y appeared on the programme. This tantamount to saying that the pro-
mme grew stronger as it progressed, is emphatically true, for Mr. Whit-
's sonata was at a terrible disadvantage rd in such company. It spoke of labor her than of inspiration, and the study
p seemed to shine through all its sures—the only thing that shone the work. Ingenuity and skill and essful efforts at originality
e there, but emotion had vanished,
ling had been smothered by the sonata
n. It must be added, however, that second subject of the finale was an ption to the generally spasmodic style,
had real beauty and tenderness. Mr.
iting has done far better work than
, and this only made the disappoint-
t in it greater. The unfinished quar-
e by Schubert is not quite such a gem
the unfinished symphony, but it is a utiful movement, nevertheless. It at-pts some very dramatic episodes, but spontaneous Schubert melody is not ting, nor the "heavenly length," either.
was finely played, the shading being vellously effective.

ut the crowning glory of the concert
the Beethoven quintette, op. 29.
er have the beauties of this rather ated work been so thoroughly dis-ed in Boston. In the first movement imitations of the chief figure were d from violins to cello, from cello to a, with exquisite clearness, and the equent interweaving with the triplet ures (this latter theme is rather trivial itself) was altogether charming, while e return of the chief theme interrupted
by saucy little staccato notes in the accompaniment was very attractive. The adagio, the gem of the entire work, was perfect in every way, the acme of quartette playing. The scherzo is a less effective movement. It is interesting as being contemporaneous with Beethoven's Symphonic Scherzo—the first ever written—in the second symphony, and like that movement it is concise and not far remote from either the minuet or the two scherzos which Haydn had employed in his string quartettes; the first true
scherzo came two years later, in the Heroic Symphony. The brunt of the work in the finale falls upon the first violin and the cello, who have some very rapid passages to execute, and right nobly did Messrs. Kneisel and Hekking fulfil their task; there was not a slip to excuse, not a blur to condone. Altogether it was the very best concerted playing one could expect to hear this side of Europe or heaven, and I doubt if it could have been excelled in the former place.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1890.

Symphony Concert — An Orchestral Programme.

The programme of the tenth Symphony concert was:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, in F.
Schubert, Symphony No. 8, in B minor (unfinished).
Mendelssohn, Overture, Scherzo, Notturno and Wedding March from the "Midsummer Night's Dream."

Of one tint, it is true, but a charming one. There is no alloy in the above, all is pure music, and its juxtaposition is a happy effort. And the playing was of the very best, barring some rough edges in the Mendelssohn music. Any performance of the Eighth Symphony brings up the everlasting subject of the proper tempi of the second and third movements. Those adopted by Mr. Nikisch at this concert gave the pianists no cause for alarm; the allegretto scherzando was read as if it were the slow movement, and the tempo di minuetto was taken in the tempo of a minuet. Mr. Seidl is probably the only conductor in this country who has attempted wide departures from the best usage regarding these movements; and after he treated the allegretto as if it were a presto, the minuet as a dirge, he was so unmercifully cudgelled by the best New York critics that he has not dared to repeat the feat. It is strange that Mr. Seidl should be so far astray, when Wagner, his idol in art matters, used invariably to conduct the third movement in minuet time. Mr. Nikisch in his readings of both these movements adopts Wagner's interpretation, which is traced back to Beethoven through Richard Wagner, Mendelssohn, and Spohr, who sat during the fiddlers when the eighth was brought out.

Once in London Mendelssohn took the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture at a tempo was probably an unprecedented one. Remonstrated with, he explained his tempo by saying "he felt it that way." In the remark lies a profound contempt for the old fossils in music, who count up on the metronome. On Saturday Mr. Nikisch felt it fast, but the humorous spirit of the picture was not marred. The scherzo was as skittish and as fleet as could be asked. In the Nocturne Mr. Hackebarth played the violin solo well nigh perfectly. Of Schubert's "Unfinished" the vocabulary of praise has since been exhausted in other concerts. Throughout the concert, heard by a vast audience, the work of the woodwind players was at times of rare artistic re-

Richard Barmeister of Baltimore, will play his pianoforte concerto, which has been heard with pleasure in New York. The orchestra will play Liszt's "Tasso," and Raff's "Im Walde."

The Kneisel concert will be given without the assistance of Mrs. Nikisch, who, but for a severe cold, would have sung. At one of the later concerts of the series she will appear. Tonight's programme is made interesting because Arthur Whiting's new piano and violin sonata will be played; the performers will be Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Whiting. The quartet will play a novelty by Schubert, his quartet satz in C minor, one movement. The other ensemble number is Beethoven's quintet in C. At Mr. Baermann's concert the programme will consist of a Trio for Piano, Violin and 'Cello in C minor, op. 7, by H. von Sahr, and Brahms's Piano Quartet in A major, op. 26. Miss Franklin will sing the Beethoven song cyclus, "An die ferne Geliebte."

At last Mr. Nikisch will appear as a Wagner conductor. For some reason or other he has refrained from performing the works of the master he honors above all others; but on Wednesday full compensation will be made in the following amply sufficient programme: Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser" (Paris version); Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger" (Mr. Italo Campanini); Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde"; Albumblatt for Violin (Mr. Franz Kneisel); "Seigfried's Passage to Brünnhilde, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and Die Götterdämmerung" (Richter's arrangement); Siegmund's Love Song from "Die Walkure" (Mr. Campanini); Prelude, "Die Meistersinger."

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1890.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The patrons of the Kneisel quartet concerts enjoyed a very pleasing concert at Union Hall last evening, notwithstanding the disappointment caused by the postponement of the appearance of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch on account of her illness. The selections of the evening were the sonata for pianoforte and violin (MS.), Arthur Whiting; quartet-satz, Schubert, and quintet in C major, Beethoven, Mr. Whiting taking the pianoforte in his own composition. Much interest was naturally felt in the new sonata by Mr. Whiting, which had its first hearing on this occasion. It is a composition of excellent parts, tuneful and well written, giving ample evidence of the sterling worth of Mr. Whiting, both as a composer and musician. The sonata was played with fine effect, and the skill of Mr. Whiting at the piano left no cause for adverse criticism upon its performance. The remaining compositions were well chosen, and Mr. Kneisel and his associates gave the great [illegible] and artistic enjoyment in [illegible]

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1890.

Local Announcements.

The first of the extra afternoon concerts in Music Hall, by the Symphony Orchestra, is announced for tomorrow, with a programme composed entirely of works by Wagner. Mr. Campanini and Mr. Kneisel will be the solo performers, and this is the programme: Overture and Venusberg Music from "Tannhäuser," Paris version; Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger"; Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"; Albumleaf, violin solo; Siegfried's Passage to Brünnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn, and Rhine Journey, from "Siegfried" and "Die Götterdämmerung"; Love Song from "Die Walküre"; Vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger."

UNION HALL, 18 BOYLSTON STREET.

SIXTH SEASON 1890-91.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.
WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF
Mr. ERNST PERABO, Pianist.

IV. CONCERT.

MONDAY, JANUARY 26TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART. QUARTET in D minor. (K 451).
Allegro moderato.—Andante.—Menuetto.—Allegro ma non troppo.

RUBINSTEIN. SONATA for PIANO AND VIOLONCELLO in D major, op. 18.
Allegro con moto.—Major.—Allegretto.—D minor; with Alternativo (più mosso) D major and minor.—Allegro molto.—(finale).—D major.

SCHUBERT. TRIO for PIANO, VIOLIN and VIOLONCELLO, in B flat, op. 99.
Allegro moderato.—Andante un poco mosso.—Scherzo.—Rondo (Allegro vivace).

The Pianoforte used is a Chickering.

The next Concert will be given Monday, February 16.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Kneisel Quartette Concert of Last Evening.

It seems that the fates have decided t no season of the Kneisel Quartette
certs shall take place without at least postponement or departure from the nted prospectus. Last night it was the ere cold of Mrs. Nikisch which occa-
ed this departure, and those who had ted with pleasant anticipation for the ortunity of hearing this attractive and ular lady were doomed to suffer from e deferred. Fortunately, however, the isposition had made its appearance ly enough to be publicly annced, and most of the audience
been notified of the necessary change programme. Besides there was abundant
olation in the always excellent work
the quartette itself, and the concert
a most attractive one even thus handi-
ped. Beethoven's quintette in C
jor, Schubert's single movement of a rtette, which he unfortunately never pleted, and a new sonata for violin
piano by Mr. Arthur Whiting, with composer at the piano, were surely gh for any but the most exorbitant
itor.

he merit of these works and of r execution was in the order given ve, which reverses the order in which y appeared on the programme. This tantamount to saying that the pro-
mme grew stronger as it progressed,
is emphatically true, for Mr. Whit-
's sonata was at a terrible disadvantage rd is such company. It spoke of labor her than of inspiration, and the study
p seemed to shine through all its asures—the only thing that shone
the work. Ingenuity and skill and cessful efforts at originality
e there, but emotion had vanished,
ling had been smothered by the sonata
n. It must be added, however, that second subject of the finale was an ption to the generally spasmodic style,
had real beauty and tenderness. Mr.
iting has done far better work than
, and this only made the disappoint-
t in it greater. The unfinished quar-
e by Schubert is not quite such a gem
the unfinished symphony, but it is a utiful movement, nevertheless. It at-pts some very dramatic episodes, but spontaneous Schubert melody is not king, nor the "heavenly length," either.
was finely played, the shading being
vellously effective.

ut the crowning glory of the concert
the Beethoven quintette, op. 29.
er have the beauties of this rather ited work been so thoroughly dis-
ed in Boston. In the first movement imitations of the chief figure were ed from violins to cello, from cello to a, with exquisite clearness, and the equent interweaving with the triplet
ures (this latter theme is rather trivial itself) was altogether charming, while e return of the chief theme interrupted
by saucy little staccato notes in the accompaniment was very attractive. The adagio, the gem of the entire work, was perfect in every way, the acme of quartette playing. The scherzo is a less effective movement. It is interesting as being contemporaneous with Beethoven's Symphonic Scherzo—the first ever written—in the second symphony, and like that movement it is concise and not far remote from either the minuet or the two scherzos which Haydn had employed
in his string quartettes; the first true
scherzo came two years later, in the Heroic Symphony. The brunt of the work in the finale falls upon the first violin and the cello, who have some very rapid passages to execute, and right nobly did Messrs. Kneisel and Hekking fulfil their task; there was not a slip to excuse,
not a blur to condone. Altogether it was the very best concerted playing one could expect to hear this side of Europe or heaven, and I doubt if it could have been excelled in the former place.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1890.

Symphony Concert — An Orchestral Programme.

The programme of the tenth Symphony concert was:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, in F.
Schubert, Symphony No. 8, in B minor (unfinished).
Mendelssohn, Overture, Scherzo, Notturno and Wedding March from the "Midsummer Night's Dream."

Of one tint, it is true, but a charming one. There is no alloy in the above, all is pure music, and its juxtaposition is a happy effort. And the playing was of the very best, barring some rough edges in the Mendelssohn music. Any performance of the Eighth Symphony brings up the everlasting subject of the proper tempi of the second and third movements. Those adopted by Mr. Nikisch at this concert gave the pianists no cause for alarm; the allegretto scherzando was read as if it were the slow movement, and the tempo di minuetto was taken in the tempo of a minuet. Mr. Seidl is probably the only conductor in his country who has attempted wide departures from the best usage regarding these movements; and after he treated the allegretto as if it were a presto, the minuet as a dirge, he was so unmercifully engelled by the best New York critics that he has not dared to repeat the act. It is strange that Mr. Seidl should be so far astray, when Wagner, his idol in art matters, used invariably to conduct the third movement in minuet time. Mr. Nikisch in his readings of both these movements adopts Wagner's interpretation, which is traced back to Beethoven through Richard Wagner, Mendelssohn, and Spohr, who sat among the fiddlers when the eighth was first brought out.

When in London Mendelssohn took the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture at what was probably an unprecedented rate, remonstrated with, he explained his tempo by saying "he felt it that way." In the remark lies a profound respect for the old fossils in music, boiled up on the metronome. On Saturday Mr. Nikisch felt it fast, but the delicious spirit of the picture was not marred. The scherzo was as skittish and blossomy as could be asked. In the Notturno Mr. Hackebarth played the horn solo well nigh perfectly. Of Schubert's "Unfinished" the vocabulary of praise has long since been exhausted in its behalf. Throughout the concert, as heard by a vast audience, the wood-wind players was at the height of his artistic re-

Richard Barmeister of Baltimore, will play his pianoforte concerto, which has been heard with pleasure in New York. The orchestra will play Liszt's "Tasso," and Raff's "Im Walde."

The Kneisel concert will be given without the assistance of Mrs. Nikisch, who, but for a severe cold, would have sung. At one of the later concerts of the series she will appear. Tonight's programme is made interesting because Arthur Whiting's new piano and violin sonata will be played; the performers will be Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Whiting. The quartet will play a novelty by Schubert, his quartet satz in C minor, one movement. The other ensemble number is Beethoven's quintet in C. At Mr. Baermann's concert the programme will consist of a Trio for Piano, Violin and 'Cello in C minor, op. 7, by H. von Sahr, and Brahms's Piano Quartet in A major, op. 26. Miss Franklin will sing the Beethoven song cyclus, "An die ferne Geliebte."

At last Mr. Nikisch will appear as a Wagner conductor. For some reason or other he has refrained from performing the works of the master he honors above all others; but on Wednesday full compensation will be made in the following amply sufficient programme: Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser" (Paris version); Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger" (Mr. Italo Campanini); Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde"; Albumblatt for Violin (Mr. Franz Kneisel); "Seigfried's Passage to Brünnhilde, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and Die Götterdämmerung" (Richter's arrangement); Siegmund's Love Song from "Die Walkure" (Mr. Campanini); Prelude, "Die Meistersinger."

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1890.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The patrons of the Kneisel quartet concerts enjoyed a very pleasing concert at Union Hall last evening, notwithstanding the disappointment caused by the postponement of the appearance of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch on account of her illness. The selections of the evening were the sonata for pianoforte and violin (MS.), Arthur Whiting; quartet-satz, Schubert, and quintet in C major, Beethoven, Mr. Whiting taking the pianoforte in his own composition. Much interest was naturally felt in the new sonata by Mr. Whiting, which had its first hearing on this occasion. It is a composition of excellent parts, tuneful and well written, giving ample evidence of the sterling worth of Mr. Whiting, both as a composer and musician. The sonata was played with fine effect, and the aid of Mr. Whiting at the piano left no cause for adverse criticism upon its performance. The remaining compositions were well chosen, and Mr. Kneisel and his associates gave their usual [illegible] and artistic endeavors in their [illegible] it is announced that Mrs. [illegible] Jan. 26, when she will appear in these

---

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1890.

Local Announcements.

The first of the extra afternoon concerts in Music Hall, by the Symphony Orchestra, is announced for tomorrow, with a programme composed entirely of works by Wagner. Mr. Campanini and Mr. Kneisel will be the solo performers, and this is the programme: Overture and Venusberg Music from "Tannhäuser," Paris version; Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger"; Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"; Albumleaf, violin solo; Siegfried's Passage to Brünnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn, and Rhine Journey, from "Siegfried" and "Die Götterdämmerung"; Love Song from "Die Walküre"; Vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger."

The D minor quartet played to-day is one of the set of six dedicated to Haydn, Mozart's friend and teacher. Mozart sent with these, his finest quartets, a dedicatory letter in which he paid Haydn this tribute: "A father being resolved to send his children into the great world, thinks it his duty to entrust them to the protection and guidance of a very celebrated man at this time, who is also by good luck his best friend. Behold, then, celebrated man and very dearest friend, my six children! They are, it is true, the fruits of long and painful labor: nevertheless, the hope which several of my well-wishers hold out that this labor will nat have been altogether thrown away, encourages me, and I cradle myself with the flattering thought that these children will one day bring me consolation."

The D major Sonata of Rubinstein though a product of comparative youth, is, in spirit and treatment, amongst the most rigidly classical of Rubinstein's productions. The composer seems to have been under the influence of Mendelssohn at the time of writing it, and to this may be due a freedom from diffuseness, and a beauty of proportion not always met with in his later works. The violoncello starts the principal theme of the allegro without a note of preamble, and repeats it in the supertonic minor, according to a common classical usage. When the pianoforte takes up the subject it is not for the purpose of simple repetition but for brief development. Nothing could be simpler, or more transparently clear in manner and purport than this section of the movement, the general character of which is thus promptly determined. After a full tonic close, the 'cello introduces a tributary theme, more engagingly melodious than its principal. It is accompanied by the pianoforte with arpeggios for the right hand The composer very naturally dwells upon this pretty Mendelssohnian tune. He gives it intact to the pianoforte, and echoes of its first rhythmic figure are heard at the beginning of an obvious preparation for the entrance of the second subject proper. This though contrasting with previous themes in expression, is as sauve and graceful as the best of them and not less attractive by reason of its sweet seriousness. For the peroration of the first part, Rubinstein uses (piu mosso) the tributary subject working it up vigorously to a climax, and then rapidly subsiding in a passage leading to the usual repeat—a passage forcibly suggestive of one similarly employed in Schumann's pianoforte quintet. The second part begins its working-out with the leading theme, now in F major; first of all stating it without variation, and then enlarging upon a fragment treated in combination with the first phrase of the second subject. This is a very interesting and attractive feature in the movement. The tributary is next drawn upon for material; both instruments being very busy with its leading phrase, which appears over and over again, till the "working out" ends with a "pause" on the dominant of the primary key. At this point the 'cello has a cadence, ending with a series of rapid arpeggios, in the midst of which the principal subject returns. Obviously the device may have been suggested by a similar passage in Mendelssohn's violin concerto. The recapitulation, beginning thus, varies the original thematic order by removing the tributary from its place between the main subjects, and presenting it last of all. The materials of the coda (ending with a presto seven bars long) will instantly be recognized as drawn from both the first and second themes.

In the allegretto, we have a movement in aria form, noteworthy for a strong contrast between its principal theme and episode. The first is pastoral in character, and attracts by an easy flow of diatonic melody. Rubinstein developes his subject at considerable length, but in a manner so clear and straightforward that explanatory remarks and citations would be utterly superfluous. We pass on, therefore, to the episode (piu mosso), the key of which is not the relative major (F), but the tonic major (D). Now occurs the contrast before spoken of. The tripping six-eight rhythm disappears, and a subject of choral-like breadth and dignity is heard, attended by the 'cello with a continuous scale "figure." All the episode is taken up either by repetition of the foregoing, or by passages akin to it. The original theme presently returns, in due form; but is twice interrupted by that of the episode, as though the composer could not resist the charm of his later creation.

Differing from the movements preceding, the finale has a preambie, leading briskly to the principal subject, which preserves the diatonic character of the themes generally, and is as simple as though Haydn had written it in his most bucolic mood. The 'cello next has the melody (legato) in the same key, and then the whole is repeated, preamble and all, as though the composer found it very satisfying, which, indeed, it is after a lightsome fashion. Ending with a full tonic close, this section is followed by an episode in the relative minor, having a long-drawn theme, highly expressive and sympathetic in character. Its comparative staidness affords a needed contrast, and enables the composer to indulge in a bravura, chiefly based upon an ascending scale passage. The second subject, which follows, introduces a rhythmic form—the triplet—hitherto absent from the melodies with which, and a very brief codetta, the first part of the finale ends. All the foregoing is marked for repetition in accordance with the form adopted—that of a first movement. The "free fantasia," after a preamble for the pianoforte, opens with the leading theme, which is given at full length, beginning in B minor. But the most characteristic feature in this section is found when the composer treats the second subject (pianoforte.) with a warmth of feeling that almost rises to passion. This is followed by a lengthy treatment of the preamble. This leads to the recapitulation. Thenceforward only the familiar presents itself, but attention may be drawn to a particularly vigorous coda, which calls for effect upon the full compass of the instruments employed. (Compiled from Monday Popular programme.) First performance at Kneisel Concerts.

In the very exhaustive Life of Schubert, by Kreissle von Helborn, a few particulars are given about the trios—Schubert's only compositions of this class. That in B flat was composed in 1826 and is numbered op. 99. That in E flat (op. 100) was composed in November, 1827 and published in the following year. The autograph MS. is in the hands of the Countess Rosa von Almafy, at Vienna. Brahms is possessor of the composer's original sketch. "These two trios," says the biographer, "were among the few of Schubert's instrumental works that had the good fortune to be played during his lifetime, in public or private, by musicians attached to the composer, and able to do them justice; and they were received with great applause whenever performed. They were often played by Boclet at the pianoforte, Schuppanzigh (Beethoven's Schuppanzigh) at the violin, and Linke at the violoncello. Boclet was enthusiastic for Schubert; and at one of their meetings, in the house of Spaun, he knelt and kissed the hand of his hero, calling out to the company at the same time, that they did not know 'what a treasure they possessed in Schubert.'"

Schumann (Gesammelte Schriften. vol. I. p. 302,) wrote of the B flat trio: "One glance at this trio, and all the pitiful clouds of life disperse, and the world shines again as fresh and bright as ever. It is now some ten years since the first Schubert trio made its appearance, like a fiery messenger from the skies, and scattered all the petty musical troubles of the day. It was exactly his hundredth work, and very shortly after its publication, on the 19th of November, 1828, he died. The newly published one appears to be earlier in the date of composition, but it bears no marks of his earlier style, and was probably written only shortly before the other—the well known one in E flat (op 100.) Internally, however, they differ essentially. The first movement there was full of stern wraths and infinite regrets: here it is graceful, confiding, and girlish. The adagio in that was one long sigh, and enough for a breaking heart: in this it is a happy dream waving its wings in the varying current of sweet human feeling. The scherzos are much alike, but I give the preference to that in the E flat trio. On the last movement I withhold my judgment. In short, the E flat trio is busy, masculine, and dramatic; the B flat, sorrowful, lyrical, feminine. The new work is indeed a precious legacy. Many and beautiful as are the things which time brings forth, it will be long ere it produces another Schubert." Second performance at Kneisel Concerts

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1890.

Symphony Concert—An Orchestral Programme.

The programme of the tenth Symphony concert was:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, in F.
Schubert, Symphony No. 8, in B minor (unfinished).
Mendelssohn, Overture, Scherzo, Notturno and Wedding March from the "Midsummer Night's Dream."

Of one tint, it is true, but a charming one. There is no alloy in the above, all is pure music, and its juxtaposition is a happy effort. And the playing was of the very best, barring some rough edges in the Mendelssohn music. Any performance of the Eighth Symphony brings up the everlasting subject of the proper tempi of the second and third movements. Those adopted by Mr. Nikisch at this concert gave the pianists no cause for alarm; the allegretto scherzando was read as if it were the slow movement, and the tempo di minuetto was taken in the tempo of a minuet. Mr. Seidl is probably the only conductor in this country who has attempted wide departures from the best usage regarding these movements; and after he treated the allegretto as if it were a presto, the minuet as a dirge, he was so unmercifully pudgelled by the best New York critics that he has not dared to repeat the feat. It is strange that Mr. Seidl should be so far astray, when Wagner, his idol in art matters, used invariably to conduct the third movement in minuet time. Mr. Nikisch in his readings of both these movements adopts Wagner's interpretation, which is traced back to Beethoven through Richard Wagner, Mendelssohn, and Spohr, who sat among the fiddlers when the eighth was first brought out.

Even in London Mendelssohn took the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture at what was probably an unprecedented rate, remonstrated with, he explained his tempo by saying "he felt it that way." In the remark lies a profound respect for the old fossils in music, brought up on the metronome. On Saturday Mr. Nikisch felt it fast, but the delicious spirit of the picture was not marred. The scherzo was as skittish and frolicksome as could be asked. In the Notturno Mr. Hackebarth played the horn solo well nigh perfectly. Of Schubert's "Unfinished" the vocabulary of praise long since been exhausted in its behalf. Throughout the concert was heard by a vast audience, the woodwind players was at their best, and in the Mendelssohn

Richard Barmeister of Baltimore, will play his pianoforte concerto, which has been heard with pleasure in New York. The orchestra will play Liszt's "Tasso," and Raff's "Im Walde."

The Kneisel concert will be given without the assistance of Mrs. Nikisch, who, but for a severe cold, would have sung. At one of the later concerts of the series she will appear. Tonight's programme is made interesting because Arthur Whiting's new piano and violin sonata will be played; the performers will be Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Whiting. The quartet will play a novelty by Schubert, his quartet satz in C minor, one movement. The other ensemble number is Beethoven's quintet in C. At Mr. Baermann's concert the programme will consist of a Trio for Piano, Violin and 'Cello in C minor, op. 7, by H. von Sahr, and Brahms's Piano Quartet in A major, op. 26. Miss Franklin will sing the Beethoven song cyclus, "An die ferne Geliebte."

At last Mr. Nikisch will appear as a Wagner conductor. For some reason or other he has refrained from performing the works of the master he honors above all others; but on Wednesday full compensation will be made in the following amply sufficient programme: Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser" (Paris version); Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger" (Mr. Italo Campanini); Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde"; Albumblatt for Violin (Mr. Franz Kneisel); "Seigfried's Passage to Brünnhilde, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and Die Götterdämmerung" (Richter's arrangement); Siegmund's Love Song from "Die Walkure" (Mr. Campanini); Prelude, "Die Meistersinger."

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1890.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The patrons of the Kneisel quartet concerts enjoyed a very pleasing concert at Union Hall last evening, notwithstanding the disappointment caused by the postponement of the appearance of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch on account of her illness. The selections of the evening were the sonata for pianoforte and violin(MS.), Arthur Whiting; quartet-satz, Schubert, and quintet in C major, Beethoven, Mr. Whiting taking the pianoforte in his own composition. Much interest was naturally felt in the new sonata by Mr. Whiting, which had its first hearing on this occasion. It is a composition of excellent parts, tuneful and well written, giving ample evidence of the sterling worth of Mr. Whiting, both as a composer and musician. The sonata was played with fine effect, and the art of Mr. Whiting at the piano left no cause for adverse criticism upon its performance. The remaining compositions were well chosen, and Mr. Kneisel and his associates gave their usual fine renditions and artistic endeavors in their [illegible] It is announced that Mrs. [illegible] her appearance at these

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert of Last Evening.

It seems that the fates have decided that no season of the Kneisel Quartette concerts shall take place without at least the postponement or departure from the printed prospectus. Last night it was the severe cold of Mrs. Nikisch which occasioned this departure, and those who had waited with pleasant anticipation for the opportunity of hearing this attractive and popular lady were doomed to suffer from hope deferred. Fortunately, however, the indisposition had made its appearance early enough to be publicly announced, and most of the audience had been notified of the necessary change of programme. Besides there was abundant consolation in the always excellent work of the quartette itself, and the concert was a most attractive one even thus handicapped. Beethoven's quintette in C major, Schubert's single movement of a quartette, which he unfortunately never completed, and a new sonata for violin and piano by Mr. Arthur Whiting, with the composer at the piano, were surely enough for any but the most exorbitant auditor.

The merit of these works and of their execution was in the order given above, which reverses the order in which they appeared on the programme. This is tantamount to saying that the programme grew stronger as it progressed, and is emphatically true, for Mr. Whiting's sonata was at a terrible disadvantage heard in such company. It spoke of labor rather than of inspiration, and the study lamp seemed to shine through all its measures—the only thing that shone in the work. Ingenuity and skill and successful efforts at originality were there, but emotion had vanished, feeling had been smothered by the sonata form. It must be added, however, that the second subject of the finale was an exception to the generally spasmodic style, and had real beauty and tenderness. Mr. Whiting has done far better work than this, and this only made the disappointment in it greater. The unfinished quartette by Schubert is not quite such a gem as the unfinished symphony, but it is a beautiful movement, nevertheless. It attempts some very dramatic episodes, but the spontaneous Schubert melody is not lacking, nor the "heavenly length," either. It was finely played, the shading being marvellously effective.

But the crowning glory of the concert was the Beethoven quintette, op. 29. Never have the beauties of this rather slighted work been so thoroughly displayed in Boston. In the first movement the imitations of the chief figure were passed from violins to cello, from cello to viola, with exquisite clearness, and the subsequent interweaving with the triplet figures (this latter theme is rather trivial in itself) was altogether charming, while the return of the chief theme interrupted by saucy little staccato notes in the accompaniment was very attractive. The adagio, the gem of the entire work, was perfect in every way, the acme of quartette playing. The scherzo is a less effective movement. It is interesting as being contemporaneous with Beethoven's Symphonic Scherzo—the first ever written—in the second symphony, and like that movement it is concise and not far remote from either the minuet or the two scherzos which Haydn had employed in his string quartettes; the first true scherzo came two years later, in the Heroic Symphony. The brunt of the work in the finale falls upon the first violin and the cello, who have some very rapid passages to execute, and right nobly did Messrs. Kneisel and Hekking fulfil their task; there was not a slip to excuse, not a blur to condone. Altogether it was the very best concerted playing one could expect to hear this side of Europe or heaven, and I doubt if it could have been excelled in the former place.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1890.

Local Announcements.

The first of the extra afternoon concerts in Music Hall, by the Symphony Orchestra, is announced for tomorrow, with a programme composed entirely of works by Wagner. Mr. Campanini and Mr. Kneisel will be the solo performers, and this is the programme: Overture and Venusberg Music from "Tannhäuser," Paris version; Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger"; Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"; Albumleaf, violin solo; Siegfried's Passage to Brünnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn, and Rhine Journey, from "Siegfried" and "Die Götterdämmerung"; Love Song from "Die Walküre"; Vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger."

THURSDAY MORNING, JAN. 1, 1891.

THE WAGNER MATINEE.

A concert at which only compositions by Wagner were heard was given yesterday afternoon at Music Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The solos were sung and played by Messrs. Campanini and Kneisel. The programme was as follows:

Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser." (Paris version.)
Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger."
Mr. Campanini.
Prelude—"Tristan und Isolde."
Albumblatt for violin.
Mr. Kneisel.
"Siegfried's Passage to Brunnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and "Die Götterdämmerung."
(Arranged by Hans Richter.)
Siegmund's Love Song, from "Die Walküre."
Mr. Campanini.
Vorspiel—"Die Meistersinger."

It is doubtful whether the so-called Paris version of the "Tannhaeuser" overture with the adjoined Bacchanale is so effective a concert number as the overture itself in its more familiar form; nor will the Bacchanale replace, so far as the concert public is concerned, the peroration with the return to the Pilgrim chorus. The music of this Bacchanale in the Venusberg is needlessly brutal and tiresome. Venus in the opera, as it is generally given, is a cold and eminently respectable woman, so far as the music is concerned; and the relations between her and the knight are, musically, platonic. But in this Bacchanale she is dragged in the mud; she is suddenly transformed and degraded into a Venus Pandemos. The drunken rabble defile her altar, and, hooting, choke her doves. Gounod has shown in "Philémon et Baucis" that a Bacchanale may be at the same time musical and delirious. The overture was effectively played, although the opening measures, the simple exposition of the Pilgrim chorus, were given with an exaggerated sentiment foreign to the notes and the poetical idea. It was loudly applauded.

The "Prelude" to "Tristan," with its endless repetitions of a short phrase, was not so well received, nor did it seem so effective a concert piece as when played at other times by this same orchestra. Wagner said, and his disciples repeat it after him with delight, that in this opera he made "a deliberate effort to be his unbridled self"; and the passion of the overture as well as of the opera is unnatural, feverish, bred in a hothouse. The whole story, so simple and so pathetic as told centuries ago, a tale worthy of the genius of John Ford, as treated by Wagner closely resembles an analytical study of diseased lust by the depraved and brilliant Catulle Mendès.

The selections from "Siegfried" and "Die Götterdämmerung" were most heartily applauded. It is a mistake to think that these excerpts lose by being played outside of the opera house. Such as have been chosen for concert use are generally glittering showpieces of gorgeous instrumentation; they often stun the hearer into meek approval; or they appease his fury by a comparative lull followed by a "prurient jingle." Now, when heard in their proper place in the opera house, if they are heard at the beginning of the opera, they are soon buried in the avalanche of dissonances and crass effects which slide upon the stage; or if they come later in the evening, the dulled ear is unable to take in even their most striking beauties. The surroundings and text have but little to do with their intrinsic faults or merits. For although the effect of operatic music is enhanced by the situation, it must be wretched stuff if it cannot delight or move in its naked simplicity. Noise is always noise, in opera or in the concert hall; an endless chain of dissonances becomes as monotonous as a long procession of tonic and dominant chords, and this is so whether they accompany dramatic action or serve merely as a concert number. High sounding titles attached to weak themes will not ennoble them, and the catalogue of motives cannot turn ugliness into beauty. The stolen sheep-bell remained a stolen sheep-bell, even when Randolph's mock Oberon described it as a "mellisonant tingle-tangle."

The final orchestral number was the "Meistersinger" overture, an overture to a comic opera in spite of its hair-raising progressions and charivari of counterpoint. All this commotion and straining and wringing of hands and shrieks to heaven simply serve as an introduction to a comic opera. Here, as Otto Gumprecht once remarked, Wagner uses cannon to kill sparrows and sets the world in flames that he may warm his hands.

Campanini, who was given a hearty welcome, sang first the Prize Song from the "Meistersinger," in the writing of which song Wagner, wishing to show his superiority over all other composers, deliberately followed in their footsteps; he forsook his theories, for in idea, structure and accompaniment it is at variance with them. And he was so delighted with it that he hinted at it, introduced it and referred to it throughout the opera. As a heavy diner-out, who, late in the evening, after incoherent babblings, lights by accident upon a brilliant and opportune jest and is so elated thereby that he repeats it at different stages of the conversation and often out of season. Campanini sang it delightfully, with purity of tone and with understanding, showing himself throughout the thorough artist. It has been shouted and roared and declaimed in this country by several of our German brethren; it has seldom been sung. He was heartily applauded; and after his exquisite singing of the "Love Song" from the "Walküre," he was twice recalled.

Mr. Kneisel gave the audience much pleasure by his charming performance of the "Albumblatt."

PHILIP HALE.

THURSDAY MORNING, JAN. 1, 1891.

The Wagner Concert at Music Hall Yesterday.

What an audience it was! Filling all the seats and a standing contingent even to the very doors! It is pleasant to note that the programme deserved such an attendance, and that it was rendered in a manner worthy of its contents. It began with the Paris version of the "Tannhauser" overture. If anything proves Wagner's loyalty to art this number does it. The "Tannhauser" overture had long been the favorite part of the whole opera with the public, and its most effective portion was the climax so grandly worked up by combining the theme of the "Pilgrim's Chorus" with the descending violin figures. But when in 1861 Napoleon III determined, at the instance of Princess Metternich, to give the opera with all possible effects, Wagner had become a disciple of the theories of Gluck, and believed that the overture should be incorporated with and lead directly into the opera it preceded, and therefore found that the successful work in question did not represent his ideas. It mattered not that the public admired it; it mattered not that he was making his début before a foreign and unfriendly nation, whose suffrages he had striven for through many years; the overture was untrue to his ideal and it must be altered! That the alteration was not an improvement does not militate against the composer, but rather pleads for him. The climax has been sacrificed to the Bacchanale; all honor to Wagner for the change, even while acknowledging it disadvantageous. The performance was a splendid one; not quite so perfectly balanced as the memorable one of a few years ago, but what it lacked in this direction it made up in additional fire and impetuosity. Thea same Campanini. It is with very real pleasure that I note that his voice has regained much of its old sweetness and beauty. Nevertheless I must ask why Mr. Nikisch consented to such a violation of the dramatic unities. A languishing, tender, lovesick Walther it was, in the "Preislied" (which was given in Italian) and Siegmund became an entirely Italianized swain in the famous "Love Song." If the latter had been "Salve Dimora" or even "Celeste Aida," the ineffable tenderness, the contrasts between fortissimo and mezza-voce would have been in place, but it was a sturdy Northern hero who loved combat rather than portamentos, clangor of arms rather than pianissimo effects, and the extreme delicacy of execution was misplaced. Nevertheless it is but just to notice that Sig. Campanini discarded the high note with which he ended the number a few years ago, and that, vocally speaking, his work was commendable and won great applause.

Mr. Kneisel played with great refinement an "Albumblatt" which is new to me; it probably dates from the Parisian period of the master's life, and is very sweet, with a "Raffs'-Cavatina" order of tenderness. It also won many plaudits.

Glorious altogether was the Richter arrangement of certain numbers from "Siegfried" and "Die Götterdammerung." What a story it all was, told in the most characteristic motives of the operas! "Siegfried's-horn" figure was the most prominent, but the Siegfried motive, the fire motive, the slumber motive, the figure of fate, and many others, combined to make a grand saga of heroic deeds. It was the full glory of modern music, and one can only commiserate those whom it bores or to whom it is incomprehensible, and when, at the end, the "Rhinefigure" led into the cry of "Rhinegold," and the "Walhalla motive" spoke of the loftiness of the gods, one could only feel the grandeur of the poet-composer and exclaim "Bravo Nikisch!" Altogether, the concert was one that must be classed as memorable, and the few technical flaws may well be forgotten in the poetry of the readings. LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Journal.
THURSDAY MORNING, JAN. 1, 1891.

The Wagner Matinee.

The Wagner concert given in Music Hall yesterday afternoon by the Symphony Orchestra, with Signor Italo Campanini and Mr. Franz Kneisel as soloists, was one of the most interesting musical events of the season. Every seat in the big hall was occupied, even to those on the stairs leading up from the stage, and every foot of available standing room was taken by an intelligent and refined audience. The work of the orchestra, under the baton of Herr Nikisch, was superb, giving a well-nigh perfect interpretation of the works of the great master. Campanini was in excellent voice, singing with much of his old-time power and sweetness and receiving enthusiastic recalls. Mr. Kneisel's playing was marked by the precision and skill which characterizes all of his work, and he received a recall. The programme, which was judiciously made up of selections from Wagner's most popular works and gave unmingled pleasure to the large audience, was as follows: Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser." (Paris version.) Prize song from "Die Meistersinger," Sig. Campanini; prelude, "Tristan und Isolde;" Albumblatt for violin, Mr. Kneisel; "Siegfried's Passage to Brunnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung" (arranged by Dr. Hans Richter); Siegmund's Love Song, from "Die Walkure," Sig. Campanini; Vorspiel, "Die Meistersinger."

The Wagner Matinee by the Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the extra concerts of the present season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, was given at Music Hall yesterday afternoon, the event being styled a "Wagner Matinee," and the programme made up from the concert repertoire of that composer's work, the several selections and the assisting artists being as follows:

Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhæuser."
Prize song from "Die Meistersinger."
Sig. Campanini.
Prelude, "Tristan und Isolde."
Albumblatt for violin.
Mr. Kneisel.
"Siegfried's Passage to Brunnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung."
Siegmund's love song, from "Die Walkure."
Sig. Campanini.
Vorspiel. "Die Meistersinger."

The attendance of the public left "no reasonable shadow of doubt" as to the amount of interest in, curiosity about or love for the Wagnerian school of composition among Boston music patrons. The hall was packed beyond even the biggest record of the Symphony rehearsals, and another equally big auditorium could have been filled by the disappointed seekers for admission. This being the case, it is useless to comment upon the character of the programme. Wagner was demanded, and Wagner has been supplied, and everybody ought to be satisfied.

Just how much real enjoyment was got from the concert is an open question, but the applause was evidence in favor of the assumption that the performances of the day had been anxiously awaited by all present, and so it may be as well to concede that everything was as it should be, that nothing could have been bettered.

Mr. Nikisch rose to the occasion and, if his readings were not all that earlier hearings of the same numbers made desirable, he succeeded in giving satisfaction to the majority of his audience and won applause sufficient to justify his interpretations of the several compositions.

Some exceptions might be taken to the tame and spiritless reading of the great "Tannhauser" overture and to the lack of clearness in the interpretation of the "Tristan and Isolde" prelude might also be objected to. The arrangement of the scenes from "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung" made by Richter, and the great "Meistersinger" prelude were, however, played in such a masterly fashion that the lesser success of the earlier orchestral numbers was almost forgotten and the satisfactory impression left by the "Meistersinger" prelude resulted in gaining a great ovation for the conductor as he concluded his arduous afternoon's task.

Sig. Campanini has good cause to feel at home before a Boston audience, and he again had an unmistakable demonstration of his popularity with the local public when he entered to sing the "Prize Song." Despite his unfamiliarity with the style of the composition, he gave a large degree of satisfaction in its delivery, his interpretation of the number being that to be expected from such a competent vocalist and musician. It was in the flowing measures of Siegmund's "Love Song," however, that the popular tenor made his greatest success, and he charmed his audience and delighted all by his thoroughly artistic singing of the number, winning repeated recalls following its completion.

Mr. Kneisel gave his best work to the playing of the "Albumblatt," and won a hearty round of applause at its conclusion.

Boston Daily Globe.
THURSDAY, JAN. 1.
MINIATURE ALMANAC.....Jan. 1

IN WAGNER MUSIC ONLY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, With Campanini and Kneisel.

A special concert made up exclusively of Wagner music attracted to Music Hall, yesterday afternoon, one of the season's largest and most brilliant audiences. That noted lyric tenor, Signor Campanini, who has always shown peculiar appreciation for the "Master of Bayreuth," sang the prize song from "The Mastersingers," and added later Siegmund's song of love and spring from "The Valkyries." Both selections were given with purity and fervor, and the artist won all his recalls. A dainty "Album blatt," played with the utmost expression, gained warm plaudits for Mr. Kneisel, who shared with Campanini the solo honors of the occasion.

But it is in the admirable achievements of the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Mr. Nikisch to guide the forces, that one finds most to commend in reviewing this Wagner concert. The overture and bacchanal from "Tannhauser," as arranged for the Paris production, began the programme. With its curiously interwoven orchestration, the bacchanal addition to the familiar overture seemed to give the selection quite a new, distinct coloring—yet we must say we like the overture better as it is usually given, with the triumphant hymn of the pilgrims to round out its rhythms. The prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" was interpreted with dainty, poetic effect. Highest honors, however, were reserved for the performance of Richter's arrangement of scenes from the last two music dramas of the Nibelungen series.

Never was tone painting more brilliant or more vivid. The passage of the hero to Brunhilda's rock, the morning dawn scene and Siegfried's Rhine journey—all were presented with a delicacy of touch, a wealth of effect that held the great audience fairly enthralled. Although this will live longest in the memory of all who were present at the concert, yet the prelude to the "Mastersingers," which ended the programme, was superbly played, and the entire offering will rank among Mr. Nikisch's most artistic and complete successes in Boston.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 28.
HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

The Symphony Concerts.

The tenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was remarkably well attended despite the discouraging condition of the thoroughfares and the difficulty of street travel generally. The programme was strongly reminiscent of the era of the Harvard concerts, and had a not unpleasing novelty in the absence from it of the groping and unsatisfying music of the modern rhapsodic school. The work given were Beethoven's genial Symphony No. 8; Schubert's unfinished Symphony and the Overture, Scherzo, Nocturne and March from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" score. As will be seen, melody, clearness, grace and beauty were the characteristics of the music played. It was an evening of tune without a moment in it that any refined intelligence could not understand. Still, there was a little overmuch of it, and it barely escaped becoming cloying through lack of stronger contrasts than the selections presented. The Beethoven symphony was finely read and played, except in the case of the minuet, which was somewhat roughly played, and the trio suffered in effect, and lost grace and flow, owing to the unaccountably slow pace at which it was taken. The scherzando, however, was beautifully given, and the first and last movements could scarcely have been bettered in reading and execution. A more sympathetic interpretation of the lovely Schubert symphony than it received on this occasion could not be reasonably desired. The Mendelssohn music was also beautifully and brilliantly given. There were moments in the overture, where the theme of the fairy chorus recurs, when the violins failed to keep together, but otherwise the performance left nothing to wish for. The wood wind covered themselves with glory by the clearness, crispness and perfect technique with which they acquitted themselves in the sparkling and exacting scherzo. It was among the most faultless renderings of this difficult movement that we have ever heard. There was much applause through the concert, the Mendelssohn music receiving the most of it and the heartiest. At the next concert the programme is to be: Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Tasso"; a concerto for piano and orchestra by Richard Burmeister, the solo part to be played by the composer, and Raff's Symphony, "Im Walde."

At the Wagner matinee to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, on Wednesday afternoon, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will be performed selections from "Tannhauser" (Paris version), "Die Meistersinger," "Tristan and Isolde," "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung." Mr. Kneisel is to be a soloist, and will play an "Albumblatt." Sig. Italo Campanini will also appear as a soloist and sing twice. The occasion will doubtless attract a large audience of Wagner lovers and of Symphony concert patrons generally.

The third concert of the Kneisel Quartet will be given in Union Hall, tomorrow evening, with the following programme: Sonata, pianoforte and violin, by Arthur Whiting, (first time) the composer playing the piano part; a quartet by Schubert, and Beethoven's Quintet in E. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who was to have sung at this concert, is, unhappily, prevented by the severe cold, and will appear at a later concert in the same series. Those who have purchased tickets and wish to have their money refunded can apply at Music Hall.

The Beacon.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 3, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Last Saturday's programme was well made up, and if it was not all gay, it was surely all genial. It had no solo number, and its three parts were all familiar; but these were well arranged, Beethoven's eighth symphony, with its sturdy, sonorous animation and the lighter mood of its scherzo, being followed by the two ever beautiful movements of Schubert's "unfinished" symphony, and these in turn by the principal instrumental portions of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, ending with the wedding march. The performance had its moments of roughness and exaggeration, the Mendelssohn suffering particularly therefrom; but it might be considered upon the whole as satisfactory as any of [illegible] present season. Tonight, between two ant friends, Liszt's well worn "Tasso" poem [illegible] Raff's "In the Woods" symphony, will be [illegible] Mr. Richard Barmeister's new piano-forte concerto, of which the highest praise has been spoken and which the author will perform.

Boston Journal.
MONDAY MORNING, JANUARY 5, 1891.

The Symphony Concert.

At the concert Saturday evening Richard Burmeister of Baltimore was the soloist, playing a concerto for piano and orchestra of his own composition. Mr. Burmeister was heard a few years since in a piano recital in Bumstead Hall at an evident disadvantage. The concerto given Saturday evening is a work of much merit, requiring considerable virtuosity and a good technique to correctly interpret. All of this the composer possesses to a remarkable degree and his octave playing was clear cut and brilliant. The work is closely scored and the rendition gave much pleasure to the audience. Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso" opened the concert, and this with the concerto gave the audience sufficient of music for a single evening. But after all this Raff's symphony "Im Walde" was given to close the concert, and it was rendered in an admirable manner, though many left the hall before its close. At the next concert Mr. Adamowski is to be the soloist.

Boston Post

THURSDAY MORNING, JAN. 1, 1891.

THE WAGNER MATINEE.

A concert at which only compositions by Wagner were heard was given yesterday afternoon at Music Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The solos were sung and played by Messrs. Campanini and Kneisel. The programme was as follows:

Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhæuser."
(Paris version.)
Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger."
Mr. Campanini.
Prelude—"Tristan und Isolde."
Albumblatt for violin.
Mr. Kneisel.
"Siegfried's Passage to Brunnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and "Die Götterdämmerung."
(Arranged by Hans Richter.)
Siegmund's Love Song, from "Die Walküre."
Mr. Campanini.
Vorspiel—"Die Meistersinger."

It is doubtful whether the so-called Paris version of the "Tannhaeuser" overture with the adjoined Bacchanale is so effective a concert number as the overture itself in its more familiar form; nor will the Bacchanale replace, so far as the concert public is concerned, the peroration with the return to the Pilgrim chorus. The music of this Bacchanale in the Venusberg is needlessly brutal and tiresome. Venus in the opera, as it is generally given, is a cold and eminently respectable woman, so far as the music is concerned; and the relations between her and the knight are, musically, platonic. But in this Bacchanale she is dragged in the mud; she is suddenly transformed and degraded into a Venus Pandemos. The drunken rabble defile her altar, and, hooting, choke her doves. Gounod has shown in "Philémon et Baucis" that a Bacchanale may be at the same time musical and delirious. The overture was effectively played, although the opening measures, the simple exposition of the Pilgrim chorus, were given with an exaggerated sentiment foreign to the notes and the poetical idea. It was loudly applauded.

The "Prelude" to "Tristan," with its endless repetitions of a short phrase, was not so well received, nor did it seem so effective a concert piece as when played at other times by this same orchestra. Wagner said, and his disciples repeat it after him with delight, that in this opera he made "a deliberate effort to be his unbridled self"; and the passion of the overture as well as of the opera is unnatural, feverish, bred in a hothouse. The whole story, so simple and so pathetic as told centuries ago, a tale worthy of the genius of John Ford, as treated by Wagner closely resembles an analytical study of diseased lust by the depraved and brilliant Catulle Mendès.

The selections from "Siegfried" and "Die Götterdämmerung" were most heartily applauded. It is a mistake to think that these excerpts lose by being played outside of the opera house. Such as have been chosen for concert use are generally glittering showpieces of gorgeous instrumentation; they often stun the hearer into meek approval; or they appease his fury by a comparative lull followed by a "prurient jingle." Now, when heard in their proper place in the opera house, if they are heard at the beginning of the opera, they are soon buried in the avalanche of dissonances and crass effects which slide upon the stage; or if they come later in the evening, the dulled ear is unable to take in even their most striking beauties. The surroundings and text have but little to do with their intrinsic faults or merits. For although the effect of operatic music is enhanced by the situation, it must be wretched stuff if it cannot delight or move in its naked simplicity. Noise is always noise, in opera or in the concert hall; an endless chain of dissonances becomes as monotonous as a long procession of tonic and dominant chords, and this is so whether they accompany dramatic action or serve merely as a concert number. High sounding titles attached to weak themes will not ennoble them, and the catalogue of motives cannot turn ugliness into beauty. The stolen sheep-bell remained a stolen sheep-bell, even when Randolph's mock Oberon described it as a "mellisonant tingle-tangle."

The final orchestral number was the "Meistersinger" overture, an overture to a comic opera in spite of its hair-raising progressions and charivari of counterpoint. All this commotion and straining and wringing of hands and shrieks to heaven simply serve as an introduction to a comic opera. Here, as Otto Gumprecht once remarked, Wagner uses cannon to kill sparrows and sets the world in flames that he may warm his hands.

Campanini, who was given a hearty welcome, sang first the Prize Song from the "Meistersinger," in the writing of which song Wagner, wishing to show his superiority over all other composers, deliberately followed in their footsteps; he forsook his theories, for in idea, structure and accompaniment it is at variance with them. And he was so delighted with it that he hinted at it, introduced it and referred to it throughout the opera. As a heavy diner-out, who, late in the evening, after incoherent babblings, lights by accident upon a brilliant and opportune jest and is so elated thereby that he repeats it at different stages of the conversation and often out of season. Campanini sang it delightfully, with purity of tone and with understanding, showing himself throughout the thorough artist. It has been shouted and roared and declaimed in this country by several of our German brethren; it has seldom been sung. He was heartily applauded; and after his exquisite singing of the "Love Song" from the "Walküre," he was twice recalled.

Mr. Kneisel gave the audience much pleasure by his charming performance of the "Albumblatt."

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, JAN. 1, 1891.

The Wagner Concert at Music Hall Yesterday.

What an audience it was! Filling all the seats and a standing contingent even to the very doors! It is pleasant to note that the programme deserved such an attendance, and that it was rendered in a manner worthy of its contents. It began with the Paris version of the "Tannhauser" overture. If anything proves Wagner's loyalty to art this number does it. The "Tannhauser" overture had long been the favorite part of the whole opera with the public, and its most effective portion was the climax so grandly worked up by combining the theme of the "Pilgrim's Chorus" with the descending violin figures. But when in 1861 Napoleon III determined, at the instance of Princess Metternich, to give the opera with all possible effects, Wagner had become a disciple of the theories of Gluck, and believed that the overture should be incorporated with and lead directly into the opera it preceded, and therefore found that the successful work in question did not represent his ideas. It mattered not that the public admired it; it mattered not that he was making his début before a foreign and unfriendly nation, whose suffrages he had striven for through many years; the overture was untrue to his ideal and it must be altered! That the alteration was not an improvement does not militate against the composer, but rather pleads for him. The climax has been sacrificed to the Bacchanale; all honor to Wagner for the change, even while acknowledging it disadvantageous. The performance was a splendid one; not quite so perfectly balanced as the memorable one of a few years ago, but what it lacked in this direction it made up in additional fire and impetuosity. Then came Campanini. It is with very real pleasure that I note that his voice has regained much of its old sweetness and beauty. Nevertheless I must ask why Mr. Nikisch consented to such a violation of the dramatic unities. A languishing, tender, lovesick Walther it was, in the "Preislied" (which was given in Italian) and Siegmund became an entirely Italianized swain in the famous "Love Song." If the latter had been "Salve Dimora" or even "Celeste Aida," the ineffable tenderness, the contrasts between fortissimo and mezza-voce would have been in place, but it was a sturdy Northern hero who loved combat rather than portamentos, clangor of arms rather than pianissimo effects, and the extreme delicacy of execution was misplaced. Nevertheless it is but just to notice that Sig. Campanini discarded the high note with which he ended the number a few years ago, and that, vocally speaking, his work was commendable and won great applause.

Mr. Kneisel played with great refinement an "Albumblatt" which is new to me; it probably dates from the Parisian period of the master's life, and is very sweet, with a "Raffs'-Cavatina" order of tenderness. It also won many plaudits.

Glorious altogether was the Richter arrangement of certain numbers from "Siegfried" and "Die Götterdammerung." What a story it all was, told in the most characteristic motives of the operas! "Siegfried's-horn" figure was the most prominent, but the Siegfried motive, the fire motive, the slumber motive, the figure of fate, and many others, combined to make a grand saga of heroic deeds. It was the full glory of modern music, and one can only commiserate those whom it bores or to whom it is incomprehensible, and when, at the end, the "Rhinefigure" led into the cry of "Rhinegold," and the "Walhalla motive" spoke of the loftiness of the gods, one could only feel the grandeur of the poet-composer and exclaim "Bravo Nikisch!" Altogether, the concert was one that must be classed as memorable, and the few technical flaws may well be forgotten in the poetry of the readings.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY MORNING, JAN. 1, 1891.

The Wagner Matinee.

The Wagner concert given in Music Hall yesterday afternoon by the Symphony Orchestra, with Signor Italo Campanini and Mr. Franz Kneisel as soloists, was one of the most interesting musical events of the season. Every seat in the big hall was occupied, even to those on the stairs leading up from the stage, and every foot of available standing room was taken by an intelligent and refined audience. The work of the orchestra, under the baton of Herr Nikisch, was superb, giving a well-nigh perfect interpretation of the works of the great master. Campanini was in excellent voice, singing with much of his old-time power and sweetness and receiving enthusiastic recalls. Mr. Kneisel's playing was marked by the precision and skill which characterizes all of his work, and he received a recall. The programme, which was judiciously made up of selections from Wagner's most popular works and gave unmingled pleasure to the large audience, was as follows: Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser." (Paris version.) Prize song from "Die Meistersinger," Sig. Campanini; prelude, "Tristan und Isolde;" Albumblatt for violin, Mr. Kneisel; "Siegfried's Passage to Brunnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung" (arranged by Dr. Hans Richter); Siegmund's Love Song, from "Die Walkure," Sig. Campanini; Vorspiel, "Die Meistersinger."

BOSTON HERALD.

THURSDAY, JAN. 1, 1891.

The Wagner Matinee by the Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the extra concerts of the present season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, was given at Music Hall yesterday afternoon, the event being styled a "Wagner Matinee," and the programme made up from the concert repertoire of that composer's work, the several selections and the assisting artists being as follows:

Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhæuser."
Prize song from "Die Meistersinger,"
Sig. Campanini.
Prelude, "Tristan und Isolde."
Albumblatt for violin.
Mr. Kneisel.
"Siegfried's Passage to Brunnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung."
Siegmund's love song, from "Die Walkure."
Sig. Campanini.
Vorspiel. "Die Meistersinger."

The attendance of the public left "no reasonable shadow of doubt" as to the amount of interest in, curiosity about or love for the Wagnerian school of composition among Boston music patrons. The hall was packed beyond even the biggest record of the Symphony rehearsals, and another equally big auditorium could have been filled by the disappointed seekers for admission. This being the case, it is useless to comment upon the character of the programme. Wagner was demanded, and Wagner has been supplied, and everybody ought to be satisfied.

Just how much real enjoyment was got from the concert is an open question, but the applause was evidence in favor of the assumption that the performances of the day had been anxiously awaited by all present, and so it may be as well to concede that everything was as it should be, that nothing could have been bettered.

Mr. Nikisch rose to the occasion and, if his readings were not all that earlier hearings of the same numbers made desirable, he succeeded in giving satisfaction to the majority of his audience and won applause sufficient to justify his interpretations of the several compositions.

Some exceptions might be taken to the tame and spiritless reading of the great "Tannhauser" overture and to the lack of clearness in the interpretation of the "Tristan and Isolde" prelude might also be objected to. The arrangement of the scenes from "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung" made by Richter, and the great "Meistersinger" prelude were, however, played in such a masterly fashion that the lesser success of the earlier orchestral numbers was almost forgotten and the satisfactory impression left by the "Meistersinger" prelude resulted in gaining a great ovation for the conductor as he concluded his arduous afternoon's task.

Sig. Campanini has good cause to feel at home before a Boston audience, and he again had an unmistakable demonstration of his popularity with the local public when he entered to sing the "Prize Song." Despite his unfamiliarity with the style of the composition, he gave a large degree of satisfaction in its delivery, his interpretation of the number being that to be expected from such a competent vocalist and musician. It was in the flowing measures of Siegmund's "Love Song," however, that the popular tenor made his greatest success, and he charmed his audience and delighted all by his thoroughly artistic singing of the number, winning repeated recalls following its completion.

Mr. Kneisel gave his best work to the playing of the "Albumblatt," and won a hearty round of applause at its conclusion.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, JAN. 1.

MINIATURE ALMANAC.....Jan. 1

IN WAGNER MUSIC ONLY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, With Campanini and Kneisel.

A special concert made up exclusively of Wagner music attracted to Music Hall, yesterday afternoon, one of the season's largest and most brilliant audiences. That noted lyric tenor, Signor Campanini, who has always shown peculiar appreciation for the "Master of Bayreuth," sang the prize song from "The Mastersingers," and added later Siegmund's song of love and spring from "The Valkyries." Both selections were given with purity and fervor, and the artist won all his recalls. A dainty "Album blatt," played with the utmost expression, gained warm plaudits for Mr. Kneisel, who shared with Campanini the solo honors of the occasion.

But it is in the admirable achievements of the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Mr. Nikisch to guide the forces, that one finds most to commend in reviewing this Wagner concert. The overture and bacchanal from "Tannhauser," as arranged for the Paris production, began the programme. With its curiously interwoven orchestration, the bacchanal addition to the familiar overture seemed to give the selection quite a new, distinct coloring—yet we must say we like the overture better as it is usually given, with the triumphant hymn of the pilgrims to round out its rhythms. The prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" was interpreted with dainty, poetic effect. Highest honors, however, were reserved for the performance of Richter's arrangement of scenes from the last two music dramas of the Nibelungen series.

Never was tone painting more brilliant or more vivid. The passage of the hero to Brunhilda's rock, the morning dawn scene and Siegfried's Rhine journey—all were presented with a delicacy of touch, a wealth of effect that held the great audience fairly enthralled. Although this will live longest in the memory of all who were present at the concert, yet the prelude to the "Mastersingers," which ended the programme, was superbly played, and the entire offering will rank among Mr. Nikisch's most artistic and complete successes in Boston.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 28.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

The Symphony Concerts.

The tenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was remarkably well attended despite the discouraging condition of the thoroughfares and the difficulty of street travel generally. The programme was strongly reminiscent of the era of the Harvard concerts, and had a not unpleasing novelty in the absence from it of the groping and unsatisfying music of the modern rhapsodic school. The work given were Beethoven's genial Symphony No. 8; Schubert's unfinished Symphony and the Overture, Scherzo, Nocturne and March from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" score. As will be seen, melody, clearness, grace and beauty were the characteristics of the music played. It was an evening of tune without a moment in it that any refined intelligence could not understand. Still, there was a little overmuch of it, and it barely escaped becoming cloying through lack of stronger contrasts than the selections presented. The Beethoven symphony was finely read and played, except in the case of the minuet, which was somewhat roughly played, and the trio suffered in effect, and lost grace and flow, owing to the unaccountably slow pace at which it was taken. The scherzando, however, was beautifully given, and the first and last movements could scarcely have been bettered in reading and execution. A more sympathetic interpretation of the lovely Schubert symphony than it received on this occasion could not be reasonably desired. The Mendelssohn music was also beautifully and brilliantly given. There were moments in the overture, where the theme of the fairy chorus recurs, when the violins failed to keep together, but otherwise the performance left nothing to wish for. The wood wind covered themselves with glory by the clearness, crispness and perfect technique with which they acquitted themselves in the sparkling and exacting scherzo. It was among the most faultless renderings of this difficult movement that we have ever heard. There was much applause through the concert, the Mendelssohn music receiving the most of it and the heartiest. At the next concert the programme is to be: Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Tasso"; a concerto for piano and orchestra by Richard Burmeister, the solo part to be played by the composer, and Raff's Symphony, "Im Walde."

At the Wagner matinee to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, on Wednesday afternoon, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will be performed selections from "Tannhauser" (Paris version), "Die Meistersinger," "Tristan and Isolde," "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung." Mr. Kneisel is to be a soloist, and will play an "Albumblatt." Sig. Italo Campanini will also appear as a soloist and sing twice. The occasion will doubtless attract a large audience of Wagner lovers and of Symphony concert patrons generally.

The third concert of the Kneisel Quartet will be given in Union Hall, tomorrow evening, with the following programme: Sonata, pianoforte and violin, by Arthur Whiting, (first time) the composer playing the piano part; a quartet by Schubert, and Beethoven's Quintet in E. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who was to have sung at this concert, is, unhappily, prevented by the severe cold, and will appear at a later concert in the same series. Those who have purchased tickets and wish to have their money refunded can apply at Music Hall.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 3, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Last Saturday's programme was well made up, and if it was not all gay, it was surely all genial. It had no solo number, and its three parts were all familiar; but these were well arranged, Beethoven's eighth symphony, with its sturdy, sonorous animation and the lighter mood of its scherzo, being followed by the two ever beautiful movements of Schubert's "unfinished" symphony, and these in turn by the principal instrumental portions of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, ending with the wedding march. The performance had its moments of roughness and exaggeration, the Mendelssohn suffering particularly therefrom; but it might be considered upon the whole as satisfactory as any of e present season. Tonight, between two ant friends, Liszt's well worn "Tasso" poem l Raff's "In the Woods" symphony, will be Mr. Richard Barmeister's new pianoforte concerto, of which the highest praise has been spoken and which the author will perform.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, JANUARY 5, 1891.

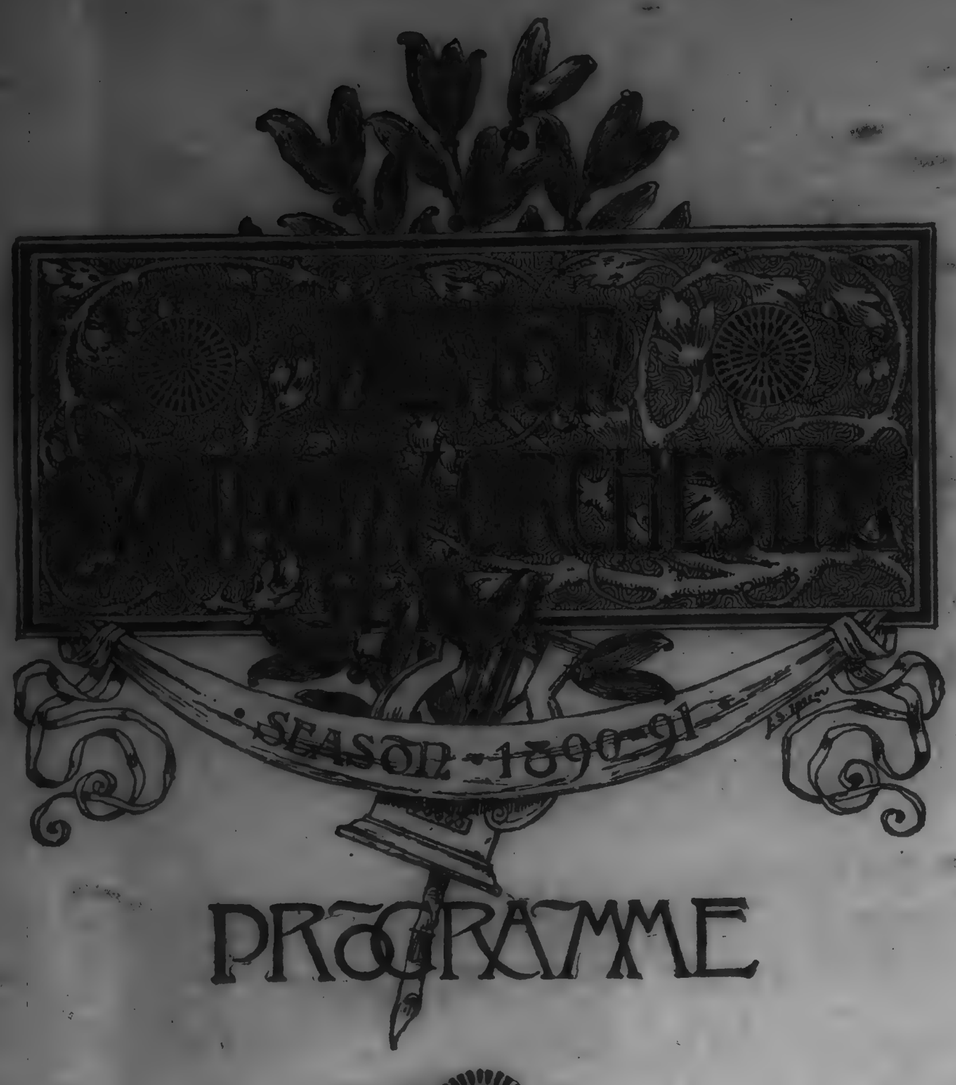
The Symphony Concert.

At the concert Saturday evening Richard Burmeister of Baltimore was the soloist, playing a concerto for piano and orchestra of his own composition. Mr. Burmeister was heard a few years since in a piano recital in Bumstead Hall at an evident disadvantage. The concerto given Saturday evening is a work of much merit, requiring considerable virtuosity and a good technique to correctly interpret. All of this the composer possesses to a remarkable degree and his octave playing was clear cut and brilliant. The work is closely scored and the rendition gave much pleasure to the audience. Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso" opened the concert, and this with the concerto gave the audience sufficient of music for a single evening. But after all this Raff's symphony "Im Walde" was given to close the concert, and it was rendered in an admirable manner, though many left the hall before its close. At the next concert Mr. Adamowski is to be the soloist.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Hyperion Theatre, - New Haven,

Monday Evening, Jan. 12, at 8.



PROGRAMME

3

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 4, 1891.

Symphony Orchestra Success

In giving the place of honor to Mr. Richard Burmeister another tribute of recognition to American talent has been paid by the director of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Although of German birth, Mr. Burmeister has for some time been associated with the work of musical education in Baltimore, where the concerto heard at last week's concert here was given its first performance. It has been brought out also in New York and Detroit, and a Leipsic hearing gained friendly criticism for the composer and his work.

An agreeable impression was certainly made by Mr. Burmeister's work here, although it can hardly rank either as very strong or very original. Of the four movements the intermezzo and the finale are the most pleasing, and on the whole the most skilfully put together. The composer himself took the piano part, and it must be said played with much too heavy a hand, often sacrificing expression to power in the andante as well as in certain passages of the finale. But in the two closing movements Mr. Burmeister was more fortunate, and there was a good deal of cordiality in the applause and recall after his performance.

Liszt's brilliant, sensuous and grandiose symphonic poem, "Tasso," was splendidly performed. It was the opening selection of the seventh concert programme, the closing number being Raff's symphony, "In the Forest." Here the orchestra showed new power in presenting delicacy of effect, and such artistic shading of tone as made the performance of the symphony a constant delight, even though it prolonged the concert considerably beyond the usual limits.

Timotheo Adamowski is to come forward as soloist this week. He will perform the Wieniawski concerto for violin in D minor, Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, Gade's ballad for orchestra, "The Mermaid One" and Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture will make the programme one of the most varied and comprehensive that Mr. Nikisch has presented here.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, JANUARY 4, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Richard Burmeister.

Director Arthur Nikisch of the Boston Symphony orchestra introduced Mr. Richard Burmeister to the patrons of the Symphony concert, last evening, as the piano soloist, and Mr. Burmeister improved the opportunity to introduce his own concerto for piano and orchestra to the audience as his contribution to the programme. With the army of pianists awaiting recognition at these concerts, it appears an easy matter to secure a more competent player than Mr. Burmeister, and

"There is no manner of doubt,
No probable, possible shadow of doubt,
No possible doubt whatever"

but that Mr. Burmeister could have found a more desirable composition to display his attainments as a pianist. As Mr. Burmeister is on the staff of the Peabody Institute of Baltimore, it may be assumed that his engagement as a soloist was made as a compliment to the musical public of that city, but this might have been more judiciously arranged by confining his appearance to Baltimore. He is evidently a conscientious player, who, in the mastery of the technique of his art, has lost sight of the equal desirability of other characteristics in his playing. He quite often forces his tone beyond a musical quality, and his playing is frequently lacking in clearness and brilliancy. He made his best effort in the astounding finale of the concerto, in which, although the solo player is heavily overweighted by the orchestra, he made a grand display of his technical attainments and ended his performance in a burst of musical pyrotechnics.

Unfortunately, Mr. Burmeister's sketch of the concerto was not received in time for publication in Mr. Wilson's analytical remarks upon the programme. With such a key to the work, its meaning and worth might be studied out, but a single hearing leaves the average music lover in a sad state of doubt as to what the aim of the composer was in framing his concerto. The work has been played in Detroit, New York and Leipsic, and now Boston can be added to the list as an indorsement for its future career.

Mr. Nikisch began his concert with a magnificent performance of Liszt's "Tasso," and ended it with Raff's "Im Walde" symphony, which was also grandly played, all of its tone pictures being painted with beautiful effects under the skilful direction of the conductor.

For next Saturday's concert the soloist will be Mr. T. Adamowski, violinist, the selections being Mendelssohn's symphony in A [illegible] concerto for violin in [illegible]

Boston Post.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 5, 1891.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the eleventh symphony concert, given at Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Symphonic Poem—"Tasso".....Liszt
Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in D minor.....Richard Burmeister
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 3—"Im Walde".....Raff

Liszt's "Lament and Triumph of Tasso" is, with the exception of "Les Préludes," the most popular of his Symphonic Poems. It is more familiar than many of the others; it is tuneful; it is more coherent, and it is comparatively well-knit: its instrumentation is diversified, interesting and brilliant. The mannerisms of Liszt, seen in all of his orchestral works, are recognized in this condensed biography of Tasso. We hear the familiar recitatives, the wailing dissonances, where woe is too often expressed by caterwauling; and at the end the carefully prepared "apotheosis," with its circus-pomp, its glitter of tinsel, its smell of sawdust. There is the inevitable preface which tells each hearer what he should applaud, if he wishes to be considered a man of taste and feeling. The same theme is used to represent in music opposite emotions: joy and desolation, victory and defeat. As in nearly all of his orchestral works, the hearer is led to suspect that while Liszt is apparently absorbed in his subject, he never forgets his audience. For so far as these Poems are concerned, he is seldom free from the charge of insincerity. Still, "Tasso" is a fascinating work, and in spite of the hero's orgulous bearing, his strut and posturing as he receives the crown to the accompaniment of the tarantara of trumpets and clash of cymbals, it is an effective number upon a concert programme.

A concerto in which the solo part is written for a pianoforte might well seem a pallid thing after the pin-wheels and Bengal lights of Liszt. It is no slight tribute to the composition and the composer, who played his own work, to say that, coming immediately after "Tasso," the concerto in D minor held the attention of the audience. It is an exceedingly interesting work, which opens with an impressive andante leading into an allegro full of thought. The themes are attractive, and they are carefully worked out. The allegro abounds in passages for the virtuoso's display; they are not foisted in but they have a right to be there. The close is singularly beautiful. Simpler in build and richer in poetic feeling are the two movements which follow. The lento, beginning with antiphonal passages for orchestra and pianoforte, is perhaps the most melodious of the four, and the intermezzo is peculiarly dainty and original. The finale which opens alla marcia is more conventional; the march movement is rather commonplace, and that which follows is the result of labor rather than inspiration. As a whole the concerto is very well written, with a nice sense of the proper relations between the solo instrument and the orchestra, while the instrumentation is discreet and often effective. It is the work of a talented musician, and the solo part was admirably and modestly played. Mr. Burmeister's technique is highly developed, his clearness, tone and bravura being all worthy of high praise. He has great strength and at the same time that exquisite delicacy which alone comes from strength, and which was so noticeable in the intermezzo. Such chord playing is heard too seldom; and although at times he came dangerously near pounding, these occasions were rare, and tone was not often driven into harshness. And it should be remembered that in a room of the size of Music Hall and in a modern concerto, which is unfortunately not unlike a duel to the death between a percussion instrument and an orchestra, the temptation to force the tone is almost irresistible. In speaking of Mr. Burmeister's playing it must be confessed that it is lacking in one important quality—sympathy. He was twice recalled.

The concert closed with Raff's "Im Walde" symphony, in which everything that has happened, happens or is likely to happen in a forest is portrayed with a Flemish minuteness of detail found only in the books of Thoreau or Thomas Hardy. With the exception of the first movement, it is rather an exhibition of dissolving views than a symphony. There are passages of great beauty in the first three movements; but in the finale, as Hanslick well says, he paints with so many colors and writes at such length that on account of the painting and poetry when the end comes we hardly know what music is. Raff, with all his gifts, his spontaneous melody, his mastery of counterpoint, his skill in expressing ideas in color, has not taken such firm hold upon the lovers of music as men less highly endowed who were not obliged to write so much and so hurriedly. He perhaps lacked concentration: he could not afford the time to gain it.

The playing of the orchestra, upon the whole, was excellent. The work of the strings was characterized by a refinement in piano passages which has during past concerts been sadly missed; the brass was more subdued, and even the heart of the relentless drummer was touched. The pianissimos were for once regarded.

The programme of the concert of next Saturday evening, Jan. 10, includes Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, Mackenzie's "La Belle Dame sans Merci," the Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," by Hector Berlioz, and Wieniawski's concerto for violin in D minor, the violin part of which will be played by Mr. T. Adamowski.

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 4.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Arthur Whiting and Mr. Daniel Kuntz, gave the third concert in this season's series, in Union Hall, on Monday evening. The programme was: Sonata for piano and violin, in G, op 7, by Arthur Whiting, (first time); Quartet-Satz in C minor, by Schubert (first time in Boston); and Quintet in C, op 29, Beethoven. Mr. Whiting's sonata is a carefully written work, but is labored and dry in effect, and does not gratify the interest on a first hearing. It is distinctly of the modern school, with a strong bias in the direction of its distaste for clearly defined melody and of its fondness for elaborate harmonic experiment and extreme thematic development. It has but few moments in which the ear is pleased or in which the understanding is not perplexed. It is music that is made with equal knowledge, correctness and industry, but it nowhere suggests spontaniety of sentiment or inspiration. The slow movement makes a more satisfactory appeal to the ear than does either of the other movements, but even here there is no warmth or flexibility in the music. The work is unquestionably well-made, but its meaning is not clear. Its performance by the composer and Mr. Kneisel left nothing to be wished for. The Schubert movement is full of charm, clear in design, delightful in effect, and without that heavenly, but often tiresome length to which the composer often spun out his ideas. It was played with exquisite taste and finish. The feature of the concert, and a work worth going miles to hear, was the noble Beethoven Quintet, decidedly one of the most beautiful, clear and glorious of Beethoven's masterpieces in chamber music for strings. From beginning to end it is delightful and satisfying in the hearing, and though it is prolific in the tunes and tunefulness despised of modern composers, it remains none the less a model that might be followed with advantage. There is no doubt here of the composer's intentions; there is also no lack of learning, but it is subordinated to the general design instead of becoming the design itself; here, too, is thematic development without stint, but it is not obtruded to the belittling of the thought of which it is an outgrowth; here also is exquisitely refined melody in abundance, the very soul of music, the reflection of that beauty which is the true aim of art, that gift, which those who possess it never despise, and which is only condemned of those who have it not. If the concert had presented no other work, those who attended would have been amply repaid. It was sympathetically read and was played with fine and impressive skill. The next concert in the series will be given Jan. 26.

On Wednesday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Nikisch, played a programme consisting wholly of music by Wagner. The audience filled the house to overflowing. The Paris version of the "Tannhauser" overture, the prelude to "Tristran and Isolde," selections from "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung," and the "Meistersinger" overture were the instrumental features of the programme. Hearing so much of Wagner's music at one sitting makes very clearly the narrow limitations within which the composer worked. It is all the same thing over and over again. A few bars of sensuous motive worked into very shreds by constant repetition; brutal cacophony; the apotheosis of dissonances; noise; instrumentation run wild; the ravings of a victim to musical brain fever; a minimum of beauty and a maximum of hideousness; glaring voluptuousness of color daubed on a canvas without regard to form, until the feverish hues become distracting in their persistent monotony. It is, so to speak, the work of a brawny musical bruiser, who, club in hand, resolves to belabor his hearer into admiration of his prowess. A sop, a very little sop, of tune is thrown in here and there by way of variety, and occasionally relief is afforded by the simple progression of the dominant to the tonic; but for the rest, the music suggests the vulgar nouveau riche, who covers himself with diamonds and fills his house with gorgeousness and glitter. After sitting out an hour and a half of such music, a mental dyspepsia sets in. It is a feast of indigestible plum cake, and depression follows. It was finely played, and no doubt intelligently interpreted. It was also evidently enjoyed by the audience, for they applauded heartily; but it is not a healthy musical taste that can find pleasure in art of this feverish, bombastic and lustfully lustful kind. Signor Campanini sang the Prize Song from "The Meistersinger," and the Love Song from "Die Walküre," and sang them exquisitely, with beautiful purity of tone and artistic warmth of style, the efforts being worthy of him in his most brilliant days. He was applauded with with great fervor and recalled after each song. Mr. Kneisel played an "Albumblatt" very beautifully, and was also heartily applauded.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Hyperion Theatre, - New Haven,

Monday Evening, Jan. 12, at 8.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 4, 1891.

Symphony Orchestra Success

In giving the place of honor to Mr. Richard Burmeister another tribute of recognition to American talent has been paid by the director of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Although of German birth, Mr. Burmeister has for some time been associated with the work of musical education in Baltimore, where the concerto heard at last week's concert here will have its first performance. It has been brought out also in New York and Detroit, and a Leipsic hearing gained friendly criticism for the composer and his work.

An agreeable impression was certainly made by Mr. Burmeister's work here, although it can hardly rank either as very strong or very original. Of the four movements the intermezzo and the finale are the most pleasing, and on the whole the most skilfully put together. The composer himself took the piano part, and it must be said played with much too heavy a hand, often sacrificing expression to power in the andante as well as in certain passages of the lento. But in the two closing movements Mr. Burmeister was more fortunate, and there was a good deal of cordiality in the applause and recall after his performance.

Liszt's brilliant, sensuous and grandiose symphonic poem, "Tasso," was splendidly performed. It was the opening selection of the eleventh concert programme, the closing feature being Raff's symphony, "In the Woods." Here the orchestra showed new keenness in presenting delicacy of effect, and such artistic shading of tone as made the performance of the symphony a constant delight, even though it prolonged the concert considerably beyond the usual limits.

Mr. Timothee Adamowski is to come forward as soloist this week. He will perform the Weniawski concerto for violin in D minor. Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, Mackenzie's ballad for orchestra, "The Merriest Fair One" and Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture will make the programme one of the most varied and comprehensive that Mr. Nikisch has presented here.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, JANUARY 4, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Richard Burmeister.

Director Arthur Nikisch of the Boston Symphony orchestra introduced Mr. Richard Burmeister to the patrons of the Symphony concert, last evening, as the piano soloist, and Mr. Burmeister improved the opportunity to introduce his own concerto for piano and orchestra to the audience as his contribution to the programme. With the army of pianists awaiting recognition at these concerts, it appears an easy matter to secure a more competent player than Mr. Burmeister, and

> "There is no manner of doubt,
> No probable, possible shadow of doubt,
> No possible doubt whatever"

but that Mr. Burmeister could have found a more desirable composition to display his attainments as a pianist. As Mr. Burmeister is on the staff of the Peabody Institute of Baltimore, it may be assumed that his engagement as a soloist was made as a compliment to the musical public of that city, but this might have been more judiciously arranged by confining his appearance to Baltimore. He is evidently a conscientious player, who, in the mastery of the technique of his art, has lost sight of the equal desirability of other characteristics in his playing. He quite often forces his tone beyond a musical quality, and his playing is frequently lacking in clearness and brilliancy. He made his best effort in the astounding finale of the concerto, in which, although the solo player is heavily overweighted by the orchestra, he made a grand display of his technical attainments and ended his performance in a burst of musical pyrotechnics.

Unfortunately, Mr. Burmeister's sketch of the concerto was not received in time for publication in Mr. Wilson's analytical remarks upon the programme. With such a key to the work, its meaning and worth might be studied out, but a single hearing leaves the average music lover in a sad state of doubt as to what the aim of the composer was in framing his concerto. The work has been played in Detroit, New York and Leipsic, and now Boston can be added to the list as an indorsement for its future career.

Mr. Nikisch began his concert with a magnificent performance of Liszt's "Tasso," and ended it with Raff's "Im Walde" symphony, which was also grandly played, all of its tone pictures being painted with beautiful effects under the skilful direction of the conductor.

For next Saturday's concert the soloist will be Mr. T. Adamowski, violinist, the selections being Mendelssohn's symphony in A (Italian), Wieniawski's concerto for violin in D minor, Mackenzie's "La Belle Dame sans Merci," a ballad for orchestra, and Berlioz' [illegible] Cellini."

Boston Post.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 5, 1891.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the eleventh symphony concert, given at Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Symphonic Poem—"Tasso".....Liszt
Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in D minor.....Richard Burmeister
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 3—"Im Walde".....Raff

Liszt's "Lament and Triumph of Tasso" is, with the exception of "Les Préludes," the most popular of his Symphonic Poems. It is more familiar than many of the others; it is tuneful; it is more coherent, and it is comparatively well-knit: its instrumentation is diversified, interesting and brilliant. The mannerisms of Liszt, seen in all of his orchestral works, are recognized in this condensed biography of Tasso. We hear the familiar recitatives, the wailing dissonances, where woe is too often expressed by caterwauling; and at the end the carefully prepared "apotheosis," with its circus-pomp, its glitter of tinsel, its smell of sawdust. There is the inevitable preface which tells each hearer what he should applaud, if he wishes to be considered a man of taste and feeling. The same theme is used to represent in music opposite emotions: joy and desolation, victory and defeat. As in nearly all of his orchestral works, the hearer is led to suspect that while Liszt is apparently absorbed in his subject, he never forgets his audience. For so far as these Poems are concerned, he is seldom free from the charge of insincerity. Still, "Tasso" is a fascinating work, and in spite of the hero's orgulous bearing, his strut and posturing as he receives the crown to the accompaniment of the tarantara of trumpets and clash of cymbals, it is an effective number upon a concert programme.

A concerto in which the solo part is written for a pianoforte might well seem a pallid thing after the pin-wheels and Bengal lights of Liszt. It is no slight tribute to the composition and the composer, who played his own work, to say that, coming immediately after "Tasso," the concerto in D minor held the attention of the audience. It is an exceedingly interesting work, which opens with an impressive andante leading into an allegro full of thought. The themes are attractive, and they are carefully worked out, The allegro abounds in passages for the virtuoso's display; they are not foisted in but they have a right to be there. The close is singularly beautiful. Simpler in build and richer in poetic feeling are the two movements which follow. The lento, beginning with antiphonal passages for orchestra and pianoforte, is perhaps the most melodious of the four, and the intermezzo is peculiarly dainty and original. The finale which opens alla marcia is more conventional; the march movement is rather commonplace, and that which follows is the result of labor rather than inspiration. As a whole the concerto is very well written, with a nice sense of the proper relations between the solo instrument and the orchestra, while the instrumentation is discreet and often effective. It is the work of a talented musician, and the solo part was admirably and modestly played. Mr. Burmeister's technique is highly developed, his clearness, tone and bravura being all worthy of high praise. He has great strength and at the same time that exquisite delicacy which alone comes from strength, and which was so noticeable in the intermezzo. Such chord playing is heard too seldom: and although at times he came dangerously near pounding, these occasions were rare, and tone was not often driven into harshness. And it should be remembered that in a room of the size of Music Hall and in a modern concerto, which is unfortunately not unlike a duel to the death between a percussion instrument and an orchestra, the temptation to force the tone is almost irresistible. In speaking of Mr. Burmeister's playing it must be confessed that it is lacking in one important quality—sympathy. He was twice recalled.

The concert closed with Raff's "Im Walde" symphony, in which everything that has happened, happens or is likely to happen in a forest is portrayed with a Flemish minuteness of detail found only in the books of Thoreau or Thomas Hardy. With the exception of the first movement, it is rather an exhibition of dissolving views than a symphony. There are passages of great beauty in the first three movements; but in the finale, as Hanslick well says, he paints with so many colors and writes at such length that on account of the painting and poetry when the end comes we hardly know what music is. Raff, with all his gifts, his spontaneous melody, his mastery of counterpoint, his skill in expressing ideas in color, has not taken such firm hold upon the lovers of music as men less highly endowed who were not obliged to write so much and so hurriedly. He perhaps lacked concentration: he could not afford the time to gain it.

The playing of the orchestra, upon the whole, was excellent. The work of the strings was characterized by a refinement in piano passages which has during past concerts been sadly missed: the brass was more subdued, and even the heart of the relentless drummer was touched. The pianissimos were for once regarded.

The programme of the concert of next Saturday evening, Jan. 10, includes Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, Mackenzie's "La Belle Dame sans Merci," the Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," by Hector Berlioz, and Wieniawski's concerto for violin in D minor, the violin part of which will be played by Mr. T. Adamowski.

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 4.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Arthur Whiting and Mr. Daniel Kunz, gave the third concert in this season's series, in Union Hall, on Monday evening. The programme was: Sonata for piano and violin, in G, op 7, by Arthur Whiting, (first time); Quartet-Satz in C minor, by Schubert (first time in Boston); and Quintet in C, op 29, Beethoven. Mr. Whiting's sonata is a carefully written work, but is labored and dry in effect, and does not gratify the interest on a first hearing. It is distinctly of the modern school, with a strong bias in the direction of its distaste for clearly defined melody and of its fondness for elaborate harmonic experiment and extreme thematic development. It has but few moments in which the ear is pleased or in which the understanding is not perplexed. It is music that is made with equal knowledge, correctness and industry, but it nowhere suggests spontaniety of sentiment or inspiration. The slow movement makes a more satisfactory appeal to the ear than does either of the other movements, but even here there is no warmth or flexibility in the music. The work is unquestionably well-made, but its meaning is not clear. Its performance by the composer and Mr. Kneisel left nothing to be wished for. The Schubert movement is full of charm, clear in design, delightful in effect, and without that heavenly, but often tiresome length to which the composer often spun out his ideas. It was played with exquisite taste and finish. The feature of the concert, and a work worth going miles to hear, was the noble Beethoven Quintet, decidedly one of the most beautiful, clear and glorious of Beethoven's masterpieces in chamber music for strings. From beginning to end it is delightful and satisfying in the hearing, and though it is prolific in the tunes and tunefulness despised of modern composers, it remains none the less a model that might be followed with advantage. There is no doubt here of the composer's intentions; there is also no lack of learning, but it is subordinated to the general design instead of becoming the design itself; here, too, is thematic development without stint, but it is not obtruded to the belittling of the thought of which it is an outgrowth; here also is exquisitely refined melody in abundance, the very soul of music, the reflection of that beauty which is the true aim of art, that gift, which those who possess it never despise, and which is only condemned of those who have it not. If the concert had presented no other work, those who attended would have been amply repaid. It was sympathetically read and was played with fine and impressive skill. The next concert in the series will be given Jan. 26.

On Wednesday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Nikisch, played a programme consisting wholly of music by Wagner. The audience filled the house to overflowing The Paris version of the "Tannhauser" overture, the prelude to "Tristran and Isolde," selections from "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung," and the "Meistersinger" overture were the instrumental features of the programme. Hearing so much of Wagner's music at one sitting makes very clearly the narrow limitations within which the composer worked. It is all the same thing over and over again. A few bars of sensuous motive worked into very shreds by constant repetition; brutal cacophony; the apotheosis of dissonances; noise; instrumentation run wild; the ravings of a victim to musical brain fever; a minimum of beauty and a maximum of hideousness; glaring voluptuousness of color daubed on a canvas without regard to form, until the feverish hues become distracting in their persistent monotony. It is, so to speak, the work of a brawny musical bruiser, who, club in hand, resolves to belabor his hearer into admiration of his prowess. A sop, a very little sop, of tune is thrown in here and there by way of variety, and occasionally relief is afforded by the simple progression of the dominant to the tonic; but for the rest, the music suggests the vulgar nouveau riche, who covers himself with diamonds and fills his house with gorgeousness and glitter. After sitting out an hour and a half of such music, a mental dyspepsia sets in. It is a feast of indigestible plum cake, and depression follows. It was finely played, and no doubt intelligently interpreted. It was also evidently enjoyed by the audience, for they applauded heartily; but it is not a healthy musical taste that can find pleasure in art of this feverish, bombastic and lustily lustful kind. Signor Campaninni sang the Prize Song from "The Meistersinger," and the Love Song from "Die Walküre," and sang them exquisitely, with beautiful purity of tone and artistic warmth of style, the efforts being worthy of him in his most brilliant days. He was applauded with with great fervor and recalled after each song. Mr. Kneisel played an "Albumblatt" very beautifully, and was also heartily applauded.

[71]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 4, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY.

THE CONCERT LAST EVENING AND OTHER MUSICAL EVENTS.

THE WAGNER MATINEE ON WEDNESDAY—THE BAERMANN AND KNEISEL CONCERTS—GENERAL MUSIC NOTES.

It is to be feared that the ranks of believers in the "grab-bag" theory, regarding the sometimes mysterious process of making up the symphony programme, were considerably augmented in numbers, after that of the eleventh rehearsal and concert had been carefully studied. It would be difficult to discover any logical reason for opening a concert with Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," and following it with a pianoforte concerto. It takes all the resources of a composer to produce a work of this latter class, that will hold its own in the large halls, and with the orchestras of today, and at the same time create a musical impression, instead of open-mouthed astonishment. Since the pianoforte possesses little enough power and tone color at best, it is hardly fair to saturate one's ears with music, almost every measure of which is like a drop of tobasco sauce, immediately before a performance upon that instrument. It may be said that there are modern overtures possessing similar properties; but there are few to be found equal in length, at least, to the Poem referred to. If there are they would be equally out of place, whether they were called overtures or rondos.

Mr. Richard Burmeister may congratulate himself, however, that his concerto stood this severe test nobly. The work may be called a show piece of the best sort. Recognizing the comparative ineffectiveness in such cases of scale and enpeggio passages, he has allowed octaves and chords to predominate; and in a manner, too, that requires great skill and enormous endurance to perform them successfully. The first and last movements, allegro maestoso and alla marcia, are written very broadly, and are full of the appassionato and impetuoso elements. With all the immense technical feats purposely contrived for the display of virtuosity, a distinctly musical intention is not only clearly evident in both, but well carried out. In form the work is strict rather than rhapsodical, and although the influence of Liszt is perceptible, the composer-pianist has a mind of his own, and is far from being a mere imitator. This is seen in the character of his themes, and in his masterly way of handling them. The lento movement, with its tranquil opening melody and animated episode is very attractive, and the light fanciful scherzando forms a bright link between it and the finale. The orchestration throughout is rich, tasteful, and not too ostentatious. Everything seems at first hearing in fine keeping with the general scheme of the work; and it all fits together as though an artist had designed and completed it.

Mr. Burmeister has played in Boston once before, when he gave a recital in the Meionaon. On that occasion he for some reason did not appear at his best, judging by this performance of his concerto. This time he proved himself a player of uncommon ability, regarded even from the high standpoint that so much technical proficiency at the present time forces the critic to assume. His touch is alive with nerve, refinement and power. He plays with great force without pounding, and in cantabile passages, light staccato runs, double-thirds, and the like, both musically and crisply. His chord and octave playing is remarkable for clearness and speed. Altogether, both concerto and performance may be set down as unusually fine.

Mr. Burmeister commanded the close attention of the audience, and was generously applauded. It is singular, by the way, that pianists are never permitted nowadays to perform a solo as a second number. Since singers have the privilege, it seems no more than just that players of instruments should be treated with equal generosity. Doubtless a large proportion of the attendants of the Symphony concerts, if they could voice their wish, would so express themselves.

"Tasso" was splendidly performed. Mr. Nikisch seldom, if ever fails to strike just the right key-note in works of this description. His keen sense of the dramatic leads him to invest every phrase with a meaning that is almost as vivid as vocal utterance; and the breadth of his musical comprehension enables him to weld them together in a manner wholly remarkable.

Raff's third symphony, "Im Walde," came last. Raff's bitter experiences with poverty invariably recall to mind Schubert's painful life. Fortunately for him, he lived later in the century, when such men as Liszt were ready and eager to lend a helping hand to struggling genius. When one realizes that Raff actually grubbed a living for years, and that he was about forty years old before his circumstances permitted him to take the time necessary to write the works of larger form that have made him famous, one marvels at their freshness of melody, beauty of design and perfection of workmanship. The "Im Walde" is always delightful to listen to. Age will not wither it for many years yet to come. That it was finely given goes without saying, and when mention is made of the exquisite horn playing, particularly that in the first movement, and the other bits of solos for oboe and clarinet, nothing more need be added.

THE WAGNER MATINEE.

It was a great event in the history of musical Boston, the Wagner concert, which was given by the Symphony Orchestra Wednesday afternoon. It commenced with the overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," as Wagner re-wrote it in 1861 for the Parisian performance that, after all, resulted in failure. While one misses the great effect produced by the return of the choral, the gorgeous elaboration of the Bacchanale music must be considered of far more artistic value. It is true, however, that the frequent suggestions of the "Nibelugen Ring" that are found in the new part of the score, are somewhat detrimental to the original character of the music. When performed as it was on this occasion, it makes a magnificent concert piece, hardly to be surpassed by any instrumental work or arrangement of Wagner's. The other orchestral numbers were the introduction to "Tristan and Isolde;" the arrangement by Hans Ritchter, as suggested by Wagner himself in which some of the purely instrumental portions of "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung" are brought together for concert use; and the overture to "Die Meistersinger."

The soloists were Signor Campanini, and Mr. Kneisel. It was a decided novelty to see an Italian surrounded by nearly a hundred German musicians, and to hear him sing to their accompaniment, the "Prize song" from Die Meistersinger, and Siegmund's love song, from Die Walkure. They were performances that gave great pleasure, too. The enthusiastic tenor, who has won so many laurels in his native fields, seemed really to enjoy the music, spite of its having no maccaroni in it, for he threw himself into his task to the full extent of his powers. Wagner wrote for German words; and naturally the brusqueness of that language was missed in the delightful cantabile singing, to use the expression in contradistinction to the generally labored and detached vocalization of the Wagnerian singer—of Campanini. His renderings were a little too sweet, as well; still his beautiful vocal work fully compensated for all shortcomings of interpretation.

Mr. Kneisel accomplished all that was possible with the commonplace, although undoubtedly Wagnerish, "Albumblatt," that was written for the piano, and arranged by Wilhelmj for the violin. It was curious to note its similarity of figure and melody at times to parts of the "Prize Song" and the "Ring."

As for Mr. Nikisch, if he never before demonstrated his genius for conducting, he did so this time, for good and all. As leader, he held the orchestra in absolute control; as interpreter, there are probably not half a dozen men in the world who could disclose the meaning of the works presented with such discrimination and magnificence. He conducted as one inspired; and his men fell with much apparent readiness into the same mood. Never have the horns sounded more perfectly. The clarinet player also surpassed himself, and Mr. Sautet, especially in "Tristan," played almost inimitably well. Throughout the concert there was no noise. There were heard no harsh blasts from the brass nor dull thumpings on the tympani.

It was a triumph of effect from a Bayreuth point of view. The hall was literally packed, every foot of standing-room being taken. The audience was thoroughly enthusiastic, and the efforts of conductor and soloists heartily recognized. It was a fine scheme to devote a concert exclusively to the works of one composer; for there is no surer way of laying bare his greatness (or littleness). Such a concert is worth, in real value, any number in which popular miscellaneous programmes rule. Now, let us have more of a similar kind, devoted to modern composers of Russia and other nationalities. And how about the American composer? Is he not worthy of the same recognition?

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The third concert was given in Union Hall last Monday evening, Mr. Arthur Whiting assisting. Without doubt the non-appearance of Mrs. Nikisch was the cause of much disappointment. It is to be hoped that she will have fully recovered from her indisposition before long. The programme was interesting in novelties. A new work by Mr. Whiting, a sonata for piano and violin, opus 7, was performed from manuscript, and an allegro movement of an unfinished quartet in C minor by Schubert, was played for the first time in Boston. The sonata proved to be more than creditable attempt in the direction of seriousness, breadth, and solidity. Its general style suggests Brahm's influence more than that of any other composer. In its construction evident care has been taken to make the work really a duo, and the piano part, while broadly written, is not, as modern works go, excessively elaborated. The first movement, vivace, was to us the most satisfactory in workmanship and musical effect. The Larghetto has a graceful, expressive opening theme, and the finale allegro impetuoso, has a good beginning, although the effect aimed at, in its pianissimo tranquillo ending was disappointing. In this respect, however, the composer must be applauded for having had the courage of his convictions, since a brilliant close would at least reach the public ear more instantaneously. The sonata was played with much spirit and finish by Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Whiting, and was cordially received.

The Schubert number immediately disclosed its parentage through the triplet figures, of which "the most poetical musician that ever was" was ever fond of making use in one way or another. It is written with uncommon conciseness, and is delightfully genial, although not for Schubert especially rich in fancy. The quartet played it in an exquisitely delicate manner, for which they were heartily applauded. Beethoven's quintet in C major, opus 29, was the closing number. In this work, its first three movements so like others of the same period, its finale so surprisingly different, Beethoven is thoroughly captivating. The opening allegro is distinctly reminiscent of that of the popular sonata for violin and piano, opus 24; and the beautiful adagio and jolly scherzo also have a familiar cast. But the presto is a bird of uncommon feather. In fancy and treatment, it is as novel and unconventional as its companion movements are the reverse; and its ethereal beauty and grace provoke the thought that it is somewhat out of its element as the closing movement of the work. Mr. Kunz was called upon to play the second viola part. The whole was finely played, with the exception of some of the scale figures of the presto, which were not rendered with the delicate clearness that was to have been expected. A remarkable bit of ensemble playing was heard in the closing detached chords of the adagio, which were given with wonderful accuracy and fineness.

T. P. CURRIER.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 4, 1891.

THE SYMPHONIES.

ELEVENTH CONCERT.

The following works were performed last evening in Music hall:

Liszt.....Symphonic Poem, "Tasso"
Burmeister, Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, in D minor.
Raff.....Symphony No. 3, "Im Walde"

The lack of either artistic or common-sense judgment in making out the above programme can not be denied. The chief absurdity was in placing at the end of a tediously long repertory one of the most charming and masterly works that was ever written for orchestra, namely, Raff's sympony "Im Walde." Few could have been in the right mood to appreciate the great work, and the many who left the hall before it began may well be congratulated, for the performance was anything but reproductive of the composer's intent, until the final allegro, which was both spiritedly and ably played. The performance of the opening allegro was inanimate and tame, while the enchanting "Twilight" music was so sentimentally interpreted that the performance dragged most somnolently.

The soloist for the concert was Mr. Richard Burmeister who performed his own Concerto in D minor. Of the work itself but little can be said, as the result of a single hearing. It is a profoundly conceived work and many of its themes are both pleasing and melodious; it is ably scored, too; yet how well it would sustain the test of repeated hearings it would seem unfair to affirm. Mr. Burmeister is unquestionably a musician of rare talent, not to say genius. As a pianist, too, he is uncommonly gifted. His abandon is masterly, and his command of a wide variety of technical difficulties can be highly praised. He also plays with much feeling and one might also add with artistic care, did he not so persistently avoid a true legato style. Mr. Burmeister was twice recalled with much enthusiasm at the conclusion of his masterly performance.

The symphonic poem with which the concert began was admirably played.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

Beethoven's quintette in C, a single movement from a quartette by Schubert, and a sonata for piano and violin by Arthur Whiting made up the programme for the Kneisel quartette concert in Union hall last Monday evening. The feature of the concert that was most eagerly awaited was the sonata by Whiting, and it but slightly disappointed. It is an ably constructed work; its themes, while somewhat lacking in musical interest, being one and all developed in a thoughtful and scholarly manner. The great work of the concert was the Beethoven quartette, op. 29. The occasion was not without its serious disappointment in the absence of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who but for a severe cold would have been present as announced and contributed a number of songs.

THE REGISTER.
NEW HAVEN
SUNDAY, JANUARY 4,

visited a great many of the scenes shown on the canvas and can testify to their wonderfully striking vividness of reality."

The Boston Symphony orchestra with its sixty odd musicians, will give the third concert of the series on the night of January 12, one week from next Monday. Herr Nikisch, who has shown himself in the last two concerts here to be an ideal, and almost it might be said inspired leader, will again wield the baton, and with its slightest motion control the small army of musicians as an organist controls the organ by means of its stops and keys. The orchestra's concerts have constantly gained in favor in this city, the first being marked by a fair attendance only, and the second being attended by a large number.

It is safe to say that the third of the series will draw the largest audience yet.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 5, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday—Mr. Burmeister as Soloist.

It may have been the length of the programme or it may have been that quality so dangerous to criticism, personal mood, that made a well played concert seem dull and at times flavorless. Yet it is certain that Liszt's "Tasso" does not wear well, not nearly as well as "Les Preludes" or the Gretchen movement of the "Faust" symphony. It serves, however, to pass the different departments of the orchestra in review before the auditor, for violins, cellos, flutes, clarinets, bass clarinet, oboes, trumpets, etc., each are given temporary prominence, and each was played in a masterly manner; more than this, the reading was the most excellent that I have heard of the work. The very first phrases were given with an elasticity like that of a recitative, and it is safe to predict from these that the last movement of the great ninth symphony will be very effective when Mr. Nikisch directs its wonderful contrabass passages in this free vein. All the many changes of tempo were well contrasted and given with unity, while the pompous apotheosis which ended the work was performed with appropriate magniloquence. But the themes grow stale in the using; when once the element of surprise has passed away the work is not interesting; familiarity breeds, if not contempt, at least satiety, and the overladen parts are like musical hasheesh, and leave an unpleasant taste behind them.

A new work followed, that is chronologically speaking, for although a very musicianly production, Mr. Burmeister's piano concerto does not give anything much out of the line of modern works of this form, and bears at least a family resemblance to many that have preceded it. There is careful development in the first movement, chiefly of a figure reminding of the "Rheingold" motif; the balance between piano and orchestra is well kept, and the fault of Chopin and Rubinstein (the over-prominence of the solo instrument) avoided; the entrance of the piano after the lofty tutti which opens the work is very effective; the delicacy of the slow movement is undeniable; the musette-like character of the intermezzo and the triumphant style of the ending with fanfares and the broadest possible piano work were alike commendable, and yet one felt that it was rather the imitative ability of talent, than the originality of genius, that was speaking. Some of the chord work of the first movement was too constant and heavy to be entirely clear, and gave a muddy character to some of the development of the first movement, but the playing as a whole was of the very first rank; Mr. Burmeister is a pianist that it is a delight to hear, for he has all necessary power, and yet one feels that he does not push to the extreme limit of his forces and gives one an agreeable sense of security and reserve power, while in the delicate portions of his concerto the refinement of shading and the clear pianissimo calls for admiring record. He was recalled with hearty enthusiasm twice, and even in this city of solo-pianists made an unusually strong impression. With Raff's "Im Walde" symphony the concert ended. This symphony seems to me the best, as the "Lenore" is the most popular of the composer's works. The first movement has some splendid development, and the use made of the two-noted horn figure is impressive and was finely performed, and this instrument as well as the clarinet did excellent work in the second movement, while the muted strings in this latter, appeared to the very best advantage, their ensemble being perfect and the shading remarkable.

The finale suited the dramatic mood of the conductor best and was finely read and played, but of all Raff's symphonic movements his finales always seem the weakest. They are diffuse, full of repetition, and often become mere orchestral fantasies, too free for the symphonic school. And this finale is one of the innumerable spectre rides which occur in modern music. Of course Wagner's "Ride of the Walkyries" heads the list, but the modern concert-goer can ride to a graveyard with Raff's "Lenore," or gallop to perdition with Berloiz's "Faust," or, as in this case, join a ghostly steeple chase with "Frau Holle." This wild northern Hulda is by no means so impressive either in legend or in music, as her relatives the Walkyries, and the hunting party gives one a little of that morbid flavor which is in the Berlioz finales. I am under the impression that an abbreviation was made in this movement and the full recapitulation of themes not given, but even with this shortening the audience had two hours filled with modern music, and even some of the radicals became restive towards the end.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

[72]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 4, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY.

THE CONCERT LAST EVENING AND OTHER MUSICAL EVENTS.

THE WAGNER MATINEE ON WEDNESDAY—THE BAERMANN AND KNEISEL CONCERTS—GENERAL MUSIC NOTES.

It is to be feared that the ranks of believers in the "grab-bag" theory, regarding the sometimes mysterious process of making up the symphony programme, were considerably augmented in numbers, after that of the eleventh rehearsal and concert had been carefully studied. It would be difficult to discover any logical reason for opening a concert with Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," and following it with a pianoforte concerto. It takes all the resources of a composer to produce a work of this latter class, that will hold its own in the large halls, and with the orchestras of today, and at the same time create a musical impression, instead of open-mouthed astonishment. Since the pianoforte possesses little enough power and tone color at best, it is hardly fair to saturate one's ears with music, almost every measure of which is like a drop of tobasco sauce, immediately before a performance upon that instrument. It may be said that there are modern overtures possessing similar properties; but there are few to be found equal in length, at least, to the Poem referred to. If there are they would be equally out of place, whether they were called overtures or rondos.

Mr. Richard Burmeister may congratulate himself, however, that his concerto stood this severe test nobly. The work may be called a show piece of the best sort. Recognizing the comparative ineffectiveness in such cases of scale and enpeggio passages, he has allowed octaves and chords to predominate; and in a manner, too, that requires great skill and enormous endurance to perform them successfully. The first and last movements, allegro maestoso and alla marcia, are written very broadly, and are full of the appassionato and impetuoso elements. With all the immense technical feats purposely contrived for the display of virtuosity, a distinctly musical intention is not only clearly evident in both, but well carried out. In form the work is strict rather than rhapsodical, and although the influence of Liszt is perceptible, the composer-pianist has a mind of his own, and is far from being a mere imitator. This is seen in the character of his themes, and in his masterly way of handling them. The lento movement, with its tranquil opening melody and animated episode is very attractive, and the light fanciful scherzando forms a bright link between it and the finale. The orchestration throughout is rich, tasteful, and not too ostentatious. Everything seems at first hearing in fine keeping with the general scheme of the work; and it all fits together as though an artist had designed and completed it.

Mr. Burmeister has played in Boston once before, when he gave a recital in the Meionaon. On that occasion he for some reason did not appear at his best, judging by this performance of his concerto. This time he proved himself a player of uncommon ability, regarded even from the high standpoint that so much technical proficiency at the present time forces the critic to assume. His touch is alive with nerve, refinement and power. He plays with great force without pounding, and in cantabile passages, light staccato runs, double-thirds, and the like, both musically and crisply. His chord and octave playing is remarkable for clearness and speed. Altogether, both concerto and performance may be set down as unusually fine.

Mr. Burmeister commanded the close attention of the audience, and was generously applauded. It is singular, by the way, that pianists are never permitted nowadays to perform a solo as a second number. Since singers have the privilege, it seems no more than just that players of instruments should be treated with equal generosity. Doubtless a large proportion of the attendants of the Symphony concerts, if they could voice their wish, would so express themselves.

"Tasso" was splendidly performed. Mr. Nikisch seldom, if ever fails to strike just the right keynote in works of this description. His keen sense of the dramatic leads him to invest every phrase with a meaning that is almost as vivid as vocal utterance; and the breadth of his musical comprehension enables him to weld them together in a manner wholly remarkable.

Raff's third symphony, "Im Walde," came last. Raff's bitter experiences with poverty invariably recall to mind Schubert's painful life. Fortunately for him, he lived later in the century, when such men as Liszt were ready and eager to lend a helping hand to struggling genius. When one realizes that Raff actually grubbed a living for years, and that he was about forty years old before his circumstances permitted him to take the time necessary to write the works of larger form that have made him famous, one marvels at their freshness of melody, beauty of design and perfection of workmanship. The "Im Walde" is always delightful to listen to. Age will not wither it for many years yet to come. That it was finely given goes without saying, and when mention is made of the exquisite horn playing, particularly that in the first movement, and the other bits of solos for oboe and clarinet, nothing more need be added.

THE WAGNER MATINEE.

It was a great event in the history of musical Boston, the Wagner concert, which was given by the Symphony Orchestra Wednesday afternoon. It commenced with the overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," as Wagner re-wrote it in 1861 for the Parisian performance that, after all, resulted in failure. While one misses the great effect produced by the return of the choral, the gorgeous elaboration of the Bacchanale music must be considered of far more artistic value. It is true, however, that the frequent suggestions of the "Nibelugen Ring" that are found in the new part of the score, are somewhat detrimental to the original character of the music. When performed as it was on this occasion, it makes a magnificent concert piece, hardly to be surpassed by any instrumental work or arrangement of Wagner's. The other orchestral numbers were the introduction to "Tristan and Isolde;" the arrangement by Hans Ritchter, as suggested by Wagner himself in which some of the purely instrumental portions of "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung" are brought together for concert use; and the overture to "Die Meistersinger."

The soloists were Signor Campanini, and Mr. Kneisel. It was a decided novelty to see an Italian surrounded by nearly a hundred German musicians, and to hear him sing to their accompaniment, the "Prize song" from Die Meistersinger, and Siegmund's love song, from Die Walkure. They were performances that gave great pleasure, too. The enthusiastic tenor, who has won so many laurels in his native fields, seemed really to enjoy the music, spite of its having no maccaroni in it, for he threw himself into his task to the full extent of his powers. Wagner wrote for German words; and naturally the brusqueness of that language was missed in the delightful cantabile singing, to use the expression in contradistinction to the generally labored and detached vocalization of the Wagnerian singer—of Campanini. His renderings were a little too sweet, as well; still his beautiful vocal work fully compensated for all shortcomings of interpretation.

Mr. Kneisel accomplished all that was possible with the commonplace, although undoubtedly Wagnerish, "Albumblatt," that was written for the piano, and arranged by Wilhelmj for the violin. It was curious to note its similarity of figure and melody at times to parts of the "Prize Song" and the "Ring."

As for Mr. Nikisch, if he never before demonstrated his genius for conducting, he did so this time, for good and all. As leader, he held the orchestra in absolute control; as interpreter, there are probably not half a dozen men in the world who could disclose the meaning of the works presented with such discrimination and magnificence. He conducted as one inspired; and his men fell with much apparent readiness into the same mood. Never have the horns sounded more perfectly. The clarinet player also surpassed himself, and Mr. Sautet, especially in "Tristan," played almost inimitably well. Throughout the concert there was no noise. There were heard no harsh blasts from the brass nor dull thumpings on the tympani.

It was a triumph of effect from a Bayreuth point of view. The hall was literally packed, every foot of standing-room being taken. The audience was thoroughly enthusiastic, and the efforts of conductor and soloists heartily recognized. It was a fine scheme to devote a concert exclusively to the works of one composer; for there is no surer way of laying bare his greatness (or littleness). Such a concert is worth, in real value, any number in which popular miscellaneous programmes rule. Now, let us have more of a similar kind, devoted to modern composers of Russia and other nationalities. And how about the American composer? Is he not worthy of the same recognition?

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The third concert was given in Union Hall last Monday evening, Mr. Arthur Whiting assisting. Without doubt the non-appearance of Mrs. Nikisch was the cause of much disappointment. It is to be hoped that she will have fully recovered from her indisposition before long. The programme was interesting in novelties. A new work by Mr. Whiting, a sonata for piano and violin, opus 7, was performed from manuscript, and an allegro movement of an unfinished quartet in C minor by Schubert, was played for the first time in Boston. The sonata proved to be more than creditable attempt in the direction of seriousness, breadth, and solidity. Its general style suggests Brahm's influence more than that of any other composer. In its construction evident care has been taken to make the work really a duo, and the piano part, while broadly written, is not, as modern works go, excessively elaborated. The first movement, vivace, was to us the most satisfactory in workmanship and musical effect. The Larghetto has a graceful, expressive opening theme, and the finale allegro impetuoso, has a good beginning, although the effect aimed at, in its pianissimo tranquillo ending was disappointing. In this respect, however, the composer must be applauded for having had the courage of his convictions, since a brilliant close would at least reach the public ear more instantaneously. The sonata was played with much spirit and finish by Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Whiting, and was cordially received.

The Schubert number immediately disclosed its parentage through the triplet figures, of which "the most poetical musician that ever was" was ever fond of making use in one way or another. It is written with uncommon conciseness, and is delightfully genial, although not for Schubert especially rich in fancy. The quartet played it in an exquisitely delicate manner, for which they were heartily applauded. Beethoven's quintet in C major, opus 29, was the closing number. In this work, its first three movements so like others of the same period, its finale so surprisingly different, Beethoven is thoroughly captivating. The opening allegro is distinctly reminiscent of that of the popular sonata for violin and piano, opus 24; and the beautiful adagio and jolly scherzo also have a familiar cast. But the presto is a bird of uncommon feather. In fancy and treatment, it is as novel and unconventional as its companion movements are the reverse; and its ethereal beauty and grace provoke the thought that it is somewhat out of its element as the closing movement of the work. Mr. Kunz was called upon to play the second viola part. The whole was finely played, with the exception of some of the scale figures of the presto, which were not rendered with the delicate clearness that was to have been expected. A remarkable bit of ensemble playing was heard in the closing detached chords of the adagio, which were given with wonderful accuracy and fineness.

T. P. CURRIER.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 4, 1891.

THE SYMPHONIES.

ELEVENTH CONCERT.

The following works were performed last evening in Music hall:

Liszt.....Symphonic Poem, "Tasso"
Burmeister, Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, in D minor.
Raff.....Symphony No. 3, "Im Walde"

The lack of either artistic or common-sense judgment in making out the above programme can not be denied. The chief absurdity was in placing at the end of a tediously long repertory one of the most charming and masterly works that was ever written for orchestra, namely, Raff's sympony "Im Walde." Few could have been in the right mood to appreciate the great work, and the many who left the hall before it began may well be congratulated, for the performance was anything but reproductive of the composer's intent, until the final allegro, which was both spiritedly and ably played. The performance of the opening allegro was inanimate and tame, while the enchanting "Twilight" music was so sentimentally interpreted that the performance dragged most somnolently.

The soloist for the concert was Mr. Richard Burmeister who performed his own Concerto in D minor. Of the work itself but little can be said, as the result of a single hearing. It is a profoundly conceived work and many of its themes are both pleasing and melodious; it is ably scored, too; yet how well it would sustain the test of repeated hearings it would seem unfair to affirm. Mr. Burmeister is unquestionably a musician of rare talent, not to say genius. As a pianist, too, he is uncommonly gifted. His abandon is masterly, and his command of a wide variety of technical difficulties can be highly praised. He also plays with much feeling and one might also add with artistic care, did he not so persistently avoid a true legato style. Mr. Burmeister was twice recalled with much enthusiasm at the conclusion of his masterly performance.

The symphonic poem with which the concert began was admirably played.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

Beethoven's quintette in C, a single movement from a quartette by Schubert, and a sonata for piano and violin by Arthur Whiting made up the programme for the Kneisel quartette concert in Union hall last Monday evening. The feature of the concert that was most eagerly awaited was the sonata by Whiting, and it but slightly disappointed. It is an ably constructed work; its themes, while somewhat lacking in musical interest, being one and all developed in a thoughtful and scholarly manner. The great work of the concert was the Beethoven quartette, op. 29. The occasion was not without its serious disappointment in the absence of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who but for a severe cold would have been present as announced and contributed a number of songs.

THE REGISTER.

NEW HAVEN

SUNDAY, JANUARY 4,

visited a great many of the scenes shown on the canvas and can testify to their wonderfully striking vividness of reality."

The Boston Symphony orchestra with its sixty odd musicians, will give the third concert of the series on the night of January 12, one week from next Monday. Herr Nikisch, who has shown himself in the last two concerts here to be an ideal, and almost it might be said inspired leader, will again wield the baton, and with its slightest motion control the small army of musicians as an organist controls the organ by means of its stops and keys. The orchestra's concerts have constantly gained in favor in this city, the first being marked by a fair attendance only, and the second being attended by a large number.

It is safe to say that the third of the series will draw the largest audience yet.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 5, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday—Mr. Burmeister as Soloist.

It may have been the length of the programme or it may have been that quality so dangerous to criticism, personal mood, that made a well played concert seem dull and at times flavorless. Yet it is certain that Liszt's "Tasso" does not wear well, not nearly as well as "Les Preludes" or the Gretchen movement of the "Faust" symphony. It serves, however, to pass the different departments of the orchestra in review before the auditor, for violins, cellos, flutes, clarinets, bass clarinet, oboes, trumpets, etc., each are given temporary prominence, and each was played in a masterly manner; more than this, the reading was the most excellent that I have heard of the work. The very first phrases were given with an elasticity like that of a recitative, and it is safe to predict from these that the last movement of the great ninth symphony will be very effective when Mr. Nikisch directs its wonderful contrabass passages in this free vein. All the many changes of tempo were well contrasted and given with unity, while the pompous apotheosis which ended the work was performed with appropriate magniloquence. But the themes grow stale in the using; when once the element of surprise has passed away the work is not interesting; familiarity breeds, if not contempt, at least satiety, and the overladen parts are like musical hasheesh, and leave an unpleasant taste behind them.

A new work followed, that is chronologically speaking, for although a very musicianly production, Mr. Burmeister's piano concerto does not give anything much out of the line of modern works of this form, and bears at least a family resemblance to many that have preceded it. There is careful development in the first movement, chiefly of a figure reminding of the "Rheingold" motif; the balance between piano and orchestra is well kept, and the fault of Chopin and Rubinstein (the over-prominence of the solo instrument) avoided; the entrance of the piano after the lofty tutti which opens the work is very effective; the delicacy of the slow movement is undeniable; the musette-like character of the intermezzo and the triumphant style of the ending with fanfares and the broadest possible piano work were alike commendable, and yet one felt that it was rather the imitative ability of talent, than the originality of genius, that was speaking. Some of the chord work of the first movement was too constant and heavy to be entirely clear, and gave a muddy character to some of the development of the first movement, but the playing as a whole was of the very first rank; Mr. Burmeister is a pianist that it is a delight to hear, for he has all necessary power, and yet one feels that he does not push to the extreme limit of his forces and gives one an agreeable sense of security and reserve power, while in the delicate portions of his concerto the refinement of shading and the clear pianissimo calls for admiring record. He was recalled with hearty enthusiasm twice, and even in this city of solo-pianists made an unusually strong impression. With Raff's "Im Walde" symphony the concert ended. This symphony seems to me the best, as the "Lenore" is the most popular of the composer's works. The first movement has some splendid development, and the use made of the two-noted horn figure is impressive and was finely performed, and this instrument as well as the clarinet did excellent work in the second movement, while the muted strings in this latter, appeared to the very best advantage, their ensemble being perfect and the shading remarkable.

The finale suited the dramatic mood of the conductor best and was finely read and played, but of all Raff's symphonic movements his finales always seem the weakest. They are diffuse, full of repetition, and often become mere orchestral fantasies, too free for the symphonic school. And this finale is one of the innumerable spectre rides which occur in modern music. Of course Wagner's "Ride of the Walkyries" heads the list, but the modern concert-goer can ride to a graveyard with Raff's "Lenore," or gallop to perdition with Berloiz's "Faust," or, as in this case, join a ghostly steeple chase with "Frau Holle." This wild northern Hulda is by no means so impressive either in legend or in music, as her relatives the Walkyries, and the hunting party gives one a little of that morbid flavor which is in the Berlioz finales. I am under the impression that an abbreviation was made in this movement and the full recapitulation of themes not given, but even with this shortening the audience had two hours filled with modern music, and even some of the radicals became restive towards the end.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

[73]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 5, 1891.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Eleventh Symphony Concert.

The programme offered by Mr. Arthur Nikisch last Saturday evening comprised three large compositions:

Liszt—Symphonic Poem, "Tasso."
Burmeister—Concerto for Piano and Orchestra in D (first time in Boston).
Raff—Symphony No. 3. "Im Walde." Soloist, Mr. Richard Burmeister.

Liszt's "Tasso," the second of his twelve Symphonic Poems, was first performed here by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra, afterwards more than once by the Harvard Musical Association. It is on the large, pretentious scale of all those works, sensational, extravagant, gloomy and brilliant by turns, carrying the audience by main force of great sonority that comes from the enlarged modern orchestra. Its full title is "Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo;" but the two contrasted parts are not mentioned in the present programme, only the successive movements of the music, Lento, Allegro, and so on. Next to "Les Preludes," it is the most moderate and reasonable, at least the most intelligible, consistent and appreciable of the twelve.

Liszt composed it as an overture or prelude to a performance of Goethe's "Tasso" at Weimar, in 1849, on the centennial anniversary of Goethe's birth. But he owned that he was more under the influence of Byron's presentation of the morbid, gloomy side of the first and main part of the subject, the Lament. Goethe seems to come in where the music brightens into Triumph. Liszt says in his preface, "Tasso lived and suffered in Ferrara, he was avenged in Rome; he still lives in the people's songs of Venice. These three movements are inseparable from his imperishable fame. To reproduce them musically we first summoned up his great shadow, as it today wanders over the lagoons of Venice; then there appeared to us the proud and melancholy face of him, a looker-on at the feasts of Ferrara, where he created his masterworks; and finally we followed him to Rome, the eternal city, which placed the crown upon his head, and glorified in him the martyr and the poet."

Liszt's "poem" opens Lento with a lugubrious motive (fortissimo, very slow) in the basses. This theme, he says, he used to hear sung to the first lines of Tasso's "Jerusalem" by gondoliers in the lagoons of Venice. To sound like that their hoarse voices and their gaunt figures, as of weird and spectral boatmen, must have been magnified through the mist, exaggerated, shadowy shapes and song! The theme, in this first form, is ugly, at least not attractive. It reappears in all shapes and sizes, all connections and all tempi as the work goes on, sometimes reflected in smallest microscopic figures, even in mere embellishments; and finally in full size again, but in the major, in the pomp and blaze of the Trionfo. Sick chromatic passages follow this gloomy introduction. Then wild, spasmodic fiendish outbursts of agony and madness (Allegro strepitoso). Then Adagio mesto brings a moment of repose, with more subdued and sweeter music. The shooting pains and groans and melancholy moans soon get the upper hand again, seeking relief in furious outbursts. Then comes a Minuet-like graceful Allegretto mosso of a taking character, the next most haunting feature after the gloomy gondolier strain which in its multifarious varieties is also made to dance sometimes.

With all the gloom and noise and strange bewilderment, there is a certain dramatic progress in the work. Reaching the second section, the Trionfo, it culminates in loud, hoarse, martial strains (Allegro con molto brio), with the full force of the great orchestra, fatiguing the brain, and almost stunning by the weight and clamor of the braying brass, with drum and triangle. That there are fine passages, beautiful effects, traits of nobility and grandeur, it would be folly to deny. Vtoloncellos, bassoons, sometimes come to the front with captivating sounds, and once the bass clarinet sings the melody in sweet and manly tone. But, on the whole, is that wholesome music, or true art, which aggravates the glooms and tortures of a life, real or fictitous, clings to the shady phase of it, only appending at the end a loud, sensational-coarse strain of triumph, so unlike the ruling of the higher principle throughout—the soul of music, which is faith—as in Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture.

Of the way in which the difficult symphonic poem was handled, mastered by the orchestra, we can only speak with praise. Every instrument seemed at its best, in tone and color, in sympathetic, loyal coöperation, light and shade, in unity and life and power. It is well to hear these things "occasionally (but) not oftener."

Mr. Burmeister has for several years been connected with the musical department of the Peabody Institute in Baltimore. His education was in Germany, where he was under the influence of Liszt. His concerto was first brought out in Baltimore during the season of 1887-88, and has since been heard in Detroit (at the Music Teachers' Convention), New York and Leipzig. It has so much of a Lisztian character, in its brilliancy and boldness, its strong instrumentation, its grasping after startling, original effects, with no very obvious raison d'être, that, as it followed close upon the "Tasso," we felt a need of contrast. It is, however, a musicianly, well written work. The movements are interesting singly, and make up a consistent whole together. Without slighting these conditions, it was evidently composed with a virtuoso's eye to difficult and brilliant technical effect, to the triumphs of remarkable execution; the ambition for display seems to have controlled its structure more than any purely musical motive or irresistible inward need of expression. It is ingenious, clever, skilfully and wisely put together; strong, but not spontaneous like a work of genius. The opening (Andante) is peculiar: on a sort of organ-point of one long reiterated horn tone short melancholy minor phrases from various instruments are heard; oboe and clarinet and flute, seconded by horns, give out alternately a pleasing melody. Then comes in the piano with a swift and vigorous run of octaves and hand-full chords, and you are soon convinced of the presence of a masterly executant; one of unflagging [illegible] and vital emphasis, of delicate and [illegible] where is required; in short, one [illegible] that we have heard in these days of remarkable pianists, who in such numbers overrun the cities of the West as well as the Atlantic shore. The manner of the man is quiet, dignified and unpretentious; and the applause was overwhelming. The Andante of course led into an Allegro (maestoso). Then came a Lento movement, in which the piano sang a well-pronounced melodious cantabile; then a fantastic, playful intermezzo, which leaps at once into a march-like finale. We think a second hearing, under the same good auspices, would reward attention.

A good relief, in quite refreshing contrast to the preceding pieces, was the Raff symphony, "Im Walde" (In the Woods). It has more beauty, more sincere and healthy charm, than any symphony that we have heard by Raff. The first movement, Allegro, entitled "In the Day Time" (for it was a "programme" symphony) was found to be a very long day, probably of midsummer, but the music is full of beauty, cheerful, wholesome, full of woodland suggestions; the motives and the not too crowded instrumentation seem to make you breathe a fresh, pure, wholesome air, fragrant of pine and hemlock; the distant mellow horns mingle their poetic forest sound with the rustle of leaves, the birds, the breezes, with charming effect. If the movement seem long, in view of so many movements set down to come after, without that fear you would fain listen longer to it, reluctant to dismiss that wholesome, happy "day." It shades gently into "Twilight," which grows deeper and sweetly solemn in the Largo that succeeds. The "Dance of the Dryads" (allegro assai) forms a captivating Scherzo, witchingly romantic. This sparling, rippling stream divides the terra firma of the Day and Twilight from what is set down as "Night, the Silent Breath of Night in the Forest," dark and still and mysterious, interrupted (naturally in a German forest, with its northern superstitious legends), by the "Entrance and Departure of the Wild Hunt with Frau Holle and Wotan"—a roaring, hurrying, echoing, exciting storm of harmony, which soon passes out of hearing and gives way to the "Break of Day," completing the circle in soft, rich roseate colors brightening into orange. All this is very beautiful; but the long Allegro movement was freely cut and shortened in performance. The symphony was evidently relished by the audience. There was no extravagance, no overstrained pursuit of novelty, none of the morbid pathos of the "Lenore" symphony to be deducted from the agreeable impression of the music as a whole. It was all most artistically rendered.

Next Saturday's programme offers us the "Italian" symphony of Mendelssohn; Wieniawski's violin concerto in D minor, to be played by Mr. T. Adamowski; a ballade for orchestra, "La Belle Dame sans Merci," by Mackenzie; and the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz.

J. S. D.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, JANUARY 5, 1890.

MUSIC.

Symphony Concert — Mr. Burmeister's Concerto.

The programme of the eleventh Symphony concert was:

Liszt, symphonic poem, "Tasso."
Burmeister, concerto for piano and orchestra, in D minor: Andante, allegro maestoso; lento; intermezzo scherzando attaco; alla marcia e finale (first time in Boston.)
Raff, Symphony No. 3. "Im Walde."

The composer of the concerto was the pianist. Mr. Burmeister is a teacher in the Peabody Institute, Baltimore, where, we believe, he succeeded Mr. Faelten. His student days were passed in Germany, among his masters being Liszt. The concerto was performed for the first time some three years ago, in Baltimore, and has since been heard in New York, at Mr. Seidl's Brighton Beach concerts, and at Mr. Damrosch's symphony concerts, at Detroit, and in Leipzig, where, however, only the piano solo part was played. The work is a valuable contribution to music. It is at the start a well made composition, the model being the romantic compositions of Schumann and Chopin, rather than the strict classics of Beethoven, or the modern manner of Liszt. There is admirable contrast between the middle movements and the two extreme ones, contrasts of mood and manner. The slow movement with its gentle opening for the strings is the richest in sentiment, rising to a really passionate climax, while none the less interesting for its grace of expression is the intermezzo with its dance rhythm accented by the faint touch of the triangle. The final march movement is worked out with well sustained skill, reaching an effective conclusion before one becomes tired of the reiterated subject. But we incline to place the first movement highest in point of musicianship. Mr. Burmeister treats the orchestra most sympathetically, and while his scoring is generally quiet, he is easily master of his task, and when he gives the orchestra alone a connecting link, as in the return to the second theme in the first movement, the roundness, the balance of the instrumentation as well as its geniality is apparent. Taken as a whole the concerto is a lovely work, the product of a scholar in music, who is also an artist. Mr. Burmeister's playing is admirable in point of clearness and rythmical precision. The performance of the concerto was generally excellent, and the audience twice recalled the composer at is close.

Liszt's "Tasso" was well played, while the beautiful "Im Walde" of Raff, a work of great skill, and in the first two movements of lovely coloring lost nothing at the hand of Mr. Nikisch. At the next concert Mr. Adamowski will be the soloist, in Wieniawski's violin concerto in D minor. The orchestra will play Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, Mackenzie's ballad, "La Belle Dame sans Merci," and Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 6, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Adamowski Quartette Concert of Last Evening.

Nations which are happy have short histories, and concerts which are excellent generally require but short reviews. The concert given at Steinert Hall last night was of this class. Never have the Adamowski Quartette played better. The programme began with Mozart's quartette in C major, which was abused in the last century very much as Brahms' music is abused in this, but is a lofty work nevertheless. If, as many classicists assert, imitation is the soul of music, this work is one of the most soulful of all, for it is brimful of imitations from beginning to end. Only the final rondo, by its many repetitions, is out of the spirit of the modern forms. The ensemble of the quartette was excellent, although at times a broader style would have been permissible.

The group of Schumann and Schubert numbers which followed was charmingly played by Mr. Ernst Perabo. There was in this performance the acme of delicacy and romance, yet also an adequate amount of breadth. It was refreshing to hear such refined playing in these days of pianistic pile-driving. In the Scharwenka piano quartette Mr. Perabo also made a splendid impression, for he always subordinated his part to the ensemble, and in fact overdid this conservatism in the first movement, wherein Scharwenka often drops into the "King Cambyses vein." But no organization could have given the adagio better than did Messrs. T. Adamowski, Max Zach, J. Adamowski and Ernst Perabo; it was noble, beyond the power of cold type to describe. The composition is an unequal one, for while the adagio is heaven-storming, the scherzo is artificial, although its second part, or trio, and its coda, are effective. The playing in the first movement was not entirely secure, but very soon regained the high standard noticeable throughout the concert, and in the finale, alternately mysterious and majestic, the performance was admirable. Altogether the concert proved that the Adamowski Quartette is now to be ranked with the foremost string quartettes of America, and I trust that next season may bring to it the crowded audiences it deserves.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.

WITH SUPPLEMENT.

TUESDAY MORNING, JANUARY 6, 1891.

The Adamowski Concert.

The third and last chamber concert in the series given by the Adamowski Quartette, assisted by Mr. Ernst Perabo, pianist, was given before a select and fair sized audience at Steinert Hall last evening. The programme consisted of quartettes for strings in C major from Mozart that had their first performance at this concert. The introductory adagio was an original working out of a peculiar, but interesting, theme. The minuetto brought before one the beautiful picture of "Ye Lady and Gentleman" of olden times, with all their grace of movement and beauty in that most picturesque dance. Mr. Perabo impresses one with his thoroughly earnest musical nature, and his modest recognition of the applause deservedly awarded him by his audience is characteristic of a true artist. His selections were happily chosen from Schumann and Schubert. The Scherzo from Sonata, op. 53, by Schubert, was particularly pleasing and finely executed. His independence of notes is a most excellent feature, his firm, but elastic, touch producing both vigor and delicacy of expression. The quartettes from the less familiar composer, Xavier Scharwenka, who, with his brother Philip, also a noted pianist and composer, has established a conservatory in Berlin, also enjoying the distinction of being the pianist at the Court of His Majesty the Emperor of Austria, were enthusiastically received by the rather critical audience. The variety in the different movements was very appreciable, the allegro moderato, with its even, preparatory movement for the stately adagio, which passes like a procession of royalty, then the brightening effect of the swifter vivace, followed by the forceful finale. These also had their first hearing last evening.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 6, 1891.

THE ADAMOWSKI CONCERT.

The third and last of the series of chamber music concerts announced by the Adamowski string quartet was given at Steinert Hall last evening, and the favor with which this capable organization is held in the best musical circles was again fully demonstrated by the size and character of the audience attending. The programme included the Mozart's string quartet in C major, piano solos by Mr. Ernst Perabo, bunte blatter, op. 99. (a) "Sehr Rasch" No. 2, (b) "Frisch" No. 3, (c) "Nicht Schnell mit Innigkeit," Schumann; (d) Scherzo from sonata, op. 53, Schubert; and the quartet for piano, violin, viola and 'cella, by Scharwenka. Mr. Adamowski and his fellow-musicians have never been heard to better advantage than on this occasion, and the quartet by Mozart was received with distinguished favor, the players giving all the graceful beauties of the work with fine effect. Mr. Perabo displayed all the attractive characteristics of his playing to the best advantage in his solos, and the concluding quartet proved the gem of the evening's programme. It is gratifying to know that Mr. Adamowski's organization is fast gaining a permanent place in the musical life of leading eastern cities.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 6, 1891.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTETTE.

The third and last of the Adamowski Quartette concerts was given last evening at Steinert Hall. The programme was as follows:

Quartette for strings in C major ..... Mozart
Piano solos. Bunte Blatter, op. 99 .....
a. "Sehr Rasch" No. 2 .....
b. "Frisch, No. 3 ..... } Schumann
c. "Night schnell mit Innigkeit" .....
d. Scherzo from Sonata op. 53 ..... Schubert
Mr. Perabo.
Quartette for piano and strings in F, op. 37 .....
..... Xaver Scharwenka

The quartette of Mozart with which the concert opened is the last of the six which the composer, in his letter of dedication to "his best friend," Haydn, described as "the fruit of long and severe labor." It is the one with the famous introduction which for years proved a bone of contention on account of its false relations: faults which, according to old Fétis, "wounded the reason, the feelings and the taste." Anyone who wishes to read the attacks and defences can find the details in the thirty odd pages which Gottfried Weber devoted to the subject in the third volume of his "Theorie der Tonsetzkunst." And when he has finished, he will approve of the words of Richard Grant White written concerning German critics: "Like the western diver, they go down deeper and stay down longer than other critics, but like him, too, they come up muddier." Meanwhile the noble music of Mozart has outlived the "maundering mystifications and ponderous platitudes" of the theorists.

The quartette was not finely played; and if ever music demanded absolute finish, it is the music of Mozart. There was a lack of repose. The tempo was often hurried without reason. Notes were often chopped, and phrases were robbed of their beauty by a crude finish. The quartette is heard to better advantage in more modern works, where swing and fire are the chief things needful. And the very qualities which individualize and distinguish the solo playing of Mr. Timothy Adamowski impair his value as a leader in a Mozart quartette.

Mr. Ernst Perabo was the pianist. He gave a conscientious performance of the pieces by Schumann and Schubert, and he played the piano part of the Scharwenka quartette, which, with the exception of the third movement, is not a particularly interesting composition.

In spite of the disagreeable weather there was an audience of good size, and the different numbers were applauded.

Philip Hale.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, JAN. 6.

ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

Last of Three Enjoyable Concerts in Steinert Hall.

The third and last of a series of three delightful concerts by the Adamowski quartet was given last evening in the Steinert Hall. The beneficiary, Mr. T. Adamowski, assisted by A. Moldauer, second violin; Max Zach, viola, and J. Adamowski, cello, delighted a very select and fortunate audience with quartet for strings in C major, Mozart.

The audience had scarcely recovered from the enjoyment of this delightful quartet when Mr. Ernest Perabo, that most modest and fervent of pianists appeared, and seating himself at the piano, began a series of three selections from Schumann and the scherzo from Schubert's sonata, op. 53. The audience had yet, however, their greatest treat in store for them, in the third and most acceptable number of the evening—a quartet for piano and strings, in F op. 37, by Xaver Scharwenka.

Its high order of excellence is in keeping with the reputation of the author, who is, by the way on the eve of making a tour of the United States, and will afford the public a broader opportunity of estimating his worth. His concerts have already drawn the best audiences in Vienna, Paris and London, and Mr. Adamowski deserves great credit for this pleasing introduction of so worthy a composer.

THE REGISTER
NEW HAVEN

TUESDAY, JANUARY 6.

Hyperion Theater. - NIKISCH.
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.
Third Concert.
Monday Evening, Jan. 12, at 8.
SOLOIST:
MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH,
Prima Donna Soprano, late of the Leipzic Stadt Theater.
A Brilliant Programme.
Tickets now on sale at M. Steinert & Sons', 777 Chapel st. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third concert in the course at the Hyperion theater on the 12th inst. Prof. Arthur Nickish, the conductor, has endeavored to make each of these concerts elaborate musical treats, and the coming concert, which is the next to the last in the series, will be no exception to the rule. The soloist for the occasion will be Mrs. Arthur Nickish, a lady of rare musical abilities. The tickets for the concert were placed on sale yesterday at M. Steinert & Sons' Music store and have met with a ready sale.

[74]

New York Tribune
1-3

——The third and last concert but one to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra in this city this season takes place at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening, January 13. Mrs. Nikisch, wife of the well-known conductor, will be one of the soloists, and will then have her first hearing in New York. The program is as follows: Overture, "Coriolanus," Beethoven; song, with orchestral accompaniment, "Traumkoenig und sein Lieb," Raff; andantino and scherzo, from F minor symphony No. 4, Tschaikowsky; rondo capriccioso for violin, Saint-Saëns—soloist, Mr. T. Adamowski; songs, with piano accompaniment; symphony, "Im Walde," Raff.

Date 1-3

A feature of the next Boston Symphony Concert, which will take place at the Academy [illegible] Tuesday week, will be the appearance as the soloist of Mrs. Nikisch, wife of the director. Mrs. Nikisch sang at a chamber concert in this city last month and made a distinctly favorable impression. She is blessed with a pretty face, attractive manners and a pleasing appearance. Her voice is a mezzo soprano of ample volume and agreeable quality, which has evidently been carefully cultivated, and she sings with a degree of dramatic intensity which is accounted for by her former connection with the lyric stage. The room at Haseltine's Galleries, where she was heard here before, was too small for her to sing with the best effect; it will be interesting to hear her in the spacious Academy. Apart from the soloist, the concert promises to be very enjoyable, as the programme comprises, in Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" numbers, some of the loveliest music ever written.

Clipping from Herald Baltimore Md
Date 1-4

The Next Boston Symphony Concert.

Another [illegible] the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Concordia Opera House on January 16, for which the sale of tickets will open at Talbott's ticket office on Monday, January 12. The soloist for this concert will be Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, prima donna soprano, late of the Stadt Opera House, Leipsic. The programme will consist of modern music, which demands the full orchestra of 75 performers. The composers are Goldmark, Raff, Cowen, Jensen, Liszt, Grieg and Mendelssohn, presenting the music written for Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream." The Cowen Scandinavian symphony will be played. The performance will be up to the highest standard.

No. American, Phil. Pa.
Date 1-5

A feature of the next Boston Symphony Concert, which will take place at the Academy of Music on Wednesday week, will be the appearance as the soloist of Mrs. Nikisch, wife of the director. Mrs. Nikisch sang at a chamber concert in this city last month and made a distinctly favorable impression. She is blessed with a pretty face, attractive manners and a pleasing appearance. Her voice is a mezzo soprano of ample volume and agreeable quality, which has evidently been carefully cultivated, and she sings with a degree of dramatic intensity which is accounted for by her former connection with the lyric stage. The room at Haseltine's Galleries, where she was heard here before, was too small for her to sing with the best effect; it will be interesting to hear her in the spacious Academy. Apart from the soloist, the concert promises to be very enjoyable, as the programme comprises, in Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" numbers, some of the loveliest music ever written.

Clipping from Inquirer Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

A feature of the next Boston Symphony Concert, which will take place at the Academy of Music on Wednesday week, will be the appearance as the soloist of Mrs. Nikisch, wife of the director. Mrs. Nikisch sang at a chamber concert in this city last month and made a distinctly favorable impression. She is blessed with a pretty face, attractive manners and a pleasing appearance. Her voice is a mezzo soprano of ample volume and agreeable quality, which has evidently been carefully cultivated, and she sings with a degree of dramatic intensity which is accounted for by her former connection with the lyric stage. The room at Haseltine's Galleries, where she was heard here before, was too small for her to sing with the best effect; it will be interesting to hear her in the spacious Academy. Apart from the soloist, the concert promises to be very enjoyable, as the programme comprises, in Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" numbers, some of the loveliest music ever written.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
—A WEEKLY PAPER—
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 7, 1891.

A TRAVELING concert company which for several seasons past has been misappropriating the title of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, by denominating itself the Boston Symphony Orchestral Club, recently came to grief at Ashville, N. C., and disbanded there, ending its "Grand Transcontinental Tour," as it was called. There was no legitimate reason for calling the organization "Boston Symphony Orchestral," or any title playing upon the name of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, except that the use of such a name would be, from its very nature, misleading, and consequently would attract business under a pretense, based upon the name of the organization, that was false. The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been kept busy in answering inquiries relative to this club with its spurious title, but neither Mr. Ellis nor Mr. Comee could afford to pay any active attention to the exposing of such a scheme. As men of intelligence they knew that it was a mere matter of a short time and the orchestral club would be compelled to go to the wall.

Some artists who were to join the now stranded club refused to fulfill their contracts unless the title was changed and such artists, for instance, as Mr. De Sève, who allied themselves with the scheme regret it very much. They should have refused in the very beginning to lend their presence or consent to an enterprise that was launched with the determination to make money out of the renowned name of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by wrongfully appropriating its title. We may as well state that certain musical journals aided and abetted the scheme, but it appears that their support did not give any strength to the humbug. To be consistent, THE MUSICAL COURIER might as well state that the Boston Symphony Orchestral Club was a stencil and stencils MUST go. In fact this latest one is gone where the woodbine twineth and where the maxdoodle mourneth for its last bourne.

A MODERN TRIO.

THE intelligent audience that attends the Boston Symphony concerts at Music Hall in that city was quick to appreciate the musical value of Mr. Richard Burmeister's piano concerto and the masterly command he displayed over the piano at last Saturday night's concert. He received a double recall and was heartily applauded by the orchestra also.

As usual, Mr. Bacon, of the Boston "Herald," with his platitudes, handles Burmeister and his concerto in this manner, which amounts to a confession of ignorance:

With the army of pianists awaiting recognition at these concerts, it appears an easy matter to secure a more competent player than Mr. Burmeister, and

> "There is no manner of doubt,
> No probable, possible shadow of doubt,
> No possible doubt whatever,"

but that Mr. Burmeister could have found a more desirable composition to display his attainments as a pianist. As Mr. Burmeister is on the staff of the Peabody Institute of Baltimore, it may be assumed that his engagement as a soloist was made as a compliment to the musical public of that city; but this might have been more judiciously arranged by confining his appearance to Baltimore. He is evidently a conscientious player, who, in the mastery of the technic of his art, has lost sight of the equal desirability of other characteristics in his playing. He quite often forces his tone beyond a musical quality, and his playing is frequently lacking in clearness and brilliancy. He made his best effort in the astounding finale of the concerto, in which, although the solo player is heavily overweighted by the orchestra, he made a grand display of his technical attainments and ended his performance in a burst of musical pyrotechnics.

Unfortunately Mr. Burmeister's sketch of the concerto was not received in time for publication in Mr. Wilson's analytical remarks upon the program. With such a key to the work, its meaning and worth might be studied out, but a single hearing leaves the average music lover in a sad state of doubt as to what the aim of the composer was in framing his concerto. The work has been played in Detroit, New York and Leipsic, and now Boston can be added to the list as an indorsement for its future career.

The information about the Peabody and that contained in the last sentence are taken by Mr. Bacon from Mr. Wilson's program. Otherwise the remarks are not within the pale of reportorial work, much less do they give to anyone a clue to the character or nature of the concerto or to Mr. Burmeister's performance. Mr. Bacon candidly admits that he depends for his so-called criticisms upon Mr. Wilson's analytical programs, and as these are read at the concerts on Saturday night they anticipate Mr. Bacon's reproduction of Mr. Wilson's ideas in the Boston "Herald."

The truth of the matter is that no artist can receive justice in the columns of the Boston "Herald" unless he or she uses Mr. Bacon's business agency. The case is analogous to that of Mr. Day and the Baltimore "American," for unless the artists engage Mr. Day's services as a manager they can depend upon a censure in the columns of the Baltimore paper. A similar state of affairs exists here with one of the New York daily papers. Critic and manager exist in the one person, and the function of the one influences the writings of the other and vice versa. Mr. Bacon, Mr. Day and the New York party are business men and not men of musical judgment, and the result is that their work destroys the value of their respective papers as mediums of criticisms among the musical people of the three cities in which their operations are conducted. In Baltimore, Mr. Day is interested in Mr. Burmeister's concerts and recitals and in the Baltimore "American" Mr. Burmeister plays well; in Boston, where Mr. Bacon receives no encouragement from Mr. Burmeister, the latter is no pianist. As a consequence of such a system the approval of the Baltimore "American" amounts to the same thing that the censure of the Boston "Herald" amounts to, and so it should be. Mr. Bacon's artists who happen to overlook Mr. Day in Baltimore are treated in the "American" just like the Boston "Herald" treats Mr. Day's customers, who refuse to patronize Mr. Bacon.

We suggest to these two business men to form a copartnership with the New York party, and then run the artists on the mutual plan, with a fair division of the profits, although it is quite probable that after a little while our New York friend, whose capacity for fiscal absorption has long since been demonstrated, would make "pie" of the two provincial managers.

THE MUSICAL COURIER was the first medium through which Mr. Burmeister's concerto was analytically explained to the musical world, and it has since then been indorsed by many of the leading musical critics of Continental Europe, and having heard it repeatedly since its first production, and also last Saturday night in Boston, we are strengthened in our opininion of the solid and substantial musical value of the concerto and are fully convinced of its permanency in the contemporary repertory of piano works. Moreover, we believe it will live long after the days when such men as Bacon, Day and the New York humbug have ceased polluting the columns of newspapers with their contemptible abuse of artists who are not disposed to negotiate with them.

THE NIKISCHES.—The third and last concert but one to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city this season takes place at Chickering Hall next Tuesday evening, January 13. Mrs. Nikisch, wife of the well-known conductor, will be one of the soloists, and will then have her first hearing in New York. The program is as follows: Overture, "Coriolanus," Beethoven; song with orchestral accompaniment, "Traumkoenig und Sein Lieb," Raff; andantino and scherzo from F minor symphony, No. 4, Tschaikowsky; rondo capriccioso for violin, Saint-Saëns; soloist, Mr. T. Adamowski; songs, with piano accompaniment; symphony, "Im Walde," Raff.

Pittsburg Dispatch
Sunday, Jan. 4.

Plans for the Future.

During the past week the Mozart Club has got its plans for the rest of the season into more definite shape. Three concerts of the regular season are yet to be given. The customary 'Ballad Concert," which has heretofore come in the early spring, will this season be postponed until the end of May, closing the season. This programme will be made up, as usual, of less extended works, among which will probably figure Mr. Ethelbert Nevin's setting, for chorus, soprano solo and four-hand accompaniment, of Eugene Field's charming "Dutch Lullaby"—the work that failed to arrive in time for last year's ballad concert.

The postponement of this miscellaneous programme has been decided on so that the club may now have a free field for the rehearsal of Verdi's Requiem, which will be given May 1, with one or more eminent foreign soloists and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Requiem will be given complete, without any of the cuts made when the Gounod Club presented it at Library Hall, with only piano accompaniment, back in the '70's. Some considerable excerpts were given by the Gounod Club and the Symphonic Society's Orchestra in the May Festival of 1879 at the old Exposition building, but this will be the first complete production with orchestra of this famous work in Pittsburg.

Assistant Manager Fred R. Comee, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was in the city on Friday, when the contract was closed, securing that unrivaled organization for the two Mozart Club concerts of April 30 and May 1. The first evening will be a symphony concert, in which Mr. Nikisch and his men will be assisted by one or both of the two prominent singers expected to be engaged for the orchestra's spring tour. One of these, let us hope, will be Mrs. Arthur Nikish, whose recent American successes justify her reputation abroad, and the artistic fitness of the famous conductor's choice of a mate. These concerts, together with the May Festival, promise unprecedented brilliance for the close of this well-filled musical season in Pittsburg.

This Week's Happenings.

Though brevity of space this morning com-

THE REGISTER.
THE NEW HAVEN
WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 7

At the Hyperion Monday evening the Boston Symphony orchestra with Arthur Nikisch as conductor, will give another of their celebrated concerts. Mrs. Nikisch, prima donna soprano of the Leipsic Stadt theater, will be heard in some selections of great interest. These concerts are always looked forward to with great interest, and a crowded house may be expected Monday evening.

Boston Post
FRIDAY MORNING, JAN. 9, 1891.

MUSIC.

THE CAMBRIDGE CONCERT.

The programme of the fourth concert of the series given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Sanders Theatre last evening was as follows:

Symphony in D major (No. 2, B. & H.) ..... Haydn
Aria, "Pensée d'Automne" ..... Massenet
Concerto Romantique for violin, op. 35 ..... Godard
(First time.)
Adagio and Scherzo from the Scandinavian Symphony ..... Cowen
Aria, "Pré aux Clercs" ..... Hérold
Scherzo Capriccioso ..... Dvorak

Miss Gertrude Franklin, in addition to the delightful aria from Hérold's opera, sang a new concert song written by Massenet for Miss Sybil Sanderson, whom, as is well known, he greatly admires, heedless of the solemn warning of the Apocrypha: "Use not much the company of a woman that is a singer, lest thou be taken with her attempts." Although it is dedicated to the fair American, it seems poorly suited to her remarkably high voice, as it lies rather in the middle and lower range. It is not a composition which will become popular at one hearing, but it is a song of real beauty and merit, thoughtfully written and with an ingeniously scored accompaniment. Miss Franklin sang it admirably, and in the aria from "Pré aux Clercs," to which Mr. Kneisel played the obbligato, her bravura was pure, clean and brilliant. She was recalled twice after each selection.

Mr. Loeffler played Godard's concerto with warmth of tone and an easy mastery of all technical difficulties. The cahzonetta, an exquisite little movement, delighted the audience, and Mr. Loeffler was most heartily applauded. The first movement seemed so disjointed and purposeless that its performance gave rise to the suspicion that it had been cut to bring the concert within the accustomed hour and a half. The last movement barely escapes triviality.

The orchestral numbers, all of a popular nature, were well played. The next concert will be given Jan. 29.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Daily Globe.
FRIDAY, JAN. 9.

SYMPHONY FOR CANTABS.

Fourth Concert Brings Enthusiasm from Lovers of Music.

The fourth of the Cambridge concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Sanders Theatre last evening before an audience which completely filled the building.

The soloists were Miss Gertrude Franklin and Mr. C. M. Loeffler, and they were very pleasantly received.

The programme as arranged by Mr. Nikisch was as follows:

Symphony in D major (No. 2, B. and H.) .... Haydn
Adagio; allegro—andante—minuet—allegro spiritoso.
Aria, Pensee d'Automne ..... Massenet
Concerto romantique for violin, op. 35 .... Godard
Allegretto moderato; recitativo; adagio—Canzonetta—allegro molto.
(First time.)
Adagio and scherzo from the Scandinavian.
Symphony ..... Cowen
Aria, Pre aux Clercs ..... Herold
Scherzo Cappriccioso ..... Dvorak

Mr. Loeffler was heard in a violin concerto, played for the first time, and made a good impression, although the piece did not give him opportunities to show his best work. Miss Franklin sang the two arias allotted to her with her customary sweetness, and was recalled after each number.

Clipping from New York City

Date 1-3

—The third and last concert but one to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra in this city this season takes place at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening, January 13. Mrs. Nikisch, wife of the well-known conductor, will be one of the soloists, and will then have her first hearing in New York. The program is as follows: Overture, "Coriolanus," Beethoven; song, with orchestral accompaniment, "Traumkoenig und sein Lieb," Raff; andantino and scherzo, from F minor symphony No. 4, Tschaikowsky; rondo capriccioso for violin, Saint-Saëns—soloist, Mr. T. Adamowski; songs, with piano accompaniment; symphony, "Im Walde," Raff.

Date 1—3.

A feature of the next Boston Symphony Concert, which will take place at the Academy [illegible] Wednesday week, will be the appearance as the soloist of Mrs. Nikisch, wife of the director. Mrs. Nikisch sang at a chamber concert in this city last month and made a distinctly favorable impression. She is blessed with a pretty face, attractive manners and a pleasing appearance. Her voice is a mezzo soprano of ample volume and agreeable quality, which has evidently been carefully cultivated, and she sings with a degree of dramatic intensity which is accounted for by her former connection with the lyric stage. The room at Haseltine's Galleries, where she was heard here before, was too small for her to sing with the best effect; it will be interesting to hear her in the spacious Academy. Apart from the soloist, the concert promises to be very enjoyable, as the programme comprises, in Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" numbers, some of the loveliest music ever written.

Clipping from Herald Baltimore, Md.

Date 1-4

The Next Boston Symphony Concert.

Another [redacted] the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Concordia Opera House on January 16, for which the sale of tickets will open at Talbott's ticket office on Monday, January 12. The soloist for this concert will be Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, prima donna soprano, late of the Stadt Opera House, Leipsic. The programme will consist of modern music, which demands the full orchestra of 75 performers. The composers are Goldmark, Raff, Cowen, Jensen, Liszt, Grieg and Mendelssohn, presenting the music written for Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream." The Cowen Scandinavian symphony will be played. The performance will be up to the highest standard.

[illegible] Pa.

Date 1-5

A feature of the next Boston Symphony Concert, which will take place at the Academy of Music on Wednesday week, will be the appearance as the soloist of Mrs. Nikisch, wife of the director. Mrs. Nikisch sang at a chamber concert in this city last month and made a distinctly favorable impression. She is blessed with a pretty face, attractive manners and a pleasing appearance. Her voice is a mezzo soprano of ample volume and agreeable quality, which has evidently been carefully cultivated, and she sings with a degree of dramatic intensity which is accounted for by her former connection with the lyric stage. The room at Haseltine's Galleries, where she was heard here before, was too small for her to sing with the best effect; it will be interesting to hear her in the spacious Academy. Apart from the soloist, the concert promises to be very enjoyable, as the programme comprises, in Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" numbers, some of the loveliest music ever written.

Clipping from Inquirer Philada.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

A feature of the next Boston Symphony Concert, which will take place at the Academy of Music on Wednesday week, will be the appearance as the soloist of Mrs. Nikisch, wife of the director. Mrs. Nikisch sang at a chamber concert in this city last month and made a distinctly favorable impression. She is blessed with a pretty face, attractive manners and a pleasing appearance. Her voice is a mezzo soprano of ample volume and agreeable quality, which has evidently been carefully cultivated, and she sings with a degree of dramatic intensity which is accounted for by her former connection with the lyric stage. The room at Haseltine's Galleries, where she was heard here before, was too small for her to sing with the best effect; it will be interesting to hear her in the spacious Academy. Apart from the soloist, the concert promises to be very enjoyable, as the programme comprises, in Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" numbers, some of the loveliest music ever written.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
—A WEEKLY PAPER—
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 7, 1891.

A TRAVELING concert company which for several seasons past has been misappropriating the title of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, by denominating itself the Boston Symphony Orchestral Club, recently came to grief at Ashville, N. C., and disbanded there, ending its "Grand Transcontinental Tour," as it was called. There was no legitimate reason for calling the organization "Boston Symphony Orchestral," or any title playing upon the name of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, except that the use of such a name would be, from its very nature, misleading, and consequently would attract business under a pretense, based upon the name of the organization, that was false. The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been kept busy in answering inquiries relative to this club with its spurious title, but neither Mr. Ellis nor Mr. Comee could afford to pay any active attention to the exposing of such a scheme. As men of intelligence they knew that it was a mere matter of a short time and the orchestral club would be compelled to go to the wall.

Some artists who were to join the now stranded club refused to fulfill their contracts unless the title was changed and such artists, for instance, as Mr. De Sève, who allied themselves with the scheme regret it very much. They should have refused in the very beginning to lend their presence or consent to an enterprise that was launched with the determination to make money out of the renowned name of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by wrongfully appropriating its title. We may as well state that certain musical journals aided and abetted the scheme, but it appears that their support did not give any strength to the humbug. To be consistent, THE MUSICAL COURIER might as well state that the Boston Symphony Orchestral Club was a stencil and stencils MUST go. In fact this latest one is gone where the woodbine twineth and where the maxdoodle mourneth for its last bourne.

A MODERN TRIO.

THE intelligent audience that attends the Boston Symphony concerts at Music Hall in that city was quick to appreciate the musical value of Mr. Richard Burmeister's piano concerto and the masterly command he displayed over the piano at last Saturday night's concert. He received a double recall and was heartily applauded by the orchestra also.

As usual, Mr. Bacon, of the Boston "Herald," with his platitudes, handles Burmeister and his concerto in this manner, which amounts to a confession of ignorance:

> With the army of pianists awaiting recognition at these concerts, it appears an easy matter to secure a more competent player than Mr. Burmeister, and
>
> "There is no manner of doubt,
> No probable, possible shadow of doubt,
> No possible doubt whatever,"

but that Mr. Burmeister could have found a more desirable composition to display his attainments as a pianist. As Mr. Burmeister is on the staff of the Peabody Institute of Baltimore, it may be assumed that his engagement as a soloist was made as a compliment to the musical public of that city; but this might have been more judiciously arranged by confining his appearance to Baltimore. He is evidently a conscientious player, who, in the mastery of the technic of his art, has lost sight of the equal desirability of other characteristics in his playing. He quite often forces his tone beyond a musical quality, and his playing is frequently lacking in clearness and brilliancy. He made his best effort in the astounding finale of the concerto, in which, although the solo player is heavily overweighted by the orchestra, he made a grand display of his technical attainments and ended his performance in a burst of musical pyrotechnics.

Unfortunately Mr. Burmeister's sketch of the concerto was not received in time for publication in Mr. Wilson's analytical remarks upon the program. With such a key to the work, its meaning and worth might be studied out, but a single hearing leaves the average music lover in a sad state of doubt as to what the aim of the composer was in framing his concerto. The work has been played in Detroit, New York and Leipsic, and now Boston can be added to the list as an indorsement for its future career.

The information about the Peabody and that contained in the last sentence are taken by Mr. Bacon from Mr. Wilson's program. Otherwise the remarks are not within the pale of reportorial work, much less do they give to anyone a clue to the character or nature of the concerto or to Mr. Burmeister's performance. Mr. Bacon candidly admits that he depends for his so-called criticisms upon Mr. Wilson's analytical programs, and as these are read at the concerts on Saturday night they anticipate Mr. Bacon's reproduction of Mr. Wilson's ideas in the Boston "Herald."

The truth of the matter is that no artist can receive justice in the columns of the Boston "Herald" unless he or she uses Mr. Bacon's business agency. The case is analogous to that of Mr. Day and the Baltimore "American," for unless the artists engage Mr. Day's services as a manager they can depend upon a censure in the columns of the Baltimore paper. A similar state of affairs exists here with one of the New York daily papers. Critic and manager exist in the one person, and the function of the one influences the writings of the other and vice versa. Mr. Bacon, Mr. Day and the New York party are business men and not men of musical judgment, and the result is that their work destroys the value of their respective papers as mediums of criticisms among the musical people of the three cities in which their operations are conducted. In Baltimore, Mr. Day is interested in Mr. Burmeister's concerts and recitals and in the Baltimore "American" Mr. Burmeister plays well; in Boston, where Mr. Bacon receives no encouragement from Mr. Burmeister, the latter is no pianist. As a consequence of such a system the approval of the Baltimore "American" amounts to the same thing that the censure of the Boston "Herald" amounts to, and so it should be. Mr. Bacon's artists who happen to overlook Mr. Day in Baltimore are treated in the "American" just like the Boston "Herald" treats Mr. Day's customers, who refuse to patronize Mr. Bacon.

We suggest to these two business men to form a copartnership with the New York party, and then run the artists on the mutual plan, with a fair division of the profits, although it is quite probable that after a little while our New York friend, whose capacity for fiscal absorption has long since been demonstrated, would make "pie" of the two provincial managers.

THE MUSICAL COURIER was the first medium through which Mr. Burmeister's concerto was analytically explained to the musical world, and it has since then been indorsed by many of the leading musical critics of Continental Europe, and having heard it repeatedly since its first production, and also last Saturday night in Boston, we are strengthened in our opininion of the solid and substantial musical value of the concerto and are fully convinced of its permanency in the contemporary repertory of piano works. Moreover, we believe it will live long after the days when such men as Bacon, Day and the New York humbug have ceased polluting the columns of newspapers with their contemptible abuse of artists who are not disposed to negotiate with them.

THE NIKISCHES.—The third and last concert but one to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city this season takes place at Chickering Hall next Tuesday evening, January 13. Mrs. Nikisch, wife of the well-known conductor, will be one of the soloists, and will then have her first hearing in New York. The program is as follows: Overture, "Coriolanus," Beethoven; song with orchestral accompaniment, "Traumkoenig und Sein Lieb," Raff; andantino and scherzo from F minor symphony, No. 4, Tschaikowsky; rondo capriccioso for violin, Saint-Saëns; soloist, Mr. T. Adamowski; songs, with piano accompaniment; symphony, "Im Walde," Raff.

Pittsburg Dispatch Sunday, Dec. 11.

Plans for the Future.

During the past week the Mozart Club has got its plans for the rest of the season into more definite shape. Three concerts of the regular season are yet to be given. The customary 'Ballad Concert," which has heretofore come in the early spring, will this season be postponed until the end of May, closing the season. This programme will be made up, as usual, of less extended works, among which will probably figure Mr. Ethelbert Nevin's setting, for chorus, soprano solo and four-hand accompaniment, of Eugene Field's charming "Dutch Lullaby"—the work that failed to arrive in time for last year's ballad concert.

The postponement of this miscellaneous programme has been decided on so that the club may now have a free field for the rehearsal of Verdi's Requiem, which will be given May 1, with one or more eminent foreign soloists and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Requiem will be given complete, without any of the cuts made when the Gounod Club presented it at Library Hall, with only piano accompaniment, back in the '70's. Some considerable excerpts were given by the Gounod Club and the Symphonic Society's Orchestra in the May Festival of 1879 at the old Exposition building, but this will be the first complete production with orchestra of this famous work in Pittsburg.

Assistant Manager Ffed R. Comee, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was in the city on Friday, when the contract was closed, securing that unrivaled organization for the two Mozart Club concerts of April 30 and May 1. The first evening will be a symphony concert, in which Mr. Nikisch and his men will be assisted by one or both of the two prominent singers expected to be engaged for the orchestra's spring tour. One of these, let us hope, will be Mrs. Arthur Nikish, whose recent American successes justify her reputation abroad, and the artistic fitness of the famous conductor's choice of a mate. These concerts, together with the May Festival, promise unprecedented brilliance for the close of this well-filled musical season in Pittsburg.

This Week's Happenings.

Though brevity of space this morning com-

THE REGISTER.
THE NEW HAVEN
WEDNESDAY. JANUARY 7.

At the Hyperion Monday evening the Boston Symphony orchestra with Arthur Nikisch as conductor, will give another of their celebrated concerts. Mrs. Nikisch, prima donna soprano of the Leipsic Stadt theater, will be heard in some selections of great interest. These concerts are always looked forward to with great interest, and a crowded house may be expected Monday evening.

Boston Post

FRIDAY MORNING, JAN. 9, 1891.

MUSIC.

THE CAMBRIDGE CONCERT.

The programme of the fourth concert of the series given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Sanders Theatre last evening was as follows:

Symphony in D major (No. 2, B. & H.)..... Haydn
Aria, "Pensée d'Automne"..... Massenet
Concerto Romantique for violin, op. 35..... Godard
(First time.)
Adagio and Scherzo from the Scandinavian Symphony..... Cowen
Aria, "Pré aux Clercs"..... Hérold
Scherzo Capriccioso..... Dvorak

Miss Gertrude Franklin, in addition to the delightful aria from Hérold's opera, sang a new concert song written by Massenet for Miss Sybil Sanderson, whom, as is well known, he greatly admires, heedless of the solemn warning of the Apocrypha: "Use not much the company of a woman that is a singer, lest thou be taken with her attempts." Although it is dedicated to the fair American, it seems poorly suited to her remarkably high voice, as it lies rather in the middle and lower range. It is not a composition which will become popular at one hearing, but it is a song of real beauty and merit, thoughtfully written and with an ingeniously scored accompaniment. Miss Franklin sang it admirably, and in the aria from "Pré aux Clercs," to which Mr. Kneisel played the obbligato, her bravura was pure, clean and brilliant. She was recalled twice after each selection.

Mr. Loeffler played Godard's concerto with warmth of tone and an easy mastery of all technical difficulties. The canzonetta, an exquisite little movement, delighted the audience, and Mr. Loeffler was most heartily applauded. The first movement seemed so disjointed and purposeless that its performance gave rise to the suspicion that it had been cut to bring the concert within the accustomed hour and a half. The last movement barely escapes triviality.

The orchestral numbers, all of a popular nature, were well played. The next concert will be given Jan. 29.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, JAN. 9.

SYMPHONY FOR CANTABS.

Fourth Concert Brings Enthusiasm from Lovers of Music.

The fourth of the Cambridge concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Sanders Theatre last evening before an audience which completely filled the building.

The soloists were Miss Gertrude Franklin and Mr. C. M. Loeffler, and they were very pleasantly received.

The programme as arranged by Mr. Nikisch was as follows:

Symphony in D major (No. 2, B. and H)....Haydn
Adagio; allegro—andante—minuet—allegro spiritoso.
Aria, Pensee d'Automne..... Massenet
Concerto romantique for violin, op. 35....Godard
Allegretto moderato; recitativo; adagio—Canzonetta—allegro molto.
(First time.)
Adagio and scherzo from the Scandinavian Symphony..... Cowen
Aria, Pre aux Clercs..... Herold
Scherzo Cappricioso..... Dvorak

Mr. Loeffler was heard in a violin concerto, played for the first time, and made a good impression, although the piece did not give him opportunities to show his best work. Miss Franklin sang the two arias allotted to her with her customary sweetness, and was recalled after each number.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1890-91.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 8TH, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

HAYDN.	SYMPHONY in D major, (No. 2, B. & H.) Adagio; Allegro.—Andante.—Minuet.—Allegro spiritoso.
MASSENET.	ARIA. "Pensée d' Automne."
GODARD.	CONCERTO ROMANTIQUE FOR VIOLIN, op. 35. Allegretto moderato; Recitativo; Adagio.—Canzonetta.—Allegro molto. (First time.)
COWEN.	ADAGIO AND SCHERZO from the SCANDINAVIAN SYMPHONY.
HEROLD.	ARIA. "Pre aux Clercs."
DVOŘÁK.	SCHERZO CAPPRICCIOSO.

SOLOISTS:

MISS GERTRUDE FRANKLIN.

MR. C. M. LOEFFLER.

The Beacon.

BOSTON. SATURDAY. JAN. 10, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

In the eleventh Symphony concert Mr. Nikisch gave American music a chance—for the piano-forte concerto then introduced to Boston has been accepted elsewhere as such, because its author is a resident professor at Baltimore, although his earlier musical life was passed abroad. Mr. Richard Burmeister has written a work which commands attention, interests, pleases and wins respect and applause. While it is evidently less the product of inspiration than of deliberation, it shows fertile imagination in its ideas and musicianly discretion in their treatment. What is perhaps its most notable characteristic is the impression of naturalness and appositeness which it gives and leaves. While one often feels that an episode or a progression, or an alternation of orchestra and solo instrument, was determined by the author's intellect and taste, one also feels that according both to logic and fancy the composer has done the best thing possible, and therefore has produced the effect of spontaneousness, even when his work must have been most studied. The concerto is thoroughly modern in manner and temperament; the piano is almost constantly to be heard, vying with the orchestra, but not in aggressive contention, and within the three movements are frequent changes of tempo and of color which give variety but do not imperil unity. The slow movement and the intermezzo, which is in the fashion of a scherzo and runs directly into the finale, are the most beautiful and fanciful parts of the work, although there is good material richly wrought in the first movement; the last movement, cast as a march, is rather ordinary in its themes, but makes compensation by the enthusiastic and almost splendid increase of volume and of speed which it develops. The pianist who plays it requires the best modern technique and must be especially strong and ready with his octaves and full chords, many most important passages being dependent on these. Mr. Burmeister's playing was entirely competent at all points of execution, and in the middle movements he had all sweetness and delicacy; but at times his touch was hard and his hand severe, dulling the vibrations and forcing the tone of his instrument. The orchestral part was pretty well read, but Mr. Nikisch did not always keep abreast of Mr. Burmeister, and his men were too often a little behind the piano, holding it back and giving hesitancy to the passages thus reluctantly approached. The concert began with Liszt's "Tasso," which there was no valid reason for reproducing. Mr. Nikisch's disposition to the sensational is not justification enough for playing over this melodramatic poem while so much better music waits unheard. There are moments of splendor in the composition, and others which must impress any but leathern nerves; there are bits of sweet sentiment and bursts of power; but the work poses and tires, and its long-drawn wails are too many and too obviously bent upon effect. Once heard, such a thing stirs, piques and even delights; repeated often, it wearies and its secrets reveal themselves, and it falls, as this repetition did, flat and dead with scarcely the sound of a pair of palms. Raff's "Woods" symphony ended the concert, and was played well, some of the lighter portions having a softness and serenity which have become almost unknown quantities under Mr. Nikisch's baton. At the concert of tonight Mr. Adamowski will play Wieniawski's D-minor violin concerto; for the orchestra are set down three familiar things—Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, MacKenzie's "La Belle Dame sans Merci" ballad, and the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz, who seems to be about the only Frenchman of whom the Symphony audiences are to be allowed to hear anything.

The last concert of the Adamowski Quartette was very interesting, although in the Mozart work the playing was not always so smooth and even as that music requires. Mr. Perabo's co-operation was of great value, for he did his part with great devotion and extreme elegance.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 10, 1891.

The Adamowski Quartet.

The third and last of the third season of these interesting concerts took place in Steinert Hall on Monday evening, Jan. 5. The quartet is still composed of T. Adamowski, first violin; A. Moldauer, second violin; Max Zach, viola; and J. Adamowski, 'cello. An audience, large for a stormy night, and flattering in quality, listened with unflagging interest to the following choice programme:

Mozart—Quartet in C (Köchel, 465, Peters, No. 17.)
Piano Solos:
Schumann—Op. 99, Bunte Blätter.
(a) No. 2, "Sehr rasch."
(b) No. 3, "Frisch."
(c) "Nicht Schnell mit Innigkeit."
Schubert—Scherzo from Sonata, Op. 53.
Scharwenka—Op. 37, Quartet for piano and strings, in F.
Pianist, Mr. Ernst Perabo.

Mozart's quartet in C, the last of the six dedicated to his master, Haydn, the fruit of his most earnest effort in this form of composition, is by many regarded as the best of his string quartets (few compared with the eighty or ninety composed by Haydn). Haydn gave a model of the quartet; but Mozart, in ideal contents and significance, made it the vehicle of higher aspirations. This one in C is all serenity and sunshine. It has that stamp of perfection, of unsullied and unfailing beauty, which seems a thing of nature and of instinct with Mozart. Yet he was a self-criticizing and laborious artist; he pondered deeply and he studied even in his apparently spontaneous creations, which seem to have come so readily at his call.

We have called this quartet one of serenity and sunshine, yet the light steals from a cloud, as it were. It opens with a brooding, melancholy introduction, a short Adagio in ¾, which sounds strange for Mozart, as if in some depressed mood, while at odds with destiny, he had unconsciously anticipated certain traits of the most morbid modern writing. Its harmony is even harsh, owing to one or two "false relations," which subjected him to bitter censure from some of the technical, pedantic critics of his day; but of which wise Father Haydn only said, "If Mozart wrote it, he must have had his reasons." We, who have grown familiar with Schumann, Brahms, etc., listen without a murmur and with full faith that Mozart is coming out all right. And so indeed he does. The Allegro, in common measure, glides like a sunbeam from the cloud, illuming and enlivening all. How exquisite the grace and beauty of the movement! What enchanting phrases! What refinement and delicacy of finish! It seems all inspired at once; the whole and perfect product of one happy moment. The four instruments drink from the same fountain, and bear their equal share in the distribution of the shining liquid element. The second subject, in G, with its triplets, makes a happy contrast. After the repeat, the "working up," taking on a tinge of pensive sentiment with the introduction of the B-flat, is most subtle and artistic, disturbing not at all the cheerful, happy flow of the movement as a whole.

In the Andante cantabile, 3-4, in F, as Otto Jahn (Mozart's biographer) truly says, the noble, manly, cheerful frame of mind expressed so far, "rises to an almost supernatural serenity." The music has the entrancing loveliness of the pure surface of a lake, in which are mirrored all the blending hues of sunset. Words cannot express music, or we would try to summon back the beautiful effect of a figure in sixteenths with which the bass prepares and accompanies (pianissimo) the motive in the upper parts through many bars; it seems to whisper, "Hush! hear this." The Minuet and Trio are elegant and bold. A charming, most Mozartean feature in the former is the arch, gracefully gliding codetta at the end of each of its short movements. The last movement, Allegro molto, is full of spirit and fine musical ideas. We can only cite the beautiful surprise (twice) when, after a passage in sixteenths, the first violin is left alone, and its closing note is raised half a tone, bringing in a wholly new key with a mystical and marvellous charm. The quartet was played with sympathetic verve and fineness.

Mr. Perabo never played with truer taste and feeling, nor more charmingly than in the three very original and difficult little "Album Leaves" by Schumann. Seldom or never have we listened to a piano solo more delightful than this rendering of the Scherzo and Trio from Schubert's Sonata in D. All the strength of its first theme and the exquisite beauty of the second were brought out in admirable contrast, without any overdoing. The style was chaste and self-possessed, while it was played con amore, making the audience feel with him.

The quartet for piano and strings by Scharwenka was far more interesting than we had expected. Having no acquaintance with such a work but a single hearing, we cannot enter into particulars. But all four movements (Allegro moderato, Adagio, Allegro vivace, and Allegro con fuoco) impressed us as original and full of force and delicacy. Mr. Perabo played the difficult piano part splendidly, making it nowhere too prominent, and he was well seconded by the other artists. Evidently the piece was heartily enjoyed; and the whole concert was a triumph for the Adamowski club. People lingered in the hall, as if it were hard to realize or to accept the conclusion of so delightful a short season.

J. S. D.

The following are the arrangements for solo performers at the Symphony Orchestra concerts in the Music Hall: Jan. 24, Mrs. Hopekirk, pianoforte; Jan. 31, Mrs. Nikisch, soprano; Feb. 7, Mr. Scharwenka, pianoforte.

ON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 10, 1891

It would seem as though the programs of the Symphony concerts were made up to suit alternately the admirers of the old school and the disciples of the new. After homage has been paid in one and the same concert to Beethoven, Schubert and Mendelssohn, attention is paid to Liszt and Raff with their program music and to Mr. Burmeister, who is of the eclectic sect with leanings towards the ultra radicals. Would not a judicious mixture of styles at each concert be more to the purpose?

* * * * *

The program of the eleventh concert given last Saturday evening at Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphonic Poem, "Tasso".....Liszt
Concerto for piano and orchestra, in D Minor.
....Burmeister
Symphony No. 3 "Im Walde".....Raff

Mr. Richard Burmeister of Baltimore played his concerto, which was heard for the first time in this city. He is a pianist who shows more mechanical skill than that mysterious quality known as sympathy, or magnetism, or what-you-will. His technique is admirable, and his bravura as seen in octave and scale passages is clear and brilliant. His phrasing is musician-like, and his demeanor is modest. The composition is in four movements, of which the lento and the intermezzo are the most pleasing. The dialogue between orchestra and piano in the former, and the grace of the latter are charming. The last movement is commonplace, and the first, an allegro with a short introductory andante, is well written and thoughtful. The difficulties found throughout the work were played with ease by the composer, who was twice recalled after the finale.

* * * * *

THE REGISTER.

NEW HAVEN EVENING

FRIDAY, JANUARY 9, 189

The sale of seats for the coming concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra next Monday evening is progressing finely and a large number have been disposed of. The program as arranged, which includes Mr. Arthur Nikisch as the soloist, promises to afford a rare musical treat and is attracting more than usual attention. There are still a number of good seats remaining at M. Steinert's music store.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY. JAN. 11, 1891.

ADAMOWSKI WAS SOLOIST.

Twelfth Concert in the Symphony Series—A Charming Programme.

Although many distinguished violinists have found a home in Boston since Mr. Timothie Adamowski first won applause here, the popularity of the Polish artist has been steadily sustained; and the music-loving public of this city always hears him with great pleasure. Mr. Adamowski was the soloist at the Symphony rehearsal and concert last week, and received many flattering evidences of success and generous appreciation.

In a peculiar degree the soloist seemed to be in sympathy with his work—the concerto in D minor by Wieniawski, himself a Pole. Mr. Adamowski has seldom, if ever, played with more fervor or feeling. The romance in particular was beautifully given. Due effect, also, was secured in the gypsy dance themes. When it is said that a rehearsal audience, proverbially undemonstrative, recalled the soloist twice, it will be readily understood that Mr. Adamowski attained a very decided and well-merited popular success.

Mendelssohn's beautiful "Italian" symphony—a delight from beginning to end—was played in the best manner of the orchestra. Mackenzie's interesting and impressive ballad, "The Fair Merciless One," added to Mr. Nikisch's and the musicians' honors, and Berlioz' brilliant and characteristic overture to his opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," completed the very enjoyable programme.

Once more the Boston Symphony orchestra is to journey to New York and other cities to gain honors well assured already. On its return, on the 23d or 24th inst., Mr. Arthur Foote's overture, "Francesca da Rimini," is to have its first hearing here. Mrs. Helen Hope Kirk, a pianist to be cordially greeted, will perform with the orchestra a concerto by Tschaikovsky. The symphony will be Tolkmann's, in D minor.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 11.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concerts.

The programme of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra should have satisfied the most exacting stickler for variety in respect to the nationality of the composers represented at these concerts. There was but one work by a German, and that was Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony. It was followed by the violin concerto in D minor, by Wieniawski, a Pole; the Ballade for orchestra, "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," by Mackenzie, a Scotchman; and the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," by Berlioz, a Frenchman. It was a brilliant and interesting concert, that afforded pleasure from beginning to end. The gay and genial Mendelssohn symphony was never more perfectly played here, and it has seldom had as fine and as sympathetic a reading. The Mackenzie Ballade, a fine work that gains immensely on a second hearing, was splendidly interpreted, and with great beauty and richness of color. The Berlioz overture was given in a noble style, and with a clearness and impressiveness that did it full justice. The orchestra was at its best, and its work throughout had a higher finish than has characterized it at any of its earlier performances of the season, and it was more frequently and more heartily applauded. Mr. Adamowski was the soloist, and in this concert he reached the highest point of technical excellence, that he has as yet manifested. His playing was steadily brilliant, clear and artistic; sincere in sentiment, broad in style and praiseworthy in every essential. It wholly deserved the enthusiastic applause that rewarded it, and the three vigorous recalls by which the audience testified their appreciation of the artist's success. At the next concert will be given: Overture, "Francesca da Rimini," by Arthur Foote, (first time); concerto for pianoforte, by Tschaikowski, and Symphony, D minor, Volkmann. The soloist will be Mme. Helen Hopekirk.

1752

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1890-91.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 8TH, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

HAYDN.	SYMPHONY in D major, (No. 2, B. & H.) Adagio; Allegro.—Andante.—Minuet.—Allegro spiritoso.
MASSENET.	ARIA. "Pensée d' Automne."
GODARD.	CONCERTO ROMANTIQUE for Violin, op. 35. Allegretto moderato; Recitativo: Adagio.—Canzonetta.—Allegro molto. (First time.)
COWEN.	ADAGIO and SCHERZO from the Scandinavian Symphony.
HEROLD.	ARIA. "Pre aux Clercs."
DVOŘÁK.	SCHERZO CAPPRICCIOSO.

SOLOISTS:

MISS GERTRUDE FRANKLIN.

MR. C. M. LOEFFLER.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 10, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

In the eleventh Symphony concert Mr. Nikisch gave American music a chance—for the piano-forte concerto then introduced to Boston has been accepted elsewhere as such, because its author is a resident professor at Baltimore, although his earlier musical life was passed abroad. Mr. Richard Burmeister has written a work which commands attention, interests, pleases and wins respect and applause. While it is evidently less the product of inspiration than of deliberation, it shows fertile imagination in its ideas and musicianly discretion in their treatment. What is perhaps its most notable characteristic is the impression of naturalness and appositeness which it gives and leaves. While one often feels that an episode or a progression, or an alternation of orchestra and solo instrument, was determined by the author's intellect and taste, one also feels that according both to logic and fancy the composer has done the best thing possible, and therefore has produced the effect of spontaneousness, even when his work must have been most studied. The concerto is thoroughly modern in manner and temperament; the piano is almost constantly to be heard, vying with the orchestra, but not in aggressive contention, and within the three movements are frequent changes of tempo and of color which give variety but do not imperil unity. The slow movement and the intermezzo, which is in the fashion of a scherzo and runs directly into the finale, are the most beautiful and fanciful parts of the work, although there is good material richly wrought in the first movement; the last movement, cast as a march, is rather ordinary in its themes, but makes compensation by the enthusiastic and almost splendid increase of volume and of speed which it develops. The pianist who plays it requires the best modern technique and must be especially strong and ready with his octaves and full chords, many most important passages being dependent on these. Mr. Burmeister's playing was entirely competent at all points of execution, and in the middle movements he had all sweetness and delicacy; but at times his touch was hard and his hand severe, dulling the vibrations and forcing the tone of his instrument. The orchestral part was pretty well read, but Mr. Nikisch did not always keep abreast of Mr. Burmeister, and his men were too often a little behind the piano, holding it back and giving hesitancy to the passages thus reluctantly approached. The concert began with Liszt's "Tasso," which there was no valid reason for reproducing. Mr. Nikisch's disposition to the sensational is not justification enough for playing over this melodramatic poem while so much better music waits unheard. There are moments of splendor in the composition, and others which must impress any but leathern nerves; there are bits of sweet sentiment and bursts of power; but the work poses and tires, and its long-drawn wails are too many and too obviously bent upon effect. Once heard, such a thing stirs, piques and even delights; repeated often, it wearies and its secrets reveal themselves, and it fails, as this repetition did, flat and dead with scarcely the sound of a pair of palms. Raff's "Woods" symphony ended the concert, and was played well, some of the lighter portions having a softness and serenity which have become almost unknown quantities under Mr. Nikisch's baton. At the concert of tonight Mr. Adamowski will play Wieniawski's D-minor violin concerto; for the orchestra are set down three familiar things—Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, MacKenzie's "La Belle Dame sans Merci" ballad, and the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz, who seems to be about the only Frenchman of whom the Symphony audiences are to be allowed to hear anything.

The last concert of the Adamowski Quartette was very interesting, although in the Mozart work the playing was not always so smooth and even as that music requires. Mr. Perabo's co-operation was of great value, for he did his part with great devotion and extreme elegance.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, JANUARY 10, 1891.

The Adamowski Quartet.

The third and last of the third season of these interesting concerts took place in Steinert Hall on Monday evening, Jan. 5. The quartet is still composed of T. Adamowski, first violin; A. Moldauer, second violin; Max Zach, viola; and J. Adamowski, 'cello. An audience, large for a stormy night, and flattering in quality, listened with unflagging interest to the following choice programme:

Mozart—Quartet in C (Köchel, 465, Peters, No. 17.)
Piano Solos:
Schumann—Op. 99, Bunte Blätter.
(a) No. 2, "Sehr rasch."
(b) No. 3, "Frisch."
(c) "Nicht Schnell mit Innigkeit."
Schubert—Scherzo from Sonata, Op. 53.
Scharwenka—Op. 37, Quartet for piano and strings, in F.
Pianist, Mr. Ernst Perabo.

Mozart's quartet in C, the last of the six dedicated to his master, Haydn, the fruit of his most earnest effort in this form of composition, is by many regarded as the best of his string quartets (few compared with the eighty or ninety composed by Haydn). Haydn gave a model of the quartet; but Mozart, in ideal contents and significance, made it the vehicle of higher aspirations. This one in C is all serenity and sunshine. It has that stamp of perfection, of unsullied and unfailing beauty, which seems a thing of nature and of instinct with Mozart. Yet he was a self-criticizing and laborious artist; he pondered deeply and he studied even in his apparently spontaneous creations, which seem to have come so readily at his call.

We have called this quartet one of serenity and sunshine, yet the light steals from a cloud, as it were. It opens with a brooding, melancholy introduction, a short Adagio in ¾, which sounds strange for Mozart, as if in some depressed mood, while at odds with destiny, he had unconsciously anticipated certain traits of the most morbid modern writing. Its harmony is even harsh, owing to one or two "false relations," which subjected him to bitter censure from some of the technical, pedantic critics of his day; but of which wise Father Haydn only said, "If Mozart wrote it, he must have had his reasons." We, who have grown familiar with Schumann, Brahms, etc., listen without a murmur and with full faith that Mozart is coming out all right. And so indeed he does. The Allegro, in common measure, glides like a sunbeam from the cloud, illuming and enlivening all. How exquisite the grace and beauty of the movement! What enchanting phrases! What refinement and delicacy of finish! It seems all inspired at once; the whole and perfect product of one happy moment. The four instruments drink from the same fountain, and bear their equal share in the distribution of the shining liquid element. The second subject, in G, with its triplets, makes a happy contrast. After the repeat, the "working up," taking on a tinge of pensive sentiment with the introduction of the B-flat, is most subtle and artistic, disturbing not at all the cheerful, happy flow of the movement as a whole.

In the Andante cantabile, 3-4, in F, as Otto Jahn (Mozart's biographer) truly says, the nobly manly, cheerful frame of mind expressed so far, "rises to an almost supernatural serenity." The music has the entrancing loveliness of the pure surface of a lake, in which are mirrored all the blending hues of sunset. Words cannot express music, or we would try to summon back the beautiful effect of a figure in sixteenths with which the bass prepares and accompanies (pianissimo) the motive in the upper parts through many bars; it seems to whisper, "Hush! hear this." The Minuet and Trio are elegant and bold. A charming, most Mozartean feature in the former is the arch, gracefully gliding codetta at the end of each of its short movements. The last movement, Allegro molto, is full of spirit and fine musical ideas. We can only cite the beautiful surprise (twice) when, after a passage in sixteenths, the first violin is left alone, and its closing note is raised half a tone, bringing in a wholly new key with a mystical and marvellous charm. The quartet was played with sympathetic verve and fineness.

Mr. Perabo never played with truer taste and feeling, nor more charmingly than in the three very original and difficult little "Album Leaves" by Schumann. Seldom or never have we listened to a piano solo more delightful than this rendering of the Scherzo and Trio from Schubert's Sonata in D. All the strength of its first theme and the exquisite beauty of the second were brought out in admirable contrast, without any overdoing. The style was chaste and self-possessed, while it was played con amore, making the audience feel with him.

The quartet for piano and strings by Scharwenka was far more interesting than we had expected. Having no acquaintance with such a work but a single hearing, we cannot enter into particulars. But all four movements (Allegro moderato, Adagio, Allegro vivace, and Allegro con fuoco) impressed us as original and full of force and delicacy. Mr. Perabo played the difficult piano part splendidly, making it nowhere too prominent, and he was well seconded by the other artists. Evidently the piece was heartily enjoyed; and the whole concert was a triumph for the Adamowski club. People lingered in the hall, as if it were hard to realize or to accept the conclusion of so delightful a short season.

J. S. D.

The following are the arrangements for solo performers at the Symphony Orchestra concerts in the Music Hall: Jan. 24, Mrs. Hopekirk, pianoforte; Jan. 31, Mrs. Nikisch, soprano; Feb. 7, Mr. Scharwenka, pianoforte.

ON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 10, 1891

It would seem as though the programs of the Symphony concerts were made up to suit alternately the admirers of the old school and the disciples of the new. After homage has been paid in one and the same concert to Beethoven, Schubert and Mendelssohn, attention is paid to Liszt and Raff with their program music and to Mr. Burmeister, who is of the eclectic sect with leanings towards the ultra radicals. Would not a judicious mixture of styles at each concert be more to the purpose?

* * * * *

The program of the eleventh concert given last Saturday evening at Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphonic Poem, "Tasso".....Liszt
Concerto for piano and orchestra, in D Minor.
....Burmeister
Symphony No. 3 "Im Walde".....Raff

Mr. Richard Burmeister of Baltimore played his concerto, which was heard for the first time in this city. He is a pianist who shows more mechanical skill than that mysterious quality known as sympathy, or magnetism, or what-you-will. His technique is admirable, and his bravura as seen in octave and scale passages is clear and brilliant. His phrasing is musician-like, and his demeanor is modest. The composition is in four movements, of which the lento and the intermezzo are the most pleasing. The dialogue between orchestra and piano in the former, and the grace of the latter are charming. The last movement is commonplace, and the first, an allegro with a short introductory andante, is well written and thoughtful. The difficulties found throughout the work were played with ease by the composer, who was twice recalled after the finale.

* * * * *

THE REGISTER.

NEW HAVEN EVENING

FRIDAY, JANUARY 9.

The sale of seats for the coming concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra next Monday evening is progressing finely and a large number have been disposed of. The program as arranged, which includes Mrs. Arthur Nikisch as the soloist, promises to afford a rare musical treat and is attracting more than usual attention. There are still a number of good seats remaining at M. Steinert's music store.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, JAN. 11, 1891.

ADAMOWSKI WAS SOLOIST.

Twelfth Concert in the Symphony Series—A Charming Programme.

Although many distinguished violinists have found a home in Boston since Mr. Timothie Adamowski first won applause here, the popularity of the Polish artist has been steadily sustained; and the music-loving public of this city always hears him with great pleasure. Mr. Adamowski was the soloist at the Symphony rehearsal and concert last week, and received many flattering evidences of success and generous appreciation.

In a peculiar degree the soloist seemed to be in sympathy with his work—the concerto in D minor by Wieniawski, himself a Pole. Mr. Adamowski has seldom, if ever, played with more fervor or feeling. The romance in particular was beautifully given. Due effect, also, was secured in the gypsy dance themes. When it is said that a rehearsal audience, proverbially undemonstrative, recalled the soloist twice, it will be readily understood that Mr. Adamowski attained a very decided and well-merited popular success.

Mendelssohn's beautiful "Italian" symphony—a delight from beginning to end—was played in the best manner of the orchestra. Mackenzie's interesting and impressive ballad, "The Fair Merciless One," added to Mr. Nikisch's and the musicians' honors, and Berlioz' brilliant and characteristic overture to his opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," completed the very enjoyable programme.

Once more the Boston Symphony orchestra is to journey to New York and other cities to gain honors well assured already. On its return, on the 23d or 24th inst., Mr. Arthur Foote's overture, "Francesca da Rimini," is to have its first hearing here. Mrs. Helen Hope Kirk, a pianist to be cordially greeted, will perform with the orchestra a concerto by Tschaikovsky. The symphony will be Tolkmann's, in D minor.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 11.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concerts.

The programme of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra should have satisfied the most exacting stickler for variety in respect to the nationality of the composers represented at these concerts. There was but one work by a German, and that was Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony. It was followed by the violin concerto in D minor, by Wieniawski, a Pole; the Ballade for orchestra, "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," by Mackenzie, a Scotchman; and the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," by Berlioz, a Frenchman. It was a brilliant and interesting concert, that afforded pleasure from beginning to end. The gay and genial Mendelssohn symphony was never more perfectly played here, and it has seldom had as fine and as sympathetic a reading. The Mackenzie Ballade, a fine work that gains immensely on a second hearing, was splendidly interpreted, and with great beauty and richness of color. The Berlioz overture was given in a noble style, and with a clearness and impressiveness that did it full justice. The orchestra was at its best, and its work throughout had a higher finish than has characterized it at any of its earlier performances of the season, and it was more frequently and more heartily applauded. Mr. Adamowski was the soloist, and in this concert he reached the highest point of technical excellence, that he has as yet manifested. His playing was steadily brilliant, clear and artistic; sincere in sentiment, broad in style and praiseworthy in every essential. It wholly deserved the enthusiastic applause that rewarded it, and the three vigorous recalls by which the audience testified their appreciation of the artist's success. At the next concert will be given: Overture, "Francesca da Rimini," by Arthur Foote, (first time); concerto for pianoforte, by Tschaikowski, and Symphony, D minor, Volkmann. The soloist will be Mme. Helen Hopekirk.

[75]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 11, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY.

A Scotchman held the post of honor, in orchestral novelties, at the twelfth rehearsal and concert. Dr. A. C. McKenzie, principal of the Royal Academy of Music, London, is the composer of a ballade for orchestra, "La Belle Dame, sans Merci," the subject being suggested by Keats's poem which bears that name. What a misfortune, by the way, it really is for a musician, in spite of the high sounding title, to have the degree of Doctor (of anything) conferred upon him. It never helps his music to sound any better, and it is dangerously apt to stir up in the listener's mind unpleasant recollections of sickness and physic, which are not unlikely to be interwoven with the thoughts or emotions aroused by his productions. In truth, some of the works or these "Doctors" (and, for the matter of that, of Professors and other Titled Personages,) are pretty bitter doses to swallow.

Mackenzie's music, however, (to take the liberty of dropping his title) is not to be classed among the bitter pills. It is an effective symphonic poem, which does not require close following of the verses that inspired its composition, to render it intelligible. It is somewhat difficult at a first hearing to discover in it those elements which led a writer in the London Athenæum, after listening to a performance of his opera, "The Troubador," to assert that he had "shown the possession of genius as distinguished from highly cultivated talent." Its treatment is eminently modern, and the orchestration is full, calling upon the harp, tuba and triangle, but it seems to possess no especial character, unless a decided leaning towards Liszt and Wagner imparts to it that quality. It is, in brief, a work cosmopolitan in its nature and rather strained in its sentiment. The performance was good, and to its brilliancy and the poem, which was given in full in the programme book, must be ascribed much of the applause it received.

The symphony with which the concert opened was the "Italian" of Mendelssohn. The allegro and the saltarello were perhaps taken at a faster tempo than usual, but they have been played before with greater finish. Still, the vigor and dash which characterized Mr. Nikisch's reading atoned for an occasional raggedness in the execution. The charming andante, and the graceful, minuet-like third movement were delightfully rendered, the horn and trumpet playing in the trio of the latter being particularly fine.

Following the symphony came Wieniawski's second concerto for violin, opus 22. The name of this famous violinist revives recollections of his visit here in 1872. Among other extraordinary performances of his, that of the Kreutzer Sonata with Rubinstein possessed one notable feature that helped to fix it ineffaceably in the minds of some that heard it. The last movement was hardly well under way when snap went a violin string. Naturally, a halt was expected, with the customary restringing and tuning. But to everybody's surprise nothing of the sort occurred. The performance went straight on to the end with all imaginable ease and vigor, and at its close Rubinstein rose from his seat and grasped the hand of his companion with a heartiness that gave delightful proof of the artist's appreciation of such an instance of consummate ability. What a reading of the work was that! With never a note before them, these two giants revealed the meaning of the fiery prestos and the heavenly andante in a manner that was nothing short of perfection. There was no pulling apart, no contrariness of mood. Each was in thorough sympathy with the other; when one had the theme, the other was simply the warm, responsive accompanist. Would musical Boston suffer two such men to pass unnoticed through the city today? Yet this concert was given to a "beggarly array of empty benches."

The concerto in question is characteristic of the composer's style of playing; broad, impassioned, with moments of serenely charming melody. Compared with the modern works of this class to which we have become accustomed of late, it seems a little antiquated; nevertheless, it contains much that still interests. Mr. T. Adamowski played it with much refinement, and displayed an easy command of its difficulties. His rendering of the beautiful romance was imbued with all the grace and taste that are his; in parts of the other movements requiring strength and fiery animation, the overlightness of his touch was apparent. The audience rewarded his efforts with much applause.

Berlioz's overture to his opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," was the last number. One of his strongest instrumental works, its superiority in point of character to the Symphonie Fantastique is plainly evident. The heroic and successful attempt of Liszt, in 1852, to revive this opera, and its performances within the past ten years under Von Bulow, Nikisch and Mottl, are significant of the esteem with which Berlioz is regarded by advanced musicians of the day. The overture was splendidly given, Mr. Nikisch's grasp of its matter being unmistakable.

T. P. CURRIER.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

The third and last concert of the season was given in Steinert Hall last Monday evening. The most interesting programme of the series was presented. Mozart's quartet for strings in C. (Peters No. 17) was the opening number. The discussions that this work excited among the critics and musicians at the time of its appearance are well known, and in these days of wholesale breaking of the laws of composition that were then held to be inviolable, are sufficiently amusing. The remark of Sarti, however, concerning the six quartets, of which this is the last, "can more be done to put the players out of tune!" may perhaps indicate the cause of the uneven playing on this occasion. At all events considerable untunefulness was noticeable, although not to the extent that has prevailed at the preceding concert.

Xaver Scharwenka's quartet for piano and strings, in F, opus 37, on the contrary, received a very satisfactory performance. It is a fine work, dramatic and inspiring musically, and in treatment, full of power and brilliancy. The wonderfully beautiful adagio is the movement of the four, although the first and the finale are on the whole, not far behind in interest. The vivace has not the taking qualities that are usually looked for in the light movement of the chamber composition. Mr. Ernst Perabo was the pianist; and it may be said at once that he was at his best in his rendering of the piano part, playing with all the breadth, expressiveness and artistic discretion for which he is noted. The ensemble was almost wholly excellent. The adagio in particular was interpreted in a manner entirely in keeping with its character; and here also, the finer qualities of Mr. Adamowski's violin playing shone with especial clearness.

Between the two concerted numbers Mr. Perabo's exquisite taste and rare sentiment were displayed in three of Schumann's Bunte Blatte, and the scherzo from sonata opus 53, by Schubert, his charming playing winning for him a hearty recall. The audience was fair in numbers and fine in quality despite the storm.

MUSIC NOTES.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the twelfth symphony concert given at Music Hall Saturday evening was as follows:

Symphony in A. (Italian) ..... Mendelssohn
Concerto for violin in D minor ..... Wieniawski
Mr. Adamowski.
Ballade for orchestra—"La Belle Dame sans Merci" ..... Mackenzie
Overture—"Benvenuto Cellini" ..... Berlioz

It will be seen by a glance at this programme that the concert was diversified and well-arranged. The symphony, though it is familiar, is a welcome number, and in one respect at least it might serve as a model and a reproof to modern composers: the proportions of the movements are such that not one of them seems diffuse or too long, and the whole composition satisfies the ear instead of wearying it.

The concerto of Wieniawski is a work of genuine musical worth, which gives opportunity for the display of the virtuoso's skill, while the ballade and overture are noteworthy examples of the English and French schools. And the playing of the orchestra from the beginning of the concert to the end, for its breadth and its delicacy, for its warmth of color and its degree of finish, calls for hearty and unalloyed praise.

The least known number of the programme was Mackenzie's ballade "La Belle Dame sans Merci," which should be a musical illustration of Keats's poem of the same title. This Scotch-English composer is undeniably a man of parts. He has studied; he is industrious. But, as is seen in this ballade, he lacks two important, indispensable qualities: individuality and passionate imagination. Now, the value of individuality cannot be overestimated. That disagreeable young man, Mr. George Moore, in his "Confessions," a curious compound of shrewd sayings and flippant untruths strongly leavened with a boyish desire to shock the British matron, boldly declaims against education as a destroyer of individuality. He is railing against people who commend "correct drawing" and "solid painting." "Do they suppose that there is one sort of painting that is better than all others, and that there is a receipt for making it as for making chocolate? Art is not mathematics, it is individuality. It does not matter how badly you paint, so long as you don't paint badly like other people. Education destroys individuality." What Mr. Moore says hysterically, but with some truth about painting, may be justly applied to music in general and to Mr. Mackenzie in particular. Ingenious as his works may be, happy as are many of his orchestral effects, no one hearing his music says, "Why, that is by Mackenzie." For it is absolutely devoid of a cachet. Now, when we hear the music of Gounod, to mention men now living, we know at once the composer. He cannot disguise himself. So when we hear certain music, we say promptly, Brahms—or one of his young admirers and imitators. But when we listen to Mr. Mackenzie, we think of everybody but Mackenzie. Not that he is a plagiarist, for he is not: his muse resembles the chameleon of fable, and she is happiest when she borrows her hue from Richard Wagner. Again, although this Ballade is interesting and admirably written as a piece of music, as an illustration of Keats's ballad it is a disappointment if not a failure; for it is lacking in passionate imagination. Where is there throughout the work a suggestion of the amorous frenzy of the love-lorn knight? Where is there a musical portrayal of this eternal Marquise de Sade, whose "wild, wild eyes" held in thrall pale kings and princes too, with starved lips seen in the gloam? Mr. Mackenzie treats the legend with the constitutional phlegm of the Englishman. Nor was he fortunate in the choice of a subject. For the imagination of John Keats soared many flights beyond the sight of the composer, and the music of the poem is rarer and more unearthly than the lucubration of this painstaking maker of measures.

Mr. Adamowski was recalled three times after the finale of the violin concerto. The applause was deserved, for his playing was distinguished by the display of a brilliant technique, real sentiment which was neither forced nor mawkish, and a thoroughly musical and artistic spirit.

There will be no symphony concert Saturday evening, the 17th. The programme of the concert which will be given Saturday evening, Jan. 24, includes Volkmann's symphony in D minor, Tschaikowski's concerto for pianoforte and Arthur Foote's overture, "Francesca da Rimini," which will be heard for the first time. Mrs. Helen Hopekirk will play the pianoforte part of the concerto.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 12, 1891.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

T. Adamowski was the soloist at the Symphony concert Saturday evening, giving Wieniawski's concerto No. 2 for the violin. Mr. Adamowski's appearances as soloist are always occasions of much pleasure to the audiences in Music Hall. His expressive and musicianly delivery of a romanza cannot, probably, be excelled in this country, and his clever technique and admirable command of the difficulties of Wieniawski's composition was never more forcibly portrayed than Saturday evening. It was an exceedingly meritorious delivery, and Mr. Adamowski was greeted with an ovation, and presented with some beautiful floral offerings. The orchestra gave Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony to open the concert, and Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" to close the evening's performance, and a delightful ballade for the strings by Dr. A. C. McKenzie, a Scotch composer, followed the violin concerto. The concert was one which appealed strongly to the musical tastes of the audience, and Mr. Nikisch was in his best mood. There is to be no symphony Saturday night, the orchestra going on its tour to Philadelphia and other cities during the week. At the next concert Helen Hopekirk is to be the soloist.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

 Season of 1890-91. ***

Leave Boston Monday, Jan. 12, at 1.00 P.M., Providence Depot.
Arrive New Haven Monday, 6. P.M.
NEW HAVEN HOTEL.
Concert at Hyperion Theatre, 8.00 P.M.
Leave New Haven directly after Concert. Steamer "Northam."
Arrive in New York Tuesday, Jan. 13.
GRAND CENTRAL HOTEL, 673 Broadway
Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 12 o'clock noon.
Concert at Chickering Hall, 8.00 P.M.
Leave New York Wednesday, Jan. 14, at 11.30 A. M., via Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.
Arrive Philadelphia 1.45 P.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 00 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia Thursday, Jan. 15, at 10 A.M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 24th and Chestnut Streets.
Arrive Washington 2 P.M.
WILLARD'S HOTEL.
Concert at Lincoln Hall, 8.00 P.M.
Leave Washington, Baltimore & Ohio Depot, Friday, Jan. 16, 2 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore 3 P.M.
CARROLTON HOUSE.
Concert at Concordia Hall, 8.00 P.M.
Leave Baltimore directly after concert.
Arrive New York Saturday, Jan. 17, at 7.00 A.M.
Leave New York, Grand Central Depot, 10.00 A.M.
Arrive Boston Saturday, Jan. 17, 4.30 P.M., Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

Members of the Orchestra not playing in New Haven will leave for New York Monday, Jan. 12, via Fall River line. Train leaves Park Square Depot at 6.00 P.M.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

SATURDAY, January 10, 1891.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, JANUARY 11, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Symphony Concert — Soloist, Mr. Adamowski.

The Symphony concert patrons were out in full force at Music Hall last evening, and the popularity of Mr. T. Adamowski, the soloist of the evening, was most abundantly shown by the gracious reception given him, and the hearty fashion in which his excellent violin work was commended by the audience. Mr. Adamowski has fairly won his way into the prominent place he holds in local musical circles, and his performance of Wieniawski's concerto in D minor, op. 22, last evening, marked the highest point he has attained in his artistic career. The work itself is most happily suited to Mr. Adamowski's tastes and temperament, and he certainly brought out its manifold beauties with fine success. His playing of the tuneful romance of the second movement was a triumph in this class of composition, and his masterly treatment of opening allegro, as well as the spirit and dash with which he interpreted the brilliant gypsy themes of the final movement, fairly captivated his audience. He was honored with repeated recalls, and given ample evidence of the extent of enjoyment caused by his charming performances.

Mr. Nikisch gave the place of honor on the programme to the Italian Symphony by Mendelssohn, and his reading of the melodious movements revealed all their beauties in a very complete manner. The lovely andante took prominence in this performance of the work which, with its brilliant Saltarello, gave a bright and pleasing introduction to the programme. The ballade for orchestra, "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," by Mackenzie, and the overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," by Berlioz, brought the concert to a close, both the latter compositions being capitally performed. The orchestra goes on its occasional tour the coming week, and at the concert of the 24th inst. Miss Helen Hopekirk will be the soloist.

With such pronounced success as attended the Wagner "Popular" a week ago it is wondered why the series is not kept up more actively. Even with a season of 24 rehearsals and 24 concerts the Nikisch orchestra will always draw a full house at whatever number of extras it may give.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, JANUARY 12, 1890.

Symphony Concert — Mr. Adamowski, Soloist.

The twelfth Symphony concert programme was:

Mendelssohn.	Symphony in A. (Italian.)
Wieniawski.	Concerto for violin in D minor, op. 22.
Mackenzie.	Ballade for orchestra. "La Belle Dame sans Merci."
Berlioz.	Overture. "Benvenuto Cellini," op. 23.

Mr. Adamowski was the soloist.

There is little new to be said about the compositions noted above. The symphony was played last season, the overture two years ago; the concerto represents only amiable writing for a skilled performer. The piece by the Englishman is least known here. An ideal setting of so subtle a man as John Keats, it may not be, yet on a second hearing Mackenzie appears in it more imaginative, while it cannot be denied that he uses the orchestra with an artist's touch. The playing of the orchestra at this concert was constantly beautiful. In the symphony there was present just the touch of life and joyousness that belongs with Mendelssohn's happy self; his was a charming nature, and although he does not say much, there is a beautiful order, and sometimes humor, in his way of saying it. In Mr. Nikisch's hands the "Cellini" overture was a georgous tone poem. Mr. Adamowski played the concerto with great beauty of tone, and, in the slow movement, with rare expression. The Gypsy music, of which the finale is constructed, was given with proper rhythmic values. Mr. Adamowski is a worker, and each year strengthens his right to be called artist. At the close of the concerto he was enthusiastically recalled three times. The next concert, Jan. 24, will serve to reintroduce, after an extended absence, Mme. Helen Hopekirk, pianist. Mme. Hopekirk has passed the last few years in study and performance under foreign auspices, and no doubt returns to us, with many metres added to her artistic stature. She will play Tschaikowsky's concerto. Another interesting feature of this concert will be a new American work, a symphonic prologue to "Francesca da Rimini," by Arthur Foote. The symphony will be Volkmann's, in D minor.

The Symphony Orchestra goes today upon its third weekly trip of the season, giving concerts in New Haven, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. Mrs. Nikisch will be the soloist, and already great interest is awakened to hear her.

The scheming person who has used the name of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to aid in floating his instrumental sextet has, we are told, come to grief in the sands of North Carolina. We hope, when this manager next starts out, that he will adopt a new name for his ...

[76]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 11, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY.

A Scotchman held the post of honor, in orchestral novelties, at the twelfth rehearsal and concert. Dr. A. C. McKenzie, principal of the Royal Academy of Music, London, is the composer of a ballade for orchestra, "La Belle Dame, sans Merci," the subject being suggested by Keats's poem which bears that name. What a misfortune, by the way, it really is for a musician, in spite of the high sounding title, to have the degree of Doctor (of anything) conferred upon him. It never helps his music to sound any better, and it is dangerously apt to stir up in the listener's mind unpleasant recollections of sickness and physic, which are not unlikely to be interwoven with the thoughts or emotions aroused by his productions. In truth, some of the works or these "Doctors" (and, for the matter of that, of Professors and other Titled Personages,) are pretty bitter doses to swallow.

Mackenzie's music, however, (to take the liberty of dropping his title) is not to be classed among the bitter pills. It is an effective symphonic poem, which does not require close following of the verses that inspired its composition, to render it intelligible. It is somewhat difficult at a first hearing to discover in it those elements which led a writer in the London Athenæum, after listening to a performance of his opera, "The Troubador," to assert that he had "shown the possession of genius as distinguished from highly cultivated talent." Its treatment is eminently modern, and the orchestration is full, calling upon the harp, tuba and triangle, but it seems to possess no especial character, unless a decided leaning towards Liszt and Wagner imparts to it that quality. It is, in brief, a work cosmopolitan in its nature and rather strained in its sentiment. The performance was good, and to its brilliancy and the poem, which was given in full in the programme book, must be ascribed much of the applause it received.

The symphony with which the concert opened was the "Italian" of Mendelssohn. The allegro and the saltarello were perhaps taken at a faster tempo than usual, but they have been played before with greater finish. Still, the vigor and dash which characterized Mr. Nikisch's reading atoned for an occasional raggedness in the execution. The charming andante, and the graceful, minuet-like third movement were delightfully rendered, the horn and trumpet playing in the trio of the latter being particularly fine.

Following the symphony came Wieniawski's second concerto for violin, opus 22. The name of this famous violinist revives recollections of his visit here in 1872. Among other extraordinary performances of his, that of the Kreutzer Sonata with Rubinstein possessed one notable feature that helped to fix it ineffaceably in the minds of some that heard it. The last movement was hardly well under way when snap went a violin string. Naturally, a halt was expected, with the customary restringing and tuning. But to everybody's surprise nothing of the sort occurred. The performance went straight on to the end with all imaginable ease and vigor, and at its close Rubinstein rose from his seat and grasped the hand of his companion with a heartiness that gave delightful proof of the artist's appreciation of such an instance of consummate ability. What a reading of the work was that! With never a note before them, these two giants revealed the meaning of the fiery prestos and the heavenly andante in a manner that was nothing short of perfection. There was no pulling apart, no contrariness of mood. Each was in thorough sympathy with the other; when one had the theme, the other was simply the warm, responsive accompanist. Would musical Boston suffer two such men to pass unnoticed through the city today? Yet this concert was given to a "beggarly array of empty benches."

The concerto in question is characteristic of the composer's style of playing; broad, impassioned, with moments of serenely charming melody. Compared with the modern works of this class to which we have become accustomed of late, it seems a little antiquated; nevertheless, it contains much that still interests. Mr. T. Adamowski played it with much refinement, and displayed an easy command of its difficulties. His rendering of the beautiful romance was imbued with all the grace and taste that are his; in parts of the other movements requiring strength and fiery animation, the overlightness of his touch was apparent. The audience rewarded his efforts with much applause.

Berlioz's overture to his opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," was the last number. One of his strongest instrumental works, its superiority in point of character to the Symphonie Fantastique is plainly evident. The heroic and successful attempt of Liszt, in 1852, to revive this opera, and its performances within the past ten years under Von Bulow, Nikisch and Motti, are significant of the esteem with which Berlioz is regarded by advanced musicians of the day. The overture was splendidly given, Mr. Nikisch's grasp of its matter being unmistakable.

T. P. CURRIER.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

The third and last concert of the season was given in Steinert Hall last Monday evening. The most interesting programme of the series was presented. Mozart's quartet for strings in C. (Peters No. 17) was the opening number. The discussions that this work excited among the critics and musicians at the time of its appearance are well known, and in these days of wholesale breaking of the laws of composition that were then held to be inviolable, are sufficiently amusing. The remark of Sarti, however, concerning the six quartets, of which this is the last, "can more be done to put the players out of tune!" may perhaps indicate the cause of the uneven playing on this occasion. At all events considerable untunefulness was noticeable, although not to the extent that has prevailed at the preceding concert.

Xaver Scharwenka's quartet for piano and strings, in F, opus 37, on the contrary, received a very satisfactory performance. It is a fine work, dramatic and inspiring musically, and in treatment, full of power and brilliancy. The wonderfully beautiful adagio is the movement of the four, although the first and the finale are on the whole, not far behind in interest. The vivace has not the taking qualities that are usually looked for in the light movement of the chamber composition. Mr. Ernst Perabo was the pianist; and it may be said at once that he was at his best in his rendering of the piano part, playing with all the breadth, expressiveness and artistic discretion for which he is noted. The ensemble was almost wholly excellent. The adagio in particular was interpreted in a manner entirely in keeping with its character; and here also, the finer qualities of Mr. Adamowski's violin playing shone with especial clearness.

Between the two concerted numbers Mr. Perabo's exquisite taste and rare sentiment were displayed in three of Schumann's Bunte Blatte, and the scherzo from sonata opus 53, by Schubert, his charming playing winning for him a hearty recall. The audience was fair in numbers and fine in quality despite the storm.

MUSIC NOTES.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 12, 1891.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the twelfth symphony concert given at Music Hall Saturday evening was as follows:

Symphony in A, (Italian) ..... Mendelssohn
Concerto for violin in D minor ..... Wieniawski
Mr. Adamowski.
Ballade for orchestra—"La Belle Dame sans Merci" ..... Mackenzie
Overture—"Benvenuto Cellini" ..... Berlioz

It will be seen by a glance at this programme that the concert was diversified and well-arranged. The symphony, though it is familiar, is a welcome number, and in one respect at least it might serve as a model and a reproof to modern composers: the proportions of the movements are such that not one of them seems diffuse or too long, and the whole composition satisfies the ear instead of wearying it.

The concerto of Wieniawski is a work of genuine musical worth, which gives opportunity for the display of the virtuoso's skill, while the ballade and overture are noteworthy examples of the English and French schools. And the playing of the orchestra from the beginning of the concert to the end, for its breadth and its delicacy, for its warmth of color and its degree of finish, calls for hearty and unalloyed praise.

The least known number of the programme was Mackenzie's ballade "La Belle Dame sans Merci," which should be a musical illustration of Keats's poem of the same title. This Scotch-English composer is undeniably a man of parts. He has studied; he is industrious. But, as is seen in this ballade, he lacks two important, indispensable qualities: individuality and passionate imagination. Now, the value of individuality cannot be overestimated. That disagreeable young man, Mr. George Moore, in his "Confessions," a curious compound of shrewd sayings and flippant untruths strongly leavened with a boyish desire to shock the British matron, boldly declaims against education as a destroyer of individuality. He is railing against people who commend "correct drawing" and "solid painting." "Do they suppose that there is one sort of painting that is better than all others, and that there is a receipt for making it as for making chocolate? Art is not mathematics, it is individuality. It does not matter how badly you paint, so long as you don't paint badly like other people. Education destroys individuality." What Mr. Moore says hysterically, but with some truth about painting, may be justly applied to music in general and to Mr. Mackenzie in particular. Ingenious as his works may be, happy as are many of his orchestral effects, no one hearing his music says, "Why, that is by Mackenzie." For it is absolutely devoid of a cachet. Now, when we hear the music of Gounod, to mention men now living, we know at once the composer. He cannot disguise himself. So when we hear certain music, we say promptly, Brahms—or one of his young admirers and imitators. But when we listen to Mr. Mackenzie, we think of everybody but Mackenzie. Not that he is a plagiarist, for he is not: his muse resembles the chameleon of fable, and she is happiest when she borrows her hue from Richard Wagner. Again, although this Ballade is interesting and admirably written as a piece of music, as an illustration of Keats's ballad it is a disappointment if not a failure; for it is lacking in passionate imagination. Where is there throughout the work a suggestion of the amorous frenzy of the love-lorn knight? Where is there a musical portrayal of this eternal Marquise de Sade, whose "wild, wild eyes" held in thrall pale kings and princes too, with starved lips seen in the gloam? Mr. Mackenzie treats the legend with the constitutional phlegm of the Englishman. Nor was he fortunate in the choice of a subject. For the imagination of John Keats soared many flights beyond the sight of the composer, and the music of the poem is rarer and more unearthly than the lucubration of this painstaking maker of measures.

Mr. Adamowski was recalled three times after the finale of the violin concerto. The applause was deserved, for his playing was distinguished by the display of a brilliant technique, real sentiment which was neither forced nor mawkish, and a thoroughly musical and artistic spirit.

There will be no symphony concert Saturday evening, the 17th. The programme of the concert which will be given Saturday evening, Jan. 24, includes Volkmann's symphony in D minor, Tschaikowski's concerto for pianoforte and Arthur Foote's overture, "Francesca da Rimini," which will be heard for the first time. Mrs. Helen Hopekirk will play the pianoforte part of the concerto.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 12, 1891.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

T. Adamowski was the soloist at the Symphony concert Saturday evening, giving Wieniawski's concerto No. 2 for the violin. Mr. Adamowski's appearances as soloist are always occasions of much pleasure to the audiences in Music Hall. His expressive and musicianly delivery of a romanza cannot, probably, be excelled in this country, and his clever technique and admirable command of the difficulties of Wieniawski's composition was never more forcibly portrayed than Saturday evening. It was an exceedingly meritorious delivery, and Mr. Adamowski was greeted with an ovation, and presented with some beautiful floral offerings. The orchestra gave Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony to open the concert, and Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" to close the evening's performance, and a delightful ballade for the strings by Dr. A. C. McKenzie, a Scotch composer, followed the violin concerto. The concert was one which appealed strongly to the musical tastes of the audience, and Mr. Nikisch was in his best mood. There is to be no symphony Saturday night, the orchestra going on its tour to Philadelphia and other cities during the week. At the next concert Helen Hopekirk is to be the soloist.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Season of 1890-91.

Leave Boston Monday, Jan. 12, at 1.00 P.M., Providence Depot.
Arrive New Haven Monday, 6. P.M.
NEW HAVEN HOTEL.
Concert at Hyperion Theatre, 8.00 P.M.
Leave New Haven directly after Concert. Steamer "Northam."
Arrive in New York Tuesday, Jan. 13.
GRAND CENTRAL HOTEL, 673 Broadway
Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 12 o'clock noon.
Concert at Chickering Hall, 8.00 P.M.
Leave New York Wednesday, Jan. 14, at 11.30 A. M., via Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.
Arrive Philadelphia 1.45 P.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8.00 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia Thursday, Jan. 15, at 10 A.M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 24th and Chestnut Streets.
Arrive Washington 2 P.M.
WILLARD'S HOTEL.
Concert at Lincoln Hall, 8.00 P.M.
Leave Washington, Baltimore & Ohio Depot, Friday, Jan. 16, 2 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore 3 P.M.
CARROLTON HOUSE.
Concert at Concordia Hall, 8.00 P.M.
Leave Baltimore directly after concert.
Arrive New York Saturday, Jan. 17, at 7.00 A.M.
Leave New York, Grand Central Depot, 10.00 A.M.
Arrive Boston Saturday, Jan. 17, 4.30 P.M., Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

Members of the Orchestra not playing in New Haven will leave for New York Monday, Jan. 12, via Fall River line. Train leaves Park Square Depot at 6.00 P.M.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

SATURDAY, January 10, 1891.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, JANUARY 11, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Symphony Concert — Soloist, Mr. Adamowski.

The Symphony concert patrons were out in full force at Music Hall last evening, and the popularity of Mr. T. Adamowski, the soloist of the evening, was most abundantly shown by the gracious reception given him, and the hearty fashion in which his excellent violin work was commended by the audience. Mr. Adamowski has fairly won his way into the prominent place he holds in local musical circles, and his performance of Wieniawski's concerto in D minor, op. 22, last evening, marked the highest point he has attained in his artistic career. The work itself is most happily suited to Mr. Adamowski's tastes and temperament, and he certainly brought out its manifold beauties with fine success. His playing of the tuneful romance of the second movement was a triumph in this class of composition, and his masterly treatment of opening allegro, as well as the spirit and dash with which he interpreted the brilliant gypsy themes of the final movement, fairly captivated his audience. He was honored with repeated recalls, and given ample evidence of the extent of enjoyment caused by his charming performances.

Mr. Nikisch gave the place of honor on the programme to the Italian Symphony by Mendelssohn, and his reading of the melodious movements revealed all their beauties in a very complete manner. The lovely andante took prominence in this performance of the work which, with its brilliant Saltarello, gave a bright and pleasing introduction to the programme. The ballade for orchestra, "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," by Mackenzie, and the overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," by Berlioz, brought the concert to a close, both the latter compositions being capitally performed. The orchestra goes on its occasional tour the coming week, and at the concert of the 24th inst. Miss Helen Hopekirk will be the soloist.

With such pronounced success as attended the Wagner "Popular" a week ago it is wondered why the series is not kept up more actively. Even with a season of 24 rehearsals and 24 concerts the Nikisch orchestra will always draw a full house at whatever number of extras it may give.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, JANUARY 12, 1890.

Symphony Concert — Mr. Adamowski, Soloist.

The twelfth Symphony concert programme was:

Mendelssohn.	Symphony in A. (Italian.)
Wieniawski.	Concerto for violin in D minor, op. 22.
Mackenzie.	Ballade for orchestra. "La Belle Dame sans Merci."
Berlioz.	Overture. "Benvenuto Cellini," op. 23.

Mr. Adamowski was the soloist.

There is little new to be said about the compositions noted above. The symphony was played last season, the overture two years ago; the concerto represents only amiable writing for a skilled performer. The piece by the Englishman is least known here. An ideal setting of so subtle a man as John Keats, it may not be, yet on a second hearing Mackenzie appears in it more imaginative, while it cannot be denied that he uses the orchestra with an artist's touch. The playing of the orchestra at this concert was constantly beautiful. In the symphony there was present just the touch of life and joyousness that belongs with Mendelssohn's happy self; his was a charming nature, and although he does not say much, there is a beautiful order, and sometimes humor, in his way of saying it. In Mr. Nikisch's hands the "Cellini" overture was a georgous tone poem. Mr. Adamowski played the concerto with great beauty of tone, and, in the slow movement, with rare expression. The Gypsy music, of which the finale is constructed, was given with proper rhythmic values. Mr. Adamowski is a worker, and each year strengthens his right to be called artist. At the close of the concerto he was enthusiastically recalled three times. The next concert, Jan. 24, will serve to reintroduce, after an extended absence, Mme. Helen Hopekirk, pianist. Mme. Hopekirk has passed the last few years in study and performance under foreign auspices, and no doubt returns to us, with many metres added to her artistic stature. She will play Tschaikowsky's concerto. Another interesting feature of this concert will be a new American work, a symphonic prologue to "Francesca da Rimini," by Arthur Foote. The symphony will be Volkmann's, in D minor.

The Symphony Orchestra goes today upon its third weekly trip of the season, giving concerts in New Haven, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. Mrs. Nikisch will be the soloist, and already great interest is awakened to hear her.

The scheming person who has used the name of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to aid in floating his instrumental sextet has, we are told, come to grief in the sands of North Carolina. We hope, when this manager next starts out, that he will adopt a new name for his club.

[76]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 12, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The twelfth concert of the tenth season, last Saturday evening, drew a full Music Hall, with many eager listeners standing from beginning to end of the following brilliant programme:

Mendelssohn—Symphony ("Italian") in A.
Wieniawski—Violin Concerto in D minor, op. 22.
Mackenzie—Ballade for Orchestra, "La Belle Dame sans Merci."
Berlioz—Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini." Op. 23. Mr. T. Adamowski, solo violin.

The real bloom and beauty of the concert, one of the consummate flowers of art and music, came in the opening number, Mendelssohn's gay, delightful symphony which he composed in Italy and which has as distinct a characteristic local atmosphere and coloring as his "Scotch Symphony." It is so fresh and full of life and joy and poesy! Those were happy days with him when he was living himself into touch with Rome and Naples. How heartily and deeply he felt the charm of it he has told in his letters; but he could only tell it satisfactorily, and with an eloquence that must long vibrate, in a symphony like this. We cannot quarrel with the very rapid tempo at which Mr. Nikisch took the opening Allegro vivace and the Saltarello (as well as Tarantella) of the Finale. The quick sensation of the Italian sky and atmosphere and scenery and life justifies, demands, a quicker pulse than we are used to (except in fever) in our more northern home. Mendelssohn himself is said to have sometimes astonished his audience by an accelerated tempo according to the mood he happened to be in. Anyhow, on this occasion, the fast time was not at the expense of clear, appreciable outline. One soon felt at home in the movement, enjoying, realizing every phrase and note.

Thirty years ago, in our days of small things at home in the way of orchestra, it was our privilege to hear this very symphony at the Gewandhaus in Leipzig—our first symphony in Europe. We never can forget the enlivening, quickening sense and feeling with which we heard the violins running so crisply and so delicately through the rapid figures of the first movement. Now we get the same sensation here, with even finer sounds from flutes and reeds and horns.

The Andante con moto, with its steady, soft staccato tread of the deep basses to the end, its half hushed religious melody, its exquisite discourse of now an oboe, now a flute and now a clarinet, its low tone of color as of a cathedral while the evening twilight comes creeping on space, and then the gradual diminuendo with which the music sinks to silence, was most beautifully rendered, and followed by the audience in deepest silence.

The Minuet (or Scherzo), marked con moto moderato, was taken moderately enough and played with consummate grace and finish. The motive for the two horns in the Trio charmed by the euphony and smoothness and the hearty warmth with which it was sung as it were. The Saltarello, with the little hitch in the rhythmical division of each measure, which distinguishes it from the more complete abandon of the Tarantella in which it soon loses itself, carried the audience away. It made one feel and realize the pulse and rhythm of the gay Italian existence. Spontaneous and prolonged applause told of the effect produced.

Wieniawski, one of the most artistic violinists who ever visited this country (that was in 1872, with Rubinstein), was born in Russian Poland; while yet a boy, in 1846, he carried off the first violin prize at the Conservatoire in Paris; in 1875 he supplied the place of Vieuxtemps at Brussels; he died in extreme poverty (!) at Moscow, March 31, 1880. He was not a mere Paganini show player. While here he proved his mastery in works like Mendelssohn's Concerto, Bach's Chaconne, and the first movement of the great Concerto of Beethoven. There was great delicacy, grace and sweetness in his playing. He played here neither of his two concertos, of which the last, dedicated to Sarasate, was the one played on Saturday by his young countryman, Adamowski. The composition contains interesting matter artistically wrought. Adamowski played it with more verve, more freedom and artistic finish, perhaps, than he had yet exhibited in many fine performances. Especially was his rendering of the middle movement, the Romance, a slow cantabile, remarkably perfect in intonation, phrasing, light and shade and musical, poetic feeling. The gypsy Allegro (alla Zingara), with which the concerto ends, was played with a fine fire and accent.

Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, born in Edinburgh in 1847, now principal of the Royal Academy in London, stands, in the opinion of many, at the head of the younger school of English composers, including Villiers Stanford, Cowen and Parry. His degree is from the University of St. Andrews. He has produced an oratorio, a cantata and two operas; no symphonies, but many orchestral pieces in smaller form. Some think his gift as a composer amounts to genius. Possibly we should have thought so too if, before listening to his "Ballad," we had taken the precaution to look into the "Historical and Descriptive Notes" prepared by Mr. Wilson, and had there read the poem of Keats, "La Belle Dame sans Merci" (the merciless beauty), on which the music is founded. As it was, we can only recall now a passage of the "Erl-King" and "Lenora" order, which might stand for the tramp of the "pacing steed" on which lady and knight ride to the "elfin grot." We can conceive too, how the impressive opening phrase for the 'cello might be identified with the first line of Keats—"Oh, what can ail thee, knight at arms?"—and be recognized as a leading motive throughout the poem and the music, and finally as giving the answer, "And this is why I sojourn here." But hearing the music with no clew to its meaning except the title, we found it strong and interesting simply as music, not gauging it by any "programme." It sounded clear, consistent, well motived, well composed and instrumented; only too long drawn out, although we are told there were some cuts in the performance. We have heard few recent English compositions which seemed to us so original, so fresh, and having such sound ker.

The Berlioz overture is Berlioz, no doubt of it. It is glorious, unbridled, rushing, audacious enough to suggest the genius [illegible] life of Benvenuto Cellini, we [illegible] it has striking momentary [illegible] and strong pregnances and shows [illegible] and contrast- [illegible] Berlioz had a tion it seems to lack logical development, as well as any positive and clear musical motive. It is vague, confused, wilful, much of it like "sound and fury signifying nothing," astonishing at times, but not appealing to imagination or deep feeling. It is wilful, cold, mechanical. Yet it is brilliant and it was brilliantly and finely played.

This week our orchestra will be visiting sister cities, reaping new laurels. The next home concert will be on Saturday evening, Jan. 24, when will be played a new overture by Arthur Foote, "Francesca da Rimini;" a piano concerto of Tschaikowski, played by Mrs. Helen Hopekirk, and a symphony in D minor by Volkmann. Our at first seemingly exhaustless season of twenty-four symphony concerts is half over. Can you believe it, friends? J. S. D.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
JANUARY 12, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday — Mr. Adamowski as Soloist.

A cosmopolitan programme with English, French, German and Polish composers represented. Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony headed the list. The name of Mendelssohn has become a veritable shibboleth in these latter days in the camp of the extreme Wagnerites. Only very recently has Mr. Kobbe spoken of Mendelssohn, "who, to judge from the innocent respectability of his music, its perfect form and polite melodies, seems always to have sat down to compose in his dress suit and kid gloves," while Mr. F. J. Crowest uses this same bone of contention (as Samson did the jawbone of an ass, only in this case the entire animal was present) to demolish Wagner, by repeatedly asserting that Mendelssohn was "the last of the musical Titans!" It is pleasant amid such differences of opinion, to notice that the public so far from crying, "a plague on both your houses," generally accepts both of the antagonistic composers. Beethoven and Weber wasted good ink and bad temper in decrying each other, yet neither succeeded in abolishing the other. It is certain that the same result will attend the antagonism of Wagner and Mendelssohn. They will by no means stand on the same plane, but the glory of Wagner cannot force the brightness, the dainty humor, the charming melodic grace of Mendelssohn into obsolescence. The Italian symphony is not so fine a work as the Scotch one, but it bubbles over with youth and gayety, and it is one of the best examples of music which pleases. With the great public it will ever remain a favorite, and every movement was greatly applauded at this concert. The work was splendidly read, and the performance was altogether praiseworthy. The beautiful viola theme in the second movement was exquisitely performed, while the flute passages in the same portion of the work were also flawless. The flute was always sure of a good showing in any orchestral work by this composer, and it seems to have been his especial favorite if one may judge by the illjudged prominence which is given to it in the last movement of the Reformation symphony, where the theme of the great Protestant chorale, "Ein Feste Burg ist unser Gott," is given to it, of all instruments in the world. The horns were splendidly handled in the third movement, and the rythmic use of the kettle-drum and trumpet in the finale deserves praise for its good balance and lack of overforcing.

Pole met Pole in the performance of Wieniawski by Adamowski, and the great piece of virtuosity, the violin concerto in D minor, was well overcome. One might have demanded a little more breadth in the first movement, but the romanza was the perfection of refined and delicate work, and the passages on the G string were powerful enough. The gypsy character of the finale was also given with appropriate dash and spirit, although certainly the romanza was the gem of it all. Recalls and flowers followed as a matter of course, for Mr. Adamowski is a persona grata to the Boston public.

Mackenzie's orchestral ballade, "La Belle Dame sans Merci"—is undoubtedly a good work, but it scarcely attains to the brooding sadness of Keats' poem. Yearning and longing it is, and there are moments of great triumph in which the trumpets and other brasses are nobly used, but the weirdness of the words is not altogether reproduced, although the ballade grows on one by repeated hearing. A most exciting and spirited performance of Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture ended a concert which was entirely successful.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The Register.
THE NEW HAVEN EVENING
MONDAY, JANUARY 12, 1891

Symphony Concert at the Hyperion—Gus Hill's Company at the Grand.

The next to the last concert in the series given by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be rendered to-night at the Hyperion theater. A prominent feature of the concert will be the performance of selections from Mendelssohn's music to the "Midsummer Night's Dream," including the Wedding March. The soloist will be Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, wife of the conductor. She will sing an aria from "Mignon" and several other songs with piano accompaniment.

The Register.
NEW HAVEN 12.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 11.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Hyperion—World of Novelties at the Grand.

The third concert of this season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given at the Hyperion theater to-morrow evening. A pleasant feature of the concert will be the appearance of Mrs. Nikisch, who is to be the soloist of the evening. Mrs. Nikisch began her career on the operatic stage in 1881 at Cologne, where she sang for two seasons. In 1883 she accepted an engagement at the Stadt theater in Leipzic for a year, and a later engagement at the Holy theater in Cassel, also of a year, terminated with her marriage. Since her retirement from the opera she has been very successful in concert work and has sung much in Leipzic, Stuttgart, Heidelberg and other large cities. Her voice is a pure mezzo soprano, which she uses with rare skill. An unaffected manner and a charming stage presence add much to the effectiveness of her singing. She will be heard to-morrow in an aria from "Mignon" with orchestra, and in a group of songs with piano accompanied by Mr. Nikisch. The orchestral numbers of the program are the overture "Oberon," Weber; two movements from the Scandinavian symphony, Cowen; Danse Macabre, Saint Saens and the overture Scherzo, Notturno and wedding march from the Midsummer Night's dream, Mendelssohn.

The New-York Times.
TEN PAGES.
NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, JAN. 14, 1891.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Of the three concerts given in New-York this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that which took place at Chickering Hall last evening was unquestionably the most brilliant. The clear, crisp condition of the atmosphere seemed to have infected the players, and their work was as clean-cut and as sparkling as diamonds. The programme was one chosen with a view to the advantageous display of the notable virtuosity of the orchestra. The three numbers allotted to the band were that monumental exposition of Beethoven's grandeur, the overture to "Coriolanus," the andante and scherzo from Tschaikowsky's F minor symphony, and the "Im Walde" symphony of Raff.

Boston concertgoers are familiar with Mr. Nikisch's admirable reading of the Beethoven number. It was on the programme of his first concert in the Music Hall, and it made a deep impression, especially in the eloquence of that wonderful 'cello phrase in the closing measures, which Mr. Nikisch brings out as no one else does. There was no noticeable difference between the performance given then and that given last night save such as could be attributed to the change of location.

The two movements from the Tschaikowsky symphony served excellently as an orchestral virtuoso piece. The andante displayed the smooth voicing of the wood-wind in a charming manner and also gave the ever-brilliant strings favorable opportunities. The scherzo, however, is simply an exhibition movement and nothing more. It has little to commend it beyond its taking instrumentation, the pizzicato ostinato being a very popular form of orchestral witchery at all times. Mr. Nikisch caused all his stringed-instrument players to lay aside their bows and pluck the strings with free hands and with change of fingers. The result was, of course, a delightful airiness in the execution, which, coupled with the excellent accentuation and fine precision, produced a brilliant effect.

Raff's lovely "Im Walde" symphony is always a grateful task for a good orchestra. Aside from the beauty of its themes and their musical treatment, the instrumentation is superb. In the hands of Mr. Nikisch and his men the symphony was revealed in its full power. If it were necessary to go into details it would be no difficult task to fill half a column with comments on the manner in which the various beauties of the symphony were brought out. But as all lovers of music are familiar with the work, it is only necessary to say that the performance was worthy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That means that it was a compendium of all that is finest in orchestral playing.

There were two soloists in last evening's entertainment, of whom one was new to this city. This was Mrs. Nikisch, the wife of the conductor. She sang Raff's "Traumkönig und sein Lieb," with orchestra and with piano accompaniment by her husband; Goldmark's "Die Quelle," Jensen's "Am ufer des Flusses des Manzanares," and Brahms's "Vergebliches Staendchen." For an encore number after the last she gave Schumann's "Frühlingsnacht." Mrs. Nikisch has a good mezzo-soprano voice and sings with an abundance of expression. Her intonation was at times last evening a little faulty, but this was atoned for by the excellence of her style. As for Mr. Nikisch's accompaniments, they were simply masterly. They were a complete revelation of the possibilities of an abused art.

The other soloist was T. Adamowski, who is one of the first violinists of the orchestra, and he played the "Rondo Capriccioso" of Saint-Saëns. Mr. Adamowski is a delightful player, who possesses a rich and velvety tone, a sweet, suave cantabile, and an excellent command of the technics of his instrument. His performance was deserving of the warm and continued applause which greeted it.

Clipping from Ledger, Phila.
Date 1-13

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give another concert in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. As the programme has already been set forth in the LEDGER, it need only be repeated that the symphony will be Schubert's "Unfinished" (B minor), and that Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, wife of the conductor, will be the vocal soloist. The Schubert symphony was played here lately by the Thomas Orchestra.

NEW YORK HERALD
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 14, 1891.

THE "METROPOLITAN" MAKES MELODY.

An Evening with the Society at the Opera House.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Herr Artur Nikisch Leads and Frau Nikisch Sings.

The Opera House presented a wonderfully brilliant appearance last night when the Metropolitan Musical Society gave its annual concert.

As usual the band and choir were under the direction of Mr. W. R. Chapman. The band was recruited from among Mr. Thomas' followers. The soloists were Miss Mary Howe, the soprano; M. Planel, the well known Paris violinist, and Mr. W. H. Sherwood, the popular New York pianist, who had come up from Chicago expressly for the concert.

The programme, it must be confessed, would, but for these three artists, have been slightly tame. The choir, which was admirably drilled, was heard to most advantage in Thomas Morley's charming old five part madrigal, "My Bonnie Lass She Smileth," and in two characteristic songs by Lassen, entitled "Evening" and "Only Thou." All three were sung with precision, spirit and a nice attention to light and shade which did credit to the society.

Had the weak and futile "Hymn to Apollo" been omitted from the programme few present would, I think, have regretted it—except the soloists, Miss Katharine Hilke, Miss Emily M. Lawler and Mr. J. H. McKinley, on whom had devolved the thankless task of interpreting the inanities of Martin Roeder, the composer of the cantata.

Miss Mary Howe was applauded after her contributions, the "Scene" and "Légende" ("Bell" aria) from "Lakmé." The young soprano sang the selection correctly but coldly and without much expression. She took the time far too slowly, but gave the final trills and runs with ease and agility. In response to an encore Miss Howe repeated the close of the aria.

Mr. Sherwood's neat and brilliant touch and admirable technique were shown to advantage in the favorite Polacca in E (op. 72) of Weber, which won him a recall. As an "encore" Mr. Sherwood played Liszt's "Campanella," mastering the difficulties of the composition apparently without an effort.

Perhaps the most interesting feature of the concert was the fragment of Godard's graceful and dainty "Concerto Romantique," the work by which the composer may be said to have first become popular in Paris. M. Planel contributed the adagio and the canzonetta from the concerto. The former is full of delicate charm and sentiment, while the canzonetta is exquisitely fresh and tender in a peculiarly French way. Although somewhat handicapped by the erratic tempi of the conductor the violinist played both movements with delightful taste, feeling and spirit.

In acknowledgment of a hearty recall he played some variations of "The Last Rose of Summer," winning fresh applause by the richness and sweetness of his tone and the perfection of his technique.

The concert ended with the finale from "Die Meistersinger."

FRAU NIKISCH SINGS.

The third of the concert that the Boston Orchestra give here this winter occurred in Chickering Hall last night, in the presence of the usual large audience and to more than the common tribute of applause.

The evening will be remembered with especial pleasure as having introduced to our public Frau Nikisch, the wife of the conductor, who won instant favor by some of the most artistic singing that we have heard this winter.

Frau Nikisch's voice is a mezzo-soprano of no great volume, but of exceptionally pure quality, and it is used with delightful art. In the first of her songs, Raff's exquisite "The Dream King and His Love," this art, however, was not sufficient to atone for lack of power. The song is one of the few of Raff's works which contains aught of dramatic suggestiveness, and, while Frau Nikisch evidently felt the music deeply, its highest reaches were somewhat beyond her.

It was in the group of minor masterpieces—Goldmark's "Die Quelle," Jensen's "Am Ufer des Manzanares," Brahms' "Vergebliches Staendchen," and particularly in Schuman's "Frühlingsnacht," which Frau Nikisch sang by way of encore—that the merits of the singer were most effectively shown. Mrs. Henschel is the only one who in the last few years has given us German lieder with anything like the spirit and arch grace of this performance.

Much of the charm of Frau Nikisch's work was due to the admirable accompaniment furnished by the orchestra in the Raff song, and in the others by Herr Nikisch himself at the piano. Again I must go back to the Henschel concerts for anything comparable to the perfection of Herr Nikisch's accompaniments.

The orchestral part of the concert was notable for a splendidly finished performance of the "Coriolanus" overture and for the really marvellous delicacy of the scherzo of Tschaikowsky's F minor symphony, which was nothing less than an orchestral tour de force. We have been accustomed to expect much from these Boston players, especially from the strings, but the scherzo in question surpassed even the highest expectations.

Mr. Adamowski, who for some years has been one of Boston's best violinists, gave a fair but not brilliant performance of the Saint-Saëns "Rondo Capriccioso," and the concert ended with Raff's "Im Walde" symphony, the slow movement of which was given with exquisite effect.

Clipping from News Baltimore Md.
Date 1-12

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert on Friday evening next was the largest the orchestra has ever had in Baltimore, and the probabilities are that every seat will be taken before Friday. The programme is modern and fine, affording full employment for the seventy-five artists, of whom the orchestra consists. There is much interest also in the debut of Mrs. Nikisch in Baltimore, which takes place at this concert.

[77

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 12, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The twelfth concert of the tenth season, last Saturday evening, drew a full Music Hall, with many eager listeners standing from beginning to end of the following brilliant programme:

Mendelssohn—Symphony ("Italian") in A.
Wieniawski—Violin Concerto in D minor, op. 22.
Mackenzie—Ballade for Orchestra, "La Belle Dame sans Merci."
Berlioz—Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini." Op. 23. Mr. T. Adamowski, solo violin.

The real bloom and beauty of the concert, one of the consummate flowers of art and music, came in the opening number, Mendelssohn's gay, delightful symphony which he composed in Italy and which has as distinct a characteristic local atmosphere and coloring as his "Scotch Symphony." It is so fresh and full of life and joy and poesy! Those were happy days with him when he was living himself into touch with Rome and Naples. How heartily and deeply he felt the charm of it he has told in his letters; but he could only tell it satisfactorily, and with an eloquence that must long vibrate, in a symphony like this. We cannot quarrel with the very rapid tempo at which Mr. Nikisch took the opening Allegro vivace and the Saltarello (as well as Tarantella) of the Finale. The quick sensation of the Italian sky and atmosphere and scenery and life justifies, demands, a quicker pulse than we are used to (except in fever) in our more northern home. Mendelssohn himself is said to have sometimes astonished his audience by an accelerated tempo according to the mood he happened to be in. Anyhow, on this occasion, the fast time was not at the expense of clear, appreciable outline. One soon felt at home in the movement, enjoying, realizing every phrase and note.

Thirty years ago, in our days of small things at home in the way of orchestra, it was our privilege to hear this very symphony at the Gewandhaus in Leipzig—our first symphony in Europe. We never can forget the enlivening, quickening sense and feeling with which we heard the violins running so crisply and so delicately through the rapid figures of the first movement. Now we get the same sensation here, with even finer sounds from flutes and reeds and horns.

The Andante con moto, with its steady, soft staccato tread of the deep basses to the end, its half hushed religious melody, its exquisite discourse of now an oboe, now a flute and now a clarinet, its low tone of color as of a cathedral while the evening twilight comes creeping on space, and then the gradual diminuendo with which the music sinks to silence, was most beautifully rendered, and followed by the audience in deepest silence.

The Minuet (or Scherzo), marked con moto moderato, was taken moderately enough and played with consummate grace and finish. The motive for the two horns in the Trio charmed by the euphony and smoothness and the hearty warmth with which it was sung as it were. The Saltarello, with the little hitch in the rhythmical division of each measure, which distinguishes it from the more complete abandon of the Tarantella in which it soon loses itself, carried the audience away. It made one feel and realize the pulse and rhythm of the gay Italian existence. Spontaneous and prolonged applause told of the effect produced.

Wieniawski, one of the most artistic violinists who ever visited this country (that was in 1872, with Rubinstein), was born in Russian Poland; while yet a boy, in 1846, he carried off the first violin prize at the Conservatoire in Paris; in 1875 he supplied the place of Vieuxtemps at Brussels; he died in extreme poverty (!) at Moscow, March 31, 1880. He was not a mere Paganini show player. While here he proved his mastery in works like Mendelssonn's Concerto, Bach's Chaconne, and the first movement of the great Concerto of Beethoven. There was great delicacy, grace and sweetness in his playing. He played here neither of his two concertos, of which the last, dedicated to Sarasate, was the one played on Saturday by his young countryman, Adamowski. The composition contains interesting matter artistically wrought. Adamowski played it with more verve, more freedom and artistic finish, perhaps, than he had yet exhibited in many fine performances. Especially was his rendering of the middle movement, the Romance, a slow cantabile, remarkably perfect in intonation, phrasing, light and shade and musical, poetic feeling. The gypsy Allegro (alla Zingara), with which the concerto ends, was played with a fine fire and accent.

Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, born in Edinburgh in 1847, now principal of the Royal Academy in London, stands, in the opinion of many, at the head of the younger school of English composers, including Villiers Stanford, Cowen and Parry. His degree is from the University of St. Andrews. He has produced an oratorio, a cantata and two operas; no symphonies, but many orchestral pieces in smaller form. Some think his gift as a composer amounts to genius. Possibly we should have thought so too if, before listening to his "Ballad," we had taken the precaution to look into the "Historical and Descriptive Notes" prepared by Mr. Wilson, and had there read the poem of Keats, "La Belle Dame sans Merci" (the merciless beauty), on which the music is founded. As it was, we can only recall now a passage of the "Erl King" and "Lenora" order, which might stand for the tramp of the "pacing steed" on which lady and knight ride to the "elfin grot." We can conceive too, how the impressive opening phrase for the 'cello might be identified with the first line of Keats—"Oh, what can ail thee, knight at arms?"—and be recognized as a leading motive throughout the poem and the music, and finally as giving the answer, "And this is why I sojourn here." But hearing the music with no clew to its meaning except the title, we found it strong and interesting simply as music, not gauging it by any "programme." It sounded clear, consistent, well motived, well composed and instrumented; only too long drawn out, although we are told there were some cuts in the performance. We have heard few recent English compositions which seemed to us so musical, so fresh, and having such sound ker[illegible]

The Berlioz overture is Berlioz, no doubt of it. It is furious, unbridled, rushing, audacious [illegible] spasmodic enough to suggest the genius [illegible] stormy life of Benvenuto Cellini, we [illegible] It has striking momentary [illegible] and strong passages and shows [illegible] contrasting and contrast[illegible] which Berlioz had a [illegible] tion it seems to lack logical development as well as any positive and clear musical motive. It is vague, confused, wilful, much of it like "sound and fury signifying nothing," astonishing at times, but not appealing to imagination or deep feeling. It is wilful, cold, mechanical. Yet it is brilliant and it was brilliantly and finely played.

This week our orchestra will be visiting sister cities, reaping new laurels. The next home concert will be on Saturday evening, Jan. 24, when will be played a new overture by Arthur Foote, "Francesca da Rimini;" a piano concerto of Tschaikowski, played by Mrs. Helen Hopekirk, and a symphony in D minor by Volkmann. Our at first seemingly exhaustless season of twenty-four symphony concerts is half over. Can you believe it, friends? J. S. D.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
JANUARY 12, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday — Mr. Adamowski as Soloist.

A cosmopolitan programme with English, French, German and Polish composers represented. Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony headed the list. The name of Mendelssohn has become a veritable shibboleth in these latter days in the camp of the extreme Wagnerites. Only very recently has Mr. Kobbe spoken of Mendelssohn, "who, to judge from the innocent respectability of his music, its perfect form and polite melodies, seems always to have sat down to compose in his dress suit and kid gloves," while Mr. F. J. Crowest uses this same bone of contention (as Samson did the jawbone of an ass, only in this case the entire animal was present) to demolish Wagner, by repeatedly asserting that Mendelssohn was "the last of the musical Titans!" It is pleasant amid such differences of opinion, to notice that the public so far from crying, "a plague on both your houses," generally accepts both of the antagonistic composers. Beethoven and Weber wasted good ink and bad temper in decrying each other, yet neither succeeded in abolishing the other. It is certain that the same result will attend the antagonism of Wagner and Mendelssohn. They will by no means stand on the same plane, but the glory of Wagner cannot force the brightness, the dainty humor, the charming melodic grace of Mendelssohn into obsolescence. The Italian symphony is not so fine a work as the Scotch one, but it bubbles over with youth and gayety, and it is one of the best examples of music which pleases. With the great public it will ever remain a favorite, and every movement was greatly applauded at this concert. The work was splendidly read, and the performance was altogether praiseworthy. The beautiful viola theme in the second movement was exquisitely performed, while the flute passages in the same portion of the work were also flawless. The flute was always sure of a good showing in any orchestral work by this composer, and it seems to have been his especial favorite if one may judge by the illjudged prominence which is given to it in the last movement of the Reformation symphony, where the theme of the great Protestant chorale, "Ein Feste Burg ist unser Gott," is given to it, of all instruments in the world. The horns were splendidly handled in the third movement, and the rythmic use of the kettle-drum and trumpet in the finale deserves praise for its good balance and lack of overforcing.

Pole met Pole in the performance of Wieniawski by Adamowski, and the great piece of virtuosity, the violin concerto in D minor, was well overcome. One might have demanded a little more breadth in the first movement, but the romanza was the perfection of refined and delicate work, and the passages on the G string were powerful enough. The gypsy character of the finale was also given with appropriate dash and spirit, although certainly the romanza was the gem of it all. Recalls and flowers followed as a matter of course, for Mr. Adamowski is a persona grata to the Boston public.

Mackenzie's orchestral ballade, "La Belle Dame sans Merci"—is undoubtedly a good work, but it scarcely attains to the brooding sadness of Keats' poem. Yearning and longing it is, and there are moments of great triumph in which the trumpets and other brasses are nobly used, but the weirdness of the words is not altogether reproduced, although the ballade grows on one by repeated hearing. A most exciting and spirited performance of Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture ended a concert which was entirely successful.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The Register.
THE NEW HAVEN EVENING
MONDAY, JANUARY 12, 1891.

Symphony Concert at the Hyperion—Gus Hill's Company at the Grand.

The next to the last concert in the series given by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be rendered to-night at the Hyperion theater. A prominent feature of the concert will be the performance of selections from Mendelssohn's music to the "Midsummer Night's Dream," including the Wedding March. The soloist will be Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, wife of the conductor. She will sing an aria from "Mignon" and several other songs with piano accompaniment.

The Register.
NEW HAVEN 12.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 11.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Hyperion—World of Novelties at the Grand.

The third concert of this season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given at the Hyperion theater to-morrow evening. A pleasant feature of the concert will be the appearance of Mrs. Nikisch, who is to be the soloist of the evening. Mrs. Nikisch began her career on the operatic stage in 1881 at Cologne, where she sang for two seasons. In 1883 she accepted an engagement at the Stadt theater in Leipzic for a year, and a later engagement at the Holy theater in Cassel, also of a year, terminated with her marriage. Since her retirement from the opera she has been very successful in concert work and has sung much in Leipzic, Stuttgart, Heidelberg and other large cities. Her voice is a pure mezzo soprano, which she uses with rare skill. An unaffected manner and a charming stage presence add much to the effectiveness of her singing. She will be heard to-morrow in an aria from "Mignon" with orchestra, and in a group of songs with piano accompanied by Mr. Nikisch. The orchestral numbers of the program are the overture "Oberon," Weber; two movements from the Scandinavian symphony, Cowen; Danse Macabre, Saint Saens and the overture Scherzo, Notturno and wedding march from the Midsummer Night's dream, Mendelssohn.

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, JAN. 14, 1891.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Of the three concerts given in New-York this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that which took place at Chickering Hall last evening was unquestionably the most brilliant. The clear, crisp condition of the atmosphere seemed to have infected the players, and their work was as clean-cut and as sparkling as diamonds. The programme was one chosen with a view to the advantageous display of the notable virtuosity of the orchestra. The three numbers allotted to the band were that monumental exposition of Beethoven's grandeur, the overture to "Coriolanus," the andante and scherzo from Tschaikowsky's F minor symphony, and the "Im Walde" symphony of Raff.

Boston concertgoers are familiar with Mr. Nikisch's admirable reading of the Beethoven number. It was on the programme of his first concert in the Music Hall, and it made a deep impression, especially in the eloquence of that wonderful 'cello phrase in the closing measures, which Mr. Nikisch brings out as no one else does. There was no noticeable difference between the performance given then and that given last night save such as could be attributed to the change of location.

The two movements from the Tschaikowsky symphony served excellently as an orchestral virtuoso piece. The andante displayed the smooth voicing of the wood-wind in a charming manner and also gave the ever-brilliant strings favorable opportunities. The scherzo, however, is simply an exhibition movement and nothing more. It has little to commend it beyond its taking instrumentation, the pizzicato ostinato being a very popular form of orchestral witchery at all times. Mr. Nikisch caused all his stringed-instrument players to lay aside their bows and pluck the strings with free hands and with change of fingers. The result was, of course, a delightful airiness in the execution, which, coupled with the excellent accentuation and fine precision, produced a brilliant effect.

Raff's lovely "Im Walde" symphony is always a grateful task for a good orchestra. Aside from the beauty of its themes and their musical treatment, the instrumentation is superb. In the hands of Mr. Nikisch and his men the symphony was revealed in its full power. If it were necessary to go into details it would be no difficult task to fill half a column with comments on the manner in which the various beauties of the symphony were brought out. But as all lovers of music are familiar with the work, it is only necessary to say that the performance was worthy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That means that it was a compendium of all that is finest in orchestral playing.

There were two soloists in last evening's entertainment, of whom one was new to this city. This was Mrs. Nikisch, the wife of the conductor. She sang Raff's "Traumkönig und sein Lieb," with orchestra and with piano accompaniment by her husband; Goldmark's "Die Quelle," Jensen's "Am ufer des Flusses des Manzanares," and Brahms's "Vergebliches Staendchen." For an encore number after the last she gave Schumann's "Frühlingsnacht." Mrs. Nikisch has a good mezzo-soprano voice and sings with an abundance of expression. Her intonation was at times last evening a little faulty, but this was atoned for by the excellence of her style. As for Mr. Nikisch's accompaniments, they were simply masterly. They were a complete revelation of the possibilities of an abused art.

The other soloist was T. Adamowski, who is one of the first violinists of the orchestra, and he played the "Rondo Capriccioso" of Saint-Saëns. Mr. Adamowski is a delightful player, who possesses a rich and velvety tone, a sweet, suave cantabile, and an excellent command of the technics of his instrument. His performance was deserving of the warm and continued applause which greeted it.

Clipping from [illegible]
[illegible]
Date 1-13

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give another concert in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. As the programme has already been set forth in the LEDGER, it need only be repeated that the symphony will be Schubert's "Unfinished" (B minor), and that Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, wife of the conductor, will be the vocal soloist. The Schubert symphony was played here lately by the Thomas Orchestra.

NEW YORK HERALD
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 14, 1891.

THE "METROPOLITAN" MAKES MELODY.

An Evening with the Society at the Opera House.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Herr Artur Nikisch Leads and Frau Nikisch Sings.

The Opera House presented a wonderfully brilliant appearance last night when the Metropolitan Musical Society gave its annual concert.

As usual the band and choir were under the direction of Mr. W. R. Chapman. The band was recruited from among Mr. Thomas' followers. The soloists were Miss Mary Howe, the soprano; M. Planel, the well known Paris violinist, and Mr. W. H. Sherwood, the popular New York pianist, who had come up from Chicago expressly for the concert.

The programme, it must be confessed, would, but for these three artists, have been slightly tame. The choir, which was admirably drilled, was heard to most advantage in Thomas Morley's charming old five part madrigal, "My Bonnie Lass She Smileth," and in two characteristic songs by Lassen, entitled "Evening" and "Only Thou." All three were sung with precision, spirit and a nice attention to light and shade which did credit to the society.

Had the weak and futile "Hymn to Apollo" been omitted from the programme few present would, I think, have regretted it—except the soloists, Miss Katharine Hilke, Miss Emily M. Lawler and Mr. J. H. McKinley, on whom had devolved the thankless task of interpreting the inanities of Martin Roeder, the composer of the cantata.

Miss Mary Howe was applauded after her contributions, the "Scene" and "Légende" ("Bell" aria) from "Lakmé." The young soprano sang the selection correctly but coldly and without much expression. She took the time far too slowly, but gave the final trills and runs with ease and agility. In response to an encore Miss Howe repeated the close of the aria.

Mr. Sherwood's neat and brilliant touch and admirable technique were shown to advantage in the favorite Polacca in E (op. 72) of Weber, which won him a recall. As an "encore" Mr. Sherwood played Liszt's "Campanella," mastering the difficulties of the composition apparently without an effort.

Perhaps the most interesting feature of the concert was the fragment of Godard's graceful and dainty "Concerto Romantique," the work by which the composer may be said to have first become popular in Paris. M. Planel contributed the adagio and the canzonetta from the concerto. The former is full of delicate charm and sentiment, while the canzonetta is exquisitely fresh and tender in a peculiarly French way. Although somewhat handicapped by the erratic tempi of the conductor the violinist played both movements with delightful taste, feeling and spirit.

In acknowledgment of a hearty recall he played some variations of "The Last Rose of Summer," winning fresh applause by the richness and sweetness of his tone and the perfection of his technique.

The concert ended with the finale from "Die Meistersinger."

FRAU NIKISCH SINGS.

The third of the concert that the Boston Orchestra give here this winter occurred in Chickering Hall last night, in the presence of the usual large audience and to more than the common tribute of applause.

The evening will be remembered with especial pleasure as having introduced to our public Frau Nikisch, the wife of the conductor, who won instant favor by some of the most artistic singing that we have heard this winter.

Frau Nikisch's voice is a mezzo-soprano of no great volume, but of exceptionally pure quality, and it is used with delightful art. In the first of her songs, Raff's exquisite "The Dream King and His Love," this art, however, was not sufficient to atone for lack of power. The song is one of the few of Raff's works which contains aught of dramatic suggestiveness, and, while Frau Nikisch evidently felt the music deeply, its highest reaches were somewhat beyond her.

It was in the group of minor masterpieces—Goldmark's "Die Quelle," Jensen's "Am Ufer des Manzanares," Brahms' "Vergebliches Staendchen," and particularly in Schuman's "Frühlingsnacht," which Frau Nikisch sang by way of encore—that the merits of the singer were most effectively shown. Mrs. Henschel is the only one who in the last few years has given us German lieder with anything like the spirit and arch grace of this performance.

Much of the charm of Frau Nikisch's work was due to the admirable accompaniment furnished by the orchestra in the Raff song, and in the others by Herr Nikisch himself at the piano. Again I must go back to the Henschel concerts for anything comparable to the perfection of Herr Nikisch's accompaniments.

The orchestral part of the concert was notable for a splendidly finished performance of the "Coriolanus" overture and for the really marvellous delicacy of the scherzo of Tschaikowsky's F minor symphony, which was nothing less than an orchestral tour de force. We have been accustomed to expect much from these Boston players, especially from the strings, but the scherzo in question surpassed even the highest expectations.

Mr. Adamowski, who for some years has been one of Boston's best violinists, gave a fair but not brilliant performance of the Saint-Saëns "Rondo Capriccioso," and the concert ended with Raff's "Im Walde" symphony, the slow movement of which was given with exquisite effect.

Clipping from Herald
Baltimore Md.
Date 1-12

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert on Friday evening next was the largest the orchestra has ever had in Baltimore, and the probabilities are that every seat will be taken before Friday. The programme is modern and fine, affording full employment for the seventy-five artists, of whom the orchestra consists. There is much interest also in the debut of Mrs. Nikisch in Baltimore, which takes place at this concert.

[77

[illegible] YORK
THE SUN, WEDNESDAY,
JANUARY 14, 1891.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Nikisch's programme for the third concert given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was of generous proportions and abundant variety. Its opening number was Beethoven's "Coriolan" overture; its closing piece, Raff's "Im Walde" symphony; between these works came Raff's "Dream King and His Love," the andantino and scherzo from Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4, Saint-Saëns' "Rondo Capriccioso" for violin, and songs by Goldmark, Jensen, and Brahms. The soloists of the evening were Mrs. Nikisch and Mr. T. Adamowski.

Of the orchestral music the final symphony had the happiest treatment. Raff's "Im Walde" may impress one as somewhat superficial, if contrasted with the classics or with the more involved writing of latter day composers, but the work abounds in vivid illustrative passages, replete with sensuous grace and loveliness, and no achievement of the same order is better suited to cast light upon so finely attuned, admirably balanced, and skilfully directed a band as Mr. Nikisch conducts.

In a practically perfect exposition, the largo depicting night in the forest may be cited as having given special prominence to the poetic feeling and exquisite finish of the orchestra's playing, while the rendering of the "Coriolanus" overture, denoting the same sympathetic spirit and technical excellence, was, perhaps, a little wanting in muscularity. The two movements from Tschaikowsky's symphony were capitally given, the freedom and swing of the scherzo, with its distinctly Russian and novel themes, proving most effective.

Of the soloists, Mr. Adamowski had been heard in New York before. He interpreted last evening Saint-Saëns's "Rondo Capriccioso," and, although the violinist has little authority or dash, his work did not go unrewarded. Mrs. Nikisch, the young and comely wife of the conductor, was heartily applauded in songs by Goldmark, Jensen, and Brahms, Jensen's "Am Ufer des Manzanares," winning unanimous approval. Mrs. Nikisch is at her best in modern lieder, for her singing is full of expression; with Mr. Nikisch at the piano—and to listen to his accompaniments is in itself a treat—the influence of her performances is thoroughly delightful. The concert brought together an audience that crowded Chickering Hall in every part.

News, New Haven, Conn.
Date 1-13

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Another delightful musical treat was furnished the public last evening at the Hyperion on the occasion of the third concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The numerous musicians seemed to be animated by but a single soul, so perfect was the harmony throughout.

There are but few leaders who accomplish such uniformally happy results as Mr. Nikisch, both in the matter of their selections and the manner of rendering them. The opening and closing numbers last evening—Weber's overture to "Oberon" and Mendelssohn's musical accompaniment to "Midsummer Night's Dream"—are well known and familiar pieces, and the large audience settled down to listen to these favorite morceaux with a perfect confidence that no disappointment was in store for them. The Scandinavian Symphony in C minor" is one of those dreamy, fanciful sketches in which the imagination runs riot, and one is so wrapt up in the melody as to be hardly conscious when the last strain ceases—the fancy wanders on. Then, in wild and weird cadence, followed the "Danse Macabre" of Saint-Saens. Surely no higher tribute need be paid to Mr. Nikisch and his band than to say that their interpretation of the supernatural scenes in which this music revels needed no added explanation in matter of fact type to make them wholly understood. Mrs. Nikisch, the soloist of the evening, has a full, rich, strong voice of great culture, which she evidently holds under perfect control. Her rendering of "Taegliche Frage" elicited a demand for an encore, which was answered by another little German song as charming as the one preceding it.

The next Symphony concert will be given February 23. No one who has a desire to hear a choice selection of classical music rendered with scarcely a flaw can afford to miss it.

Clipping No.
Clipping from Call Philadelphia Pa.
Date 1-15

Third Boston Symphony Concert.

A fine program has been prepared by Conductor Nikisch for the third Boston Symphony Concert, which will take place at the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. The orchestra will be heard in compositions by Goldmark, Schubert and Mendelssohn. Mme. Nikisch will be the vocalist. She will interpret songs by Raff, Schubert, Jensen and Goldmark.

Clipping from Journal, Providence, R. I.
Date 1-14

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Nikisch, conductor, will give the fourth concert of its series at Infantry [illegible] on Wednesday evening of next week. [illegible] and Mrs. Nikisch [illegible]

Palladium, New Haven, Conn.
Date 1-13

IN THE TOP GALLERY.

THE MOST POPULAR SEATS FOR THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERTS

Close of a Highly Successful Series—A Programme Which Contained Features Which Will Never Be Forgotten by the Many Listeners.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given last evening and long before seven o'clock the lobby of the Hyperion was packed with holders of rush tickets, struggling to obtain some kind of a place in the line before the box office. When at last the doors were opened the crowd rushed up the two long flights of stairs and frantically leaped for the front rows.

Before a quarter past seven all the desirable rush seats had been taken, and by half-past there wasn't a vacant chair in the upper gallery anywhere. This location of seats for the Symphony concerts is becoming more and more popular, the blending of the instruments is heard to far better advantage up there, and last night the seats in the other portions of the theater were comparatively scantily taken.

The first number on the programme was Neber's tuneful overture to "Oberon" and its wonderful instrumental coloring was exquisitely brought out by the orchestra. Hardly had the echoes of the fairies' mad dance died away, when Mrs. Nikisch, the soloist of the evening, stepped before the audience and the orchestra commenced the dreamy introduction to a beautiful aria from Thomas "Mignon." Mrs. Nikisch has a mezzo soprano voice of the fullest and richest quality, but it was not enjoyed so much in the operatic aria, though the rendition was faultless and artistic, as in the short songs of Schubert, Goldmark and Helmund, which she sang later in the programme with piano accompaniment. She rendered these with wonderful taste and expression, and her vivacious and merry interpretation of the familiar and popular "Daily Question" brought down an avalanche of applause, and she was recalled again and again till at last she responded to the encore by singing a quaint and simple little melody.

The Norwegian music of Cowen's Scandinavian symphony was exceedingly wierd and characteristic. The canonical treatment of the theme wonderfully represented the echoing melody as it is tossed from cliff to cliff in the gloomy and quiet Norwegian fjord, and the stillness of the calm moonlit and mountain-shadowed waters, rudely broken by the gay reveling of a party of minstrels, the sound of whose merriment gradually dies away again as they sail off into distance, was beautifully pictured. The enjoyment of the piece was greatly marred, however, by the unfortunate fact that the horns were badly out of tune. An imperfection of this nature is so unusual in the Boston Symphony that it was particularly noticeable.

The most enjoyable number of the programme, and probably the most picturesque orchestral epic piece that has ever been performed here, was the symphonic poem, "Danse Macabre," by Saint Saens. It was from the following ghastly lines that the composer obtained his inspiration, and if the poem is uncanny the music was doubly so:

Zig, Zig, Zig,—grim Death, in cadence,
Striking with his heel a tomb,—
Death at midnight plays a dance tune,
Zig, Zig, Zig upon his viol.
The winter wind blows, and the night is all dark;
Moans are heard in the linden trees;
Through the gloom the white skeletons pass,
Running and leaping in their shrouds.
Zig, Zig, Zig, each one is frisking,
The bones of the dancers are heard to crack.
But hist! of a sudden they quit the round;
They push forward, they fly, the cock has crowed.

Slowly the picked strings of the cellos were tolling for the midnight hour, when suddenly a wild, wierd and awful melody dances madcap over the violins. The wind sighs and moans through the trees and around the stones in the graveyard, and yet this ghastly melody goes on more and more madly, and now piercing, blood curdling screams fill the air already ringing with uncanny noises, and the skeletons leap from grave to grave and join in awful revelry, their bones knocking together with gruesome rythm. The cock crows and the shades flutter away, down, down into the darkness of the distance till at last all is still but the sighing of the wind and the notes of the horn that proclaims the coming morn.

Happily contrasted with this infernal but wonderfully effective composition was the beautiful fairy music of Mendelssohn's Nicsummer Night's Dream, which closed concert. The fays gaily tripped from flower to flower, as the made high sport over the loves of the two mortal couples until after the sylvan scherzo and the lullaby nocturne, the gay marriage bells rang out and the familiar, festive, but stately strains of the wedding march brought the concert to an end.

Clipping from Phila. Pa.
Date 1-10

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] third concert of its series at the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening. A special feature of the programme will be the performance of Mendelssohn's music to the "Midsummer Night's Dream," in which Mr. Nikisch and his musicians distinguished themselves at a recent concert in Boston. Mrs. Nikisch is announced as soloist. Complete programmes are to be had at 1119 Chestnut Street, where the sale of seats is now in progress.

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, Jan. 21, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1890-91

PROGRAMME

4

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

[78]

NEW YORK
THE SUN, WEDNESDAY,
JANUARY 14, 1891.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Nikisch's programme for the third concert given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was of generous proportions and abundant variety. Its opening number was Beethoven's "Coriolan" overture; its closing piece, Raff's "Im Walde" symphony; between these works came Raff's "Dream King and His Love," the andantino and scherzo from Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4, Saint-Saëns' "Rondo Capriccioso" for violin, and songs by Goldmark, Jensen, and Brahms. The soloists of the evening were Mrs. Nikisch and Mr. T. Adamowski.

Of the orchestral music the final symphony had the happiest treatment. Raff's "Im Walde" may impress one as somewhat superficial, if contrasted with the classics or with the more involved writing of latter day composers, but the work abounds in vivid illustrative passages, replete with sensuous grace and loveliness, and no achievement of the same order is better suited to cast light upon so finely attuned, admirably balanced, and skilfully directed a band as Mr. Nikisch conducts.

In a practically perfect exposition, the "large depleting night in the forest may be cited as having given special prominence to the poetic feeling and exquisite finish of the orchestra's playing, while the rendering of the "Coriolanus" overture, denoting the same sympathetic spirit and technical excellence, was, perhaps, a little wanting in muscularity. The two movements from Tschaikowsky's symphony were capitally given, the freedom and swing of the scherzo, with its distinctly Russian and novel themes, proving most effective.

Of the soloists, Mr. Adamowski had been heard in New York before. He interpreted last evening Saint-Saëns's "Rondo Capriccioso," and, although the violinist has little authority or dash, his work did not go unrewarded. Mrs. Nikisch, the young and comely wife of the conductor, was heartily applauded in songs by Goldmark, Jensen, and Brahms. Jensen's "Am Ufer des Manzanares," winning unanimous approval. Mrs. Nikisch is at her best in modern lieder, for her singing is full of expression; with Mr. Nikisch at the piano—and to listen to his accompaniments is in itself a treat—the influence of her performances is thoroughly delightful. The concert brought together an audience that crowded Chickering Hall in every part.

News, New Haven, Conn.
Date 1-13

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Another delightful musical treat was furnished the public last evening at the Hyperion on the occasion of the third concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The numerous musicians seemed to be animated by but a single soul, so perfect was the harmony throughout.

There are but few leaders who accomplish such uniformally happy results as Mr. Nikisch, both in the matter of their selections and the manner of rendering them. The opening and closing numbers last evening—Weber's overture to "Oberon" and Mendelssohn's musical accompaniment to "Midsummer Night's Dream"—are well known and familiar pieces, and the large audience settled down to listen to these favorite morceaux with a perfect confidence that no disappointment was in store for them. The Scandinavian Symphony in C minor" is one of those dreamy, fanciful sketches in which the imagination runs riot, and one is so wrapt up in the melody as to be hardly conscious when the last strain ceases—the fancy wanders on. Then, in wild and weird cadence, followed the "Danse Macabre" of Saint-Saens. Surely no higher tribute need be paid to Mr. Nikisch and his band than to say that their interpretation of the supernatural scenes in which this music revels needed no added explanation in matter of fact type to make them wholly understood. Mrs. Nikisch, the soloist of the evening, has a full, rich, strong voice of great culture, which she evidently holds under perfect control. Her rendering of "Taegliche Frage" elicited a demand for an encore, which was answered by another little German song as charming as the one preceding it.

The next Symphony concert will be given February 23. No one who has a desire to hear a choice selection of classical music rendered with scarcely a flaw can afford to miss it.

Clipping No.
Clipping from Call Philadelphia Pa.
Date 1-15

Third Boston Symphony Concert.

A fine program has been prepared by Conductor Nikisch for the third Boston Symphony Concert, which will take place at the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. The orchestra will be heard in compositions by Goldmark, Schubert and Mendelssohn. Mme. Nikisch will be the vocalist. She will interpret songs by Raff, Schubert, Jensen and Goldmark.

Clipping from Journal, Providence, R. I.
Date 1-14

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Nikisch, conductor, will give the fourth concert of its series at Infantry Hall on Wednesday evening of next week. Miss Aiken, Wentworth and Mr. Anton

Palladium, New Haven, Conn.
Date 1-13

IN THE TOP GALLERY.

THE MOST POPULAR SEATS FOR THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERTS

Close of a Highly Successful Series—A Programme Which Contained Features Which Will Never Be Forgotten by the Many Listeners.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given last evening, and long before seven o'clock the lobby of the Hyperion was packed with holders of rush tickets, struggling to obtain some kind of a place in the line before the box office. When at last the doors were opened the crowd rushed up the two long flights of stairs and frantically leaped for the front rows.

Before a quarter past seven all the desirable rush seats had been taken, and by half-past there wasn't a vacant chair in the upper gallery anywhere. This location of seats for the Symphony concerts is becoming more and more popular, the blending of the instruments is heard to far better advantage up there, and last night the seats in the other portions of the theater were comparatively scantily taken.

The first number on the programme was Neber's tuneful overture to "Oberon" and its wonderful instrumental coloring was exquisitely brought out by the orchestra. Hardly had the echoes of the fairies' mad dance died away, when Mrs Nikisch, the soloist of the evening, stepped before the audience and the orchestra commenced the dreamy introduction to a beautiful aria from Thomas "Mignon." Mrs Nikisch has a mezzo soprano voice of the fullest and richest quality, but it was not enjoyed so much in the operatic aria, though the rendition was faultless and artistic, as in the short songs of Schubert, Goldmark and Helmund, which she sang later in the programme with piano accompaniment. She rendered these with wonderful taste and expression, and her vivacious and merry interpretation of the familiar and popular "Daily Question" brought down an avalanche of applause, and she was recalled again and again till at last she responded to the encore by singing a quaint and simple little melody.

The Norwegian music of Cowen's Scandinavian symphony was exceedingly wierd and characteristic. The canonical treatment of the theme wonderfully represented the echoing melody as it is tossed from cliff to cliff in the gloomy and quiet Norwegian fjord, and the stillness of the calm moonlit and mountain shadowed waters, rudely broken by the gay reveling of a party of minstrels, the sound of whose merriment gradually dies away again as they sail off into distance, was beautifully pictured. The enjoyment of the piece was greatly marred, however, by the unfortunate fact that the horns were badly out of tune. An imperfection of this nature is so unusual in the Boston Symphony that it was particularly noticeable.

The most enjoyable number of the programme, and probably the most picturesque orchestral epic piece that has ever been performed here, was the symphonic poem, "Danse Macabre," by Saint Saens. It was from the following ghastly lines that the composer obtained his inspiration, and if the poem is uncanny the music was doubly so:

Zig, Zig, Zig,—grim Death, in cadence,
Striking with his heel a tomb,—
Death at midnight plays a dance tune,
Zig, Zig, Zig upon his viol.
The winter wind blows, and the night is all dark;
Moans are heard in the linden trees;
Through the gloom the white skeletons pass,
Running and leaping in their shrouds.
Zig, Zig, Zig, each one is frisking,
The bones of the dancers are heard to crack.
But hist! of a sudden they quit the round;
They push forward, they fly, the cock has crowed.

Slowly the picked strings of the cellos were tolling for the midnight hour, when suddenly a wild, wierd and awful melody dances madcap over the violins. The wind sighs and moans through the trees and around the stones in the graveyard, and yet this ghastly melody goes on more and more madly, and now piercing blood curdling screams fill the air already ringing with uncanny noises, and the skeletons leap from grave to grave and join in awful revelry, their bones knocking together with gruesome rythm. The cock crows and the shades flutter away, down, down into the darkness of the distance till at last all is still but the sighing of the wind and the notes of the horn that proclaims the coming morn.

Happily contrasted with this infernal but wonderfully effective composition was the beautiful fairy music of Mendelssohn's Nidsummer Night's Dream, which closed concert. The fays gaily tripped from flower to flower, as the made high sport over the loves of the two mortal couples until after the sylvan scherzo and the lullaby nocturne, the gay marriage bells rang out and the familiar, festive, but stately strains of the wedding march brought the concert to an end.

Clipping from Phila. Pa.
Date 1-10

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] third concert of its series at the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening. A special feature of the programme will be the performance of Mendelssohn's music to the "Midsummer Night's Dream," in which Mr. Nikisch and his musicians distinguished themselves at a recent concert in Boston. Mrs. Nikisch is announced as soloist. Complete programmes are to be had at 1119 Chestnut Street, where the sale of seats is now in progress.

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, Jan. 21, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1890-91

PROGRAMME

4

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

The Evening Post.

New York, Wednesday, January 14, 1891

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The solo element was more prominent at last evening's concert of Mr. Nikisch's orchestra than usual, but, fortunately, it was so good that the high standard set for itself by the famous Boston organization was not in the least lowered. There was much curiosity to see and hear the conductor's wife, who was to interpret songs by Goldmark, Brahms, Jensen, and Raff, and this curiosity was agreeably gratified. She proved to be a singer endowed with a pleasing voice, well trained in the art of reproducing those delightful German songs which are heard altogether too seldom in our concert halls. She was especially fascinating in Brahms's "Vergebliches Ständchen," which she sang with such piquant expression that the audience broke out into the most enthusiastic applause, which was continued until she consented to sing again. She had the immense advantage of having her piano as well as orchestral accompaniments played by her husband, who is by far the best song accompanist that has been heard in New York within our memory, and who ought to give a special course of instruction to other pianists, who usually make either too much or too little of their accompaniments to songs. The other soloist was Mr. Adamowsky, who played Saint-Saëns's "Rondo Capriccioso" with most facile execution and great brilliancy. Mr. Nikisch is fortunate to have two such able soloists as Mr. Adamowsky and Mr. Kneisel among his violinists.

The orchestral numbers included Beethoven's "Coriolan" overture, the andantino and scherzo from Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, and Raff's Forest Symphony. The "Coriolan" overture was played here last year by the same orchestra, but the other two numbers were given for the first time, and it must be conceded that a more poetic performance of the Forest Symphony has never been heard here. The exhilarating allegro depicting daytime in a forest, the dreamy twilight largo, the merry Mendelssohnian dance of the Dryads, and the gruesome, agitated night in the forest, with the approach of the wild huntsmen—all were given in a way which brought out the appropriate orchestral and dramatic coloring of this master work by a composer who, whatever his shortcomings may have been, had the gift of inventing original melodies and clothing them in a rich orchestral garb, with new and characteristic harmonies. The audience remained spellbound to the last note, and no wonder, for Mr. Nikisch worked up the final allegro to a magnificent and thrilling climax.

The Tschaikowsky selections also came in for a good share of applause; indeed, the audience for a while insisted on a repetition of the scherzo, which, however, was not granted. It is written almost throughout for strings pizzicato, in an ingenious manner, and it was curious to see once more how fond audiences are of this device, which has made a certain polka by Delibes so popular, and by the invention of which Monteverde, the Italian Wagner, so astonished his players and operatic audiences in the seventeenth century. From one point of view, it is true, this practice of plucking the strings instead of using the bow was less of a novelty then than it is now; for at that time the orchestra included several instruments whose strings were plucked (lutes, harps, guitars), while to-day the sole survivor of this type in the grand orchestra is the harp.

The Times.

PHILADELPHIA, JANUARY 15, 1891.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Successful Concert at the Academy, With Mrs. Nikisch as Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a more than usually successful concert last evening at the Academy of Music. Although the programme was not remakably important, the audience filled the house and was attentive throughout the concert. The leading feature was a new overture by Goldmark, "Prometheus." The fitness of the title is not apparent, but that is of little consequence. It is good music, full of original ideas naturally developed, and it was admirably played by the orchestra, with much fuller tone than it has hitherto displayed this season. If not quite so poetical as the "Sakuntala," the overture is still a work of distinct value, and it gave a welcome example of the virility of rendering of which Mr. Nikisch is capable.

The Schubert unfinished symphony, though parts of it were played with strength and beauty, was disappointing, for the reason so often noticed—that in the minute elaboration of instrumental detail the modern conductor is apt to lose something of the spirit and purpose of the classical composers. On the other hand, Mr. Nikisch's delicacy of touch, combined with poetic sentiment, is entirely applicable to the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. The overture was exquisitely played and the scherzo was in its way a perfect model of orchestral virtuosity. The march, though taken rather slowly, was also reasonably successful, though here the weakness of the brass is felt.

Mrs. Nikisch was the soloist of the evening and won the favor of the audience at once, as much by her charming personality as by her artistic gifts. She has a very pleasant mezzo-soprano voice and an excellent style, and while she lacks the dramatic power necessary to give effect to Raff's "Dream King," the group of modern songs from Goldmark, Jensen, Brahms and Schumann, which she sang with the piano, were altogether delightful, Mr. Nikisch playing the accompaniments with exquisite taste.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

THURSDAY, JANUARY 15, 1891.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Our friends who have been indulging in superlatives in their comments on the first two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will be put to their trumps now, if they try to convey an adequate idea of the excellencies of the third concert, which took place at Chickering Hall on Tuesday night. It was far and away more admirable than either of the concerts that preceded it in most of the elements which invite the attention of the judicious listener at these concerts. New-Yorkers are less concerned about Mr. Nikisch's programmes and solo performers than about the playing of his orchestra. The schemes of their own orchestral concerts are, as a rule, better constructed than those of the Boston organization, and though they have reason to envy Boston the possession of such solo violinists and singers as have appeared thus far, they are not startled out of their equanimity by them. The playing of the band, however, is in a different case. There New-Yorkers have learned to expect delights which their own organizations can not provide. We have thought that in some particulars the playing of the orchestra in the first two concerts was not up to the standard maintained in former seasons, but on Tuesday night there was no occasion to deplore the real or fancied decadence. In all its work it was superb, and great enthusiasm followed every one of its numbers. Even the Pizzicato Scherzo of Tschaikowsky's Symphony in F minor compelled admiration because of the precision and delicacy with which it was played. It was, indeed, a tour de force, but in the minds of those who have a true ideal of what the symphonic form ought to be, and who feel that the real charm and nobility of the violin is disclosed only in its capacity as a melody instrument, a capacity that is matchless in the instrumental field, the doubts about the propriety of Tschaikowsky's clever composition were not resolved. How different was the band's cantilina in Raff's "Forest" Symphony, with its lovely poetry, which closed the concert. There was spiritual refreshment pure and undefiled.

The solo performers were Mrs. Nikisch, mezzo soprano, and Mr. Adamowski, violin. The warm place which the conductor has won in the hearts of New-York's music patrons was at once shared by his charming wife, whose presence and voice are engaging and whose artistic nature was disclosed in every bar of Raff's song with orchestral accompaniment, "The Dream King and his Love," which she sang first, and the four songs which came later—Goldmark's "Die Quelle," Jensen's "Am Ufer des Manzanares," Brahms's "Vergebliches Staendchen" and Schumann's "Fruehling's Nacht," the latter sung in response to most hearty recalls. Mrs. Nikisch's voice is not remarkable in quality, but it has a winsomeness and sympathetic freshness that are irresistible, and her conception of the poetry and music is that of a deep-feeling and true artist. She was accompanied on the pianoforte by her husband so exquisitely that it was hard to judge which of the happily mated pair deserved the greater meed of admiration.

Mr. Adamowski played a rather light-waisted Rondo Capriccioso by Saint-Saëns, but all disposition to find fault with the music is swallowed up by the pleasure which Mr. Adamowski's playing provided. It was finished to a degree. With such artists as he, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Rath and three or four others sitting at the violin desks, it is no wonder that the Boston Symphony Orchestra stands alone among American bands. The house was crowded.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 17, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

There must be nothing but glad praise for Mr. Nikisch's direction of the twelfth concert. The programme had the usual fault of being ten or fifteen minutes too long and the performance was tardy in beginning; the material was not too attractive, the symphony and final overture being old stand bys—Mendelssohn's "Italian" and Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini." But there were in these, as in all else during the evening, the care, the reserve, the modesty and the sympathy which are too often wanting in Mr. Nikisch's style. The symphony was perfection in its proportionment of volume and emphasis, its gentle flow, its steady time and rhythm, its alternating insouciance and reflectiveness and its poetic fancy. The score, so lightly charged with the color of deep brass, was allowed its true suavity of horns and wood, and even the preposterous drummer abated his nervous furies until his sounds melted mysteriously, as they should, into the lower harmonies. The overture was not unduly resonant or pompous, and full justice was done to the intermediate orchestral number, Dr. Mackenzie's musical parallel to Keats's poem, "La Belle Dame sans Merci." A thoroughly respectable work, this, not devoid of fancy in its suggestions of martial action, of pastoral openness and gloomy despondency, but not romantic, weird or haunting in any great degree. It illustrates the poem like a set of old-fashioned wood-cuts or mediæval illuminations, but never intensifies the rhapsody, the lament, the passion or the sad languor of the strange stanzas. Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist and won well the triple recall which he received after playing Wieniawski's D-minor violin concerto. Written for Sarasate, the gypsy fervor and dash of the last movement need a more heated and strenuous spirit than Mr. Adamowski's, but this exception touches his temperament and not his art, which sustained him here, as elsewhere in the concerto, with clear, carrying tone, distinct execution and elegant phrasing. The andante, which is exactly in accord with Mr. Adamowski's truth of sentiment and sweetness of expression, was exquisitely done. There will be no concert tonight. On the following Saturday Mme. Helen Hopekirk will make her first appearance after an absence of some seasons, playing a concerto from Tschaikowski; the symphony will be Volkmann in D-minor and Mr. Arthur Foote will get a hearing for his new "Francesca da Rimini" overture.

N HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 17, 1891

REVIEW OF THE WEEK.

The program of the twelfth symphony concert which took place last Saturday evening at Music Hall was interesting and well arranged. The symphony was in its proper place; the two numbers which followed were exceedingly well played, and the Berlioz overture brought brilliantly the close. The selections were as follows:

Symphony in A (Italian).....Mendelssohn
Concerto for violin in D minor .....Wieniawski
Mr. Adamowski.
Ballade for orchestra,
"La Belle Dame sans Merci".....Mackenzie
Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini".....Berlioz

* * * * *

It is true that we heard the Italian symphony last winter, and it is also true that we are constantly dosed with Mendelssohn; but however much we are inclined to rebel, like children who cry out against the mixture of sulphur and molasses administered at stated intervals, it is a question whether the dose is not most advantageous to the musical body. Certainly after the program-music of Liszt and Raff which was heard lately, the Italian symphony seemed more beautiful and more exquisitely proportioned than ever. Mendelssohn has suffered severely both from absurd praise and unbounded abuse. After all has been said for and against him there must remain certain facts which will be admitted by all fair-minded men: that he was a master of form, that he had a gift of melody, that he had a keen sense of the value of legitimate contrasts in instrumentation, and an almost unerring appreciation of the value and characteristics of each instrument. He had, it is true, many grievous faults both as man and musician. As a man, in spite of the panegyrics of slavish admirers and imitators, he was prudish, priggish, a back-biter, envious, and often exceedingly disingenuous. These unpleasant traits are revealed not by the discoveries of his enemies, but by his own letters and his own actions. The letters published by Felix Moscheles are proof enough; his silence concerning the works of his friend Schumann brings additional testimony. Musically he erred in mawkish sentimentality as is seen in his "Songs without Words," and his mannerisms are exhibitions of weakness rather than of repulsive strength or crude originality. Nor was his influence, which was far beyond his deserts, always for the best. Too many an English composer has been ruined by admiration for the man who was a friend at the English Court; and Leipzig to-day is far behind other German cities from a musical standpoint on account of the shade of Mendelssohn, invoked with incantations and superstitious awe that he may pronounce upon the merits of a young composer. Many a musician will recognize three stages in his judgment of Mendelssohn. At first he is charmed, delighted with his sweetness and symmetry. This sweetness then cloys, and to the symmetry which grows monotonous he prefers for a time the breaking away from conventional rules seen in the modern radical school. But after he has worshipped for a time at the shrine of these strange gods, he returns to his earlier love and with sober judgment recognizes the great merits of the composer of "Fingal's Cave" and the "Italian" symphony. He will throw overboard most of his music written for the pianoforte; he can spare the songs and even the oratorios; but he will cling to the overtures, to the "Italian" and "Scotch" symphonies and to the "Walpurgis Night." And to the young composer the study of Mendelssohn's scores is more to be commended than attempts to follow feebly in the footsteps of men who were great by force of genius and not from simply disregarding the rules of form and the traditions of the elders.

* * * * *

It has been said above that too many of the Englishmen have slavishly imitated Mendelssohn. This reproach cannot be brought against Mr. Mackenzie, who is, however, an eclectic and is devoid of strong individuality. He is a serious musician without a strongly developed sense of melody, who by industry has succeeded in writing works which are to his credit. This Ballade which illustrates musically the well-known poem of Keats is a good example of his style, although in imagination and poesy it falls far short of the poem itself. Viewed as a piece of music without a title it is interesting, exceedingly well written and ingeniously scored.

* * * * *

Hector Berlioz wrote two overtures for his opera "Benvenuto Cellini," which, produced in 1838 at the Grand Opera in Paris, failed, although the chief parts were sung by Duprez, Dorus-Gras and Stoltz. The second overture, played before the second act and known as "The Roman Carnival," is musically the better and the more effective. Yet the overture played last Saturday is a brilliant and most impressive work. This, as well as the orchestral numbers, was finely played by the orchestra. Throughout the concert there was a marked attention shown to the dynamic marks of the composers, an absence of exaggeration, a musical spirit which was a forcible contrast to the apparent indifference and carelessness unfortunately seen in too many concerts of this season.

* * * * *

Mr. Adamowski played the solo part of Wieniawski's delightful concerto. He gave it an admirable performance. He played with great care for tone and phrasing yet with the true abandon of the virtuoso. The inherent difficulties of the composition were easily overcome. His sentiment was genuine. In short it was a striking exhibition of Mr. Adamowski's artistic growth. He was thrice recalled, a flattering tribute which he well deserved.

* * * * *

THURSDAY, JANUARY 15, 1891.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch at the Academy of Music Last Evening.

The most interesting feature of the Boston Symphony Concert last evening was the singing of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, wife of the conductor, who was heard at Adamowski concert not long since, but is otherwise unknown here as a singer. Mrs. Nikisch has a pleasing voice, which has been well trained, and is admirably adapted to German songs. Her selections were Raff's "Dream King and His Love," with orchestral accompaniment; Goldmark's "Die Quelle;" Jensin's "Am Ufer des Manzanares;" Brahms "Vergebliches Standchen," the last three with a piano accompaniment by Mr Nikisch.

It was a rare treat to hear these delightful songs sung in such a thoroughly competent manner. The Brahms selection was sung with a piquant expression that was fascinating. She was especially happy in having her husband as an accompanist, for of all orchestral conductors that have been heard in the city Mr. Nickish is by far the best in directing accompaniments for the voice.

When others drown the voice he reinforces it. The audience was highly pleased and Mrs. Nikisch was given an encore.

The three orchestral numbers were: Goldmark's "Prometheus" overture, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and selections from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Nights Dream" overture. The unfamiliar "Prometheus" is a creation worthy of its author, and well befits its title. The Schubert symphony was played at the last Thomas Concert. Mr. Nikisch interpreted it somewhat differently, and had the advantage of an organization more suited to the composition. It was charmingly played, the wealth of strings seldom being used to a better advantage.

Mendelsshon's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture was one of the most delightful of overture orchestral compositions. There is a romance of delicacy, a variety of harmonious theme and a wealth of melodious strains in it that make it deservedly popular. Mr. Nikisch showed great discrimination in the arrangement of the score for his orchestra. The fairy dance was given by sixty strings as delicately as on a single violin. It is in such work as this that the full scope of the organization is brought out.

The programme was a little out of the usual vein and was all the more agreeable as a slight diversion from the usual order of things.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, January 15, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Herr Arthur Nikisch and his instrumental forces were heard at the Academy of Music last evening in a diversified programme, which included Goldmark's "Prometheus" overture, a stormy composition, as full of original effects as "Sakuntala" or other later overtures of this composer; Schubert's unfinished symphony and the scherzo, nocturne and march from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. Mrs. Nikisch, the soloist of the occasion, contributed to the programme several songs by modern German composers, none of which possessed especial musical value, or was delivered in a manner that might command critical attention. No reason is apparent why this artist should not appear in public as a solo singer; and the soprano of the period never quarrels with opportunity. It is not thus, however, that the American public is eventually to be convinced of the value of the work of German song-writers. With a great orchestra there should either be great soloists or none at all. The Schubert selection, indeed, amply repaid all lovers of music who attended this concert.

The Evening Post.

New York, Wednesday, January 14, 1891.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The solo element was more prominent at last evening's concert of Mr. Nikisch's orchestra than usual, but, fortunately, it was so good that the high standard set for itself by the famous Boston organization was not in the least lowered. There was much curiosity to see and hear the conductor's wife, who was to interpret songs by Goldmark, Brahms, Jensen, and Raff, and this curiosity was agreeably gratified. She proved to be a singer endowed with a pleasing voice, well trained in the art of reproducing those delightful German songs which are heard altogether too seldom in our concert halls. She was especially fascinating in Brahms's "Vergebliches Ständchen," which she sang with such piquant expression that the audience broke out into the most enthusiastic applause, which was continued until she consented to sing again. She had the immense advantage of having her piano as well as orchestral accompaniments played by her husband, who is by far the best song accompanist that has been heard in New York within our memory, and who ought to give a special course of instruction to other pianists, who usually make either too much or too little of their accompaniments to songs. The other soloist was Mr. Adamowsky, who played Saint-Saëns's "Rondo Capriccioso" with most facile execution and great brilliancy. Mr. Nikisch is fortunate to have two such able soloists as Mr. Adamowsky and Mr. Kneisel among his violinists.

The orchestral numbers included Beethoven's "Coriolan" overture, the andantino and scherzo from Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, and Raff's Forest Symphony. The "Coriolan" overture was played here last year by the same orchestra, but the other two numbers were given for the first time, and it must be conceded that a more poetic performance of the Forest Symphony has never been heard here. The exhilarating allegro depicting daytime in a forest, the dreamy twilight largo, the merry Mendelssohnian dance of the Dryads, and the gruesome, agitated night in the forest, with the approach of the wild huntsmen—all were given in a way which brought out the appropriate orchestral and dramatic coloring of this master work by a composer who, whatever his shortcomings may have been, had the gift of inventing original melodies and clothing them in a rich orchestral garb, with new and characteristic harmonies. The audience remained spellbound to the last note, and no wonder, for Mr. Nikisch worked up the final allegro to a magnificent and thrilling climax.

The Tschaikowsky selections also came in for a good share of applause; indeed, the audience for a while insisted on a repetition of the scherzo, which, however, was not granted. It is written almost throughout for strings pizzicato, in an ingenious manner, and it was curious to see once more how fond audiences are of this device, which has made a certain polka by Delibes so popular, and by the invention of which Monteverde, the Italian Wagner, so astonished his players and operatic audiences in the seventeenth century. From one point of view, it is true, this practice of plucking the strings instead of using the bow was less of a novelty then than it is now; for at that time the orchestra included several instruments whose strings were plucked (lutes, harps, guitars), while to-day the sole survivor of this type in the grand orchestra is the harp.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, JANUARY 15, 1891.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Successful Concert at the Academy, With Mrs. Nikisch as Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a more than usually successful concert last evening at the Academy of Music. Although the programme was not remakably important, the audience filled the house and was attentive throughout the concert. The leading feature was a new overture by Goldmark, "Prometheus." The fitness of the title is not apparent, but that is of little consequence. It is good music, full of original ideas naturally developed, and it was admirably played by the orchestra, with much fuller tone than it has hitherto displayed this season. If not quite so poetical as the "Sakuntala," the overture is still a work of distinct value, and it gave a welcome example of the virility of rendering of which Mr. Nikisch is capable.

The Schubert unfinished symphony, though parts of it were played with strength and beauty, was disappointing, for the reason so often noticed—that in the minute elaboration of instrumental detail the modern conductor is apt to lose something of the spirit and purpose of the classical composers. On the other hand, Mr. Nikisch's delicacy of touch, combined with poetic sentiment, is entirely applicable to the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. The overture was exquisitely played and the scherzo was in its way a perfect model of orchestral virtuosity. The march, though taken rather slowly, was also reasonably successful, though here the weakness of the brass is felt.

Mrs. Nikisch was the soloist of the evening and won the favor of the audience at once, as much by her charming personality as by her artistic gifts. She has a very pleasant mezzo-soprano voice and an excellent style, and while she lacks the dramatic power necessary to give effect to Raff's "Dream King," the group of modern songs from Goldmark, Jensen, Brahms and Schumann, which she sang with the piano, were altogether delightful, Mr. Nikisch playing the accompaniments with exquisite taste.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

THURSDAY, JANUARY 15, 1891.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Our friends who have been indulging in superlatives in their comments on the first two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will be put to their trumps now, if they try to convey an adequate idea of the excellencies of the third concert, which took place at Chickering Hall on Tuesday night. It was far and away more admirable than either of the concerts that preceded it in most of the elements which invite the attention of the judicious listener at these concerts. New-Yorkers are less concerned about Mr. Nikisch's programmes and solo performers than about the playing of his orchestra. The schemes of their own orchestral concerts are, as a rule, better constructed than those of the Boston organization, and though they have reason to envy Boston the possession of such solo violinists and singers as have appeared thus far, they are not startled out of their equanimity by them. The playing of the band, however, is in a different case. There New-Yorkers have learned to expect delights which their own organizations can not provide. We have thought that in some particulars the playing of the orchestra in the first two concerts was not up to the standard maintained in former seasons, but on Tuesday night there was no occasion to deplore the real or fancied decadence. In all its work it was superb, and great enthusiasm followed every one of its numbers. Even the Pizzicato Scherzo of Tschaikowsky's Symphony in F minor compelled admiration because of the precision and delicacy with which it was played. It was, indeed, a tour de force, but in the minds of those who have a true ideal of what the symphonic form ought to be, and who feel that the real charm and nobility of the violin is disclosed only in its capacity as a melody instrument, a capacity that is matchless in the instrumental field, the doubts about the propriety of Tschaikowsky's clever composition were not resolved. How different was the band's cantilina in Raff's "Forest" Symphony, with its lovely poetry, which closed the concert. There was spiritual refreshment pure and undefiled.

The solo performers were Mrs. Nikisch, mezzo soprano, and Mr. Adamowski, violin. The warm place which the conductor has won in the hearts of New-York's music patrons was at once shared by his charming wife, whose presence and voice are engaging and whose artistic nature was disclosed in every bar of Raff's song with orchestral accompaniment, "The Dream King and his Love," which she sang first, and the four songs which came later—Goldmark's "Die Quelle," Jensen's "Am Ufer des Manzanares," Brahms's "Vergebliches Staendchen" and Schumann's "Fruehling's Nacht," the latter sung in response to most hearty recalls. Mrs. Nikisch's voice is not remarkable in quality, but it has a winsomeness and sympathetic freshness that are irresistible, and her conception of the poetry and music is that of a deep-feeling and true artist. She was accompanied on the pianoforte by her husband so exquisitely that it was hard to judge which of the happily mated pair deserved the greater meed of admiration.

Mr. Adamsowski played a rather light-waisted Rondo Capriccioso by Saint-Saens, but all disposition to find fault with the music was swallowed up by the pleasure which Mr. Adamowski's playing provided. It was finished to a degree [illegible] With such artists as he, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Rath and three or four others sitting at the violin desks, it is no wonder that the Boston Symphony Orchestra stands alone among American bands. The house was crowded.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 17, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

There must be nothing but glad praise for Mr. Nikisch's direction of the twelfth concert. The programme had the usual fault of being ten or fifteen minutes too long and the performance was tardy in beginning; the material was not too attractive, the symphony and final overture being old stand bys—Mendelssohn's "Italian" and Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini." But there were in these, as in all else during the evening, the care, the reserve, the modesty and the sympathy which are too often wanting in Mr. Nikisch's style. The symphony was perfection in its proportionment of volume and emphasis, its gentle flow, its steady time and rhythm, its alternating insouciance and reflectiveness and its poetic fancy. The score, so lightly charged with the color of deep brass, was allowed its true suavity of horns and wood, and even the preposterous drummer abated his nervous furies until his sounds melted mysteriously, as they should, into the lower harmonies. The overture was not unduly resonant or pompous, and full justice was done to the intermediate orchestral number, Dr. Mackenzie's musical parallel to Keats's poem, "La Belle Dame sans Merci." A thoroughly respectable work, this, not devoid of fancy in its suggestions of martial action, of pastoral openness and gloomy despondency, but not romantic, weird or haunting in any great degree. It illustrates the poem like a set of old-fashioned wood-cuts or mediæval illuminations, but never intensifies the rhapsody, the lament, the passion or the sad languor of the strange stanzas. Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist and won well the triple recall which he received after playing Wieniawski's D-minor violin concerto. Written for Sarasate, the gypsy fervor and dash of the last movement need a more heated and strenuous spirit than Mr. Adamowski's, but this exception touches his temperament and not his art, which sustained him here, as elsewhere in the concerto, with clear, carrying tone, distinct execution and elegant phrasing. The andante, which is exactly in accord with Mr. Adamowski's truth of sentiment and sweetness of expression, was exquisitely done. There will be no concert tonight. On the following Saturday Mme. Helen Hopekirk will make her first appearance after an absence of some seasons, playing a concerto from Tschaikowski; the symphony will be Volkmann in D-minor and Mr. Arthur Foote will get a hearing for his new "Francesca da Rimini" overture.

N HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 17, 1891

REVIEW OF THE WEEK.

The program of the twelfth symphony concert which took place last Saturday evening at Music Hall was interesting and well arranged. The symphony was in its proper place; the two numbers which followed were exceedingly well played, and the Berlioz overture brought brilliantly the close. The selections were as follows:

Symphony in A (Italian).....Mendelssohn
Concerto for violin in D minor.....Wieniawski
Mr. Adamowski.
Ballade for orchestra,
"La Belle Dame sans Merci".....Mackenzie
Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini".....Berlioz

* * * * *

It is true that we heard the Italian symphony last winter, and it is also true that we are constantly dosed with Mendelssohn; but however much we are inclined to rebel, like children who cry out against the mixture of sulphur and molasses administered at stated intervals, it is a question whether the dose is not most advantageous to the musical body. Certainly after the program-music of Liszt and Raff which was heard lately, the Italian symphony seemed more beautiful and more exquisitely proportioned than ever. Mendelssohn has suffered severely both from absurd praise and unbounded abuse. After all has been said for and against him there must remain certain facts which will be admitted by all fair-minded men: that he was a master of form, that he had a gift of melody, that he had a keen sense of the value of legitimate contrasts in instrumentation, and an almost unerring appreciation of the value and characteristics of each instrument. He had, it is true, many grievous faults both as man and musician. As a man, in spite of the panegyrics of slavish admirers and imitators, he was prudish, priggish, a back-biter, envious, and often exceedingly disingenuous. These unpleasant traits are revealed not by the discoveries of his enemies, but by his own letters and his own actions. The letters published by Felix Moscheles are proof enough; his silence concerning the works of his friend Schumann brings additional testimony. Musically he erred in mawkish sentimentality as is seen in his "Songs without Words," and his mannerisms are exhibitions of weakness rather than of repulsive strength or crude originality. Nor was his influence, which was far beyond his deserts, always for the best. Too many an English composer has been ruined by admiration for the man who was a friend at the English Court; and Leipzig to-day is far behind other German cities from a musical standpoint on account of the shade of Mendelssohn, invoked with incantations and superstitious awe that he may pronounce upon the merits of a young composer. Many a musician will recognize three stages in his judgment of Mendelssohn. At first he is charmed, delighted with his sweetness and symmetry. This sweetness then cloys, and to the symmetry which grows monotonous he prefers for a time the breaking away from conventional rules seen in the modern radical school. But after he has worshipped for a time at the shrine of these strange gods, he returns to his earlier love and with sober judgment recognizes the great merits of the composer of "Fingal's Cave" and the "Italian" symphony. He will throw overboard most of his music written for the pianoforte; he can spare the songs and even the oratorios; but he will cling to the overtures, to the "Italian" and "Scotch" symphonies and to the "Walpurgis Night." And to the young composer the study of Mendelssohn's scores is more to be commended than attempts to follow feebly in the footsteps of men who were great by force of genius and not from simply disregarding the rules of form and the traditions of the elders.

* * * * *

It has been said above that too many of the Englishmen have slavishly imitated Mendelssohn. This reproach cannot be brought against Mr. Mackenzie, who is, however, an eclectic and is devoid of strong individuality. He is a serious musician without a strongly developed sense of melody, who by industry has succeeded in writing works which are to his credit. This Ballade which illustrates musically the well-known poem of Keats is a good example of his style, although in imagination and poesy it falls far short of the poem itself. Viewed as a piece of music without a title it is interesting, exceedingly well written and ingeniously scored.

* * * * *

Hector Berlioz wrote two overtures for his opera "Benvenuto Cellini," which, produced in 1838 at the Grand Opera in Paris, failed, although the chief parts were sung by Duprez, Dorus-Gras and Stoltz. The second overture, played before the second act and known as "The Roman Carnival," is musically the better and the more effective. Yet the overture played last Saturday is a brilliant and most impressive work. This, as well as the orchestral numbers, was finely played by the orchestra. Throughout the concert there was a marked attention shown to the dynamic marks of the composers, an absence of exaggeration, a musical spirit which was a forcible contrast to the apparent indifference and carelessness unfortunately seen in too many concerts of this season.

* * * * *

Mr. Adamowski played the solo part of Wieniawski's delightful concerto. He gave it an admirable performance. He played with great care for tone and phrasing yet with the true abandon of the virtuoso. The inherent difficulties of the composition were easily overcome. His sentiment was genuine. In short it was a striking exhibition of Mr. Adamowski's artistic growth. He was thrice recalled, a flattering tribute which he well deserved.

* * * * *

Philadelphia Inquirer

THURSDAY, JANUARY 15, 1891.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch at the Academy of Music Last Evening.

The most interesting feature of the Boston Symphony Concert last evening was the singing of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, wife of the conductor, who was heard at Adamowski concert not long since, but is otherwise unknown here as a singer. Mrs. Nikisch has a pleasing voice, which has been well trained, and is admirably adapted to German songs. Her selections were Raff's "Dream King and His Love," with orchestral accompaniment; Goldmark's "Die Quelle;" Jensin's "Am Ufer des Manzanares;" Brahms' "Vergebliches Standchen," the last three with a piano accompaniment by Mr Nikisch.

It was a rare treat to hear these delightful songs sung in such a thoroughly competent manner. The Brahms selection was sung with a piquant expression that was fascinating. She was especially happy in having her husband as an accompanist, for of all orchestral conductors that have been heard in the city Mr. Nickish is by far the best in directing accompaniments for the voice.

When others drown the voice he reinforces it. The audience was highly pleased and Mrs. Nikisch was given an encore.

The three orchestral numbers were: Goldmark's "Prometheus" overture, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and selections from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Nights Dream" overture. The unfamiliar "Promethus" is a creation worthy of its author, and well befits its title. The Schubert symphony was played at the last Thomas Concert. Mr. Nikisch interpreted it somewhat differently, and had the advantage of an organization more suited to the composition. It was charmingly played, the wealth of strings seldom being used to a better advantage.

Mendelsshon's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture was one of the most delightful of overture orchestral compositions. There is a romance of delicacy, a variety of harmonious theme and a wealth of melodious strains in it that make it deservedly popular. Mr. Nikisch showed great discrimination in the arrangement of the score for his orchestra. The fairy dance was given by sixty strings as delicately as on a single violin. It is in such work as this that the full scope of the organization is brought out.

The programme was a little out of the usual vein and was all the more agreeable as a slight diversion from the usual order of things.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, January 15, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Herr Arthur Nikisch and his instrumental forces were heard at the Academy of Music last evening in a diversified programme, which included Goldmark's "Prometheus" overture, a stormy composition, as full of original effects as "Saknutala" or other later overtures of this composer; Schubert's unfinished symphony and the scherzo, nocturne and march from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. Mrs. Nikisch, the soloist of the occasion, contributed to the programme several songs by modern German composers, none of which possessed especial musical value, or was delivered in a manner that might command critical attention. No reason is apparent why this artist should not appear in public as a solo singer; and the soprano of the period never quarrels with opportunity. It is not thus, however, that the American public is eventually to be convinced of the value of the work of German song-writers. With a great orchestra there should either be great soloists or none at all. The Schubert selection, indeed, amply repaid all lovers of music who attended this concert.

...AN,
...PHILADELPHIA, ...E
OR.
THURSDAY,
HEAL
JANUARY 15, 1891

The third in the current series of Boston Symphony Concerts took place at the Academy of Music last evening, and was brilliantly successful in every way. A great audience, one that filled every seat in the house and made even standing room hard to get, was present, and a singularly well chosen and attractive programme was rendered in a manner that left nothing to be desired. The orchestral selections consisted of an overture by Goldmark, "Prometheus," Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. Of these the Goldmark overture had not been given here before, and as the work of one of the most brilliant of the younger contemporary composers, it had a respectful and attentive hearing.

It proved to be a poetic, original, and deeply imaginative work, not at all classic either in form or sentiment, but expressing the meaning and tragedy of the ancient myth as seen from a modern point of view with graphic eloquence and rare melodic beauty. It is not worth while reviewing it in detail, for every hearer will find a meaning of his own in its more striking and distinctive passages. As to the fine effectiveness of the composition as a whole; there is, however, likely to be a general agreement. Both of the other orchestral numbers are very familiar. Schubert's B minor symphony was played here by the Thomas Orchestra less than two weeks ago, but it is a composition of such extraordinary charm that it was a pleasure to hear it again, and the interpretation of it given by Mr. Nikisch was exquisitely beautiful. All the poetry of Schubert's lovely music, all the conflicting emotion of which it is the voice, its appealing pathos and gentle melancholy, its alternations of resignation and revolt, its transitions from hopefulness to despair, every feature that distinguishes it had in Mr. Nikisch an intelligent and sympathetic exponent, and the rendering of it which he gave was unsurpassably fine and one not to be forgotten. Not less delightful in a widely different way was the playing of the Mendelssohn music, with which the concert closed. It could not have been more delicate or brilliant.

Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra, however, did not carry off all the honors of the evening. A good part of them fell to the share of Mrs. Nikisch, who was the soloist of the occasion, and whose promised appearance certainly had a good deal to do with the crowded state of the house. This lady sang in Philadelphia last month at one of Mr. Adamowski's Chamber Concerts, but she was heard to much better advantage last night, and the favorable impression which she made at the first was deepened and confirmed. Her voice is a strong, agreeable mezzo-soprano, of ample volume and excellent quality, and her method is that of an intelligent, experienced, well-trained artist. Her numbers, which comprised Raff's beautiful but trying "Dream King and His Love," with the orchestra; and songs with the piano, by Goldmark "Die Quelle;" by Jensen, "Am Ufer des Manzanares," and by Brahm, "Vergebliches Standchen," were an important element in the evening's entertainment. In the songs with piano Mrs. Nikisch was accompanied by her husband, who showed himself to be as good an accompanist as Georg Henschel. It will be a pleasure to hear Mrs. Nikisch again.

...LETTER AND TRANSCRIPT,
...PHILADELPHIA,
JANUARY 15,

Academy of Music—Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its third concert in the Academy of Music last evening, had a crowded audience (with a standing contingent) which evidently appreciated the unusually enjoyable programme submitted. But three orchestral numbers were listed: Goldmark's "Prometheus" overture, Schubert's "Unfinished (B minor) symphony, and the overture, Scherzo, Nocturne and Wedding March from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. The grand overture of Goldmark's was grandly given, and, for the matter of that, it may be said in brief for the orchestra that a finer and more finished playing throughout the concert has not been heard in the Academy. The performance of the Schubert symphony, which is probably as familiar as any to a Philadelphia audience, was a model of clearness, accuracy, richness of color and lovely quality of tone. Mr. Nikisch's reading differs in portions of the work from Mr. Thomas's quite plainly in the matter of tempi, and in the second movement the blithesome, joyous strain which Mr. Thomas introduces was missing. While Mr. Nikisch's presentation must be recorded as a most important one, it will not obscure pleasant memories of previous performances of the same symphony. The Mendelssohn overture could not be excelled in the way of briskness, piquancy and delicacy of execution, and little is risked in saying that the Mendelssohn numbers were enjoyed as fully, at least, as anything else in the concert.

The soloist was Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, wife of the conductor. The very agreeable impression made by this lady was recorded in the LEDGER, together with a discussion of her artistic powers, at the time of her début in this city a few weeks ago. She sang Raff's "Dream King and his Love" with orchestral accompaniment, quite acceptably, but without producing a marked effect upon her hearers. She was more at home and soon won the favor of the audience in short songs by Goldmark, Jensen and Brahms, to which she added, as an encore, and, after several cordial recalls, one from the Schumann lieder. Mrs. Nikisch's singing is characterized by grace, taste and sentiment, though her method of tone production and her vocalization generally can hardly be said to conform always to good art. In the lieder, and especially where vivacity and naïveté are needful qualities, her ingenuous charm of manner greatly aids the effectiveness of her singing.

The next concert will occur February 25th, when Vladimir De Pachmann will be the soloist.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 18, 1891.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWELFTH CONCERT.

The programme at Music hall Saturday evening, Jan. 10, was:

Mendelssohn—Symphony in A. (Italian).
Wieniawski—Concerto for violin in D minor, op. 22.
Mackenzie—Ballade for orchestra. "La Belle Dame sans Merci."
Berlioz—Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," op. 23.

After the first movement of the Symphony, the orchestra often proved itself equal to the very highest standard of orchestral performance.

With the movement referred to the violins frequently lacked precision and the conductor apparently became so involved in the mere temperament of his interpretation that his technical lead of the orchestra was wholly inadequate and even impotent. The interpretation itself, however, was unusually interesting although no one can gainsay that it unduly exaggerated the expression marks of the score. The contrasts of light and shade were brusquely and roughly made, and the entire reading although both entertaining and original was wholly unrefined.

The andante con moto was more refinedly interpreted; the con moto moderato was a passably good performance; but with the saltarello came some of the very best orchestral playing of the concert.

The soloist for the concert, Mr. T. Adamowski, was triumphantly successful with the violin concerto by Wieniawski. The work itself is superb; it is a noble work; it may even be rated as one of the most charming violin concertos that has yet been heard in the symphony concerts. Mr. Adamowski seemed an ideal exponent of its poetic value, as he was in his most musical mood; while technically considered his playing left little to be desired. Next in order was the wonderfully well-made ballade of Mackenzie and then followed for a finale Berlioz's masterpiece "Benvenuto Cellini." Both works were brilliantly played, but many left the hall before the overture was performed as the programme was again too long by at least fifteen minutes.

PHILADELPHIA PRESS,
THURSDAY,
JANUARY 15,

Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

The audience that greeted the deservedly popular Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening was the largest of the season. The programme was a popular one with musicians and music-loving people. This fact, coupled with interest that naturally manifested itself in the first notable appearance of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch in concert here, no doubt accounts for the crowded house.

"Prometheus Bound," one of the latest contributions to musical literature, by Goldmark, was a good introduction to this enjoyable feast of good things. The work abounds in vivid coloring and dramatic feeling, and is thoroughly enjoyable throughout. The overture was well played and heartily enjoyed by the audience.

Mrs. Nikisch sang "The Dream-King and His Love," by Raff, with orchestral accompaniment. She possesses a mezzo soprano of good quality and range, and sang well. She was recalled several times. Later in the programme she favored the audience with a good rendering of three German songs—"Die Quelle," by Goldmark; 'Am Ufer des Manzanares," by Jensen; and "Vergebliches Standchen," by Brahms—accompanied on the piano by Mr. Nikisch. Her reception after these songs was even more hearty than after her first effort. After bowing several times she responded with another German song as an encore.

Schubert's ever welcome "Unfinished" symphony in B minor, was carefully played. The first movement was given in slower tempo than usual, but the language of the composer was never obscure. So carefully had the conducter drilled his men that every melody stood out with the striking beauty peculiar to Schubert. The second movement was more enjoyable than the first. As Thomas played this same symphony only last week, it gave those desirous of making comparisons a fine opportunity to do so.

The overture, Scherzo, Nolturno, and Wedding March from Mendelssohn's music, and "Midsummer Night's Dream" closed the programme. This music, written when Mendelssohn was only 16, reveals some of the most fairy-like imagery that one can ever hope to hear. Mendelssohn wrote well on subsequent occasions, but he never exceeded the youthful efforts of fitting this music to Shakespeare's play. The work of the Orchestra was uniformly good. The Wedding March, which one is accustomed to hear hurried through, was taken with a deliberation that brought out the majesty that one naturally expects in compositions of this kind. The next concert of this organization will occur on February 25, when Valdimar de Pachmann, pianist, will be the soloist.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 17, 1891.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening attracted an overflowing house. The programme was as follows: Overture—"Coriolanus," Beethoven; Song, with Orchestra—"The Dream King and his Love," Raff; Andantino and Scherzo, from Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Tschaikowsky; Rondo Capriccioso, for violin, Saint-Saens; Songs, with piano, "Die Quelle," Goldmark; "Am Ufer des Manzanares," Jensen; "Vergebliches Staendchen," Brahms; Symphony—"Im Walde," No. 3, Raff. The soloists were Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and Mr. T. Adamowski.

THE SUN.

BALTIMORE, SATURDAY, JAN. 17, 1891.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Concordia.

The Baltimore people appreciate the splendid work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra now. Last night every seat in the Concordia Opera House was filled and many persons were compelled to stand. While the programme was not of such great interest as at the last concert, it was a superb one, and almost spoiled the audience for less artistic performances. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch's first appearance created general interest, and the singer was well received. Mrs. Nikisch has not a great voice, but a remarkably pleasing one, and her singing was so artistic and she made so much of her opportunities, particularly in the short songs, that she was not out of place in a great organization like the Boston Orchestra. She was formerly a light opera singer, and has performed successfully in the Stadt Theatre, Leipzig, and the Hof Theatre, Cologne. Mr. Nikisch accompanied her on the piano, and in the storm of applause that followed the vocal numbers he was certainly entitled to fully half, for no more exquisitely played accompaniments were ever heard in Baltimore.

The light, delicate chords that formed the prelude and closed the Jensen song. "Am Ufer des Manzanares," were the perfection of musical expression. Of the orchestral numbers the weird "Danse Macabre," by Saint-Saens, was most enjoyed. It is one of the most realistic of descriptive pieces ever composed, and has a grotesque, fanciful sort of beauty that makes it wonderfully effective. It describes a scene in a graveyard in a winter midnight. At the end of the twelve strokes announcing the witching hour, the graves open and fleshless figures emerge. Death, "in grim cadence," tunes his fiddle amid the rattling of bones as the skeletons collect for the infernal dance. Amidst the revelry comes the mournful dirge of the departed, but the ghastly company continue the dance of death. The night wind moans through the lindens. Suddenly the earthly warning sounds, the cock crows and the spectral revelers scamper away. All of this is wonderfully depicted in the music, and was no less wonderfully performed last night. Other orchestral numbers were Goldmark's "Prometheus" overture, two movements from Cowen's Scandinavian symphony, and the music of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer's Night's Dream."

The first concert given by the Kneisel quartette in Baltimore this season will be held tonight at Hazazer's Hall. The members of the quartette are Franz Kneisel, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; L. Svecenski, viola, and Anton Hekking, 'cello. The musicians are prominent members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the quartette is considered the finest in the country. The concert will be under the auspices of the Faelten Music School.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, JAN. 18, 1891.

A Conquering Tour for Nikisch.

It was once thought by some people that in Boston alone the name and fame of the Boston Symphony orchestra would be sufficient to draw enthusiastic multitudes. The successful tours of this superb organization have effectually dispelled this fallacy. The latest journey has been most prosperous of all. Every seat in the house was sold long before each concert in each of the four cities visited—New York, Philadelphia, Washington, and finally Baltimore. Great has been the artistic as well as pecuniary success. Mme. Nikisch's reception everywhere has been most enthusiastic.

——The leading New York musical critic sums up Mr. Nikisch's band as "finely attuned, admirably balanced and skilfully directed."

——Mrs. Nikisch's Boston friends—and she already numbers them by hundreds—will be rejoiced to know of her brilliant success in New York, where she sang for the first time with the Symphony orchestra Tuesday night at Chickering Hall. The house, notwithstanding a number of potent counter attractions, including Mrs. Vanderbilt's musicale, was packed and most enthusiastic to the end. Mrs. Nikisch wore a superb new gown, in which she looked excessively handsome. She had four recalls and an imperative encore. A number of beautiful bouquets and baskets of flowers were handed her after her first song. Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Longfellow, Mrs. Ole Bull and Miss Emma Thursby were in the audience. Mrs. Nikisch repeated her success in Philadelphia later in the week, where the band played to 4000 people, and in Washington.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, JANUARY 18, 1891.

THE ORCHESTRA'S TOUR.

The week's tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra has surpassed, in successful results, any ever undertaken by the organization, and the singular merits of the concerts given in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington have been admitted by the severest critics in each and all of these cities. The capacity of the several auditoriums in which the concerts have been given have been tested, and the financial results have been the best possible, even standing tickets being exhausted before the opening overture. Mr. Nikisch has certainly made himself as great a favorite with the public of the fair cities named as he is here in Boston, and there is reason to believe that the popularity of the orchestra and its conductor is surely and safely established in these several cities. It is pleasant to know that Mrs. Nikisch met with a flattering recognition of her artistic merits in her appearances on the tour, as soloist, and Mr. Adamowski also met with great favor in his appearances.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, JANUARY 19, 1890.

There was never a parallel in concert-matters in this country with the reception accorded the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the four border cities which it visits monthly through the season. The last trip was simply triumphal in all its aspects; audiences testing the utmost capacity of the largest halls—in Philadelphia more than 1000 people were refused admission—and such enthusiastic recognition of the playing, especially on the part of New York critics, as is seldom tendered any art matter anywhere. 'Gainst this unanimity—and who shall say that Mr. Krehbiel, Mr. Henderson, and Mr. Finck of New York are not critical—we have here at home a too frequent hypercriticism which is both ridiculous and sad. Mrs. Nikisch was the soloist on the trip which closed last Saturday, and her reception was everywhere cordial. In his criticism of Mrs. Nikisch, Mr. Finck of the New York Evening Post, adds a word about Mr. Nikisch in his capacity as accompanist, which is timely reading: "She proved to be a singer endowed with a pleasing voice, well trained in the art of reproducing those delightful German songs which are heard altogether too seldom in our concert halls. She was especially fascinating in Brahms's 'Vergebliches Ständchen,' which she sang with such piquant expression that the audience broke out into the most enthusiastic applause, which was continued until she consented to sing again. She had the immense advantage of having her piano as well as orchestral accompaniments played by her husband, who is by far the best song accompanist that has been heard in New York within our memory, and who ought to give a special course of instruction to other pianists, who usually make either too much or too little of their accompaniments to songs."

Baltimore American
AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

SATURDAY, JANUARY 17, 1891.

IT WAS NIKISCH'S NIGHT.

Lovers of Music in Force to Hear the Boston Symphony.

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening, at the Concordia Opera House, drew the largest audience this magnificent band of musicians has ever had in this city. Every seat was occupied, and most of the standing room taken. The audience embraced about all the well-known lovers of good music and as large a portion of the followers of fashion as could possibly be spared from other important entertainments. No genuine lover of music in any of the various walks of city life would willingly miss one of these concerts, and therefore many sacrifices of other opportunities are made in order to attend them.

The Goldmark Concert overture, entitled "Prometheus," is a most brilliant and highly-colored musical conception of the famous mythological character. Goldmark is a pusher of the modern orchestra, and he generally employs it for all it is worth. His instrumentation is usually colossal, and it is especially so in this work which goes forward and back from almost imperceptible pianissimos to the grandest crashes of heavy force, waving a tone-poem tapestry of more than Oriental coloring.

The Saint-Saens symphonic poem, "Danse Macabre," is another fine specimen of modern instrumentation. French compositions generally compass the entire scale of musical dynamics, from almost unbearable tumult down to profound silence, but their work is never dull or heavy. This dance of death and skeletons is more Frenchy than the French language. It is bold, piquant, grotesque, and yet beautiful. It is such music as no one but a Frenchman would ever dream of writing. Its performance was a revelation of finesse, and its reception was enthusiastic.

The orchestral work which perhaps gave the audience the greatest delight was the Mendelssohn music to the "Midsummer Night's Dream." Familiar as its numbers all are, such a performance as that of last evening will always reveal new beauties to the intelligent listener, and increase his most enthusiastic admiration for the old ones. From the first call of the fairies in the overture to the grand finale of the wedding march, the audience listened spellbound, and gave Mr. Nikisch rounds of applause at the close. There can be no question of the fact that the orchestra has taken a long step in advance since it came under his direction.

Perhaps, the chief event of the evening was the debut of the beautiful soprano, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, before a Baltimore audience. She was greeted with a generous outburst of welcome, and her fine appearance won favor with the public at once. Her song, "The Dream King and His Love," was well suited to her voice. Mrs. Nikisch was recalled several times, and finally consented to sing again, giving a beautiful serenade by Brahms.

Concordia Hall is unquestionably one of the best places in the city for the rendition of orchestral music. The strings are brought well forward, so that their cutting resonance comes well out into the hall, while enough of the brass is lost to keep it from being too loud, even in fortissimo passages. Under the skilled leadership of Mr. Nikisch, the result is a thoroughly well-balanced and artistic rendition, and the impression at the end of a concert is that of having enjoyed a feast. The public testified its approbation of the orchestra and its gifted leader by frequent, but discriminating and enthusiastic applause.

[80]

NORTH AMERICAN, PHILADELPHIA, THURSDAY, JANUARY 15, 1891.

The third in the current series of Boston Symphony Concerts took place at the Academy of Music last evening, and was brilliantly successful in every way. A great audience, one that filled every seat in the house and made even standing room hard to get, was present and a singularly well chosen and attractive programme was rendered in a manner that left nothing to be desired. The orchestral selections consisted of an overture by Goldmark, "Prometheus," Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. Of these the Goldmark overture had not been given here before, and as the work of one of the most brilliant of the younger contemporary composers, it had a respectful and attentive hearing.

It proved to be a poetic, original, and deeply imaginative work, not at all classic either in form or sentiment, but expressing the meaning and tragedy of the ancient myth as seen from a modern point of view with graphic eloquence and rare melodic beauty. It is not worth while reviewing it in detail, for every hearer will find a meaning of his own in its more striking and distinctive passages. As to the fine effectiveness of the composition as a whole; there is, however, likely to be a general agreement. Both of the other orchestral numbers are very familiar. Schubert's B minor symphony was played here by the Thomas Orchestra less than two weeks ago, but it is a composition of such extraordinary charm that it was a pleasure to hear it again, and the interpretation of it given by Mr. Nikisch was exquisitely beautiful. All the poetry of Schubert's lovely music, all the conflicting emotion of which it is the voice, its appealing pathos and gentle melancholy, its alternations of resignation and revolt, its transitions from hopefulness to despair, every feature that distinguishes it had in Mr. Nikisch an intelligent and sympathetic exponent, and the rendering of it which he gave was unsurpassably fine and one not to be forgotten. Not less delightful in a widely different way was the playing of the Mendelssohn music, with which the concert closed. It could not have been more delicate or brilliant.

Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra, however, did not carry off all the honors of the evening. A good part of them fell to the share of Mrs. Nikisch, who was the soloist of the occasion, and whose promised appearance certainly had a good deal to do with the crowded state of the house. This lady sang in Philadelphia last month at one of Mr. Adamowski's Chamber Concerts, but she was heard to much better advantage last night, and the favorable impression which she made at the first was deepened and confirmed. Her voice is a strong, agreeable mezzo-soprano, of ample volume and excellent quality, and her method is that of an intelligent, experienced, well-trained artist. Her numbers, which comprised Raff's beautiful but trying "Dream King and His Love," with the orchestra; and songs with the piano, by Goldmark "Die Quelle;" by Jensen, "Am Ufer des Manzanares," and by Brahm, "Vergebliches Standchen," were an important element in the evening's entertainment. In the songs with piano Mrs. Nikisch was accompanied by her husband, who showed himself to be as good an accompanist as Georg Henschel. It will be a pleasure to hear Mrs. Nikisch again.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT—PHILADELPHIA, JANUARY 15,

Academy of Music—Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its third concert in the Academy of Music last evening, had a crowded audience (with a standing contingent) which evidently appreciated the unusually enjoyable programme submitted. But three orchestral numbers were listed: Goldmark's "Prometheus" overture, Schubert's "Unfinished (B minor) symphony, and the overture, Scherzo, Nocturne and Wedding March from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. The grand overture of Goldmark's was grandly given, and, for the matter of that, it may be said in brief for the orchestra that a finer and more finished playing throughout the concert has not been heard in the Academy. The performance of the Schubert symphony, which is probably as familiar as any to a Philadelphia audience, was a model of clearness, accuracy, richness of color and lovely quality of tone. Mr. Nikisch's reading differs in portions of the work from Mr. Thomas's quite plainly in the matter of tempi, and in the second movement the blithesome, joyous strain which Mr. Thomas introduces was missing. While Mr. Nikisch's presentation must be recorded as a most important one, it will not obscure pleasant memories of previous performances of the same symphony. The Mendelssohn overture could not be excelled in the way of briskness, piquancy and delicacy of execution, and little is risked in saying that the Mendelssohn numbers were enjoyed as fully, at least, as anything else in the concert.

The soloist was Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, wife of the conductor. The very agreeable impression made by this lady was recorded in the LEDGER, together with a discussion of her artistic powers, at the time of her début in this city a few weeks ago. She sang Raff's "Dream King and his Love" with orchestral accompaniment, quite acceptably, but without producing a marked effect upon her hearers. She was more at home and soon won the favor of the audience in short songs by Goldmark, Jensen and Brahms, to which she added, as an encore, and, after several cordial recalls, one from the Schumann lieder. Mrs. Nikisch's singing is characterized by grace, taste and sentiment, though her method of tone production and her vocalization generally can hardly be said to conform always to good art. In the lieder, and especially where vivacity and naiveté are needful qualities, her ingenuous charm of manner greatly aids the effectiveness of her singing.

The next concert will occur February 25th, when Vladimir De Pachmann will be the soloist.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 17, 1891.

THE third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening attracted an overflowing house. The programme was as follows: Overture—"Coriolanus," Beethoven; Song, with Orchestra—"The Dream King and his Love," Raff; Andantino and Scherzo, from Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Tschaikowsky; Rondo Capriccioso, for violin, Saint-Saens; Songs, with piano, "Die Quelle," Goldmark; "Am Ufer des Manzanares," Jensen; "Vergebliches Staendchen," Brahms; Symphony—"Im Walde," No. 3, Raff. The soloists were Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and Mr. T. Adamowski.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, JANUARY 18, 1891.

THE ORCHESTRA'S TOUR.

The week's tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra has surpassed, in successful results, any ever undertaken by the organization, and the singular merits of the concerts given in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington have been admitted by the severest critics in each and all of these cities. The capacity of the several auditoriums in which the concerts have been given have been tested, and the financial results have been the best possible, even standing tickets being exhausted before the opening overture. Mr. Nikisch has certainly made himself as great a favorite with the public of the fair cities named as he is here in Boston, and there is reason to believe that the popularity of the orchestra and its conductor is surely and safely established in these several cities. It is pleasant to know that Mrs. Nikisch met with a flattering recognition of her artistic merits in her appearances on the tour, as soloist, and Mr. Adamowski also met with great favor in his appearances.

THE SUN.

BALTIMORE, SATURDAY, JAN. 17, 1891.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Concordia.

The Baltimore people appreciate the splendid work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra now. Last night every seat in the Concordia Opera House was filled and many persons were compelled to stand. While the programme was not of such great interest as at the last concert, it was a superb one, and almost spoiled the audience for less artistic performances. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch's first appearance created general interest, and the singer was well received. Mrs. Nikisch has not a great voice, but a remarkably pleasing one, and her singing was so artistic and she made so much of her opportunities, particularly in the short songs, that she was not out of place in a great organization like the Boston Orchestra. She was formerly a light opera singer, and has performed successfully in the Stadt Theatre, Leipzig, and the Hof Theatre, Cologne. Mr. Nikisch accompanied her on the piano, and in the storm of applause that followed the vocal numbers he was certainly entitled to fully half, for no more exquisitely played accompaniments were ever heard in Baltimore.

The light, delicate chords that formed the prelude and closed the Jensen song. "Am Ufer des Manzanares," were the perfection of musical expression. Of the orchestral numbers the weird "Danse Macabre," by Saint-Saens, was most enjoyed. It is one of the most realistic of descriptive pieces ever composed, and has a grotesque, fanciful sort of beauty that makes it wonderfully effective. It describes a scene in a graveyard in a winter midnight. At the end of the twelve strokes announcing the witching hour, the graves open and fleshless figures emerge. Death, "in grim cadence," tunes his fiddle amid the rattling of bones as the skeletons collect for the infernal dance. Amidst the revelry comes the mournful dirge of the departed, but the ghastly company continue the dance of death. The night wind moans through the lindens. Suddenly the earthly warning sounds, the cock crows and the spectral revelers scamper away. All of this is wonderfully depicted in the music, and was no less wonderfully performed last night. Other orchestral numbers were Goldmark's "Prometheus" overture, two movements from Cowen's Scandinavian symphony, and the music of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer's Night's Dream."

The first concert given by the Kneisel quartette in Baltimore this season will be held tonight at Hazazer's Hall. The members of the quartette are Franz Kneisel, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; L. Svecenski, viola, and Anton Hekking, 'cello. The musicians are prominent members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the quartette is considered the finest in the country. The concert will be under the auspices of the Faelten Music School.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, JANUARY 19, 1890.

There was never a parallel in concert-matters in this country with the reception accorded the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the four border cities which it visits monthly through the season. The last trip was simply triumphal in all its aspects; audiences testing the utmost capacity of the largest halls — in Philadelphia more than 1000 people were refused admission—and such enthusiastic recognition of the playing, especially on the part of New York critics, as is seldom tendered any art matter anywhere. 'Gainst this unanimity—and who shall say that Mr. Krehbiel, Mr. Henderson, and Mr. Finck of New York are not critical—we have here at home a too frequent hypercriticism which is both ridiculous and sad. Mrs. Nikisch was the soloist on the trip which closed last Saturday, and her reception was everywhere cordial. In his criticism of Mrs. Nikisch, Mr. Finck of the New York Evening Post, adds a word about Mr. Nikisch in his capacity as accompanist, which is timely reading: "She proved to be a singer endowed with a pleasing voice, well trained in the art of reproducing those delightful German songs which are heard altogether too seldom in our concert halls. She was especially fascinating in Brahms's 'Vergebliches Ständchen,' which she sang with such piquant expression that the audience broke out into the most enthusiastic applause, which was continued until she consented to sing again. She had the immense advantage of having her piano as well as orchestral accompaniments played by her husband, who is by far the best song accompanist that has been heard in New York within our memory, and who ought to give a special course of instruction to other pianists, who usually make either too much or too little of their accompaniments to songs."

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 18, 1891.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWELFTH CONCERT.

The programme at Music hall Saturday evening, Jan. 10, was:

Mendelssohn—Symphony in A. (Italian).
Wieniawski—Concerto for violin in D minor, op. 22.
Mackenzie—Ballade for orchestra. "La Belle Dame sans Merci."
Berlioz—Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," op. 23.

After the first movement of the Symphony, the orchestra often proved itself equal to the very highest standard of orchestral performance.

With the movement referred to the violins frequently lacked precision and the conductor apparently became so involved in the mere temperament of his interpretation that his technical lead of the orchestra was wholly inadequate and even impotent. The interpretation itself, however, was unusually interesting although no one can gainsay that it unduly exaggerated the expression marks of the score. The contrasts of light and shade were brusquely and roughly made, and the entire reading although both entertaining and original was wholly unrefined.

The andante con moto was more refinedly interpreted; the con moto moderato was a passably good performance; but with the saltarello came some of the very best orchestral playing of the concert.

The soloist for the concert, Mr. T. Adamowski, was triumphantly successful with the violin concerto by Wieniawski. The work itself is superb; it is a noble work; it may even be rated as one of the most charming violin concertos that has yet been heard in the symphony concerts. Mr. Adamowski seemed an ideal exponent of its poetic value, as he was in his most musical mood; while technically considered his playing left little to be desired. Next in order was the wonderfully well-made ballade of Mackenzie and then followed for a finale Berlioz's masterpiece "Benvenuto Cellini." Both works were brilliantly played, but many left the hall before the overture was performed as the programme was again too long by at least fifteen minutes.

PHILADELPHIA PRESS.—THURSDAY, JANUARY 15.

Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

The audience that greeted the deservedly popular Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening was the largest of the season. The programme was a popular one with musicians and music-loving people. This fact, coupled with interest that naturally manifested itself in the first notable appearance of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch in concert here, no doubt accounts for the crowded house.

"Prometheus Bound," one of the latest contributions to musical literature, by Goldmark, was a good introduction to this enjoyable feast of good things. The work abounds in vivid coloring and dramatic feeling, and is thoroughly enjoyable throughout. The overture was well played and heartily enjoyed by the audience.

Mrs. Nikisch sang "The Dream-King and His Love," by Raff, with orchestral accompaniment. She possesses a mezzo soprano of good quality and range, and sang well. She was recalled several times. Later in the programme she favored the audience with a good rendering of three German songs—"Die Quelle," by Goldmark; 'Am Ufer des Manzanares," by Jensen; and "Vergebliches Standchen," by Brahms—accompanied on the piano by Mr. Nikisch. Her reception after these songs was even more hearty than after her first effort. After bowing several times she responded with another German song as an encore.

Schubert's ever welcome "Unfinished" symphony in B minor, was carefully played. The first movement was given in slower tempo than usual, but the language of the composer was never obscure. So carefully had the conducter drilled his men that every melody stood out with the striking beauty peculiar to Schubert. The second movement was more enjoyable than the first. As Thomas played this same symphony only last week, it gave those desirous of making comparisons a fine opportunity to do so.

The overture, Scherzo, Nolturno, and Wedding March from Mendelssohn's music, and "Midsummer Night's Dream" closed the programme. This music, written when Mendelssohn was only 16, reveals some of the most fairy-like imagery that one can ever hope to hear. Mendelssohn wrote well on subsequent occasions, but he never exceeded the youthful efforts of fitting this music to Shakespeare's play. The work of the Orchestra was uniformly good. The Wedding March, which one is accustomed to hear hurried through, was taken with a deliberation that brought out the majesty that one naturally expects in compositions of this kind. The next concert of this organization will occur on February 25, when Valdimar de Pachmann, pianist, will be the soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY. JAN. 18, 1891.

A Conquering Tour for Nikisch.

It was once thought by some people that in Boston alone the name and fame of the Boston Symphony orchestra would be sufficient to draw enthusiastic multitudes. The successful tours of this superb organization have effectually dispelled this fallacy. The latest journey has been most prosperous of all. Every seat in the house was sold long before each concert in each of the four cities visited—New York, Philadelphia, Washington, and finally Baltimore. Great has been the artistic as well as pecuniary success. Mme. Nikisch's reception everywhere has been most enthusiastic.

——The leading New York musical critic sums up Mr. Nikisch's band as "finely attuned, admirably balanced and skilfully directed."

——Mrs. Nikisch's Boston friends—and she already numbers them by hundreds—will be rejoiced to know of her brilliant success in New York, where she sang for the first time with the Symphony orchestra Tuesday night at Chickering Hall. The house, notwithstanding a number of potent counter attractions, including Mrs. Vanderbilt's musicale, was packed and most enthusiastic to the end. Mrs. Nikisch wore a superb new gown, in which she looked excessively handsome. She had four recalls and an imperative encore. A number of beautiful bouquets and baskets of flowers were handed her after her first song. Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Longfellow, Mrs. Ole Bull and Miss Emma Thursby were in the audience. Mrs. Nikisch repeated her success in Philadelphia later in the week, where the band played to 4000 people, and in Washington.

Baltimore American AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

SATURDAY, JANUARY 17, 1891.

IT WAS NIKISCH'S NIGHT.

Lovers of Music in Force to Hear the Boston Symphony.

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening, at the Concordia Opera House, drew the largest audience this magnificent band of musicians has ever had in this city. Every seat was occupied, and most of the standing room taken. The audience embraced about all the well-known lovers of good music and as large a portion of the followers of fashion as could possibly be spared from other important entertainments. No genuine lover of music in any of the various walks of city life would willingly miss one of these concerts, and therefore many sacrifices of other opportunities are made in order to attend them.

The Goldmark Concert overture, entitled "Prometheus," is a most brilliant and highly-colored musical conception of the famous mythological character. Goldmark is a pusher of the modern orchestra, and he generally employs it for all it is worth. His instrumentation is usually colossal, and it is especially so in this work which goes forward and back from almost imperceptible pianissimos to the grandest crashes of heavy force, waving a tone-poem tapestry of more than Oriental coloring.

The Saint-Saens symphonic poem, "Danse Macabre," is another fine specimen of modern instrumentation. French compositions generally compass the entire scale of musical dynamics, from almost unbearable tumult down to profound silence, but their work is never dull or heavy. This dance of death and skeletons is more Frenchy than the French language. It is bold, piquant, grotesque, and yet beautiful. It is such music as no one but a Frenchman would ever dream of writing. Its performance was a revelation of finesse, and its reception was enthusiastic.

The orchestral work which perhaps gave the audience the greatest delight was the Mendelssohn music to the "Midsummer Night's Dream." Familiar as its numbers all are, such a performance as that of last evening will always reveal new beauties to the intelligent listener, and increase his most enthusiastic admiration for the old ones. From the first call of the fairies in the overture to the grand finale of the wedding march, the audience listened spellbound, and gave Mr. Nikisch rounds of applause at the close. There can be no question of the fact that the orchestra has taken a long step in advance since it came under his direction.

Perhaps, the chief event of the evening was the debut of the beautiful soprano, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, before a Baltimore audience. She was greeted with a generous outburst of welcome, and her fine appearance won favor with the public at once. Her song, "The Dream King and His Love," was well suited to her voice. Mrs. Nikisch was recalled several times, and finally consented to sing again, giving a beautiful serenade by Brahms.

Concordia Hall is unquestionably one of the best places in the city for the rendition of orchestral music. The strings are brought well forward, so that their cutting resonance comes well out into the hall, while enough of the brass is lost to keep it from being too loud, even in fortissimo passages. Under the skilled leadership of Mr. Nikisch, the result is a thoroughly well-balanced and artistic rendition, and the impression at the end of a concert is that of having enjoyed a feast. The public testified its approbation of the orchestra and its gifted leader by frequent, but discriminating and enthusiastic, applause.

[80]

American Musician

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place on Tuesday evening, January 13, at Chickering Hall.

The orchestra was assisted by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, vocalist, and Mr. T. Adamowski, violinist, in the following program:

1. Overture, "Coriolanus,".....Beethoven
2. Song, with orchestra, "Traumkoenig und sein Lieb,".....Raff
3. Andantino and Scherzo from the Symphony in F Minor, No. 4.....Tschaikoffsky
4. Rondo Capriccioso for Violin.....Saint-Saëns
5. Songs, with piano accompaniment:
   a, "Die Quelle,".....Goldmmark
   b, "Am Ufer des Manzanares,".....Jensen
   c, "Vergebliches Staendchen,".....Brahms
6. Symphony, "Im Walde,".....Raff

The program was unusually interesting and varied, and would in itself have attracted a large audience without the additional inducement offered by the first appearance of the wife of the much admired conductor.

It was an error of judgment to present the lady to our exacting public in such a selection as the Raff song, which is entirely beyond her vocal resources. Mrs. Nikisch possesses a mezzo-soprano voice of limited range and of average power; it is pleasing in quality in the medium register which is not devoid of color; the high notes are weak and are rarely attacked with directness or precision; they are either preceded by the reprehensible stroke of the glottis affected by so many French and German vocalists, or else they are attained by "carrying" the voice from the lower note to the higher; one of the results of this constant portamento was to imbue Mrs. Nikisch's singing with a character of mournful sadness, which was, perhaps, inappropriate to Raff's lengthy and, if anything, dramatic "song." Another result of her defective attack is to leave the hearer in doubt as to her intonation, which is often uncertain, to say the least. Mrs. Nikisch's style of delivery is finished and artistic, and is evidently the fruit of long and serious study, being thoughtful and deliberate rather than spontaneous or intuitive. Her diction is clear and her accent expressive, though, in the short songs, it was somewhat exaggerated in sentiment. The audience received Mrs. Nikisch very kindly, while many were undoubtedly disappointed in her achievements. The highly-colored accounts of her Boston debut which preceded her first appearance in this hity, led people to expect more than she could hope to accomplish. She is a lieder singer of ordinary attainments, well-schooled and sufficiently experienced, but she certainly does not possess an individuality so pronounced as to justify her engagement for the Boston concerts; excepting for the fact that she is the wife of the conductor, it is safe to believe that the lady would never have been offered the opportunity to appear before an American audience.

Mr. Adamowsky played the Saint-Saëns Rondo in a straightforward and unaffected manner, which met with general approval. His tone is not very strong, but is warm and expressive; his bowing is broad and even and he phrases with taste and exquisite artistic feeling; in passages presenting technical difficulties his execution is correct but his tone loses some of its purity and sweetness; all in all, however, Mr. Adamowsky created a satisfactory impression and was consequently rewarded with applause.

Mr. Nikisch's reading of the Raff Symphony despite a bad "break" of the wind choir, was one of his best efforts; the Largo was particularly well rendered, the poetical suggestions of the music being effectively realized. In the other numbers Mr. Nikisch's familiar methods, his vivid contrasts of color, his sudden variations of dynamic power, his abuse of tempo rubato effects, were called into play as usual. The accompaniments to the soloists were, however, remarkably satisfactory, being subdued and respectful; the want of union between the soloists and orchestra, which was often noticeable, was but the inevitable consequence of the conductor's spasmodic manipulation of the baton of command, and also, perhaps, of his inability to foresee the intentions of the soloist.

AMERICO GORI.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Academy of Music, - Philadelphia.

Wednesday Evening, Jan. 14, at 8.

PROGRAMME

3

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Concordia Opera House, Baltimore,

Friday Evening, Jan. 16, at 8.

PROGRAMME

2

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Lincoln Music Hall, - Washington.

Thursday Evening, Jan. 15, at 8.

PROGRAMME

3

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

The Gazette.

MONTREAL, SATURDAY, JANUARY 17

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Tuesday evening last, in Chickering hall, New York, a splendid concert was given by this orchestra. The occasion was of added interest, as Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, wife of the conductor, made her debut before a New York audience. The applause that followed her vocal solos in unstinted measure (demanding three recalls), gave undoubted evidence of Mrs. Nikisch's instant success. After the second solo number Mrs. Nikisch responded to the repeated recalls by singing another song. The instrumental solo number was given by Mr. Adamowski. This fine violinist was in splendid form, and received the reception which his masterly playing deserved. The orchestral numbers received an ideal rendering, and were interesting, and, with the exception of the accompaniments to the solo numbers, ware conducted without score. The hall was packed. It was a splendid concert, and one ro be remembered by those who were so fortunate as to hear it.

...17. Januar 1891.

...Concert des „Bostoner Sinfonie-Orchesters."

...dem Auftreten Christine Nilsen's ...od. Wachtel's zu Anfang der sieben... ...ahre hat die „Concordia" kein solches ...ment gefaßt, wie das, welches sich ge... ...Abend zu dem zweiten Concerte des ...stoner Sinfonie-Orchesters" eingefun... ...hatte. Das Haus war übervoll. Das ...hte nun eigentlich nicht Wunder nehmen, ...n Orchester, wie das „Bostoner," sind ...lich gesät, und dieser musikalische Orga... ...mus—so darf man dieses Orchester nen... ...hat in Hrn. A. Nikisch einen künst... ...chen Mittelpunkt, der das Orchester als ...n Instrument betrachtet.

...as gestrige Concert wurde mit einer ...ität (für Baltimore wenigstens) eröff... ...mit Goldmark's Ouvertüre „der gefes... ...te Prometheus." Goldmark ist ein Meister ...r Form und des Ausdrucks; allein in die... ...Ouvertüre scheint er hinter seinem Stoff ...rückgeblieben zu sein. Mag man dem an ...en Felsen geschmiedeten und gemarterten ...ohlthäter der Menschen den Zug des ...chmerzes verleihen, mag man ihn in Göt...'scher Weise betrachten als den Trotzi... ...n, der der Götter nicht achtet, den die Zeit ...m Manne geschmiedet, „zu leiden, zu ...einen, zu genießen und zu freuen sich," ...mag man die Resignation als Grundstim...mung nehmen: Goldmark packt uns nur ...tellenweise, nicht als Ganzes. Manches in ...er Ouvertüre ist Schminke, die über den ...Inhalt hinwegtäuscht. Die Wiedergabe der ...Ouvertüre war eine ganz vortreffliche, auf's ...Feinste und Sauberste heraus gearbeitet; ...dabei mag nicht unerwähnt bleiben, daß ...das Werk hohe Forderungen an das Orche... ...ter stellt.

...Cowen's „skandinavische Sinfonie" gehört ...zu den bedeutendsten Orchesterwerken engli... ...cher Componisten. Hr. Nikisch gab zwei ...Sätze daraus: das „Adagio" und das „Scherzo." Daß er den ersten Satz, in dem ...das melancholische Thema schließlich quä... ...lend wird, und den Schlußsatz weggelassen ...hat, war wohlgethan. Die „Sommernacht ...am Fjord," in deren schöne träumerische ...Stimmung ein entferntes Hornquartett her... ...eintönt, ist voll Poesie und Effekt. Das ...„Scherzo" ist ein frappantes Elfenstück (eine ...Schlittenfahrt, die der Verfasser des Pro... ...gramms musikalisch geschildert sehen will, ...hat uns nicht eingeleuchtet). Der flüchtige ...Charakter des Satzes ist mit genialer Con... ...sequenz durchgeführt, und die Mendels... ...sohn'sche Sommernachtstraum-Musik hat ...wohl als Muster gedient, vielleicht auch „Fee ...Mab" von Berlioz. Dieser Satz wurde ...prächtig gespielt. Das thut diesem Orchester ...nicht manches gleich.

...Der Shakespear'sche „Sommernachts... ...traum," um den Mendelssohn seinen wun... ...derbaren Tönezauber gewoben, bewegt sich ...ebenfalls in dem romantischen Genre. Diese ...musikalischen Bilder von bezaubernder Far... ...benpracht und vollendeter Klarheit und ...Schönheit werden stets die Anerkennung des ...Publikums finden. Sie fanden sie auch ge... ...stern; indessen zu viel Romantik in einem ...Konzert zu bieten, ist in unserer Zeit nicht ...wohlgethan; und ein Orchester, wie das ...„Bostoner," hören wir doch immer am Lieb... ...sten große und ernste Aufgaben lösen.

...Die vierte Conzertleistung bildete einen ...starken Contrast zwischen Cowen und Men... ...delssohn. Es war Saint Saens' „Todten... ...tanz." Im Anschluß an das Gedicht von ...Cazalis tritt der Tod als Spielmann ...auf, der die klappernden Skelette zu mitter... ...nächtlicher Stunde zum Tanze lockt. Es ...schlägt 12. Der Tod beginnt aufzuspielen. ...Es liegt tiefe Trauer über dieser Tanzfröh... ...lichkeit. Der Tanz wird wilder, bis der ...Hahn kräht, dann verschwinden die gespen... ...stischen Bilder. Das Werk macht, mag man ...es noch so oft gehört haben, stets einen er... ...greifenden Eindruck, besonders wenn es, ...wie gestern Abend, vollendet geboten wird.

...Als Solistin trat gestern Abend Madame ...Nikisch, die Gemahlin des Orchesterdirigen... ...ten, zum ersten Male in Baltimore auf. ...Die Sängerin hatte gestern Abend einen sol... ...chen Erfolg, wie wir ihn in den vielen Jah... ...ren unserer musikalischen Berichterstattung ...nur selten zu verzeichnen gehabt haben. Die ...Sängerin besitzt eine Stimme von großem ...Umfange, von weittragender Kraft des To... ...nes, die in allen Lagen gleich schön und leicht ...anspricht. Die herzliche Wärme des musika... ...lischen Ausdrucks und die dramatisch-belebte ...Färbung des Gesanges, der stimmliche ...Glanz, der echt musikalische Vortrag, der ...das Technische unter den musikalischen Ge... ...halt der Compositionen unterordnet, sichern ...Mad. Nikisch einen ersten Platz unter unse... ...ren Sängerinnen.

...Die Dame sang gestern Abend Raff's „der ...Traumkönig und sein Lieb'" ein Werk, an ...das sich nicht allzu viele Sängerinnen wa... ...gen. Es erfordert ungewöhnlich großen ...stimmlichen Umfang. Die Sängerin riß ...ihre Hörer zu stürmischen Beifallsäußerun... ...gen hin. Drei Lieder: Liszt's „am Rhein," ...Jensen's „am Manzanares" und Gold... ...mark's „Quelle," in denen sich Hr. Nikisch ...als äußerst gewandter und feinfühliger Be... ...gleiter zeigte, brachten solchen Beifall, daß ...Mad. Nikisch noch „guten Abend, mein ...Lieb" zugab. Schließlich hätten wir noch ...anzufügen, daß auch alle Orchestergaben ...ihrerseits händlich die wärmste Anerkennung ...der Hörer fanden.

[83]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
—A WEEKLY PAPER—
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 21, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE three concerts thus far given here this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been an ever rising artistic success, which means, of course, that the third one, which took place at Chickering Hall on Tuesday night of last week, before a completely sold out house, was the best one of all. It certainly seemed so to us, and the audience took the greatest of interest in every number of the carefully chosen program and bestowed intelligent and enthusiastic applause on performances which, for technical perfection, have never been surpassed here.

Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture revealed a most interesting reading on the part of Mr. Nikisch, but a trifle more impressiveness of accentuation was looked for by us. As it was given, however, it was very beautiful and finished.

The latter qualities distinguished, also, especially the two middle movements, both of them exceedingly original and clever, from Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony in F minor, a work which was given here in its entirety by the Symphony Society last season. By the bye, the compiler of the program book gives the key of the andantino as B minor instead of B flat minor. A musical critic and analyst ought to know that a symphony in F minor is not likely to have a slow movement in B minor; moreover, he should be cognizant of the difference between two sharps and five flats. But he probably translated his "analysis" from the German, in which B moll signifies B flat minor, while B minor is represented through H moll, a trap into which several American musical writers have dropped before.

The pièce de résistance of the program was Joachim Raff's eternally beautiful, fresh, richly inspired and exquisitely orchestrated symphony "Im Walde," the unquestionably most important symphonic creation which has been written since Beethoven. The three first movements of this finely colored tone painting were given with a beauty, richness and sensuousness of tone and finesse of shading, as well as rhythmic precision, which could not have been surpassed and which we never before heard equaled. Just in the last bars of the scherzo, however, occurred a slip through the non-entrance of the flute, which came near marring the effect. Messrs. Nikisch and Kneisel's presence of mind, however, saved the orchestra, and we doubt very much if anybody in the audience was aware of a mishap.

The last movement Mr. Nikisch took entirely too slow. The writer, with whom the "Wald" symphony is somewhat of a hobby, heard it several times produced under the composer's own direction, and therefore knows whereof he speaks. Moreover, Mr. Nikisch made a big and perhaps not unjustifiable cut in this movement by leaving out the return of the episode of "the wild hunt." Technically, the movement was produced to perfection, the slowness of the tempo allowing a clearness in the bringing out of the thematic workmanship which it would otherwise be very difficult if not absolutely impossible to attain.

Two soloists were heard on this occasion, both of them hitherto unknown to New York audiences. The first one was Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, the gifted conductor's gifted and most charming wife, who sang a rarely heard, very refined and pretty song with orchestra, "The Dream King and his Love," by Raff, and a group of Lieder with piano accompaniment: Goldmark's "Die Quelle" (strongly reminiscent of Schubert), Jensen's "Am Ufer des Manzanares" and Brahms' "Vergebliches Ständchen," after which, as an encore upon fourfold, most hearty recall, she added Schumann's "Mondnacht."

Mrs. Nikisch is possessed of a very sweet, agreeable and most sympathetic soprano voice of excellent training and she sings most musically and with artistic feeling and phrasing. Her husband aided and sustained her with an accompaniment the like of which one rarely hears on any concert stage.

The second and somewhat superfluous soloist, as the program was sufficiently long without his services, was that mediocre violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Timothy Adamowski, Esq., who essayed Saint-Saëns' "Rondo Capriccioso" in A minor which Sarasate played here so exquisitely. Mr. Adamowski had neither the Spaniard's technic, nor his finish, brilliancy or spirit. He played angularly, at times quite amateurish and with anything but correct intonation. Why he should have been allowed to play at all we are at a loss to understand. If a violinist was wanted why not let Kneisel, who made such a success at the last concert, play again; or if that was not desirable, why not take such other and better performers among the orchestra's violinists as Loeffler, Roth, Svecenski or a few others we could name?

Music in Baltimore.

BALTIMORE, January 19, 1891.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra played its second concert here on Friday evening at the Concordia. Mrs. Nikisch sang. This was the program:

Overture, "Prometheus".....Goldmark
Song with orchestra, "The Dream King and His Love".....Raff
Adagio and scherzo, from "Scandinavian Symphony," No 3, in C minor.....Cowen
Symphonic poem, "Danse Macabre".....Saint-Saëns

SONGS WITH PIANOS.

(a) "Am Rhein".....Liszt
(b) "Am Ufer des Manzanares".....Jensen
(c) "Die Quelle".....Goldmark
"Midsummer Night's Dream" music.....Mendelssohn

Vladimir Pachman, "ze gratest bianist in ze wurld," is announced for the third Boston concert, February 27.

The Kneisel Quartet made a thorough success of its concert on Saturday night. The Schumann string quartet in A minor and Beethoven's C major, op. 99, string quintet, as well as a quartet movement in C minor, by Schubert, were all played with remarkable ensemble effect. To Mr. Faelten, the head of the Faelten Musical School, the people here are indebted for these instructive chamber music concerts. The Kneisel Quartet will play again on February 23, and Mrs. Nikisch will be the soloist.

...LLIANCE JOURNAL.
...THURSDAY, JANUARY 22, 1891.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Liszt's "Tasso" and Music from "Midsummer Night's Dream."

This was the programme of the fourth Symphony concert of this winter's series: Mendelssohn—Overture, Scherzo, Nocturne and Wedding March, from "Midsummer Night's Dream."
Donizetti.....Cavatina, "Don Pasquale."
Servais.....Fantasie Characteristique. For Violoncello.
Cowen....Adagio and Scherzo, from Scandinavian Symphony No. 3, in C minor.
Songs, with Piano:
(a) Reubenstein.....Les Yeux d'Azur
(b) Massenet.....Le Sais-tu."
(c) Vidal.....Printemps Nouveau."
Liszt.....Symphonic Poem, "Tasso."
Soloists, Miss Alice Wentworth, and Mr. Anton Hekking.

Of the present actuality of that "musical growth" which has so long elusively twinkled like a will o' the wisp in the dreams of the music cult of this city, there is a most trustworthy indication in the great increase in patronage given the Symphony concerts, which is double that of any other winter. Last night in Infantry Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra played to its largest, and its most enraptured, Providence audience. There were elements of distinction, too, which marked it above any previous Symphony assembly. Applause was unconfined.

Mendelssohn's fairy overture was attacked with a softness most exquisite, and the blithe spiritualities of the three movements floated out as gently, rose and fell as lightly as the down of a thistle in a summer breeze. They were interpreted with delicious simpleness. "The pert and nimble spirit of mirth" which contained the gay fairies of the old Athenian wood, their elfish revellings, and their sweet love-makings, and all the delicately supernatural elements which Shakspeare translated, are illustrated in Mendelssohn's music with subtlest and divinest fancy. A rare loveliness bedecks the forest, whose sprites steal unstinted hours of gayety and beauty from the night. The charm of Mr. Nikisch's reading of it all eludes analysis; but it seems to have been free and infinitely graceful in spirit. Somehow—perhaps because of its commonness, if such a work ever can become common—the well-worn wedding march seemed prosaic without reason, after the fairy movements that had gone before. But it was splendidly played, better, probably, than any there ever heard it played before, and the memories and associations which it magically called up, helped it into being the most delightful portion of this very delightful programme.

Liszt's "Tasso" is extravagant. In the laments, the first and main part of the subject, there is, indeed, a sorrow and fine anguish that is wonderfully appealing and expressive of that which is the love-born, suffering, and long unappreciated life of the Italian poet, as so fascinatatin. It is dramatic, but not altogether attractive. Perhaps it is not possible to make the racks and torments of a human life delectable. Then the climax is unfortunately noisy. Such triumph as the clamoring brass drum and triangle suggest, is out of keeping with the natural mildness of a poet's real triumph. It was performed with remarkable interest by the orchestra.

An effectual work like Cowen's Scandinavian Symphony, No. 3, is refreshing. It has the clear Northern atmosphere. The adagio is a summer evening on the fjord. Distant music from a band is heard, and bits from Norwegian folk-songs are cleverly and prettily interwoven or suddenly interjected. All in all, there is a poetic grandeur, and, in the Scherzo a brightness and color that is admirable.

Especially pleasing was Miss Alice Wentworth, who sang her group of songs and the beautiful "Don Pasquale," Cavatina, with distinguished success. Her voice is deliciously young and unworn, and her manner sweet and charmingly girlish. Mr. Hekking, 'cellist, was greatly fortunate in his execution of the fantasy, which in itself has hard, rocky, unbeautiful places, that merely served to display the mastery of the player. Both the soloists and the director received tumultuous ovations. And the audience, when the last note faded out, stopped to applaud the retiring orchestra.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 25, 1891.

THE THIRTEENTH SYMPHONY.

Chief Features of Last Evening's Concert in Music Hall.

Stated in brief, the leading features of the Symphony concert last evening were a symphonic prologue, "Francesca da Rimini," by Arthur Foote, and the Tschaikowsky concerto for piano, in B flat minor, played by Mme. Hopekirk. The artistic details of the concert will be noticed at length in our next issue.

Suffice it to say that Mme. Hopekirk has superbly broadened since she was last here; true she never lacked breadth, but it is equally true that several years of artistic experience have liberally endowed her with the highest musical qualities that could be desired for an artist. She is more than ever one of the most brilliant and artistic pianists of the day, and her success last evening was no less emphatic and brilliant than deserved.

Mr. Foote's "Symphonic Prologue" is his ablest work thus far, and this and other features of the concert will be duly noticed next week.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 25, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY.

Tschaikowsky is the only Russian composer of the day, whose works are fairly well known to Americans. At home he is among the elder and perhaps more conservative of a group of rising musicians who in composition adhere closely to the characteristics of their folk-song, and whose musical views are, in the widest sense of the word, romantic.

The vastness of Russia, and the music-loving nature of its people must of necessity give its composers immense advantages in respect of material. It would seem that throughout this tremendous territory, original melodies without number are yet to be discovered; and even if this mine should be at last exhausted, Asia can be drawn upon to an equal extent. The natural inference then, is that a school of Russian music, destined to exert widespread influence, is a pretty well assured thing of the future.

Cæsar Cui, (a few of whose works have been given in this country) Rimsky-Korsakoff, Arensky, Glasenoff, and Liadoff are among the ablest men of this group. A concerto for pianoforte by Arensky was played in Berlin not long ago. Glasenoff has written overtures for which he took Greek themes. Rimsky-Korsakoff conduced at the Allgemeine Deutsche-Music Verein about eight years ago, a symphony of his own that was received by the distinguished musicinns who customarily congregate at the festivals of this society, with great enthusiasm. The subject that inspired the composition of this work was the legend of "Antar." Antar was an Arabian shepheard who lived among the Ruins of Palmyra. One day, while tending his flock, he saw a gazelle, which he attempted to shoot. Just then the gazelle was attacked by a huge bird, and Antar killed the latter instead of the former. The gazelle immediately turned into a beautiful fairy, who informed the astonished shepherd that, having, through killing the bird, destroyed an evil spirit that had bersecuted her, he should be granted three wishes as a token of her gratitude. Man-like, he wished first for the pleasures of revenge; second, for the pleasures of power; third, for the pleasures of Love. To his wishes he added a request that when he became too old to love, the fairy should take his life, which she promised to do. This part of the story is described, or suggested, as the case may be, in the first movement of the symphony. The wishes are then similarly treated in the three following movements; and as the closing movement approaches an end, the fairy appears and ends the life of the shepherd, now old and feeble, with a kiss. In the musical illustration of this kiss the acme of orchestral realism, it is said, is reached.

Tschaikowsky's first pianoforte concerto, opus 23, in B flat minor, is a fine work, well worthy to be ranked among the best compositions of this class extant. There are, to be sure, suggestions of Mendelssohn noticeable in the second theme of the opening movement; but the novel accompanying harmonies and instrumentation save it from conventionality. The andantino is charming; even if the waltz theme of its trio occasions a little surprise, there is after all no reason why it should not be there. The finale, in rondo form, is strong, characteristic, brilliant and sustains one's interest, which is deeply stirred by the broad, powerful opening movement to the very end. Mme. Helen Hopekirk, who created a very favorable impression here some five years ago, was the pianist. Technically the performance was wholly admirable, if an occasional tendency to strike with a force that created unmusical sounds, be excepted. After all, pounding the pianoforte (if it is not too severe) may as well be excused once for all in Music Hall. Every prominent pianist who appears there should precede or supplement such appearances with concerts in a smaller hall. As Mme. Hopekirk is soon to be heard in this manner, detailed criticism of her playing may be deferred till then. It need only be added that, musically, her reading of the concerto was remarkably free from sentimentalism, and adequate in breadth, refined taste and fire. She was heartily received, and recalled several times.

The concert opened with a work just completed by Mr. Arthur Foote, bearing the the title, "Symphonic Prologue, Francesca da Rimini," opus 24. That the composer has not attempted a complete musical illustration of this story of unfortunate love, is intimated in the motto attached to the work:

"No greater grief than to remember days
Of joy, when misery is at hand."

In fact, the modern concert overture form is practically followed throughout. In this, his latest composition for orchestra, Mr. Foote has, in breadth and depth of conception, and skill in orchestration, taken a long stride forward. The themes are striking, well adapted to the sentiments they are intended to express, and developed in a manner that leaves them clearly impressed upon the mind of the attentive listener.

The fiery subject with which the allegro opens, and the lovers' theme are especially good and suggestive, and the pianissimo ending of the coda is wholly appropriate. Effective use is made of the full orchestra, including the tuba, although it is probable that some re-writing will have to be done in order to secure a more perfect balance of parts. As to the title, it may indeed be said "What's in a name!" But if the work does not fulfill all the expectations that are aroused by its title, the same may also be said of many others of more pretentious character, by more eminent writers. Mr. Foote conducted the prologue himself easily and efficiently, and was received as the favorites of the symphony audiences always are, with enthusiasm.

The symphony was Volkman's in D minor, No. 1. It is a sombre, depressing work, the thoughts of the composer as expressed in the extreme movements, being so deeply dyed with apparent gloom and ill-nature, as to render the andante and even the scherzo far from comforting and cheering. It has points of strength, without doubt, but with so many works of far greater interest already in the library of the symphony orchestra, one cannot help involuntarily exclaiming to himself, "Why Volkmann!" It was splendidly performed, but rather coolly received.

T. P. CURRIER.

Of Mrs. Nikisch, a Leipsic graduate remarks: "Frau Nikisch, to my knowledge, never sang in public in Leipsic, except, perhaps, on some little social occasion. People in Leipsic thought a great deal of both Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, personally as well as musically, and I often heard the remark made there, 'What shall we do without them?'"

Chelsea is to have an early representation of the popular new opera "Priscilla." It will be given at the Opera House in that city with a local chorus

Der Deutsche Correspondent.

Samstag, 17. Januar 1891.

Das zweite Conzert des „Bostoner Sinfonie-Orchesters."

Seit dem Auftreten Christine Nilsen's und Theod. Wachtel's zu Anfang der siebeniger Jahre hat die „Concordia" kein solches Publikum gefaßt, wie das, welches sich gestern Abend zu dem zweiten Conzerte des „Bostoner Sinfonie-Orchesters" eingefunden hatte. Das Haus war übervoll. Das sollte nun eigentlich nicht Wunder nehmen, denn Orchester, wie das „Bostoner," sind dünn gesät, und dieser musikalische Organismus—so darf man dieses Orchester nennen—hat in Hrn. A. Nikisch einen künstlerischen Mittelpunkt, der das Orchester als sein Instrument betrachtet.

Das gestrige Conzert wurde mit einer Novität (für Baltimore wenigstens) eröffnet, mit Goldmark's Ouvertüre „der gefesselte Prometheus." Goldmark ist ein Meister der Form und des Ausdrucks; allein in dieser Ouvertüre scheint er hinter seinem Stoff zurückgeblieben zu sein. Mag man dem an den Felsen geschmiedeten und gemarterten Wohlthäter der Menschen den Zug des Schmerzes verleihen, mag man ihn in Göthe'scher Weise betrachten als den Trotzigen, der der Götter nicht achtet, den die Zeit zum Manne geschmiedet, „zu leiden, zu weinen, zu genießen und zu freuen sich," mag man die Resignation als Grundstimmung nehmen: Goldmark packt uns nur stellenweise, nicht als Ganzes. Manches in der Ouvertüre ist Schminke, die über den Inhalt hinwegtäuscht. Die Wiedergabe der Ouvertüre war eine ganz vortreffliche, auf's Feinste und Sauberste heraus gearbeitet; dabei mag nicht unerwähnt bleiben, daß das Werk hohe Forderungen an das Orchester stellt.

Cowen's „skandinavische Sinfonie" gehört zu den bedeutendsten Orchesterwerken englischer Componisten. Hr. Nikisch gab zwei Sätze daraus: das „Adagio" und das „Scherzo." Daß er den ersten Satz, in dem das melancholische Thema schließlich quälend wird, und den Schlußsatz weggelassen hat, war wohlgethan. Die „Sommernacht am Fjord," in deren schöne träumerische Stimmung ein entferntes Hornquartett hereintönt, ist voll Poesie und Effekt. Das „Scherzo" ist ein frappantes Elfenstück (eine Schlittenfahrt, die der Verfasser des Programms musikalisch geschildert sehen will, hat uns nicht eingeleuchtet). Der flüchtige Charakter des Satzes ist mit genialer Consequenz durchgeführt, und die Mendelssohn'sche Sommernachtstraum-Musik hat wohl als Muster gedient, vielleicht auch „Fee Mab" von Berlioz. Dieser Satz wurde prächtig gespielt. Das thut diesem Orchester nicht manches gleich.

Der Shakespear'sche „Sommernachtstraum," um den Mendelssohn seinen wunderbaren Tönezauber gewoben, bewegt sich ebenfalls in dem romantischen Genre. Diese musikalischen Bilder von bezaubernder Farbenpracht und vollendeter Klarheit und Schönheit werden stets die Anerkennung des Publikums finden. Sie fanden sie auch gestern; indessen zu viel Romantik in einem Conzert zu bieten, ist in unserer Zeit nicht wohlgethan; und ein Orchester, wie das „Bostoner," hören wir doch immer am Liebsten große und ernste Aufgaben lösen.

Die vierte Conzertleistung bildete einen starken Contrast zwischen Cowen und Mendelssohn. Es war Saint Saens' „Todtentanz." Im Anschluß an das Gedicht von H. Cazalis tritt der Tod als Spielmann auf, der die klappernden Skelette zu mitternächtlicher Stunde zum Tanze lockt. Es schlägt 12. Der Tod beginnt aufzuspielen. Es liegt tiefe Trauer über dieser Tanzfröhlichkeit. Der Tanz wird wilder, bis der Hahn kräht, dann verschwinden die gespenstischen Bilder. Das Werk macht, mag man es noch so oft gehört haben, stets einen ergreifenden Eindruck, besonders wenn es, wie gestern Abend, vollendet geboten wird.

Als Solistin trat gestern Abend Madame Nikisch, die Gemahlin des Orchesterdirigenten, zum ersten Male in Baltimore auf. Die Sängerin hatte gestern Abend einen solchen Erfolg, wie wir ihn in den vielen Jahren unserer musikalischen Berichterstattung nur selten zu verzeichnen gehabt haben. Die Sängerin besitzt eine Stimme von großem Umfange, von weittragender Kraft des Tones, die in allen Lagen gleich schön und leicht anspricht. Die herzliche Wärme des musikalischen Ausdrucks und die dramatisch-belebte Färbung des Gesanges, der stimmliche Glanz, der echt musikalische Vortrag, der das Technische unter den musikalischen Gehalt der Compositionen unterordnet, sichern Mad. Nikisch einen ersten Platz unter unseren Sängerinnen.

Die Dame sang gestern Abend Raff's „der Traumkönig und sein Lieb'" ein Werk, an das sich nicht allzu viele Sängerinnen wagen. Es erfordert ungewöhnlich großen stimmlichen Umfang. Die Sängerin riß ihre Hörer zu stürmischen Beifallsäußerungen hin. Drei Lieder: Liszt's „am Rhein," Jensen's „am Manzanares" und Goldmark's „Quelle," in denen sich Hr. Nikisch als äußerst gewandter und feinfühliger Begleiter zeigte, brachten solchen Beifall, daß Mad. Nikisch noch „guten Abend, mein Schatz" zugab. Schließlich hätten wir noch anzufügen, daß auch alle Orchestergaben selbstverständlich die wärmste Anerkennung der Hörer fanden.

The Musical Courier.

—A WEEKLY PAPER—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 21, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE three concerts thus far given here this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been an ever rising artistic success, which means, of course, that the third one, which took place at Chickering Hall on Tuesday night of last week, before a completely sold out house, was the best one of all. It certainly seemed so to us, and the audience took the greatest of interest in every number of the carefully chosen program and bestowed intelligent and enthusiastic applause on performances which, for technical perfection, have never been surpassed here.

Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture revealed a most interesting reading on the part of Mr. Nikisch, but a trifle more impressiveness of accentuation was looked for by us. As it was given, however, it was very beautiful and finished.

The latter qualities distinguished, also, especially the two middle movements, both of them exceedingly original and clever, from Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony in F minor, a work which was given here in its entirety by the Symphony Society last season. By the bye, the compiler of the program book gives the key of the andantino as B minor instead of B flat minor. A musical critic and analyst ought to know that a symphony in F minor is not likely to have a slow movement in B minor; moreover, he should be cognizant of the difference between two sharps and five flats. But he probably translated his "analysis" from the German, in which B moll signifies B flat minor, while B minor is represented through H moll, a trap into which several American musical writers have dropped before.

The pièce de résistance of the program was Joachim Raff's eternally beautiful, fresh, richly inspired and exquisitely orchestrated symphony "Im Walde," the unquestionably most important symphonic creation which has been written since Beethoven. The three first movements of this finely colored tone painting were given with a beauty, richness and sensuousness of tone and finesse of shading, as well as rhythmic precision, which could not have been surpassed and which we never before heard equaled. Just in the last bars of the scherzo, however, occurred a slip through the non-entrance of the flute, which came near marring the effect. Messrs. Nikisch and Kneisel's presence of mind, however, saved the orchestra, and we doubt very much if anybody in the audience was aware of a mishap.

The last movement Mr. Nikisch took entirely too slow. The writer, with whom the "Wald" symphony is somewhat of a hobby, heard it several times produced under the composer's own direction, and therefore knows whereof he speaks. Moreover, Mr. Nikisch made a big and perhaps not unjustifiable cut in this movement by leaving out the return of the episode of "the wild hunt." Technically, the movement was produced to perfection, the slowness of the tempo allowing a clearness in the bringing out of the thematic workmanship which it would otherwise be very difficult if not absolutely impossible to attain.

Two soloists were heard on this occasion, both of them hitherto unknown to New York audiences. The first one was Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, the gifted conductor's gifted and most charming wife, who sang a rarely heard, very refined and pretty song with orchestra, "The Dream King and his Love," by Raff, and a group of Lieder with piano accompaniment: Goldmark's "Die Quelle" (strongly reminiscent of Schubert), Jensen's "Am Ufer des Manzanares" and Brahms' "Vergebliches Ständchen," after which, as an encore upon fourfold, most hearty recall, she added Schumann's "Mondnacht."

Mrs. Nikisch is possessed of a very sweet, agreeable and most sympathetic soprano voice of excellent training and she sings most musically and with artistic feeling and phrasing. Her husband aided and sustained her with an accompaniment the like of which one rarely hears on any concert stage.

The second and somewhat superfluous soloist, as the program was sufficiently long without his services, was that mediocre violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Timothy Adamowski, Esq., who essayed Saint-Saëns' "Rondo Capriccioso" in A minor which Sarasate played here so exquisitely. Mr. Adamowski had neither the Spaniard's technic, nor his finish, brilliancy or spirit. He played angularly, at times quite amateurish and with anything but correct intonation. Why he should have been allowed to play at all we are at a loss to understand. If a violinist was wanted why not let Kneisel, who made such a success at the last concert, play again; or if that was not desirable, why not take such other and better performers among the orchestra's violinists as Loeffler, Roth, Svecenski or a few others we could name?

Music in Baltimore.

BALTIMORE, January 19, 1891.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra played its second concert here on Friday evening at the Concordia. Mrs. Nikisch sang. This was the program:

Overture, "Prometheus".....Goldmark
Song with orchestra, "The Dream King and His Love".....Raff
Adagio and scherzo, from "Scandinavian Symphony," No 3, in C minor.....Cowen
Symphonic poem, "Danse Macabre".....Saint-Saëns

SONGS WITH PIANOS.

(a) "Am Rhein".....Liszt
(b) "Am Ufer des Manzanares".....Jensen
(c) "Die Quelle".....Goldmark
"Midsummer Night's Dream" music.....Mendelssohn

Vladimir Pachman, "ze gratest bianist in ze wurld," is announced for the third Boston concert, February 27.

The Kneisel Quartet made a thorough success of its concert on Saturday night. The Schumann string quartet in A minor and Beethoven's C major, op. 99, string quintet, as well as a quartet movement in C minor, by Schubert, were all played with remarkable ensemble effect. To Mr. Faelten, the head of the Faelten Musical School, the people here are indebted for these instructive chamber music concerts. The Kneisel Quartet will play again on February 23, and Mrs. Nikisch will be the soloist.

Providence Journal

THURSDAY, JANUARY 22, 1891.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Liszt's "Tasso" and Music from "Midsummer Night's Dream.

This was the programme of the fourth Symphony concert of this winter's series: Mendelssohn—Overture, Scherzo, Natturne and Wedding March, from "Midsummer Night's Dream."
Donizetti.....Cavatina, "Don Pasqualle."
Servais.....Fantasie Characterisque
For Violoncello.
Cowen.....Adagio and Scherzo, from Scandinavian Symphony No. 3, in C minor.
Songs, with Piano:
(a) Reubenstein.....Les Yeux d'Azur
(b) Massenet.....Le Sais-tu."
(c) Vidal.....Printemps Nouveau."
Liszt.....Symphonic Poem, "Tasso."
Soloists, Miss Alice Wentworth, and Mr. Anton Hekking.

Of the present actuality of that "musical growth" which has so long elusively twinkled like a will o' the wisp in the dreams of the music cult of this city, there is a most trustworthy indication in the great increase in patronage given the Symphony concerts, which is double that of any other winter. Last night in Infantry Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra played to its largest, and its most enraptured, Providence audience. There were elements of distinction, too, which marked it above any previous Symphony assembly. Applause was unconfined.

Mendelssohn's fairy overture was attacked with a softness most exquisite, and the blithe spiritualities of the three movements floated out as gently, rose and fell as lightly as the down of a thistle in a summer breeze. They were interpreted with delicious simpleness. "The pert and nimble spirit of mirth" which contained the gay fabrics of the old Athenian wood, their elfish revellings, and their sweet love-makings, and all the delicately supernatural elements which Shakspeare translated, are illustrated in Mendelssohn's music with subtlest and divinest fancy. A rare loveliness bedecks the forest, whose sprites steal unstinted hours of gayety and beauty from the night. The charm of Mr. Nikisch's reading of it all eludes analysis; but it seems to have been free and infinitely graceful in spirit. Somehow—perhaps because of its commonness, if such a work ever can become common—the well-worn wedding march seemed prosaic without reason, after the fairy movements that had gone before. But it was splendidly played, better, probably, than any there ever heard it played before, and the memories and associations which it magically balled up, helped it into being the most delightful portion of this very delightful programme.

Listz's "Tasso" is extravagant. In the laments, the first and main part of the subject, there is, indeed, a sorrow and fine anguish that is wonderfully appealing and expressive of that which in the love-lorn, suffering, and long unappreciated life of the Italian poet, is so fascintatin. It is dramaile, but not altogether attractive. Perhaps it is not possible to make the racks and torments of a human life delectable. Then the climax is unfortunately noisy. Such triumph as the clamoring brass drum and triangle suggest, is out of keeping with the natural mildness of a poet's real triumph. It was performed with remarkable interest by the orchestra.

An effectual work like Cowen's Scandinavian Symphony, No. 3, is refreshing. It has the clear Northern atmosphere. The adagio is a summer evening on the fjord. Distant music from a band is heard, and bits from Norwegian folk-songs are cleverly and prettily interwoven or suddenly interjected. All in all, there is a poetic grandeur, and, in the Scherzo a brightness and color that is admirable.

Especially pleasing was Miss Alice Wentworth, who sang her group of songs and the beautiful "Don Pasquale," Cavatina, with distinguished success. Her voice is deliciously young and unworn, and her manner sweet and charmingly girlish. Mr. Hekking, 'cellist, was greatly fortunate in his execution of the fantasy, which in itself has hard, rocky, unbeautiful places, that merely served to display the mastery of the player. Both the soloists and the director received tumultuous ovations. And the audience, when the last note faded out, stopped to applaud the retiring orchestra.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 25, 1891.

THE THIRTEENTH SYMPHONY.

Chief Features of Last Evening's Concert in Music Hall.

Stated in brief, the leading features of the Symphony concert last evening were a symphonic prologue, "Francesca da Rimini," by Arthur Foote, and the Tschaikowsky concerto for piano, in B flat minor, played by Mme. Hopekirk. The artistic details of the concert will be noticed at length in our next issue.

Suffice it to say that Mme. Hopekirk has superbly broadened since she was last here; true she never lacked breadth, but it is equally true that several years of artistic experience have liberally endowed her with the highest musical qualities that could be desired for an artist. She is more than ever one of the most brilliant and artistic pianists of the day, and her success last evening was no less emphatic and brilliant than deserved.

Mr. Foote's "Symphonic Prologue" is his ablest work thus far, and this and other features of the concert will be duly noticed next week.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 25, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY.

Tschaikowsky is the only Russian composer of the day, whose works are fairly well known to Americans. At home he is among the elder and perhaps more conservative of a group of rising musicians who in composition adhere closely to the characteristics of their folk-song, and whose musical views are, in the widest sense of the word, romantic.

The vastness of Russia, and the music-loving nature of its people must of necessity give its composers immense advantages in respect of material. It would seem that throughout this tremendous territory, original melodies without number are yet to be discovered; and even if this mine should be at last exhausted, Asia can be drawn upon to an equal extent. The natural inference then, is that a school of Russian music, destined to exert widespread influence, is a pretty well assured thing of the future.

Cæsar Cui, (a few of whose works have been given in this country) Rimsky-Korsakoff, Arensky, Glasenoff, and Liadoff are among the ablest men of this group. A concerto for pianoforte by Arensky was played in Berlin not long ago. Glasenoff has written overtures for which he took Greek themes. Rimsky-Korsakoff conduced at the Allgemeine Deutsche-Music Verein about eight years ago, a symphony of his own that was received by the distinguished musicinns who customarily congregate at the festivals of this society, with great enthusiasm. The subject that inspired the composition of this work was the legend of "Antar." Antar was an Arabian shepheard who lived among the Ruins of Palmyra. One day, while tending his flock, he saw a gazelle, which he attempted to shoot. Just then the gazelle was attacked by a huge bird, and Antar killed the latter instead of the former. The gazelle immediately turned into a beautiful fairy, who informed the astonished shepherd that, having, through killing the bird, destroyed an evil spirit that had bersecuted her, he should be granted three wishes as a token of her gratitude. Man-like, he wished first for the pleasures of revenge; second, for the pleasures of power; third, for the pleasures of Love. To his wishes he added a request that when he became too old to love, the fairy should take his life, which she promised to do. This part of the story is described, or suggested, as the case may be, in the first movement of the symphony. The wishes are then similarly treated in the three following movements; and as the closing movement approaches an end, the fairy appears and ends the life of the shepherd, now old and feeble, with a kiss. In the musical illustration of this kiss the acme of orchestral realism, it is said, is reached.

Tschaikowsky's first pianoforte concerto, opus 23, in B flat minor, is a fine work, well worthy to be ranked among the best compositions of this class extant. There are, to be sure, suggestions of Mendelssohn noticeable in the second theme of the opening movement; but the novel accompanying harmonies and instrumentation save it from conventionality. The andantino is charming; even if the waltz theme of its trio occasions a little surprise, there is after all no reason why it should not be there. The finale, in rondo form, is strong, characteristic, brilliant and sustains one's interest, which is deeply stirred by the broad, powerful opening movement to the very end. Mme. Helen Hopekirk, who created a very favorable impression here some five years ago, was the pianist. Technically the performance was wholly admirable, if an occasional tendency to strike with a force that created unmusical sounds, be excepted. After all, pounding the pianoforte (if it is not too severe) may as well be excused once for all in Music Hall. Every prominent pianist who appears there should precede or supplement such appearances with concerts in a smaller hall. As Mme. Hopekirk is soon to be heard in this manner, detailed criticism of her playing may be deferred till then. It need only be added that, musically, her reading of the concerto was remarkably free from sentimentalism, and adequate in breadth, refined taste and fire. She was heartily received, and recalled several times.

The concert opened with a work just completed by Mr. Arthur Foote, bearing the the title, "Symphonic Prologue, Francesca da Rimini," opus 24. That the composer has not attempted a complete musical illustration of this story of unfortunate love, is intimated in the motto attached to the work:

"No greater grief than to remember days
Of joy, when misery is at hand."

In fact, the modern concert overture form is practically followed throughout. In this, his latest composition for orchestra, Mr. Foote has, in breadth and depth of conception, and skill in orchestration, taken a long stride forward. The themes are striking, well adapted to the sentiments they are intended to express, and developed in a manner that leaves them clearly impressed upon the mind of the attentive listener.

The fiery subject with which the allegro opens, and the lovers' theme are especially good and suggestive, and the pianissimo ending of the coda is wholly appropriate. Effective use is made of the full orchestra, including the tuba, although it is probable that some re-writing will have to be done in order to secure a more perfect balance of parts. As to the title, it may indeed be said "What's in a name!" But if the work does not fulfill all the expectations that are aroused by its title, she same may also be said of many others of more pretentious character, by more eminent writers. Mr. Foote conducted the prologue himself easily and efficiently, and was received as the favorites of the symphony audiences always are, with enthusiasm.

The symphony was Volkman's in D minor, No. 1. It is a sombre, depressing work, the thoughts of the composer as expressed in the extreme movements, being so deeply dyed with apparent gloom and ill-nature, as to render the audante and even the scherzo far from comforting and cheering. It has points of strength, without doubt, but with so many works of far greater interest already in the library of the symphony orchestra, one cannot help involuntarily exclaiming to himself, "Why Volkmann!" It was splendidly performed, but rather coolly received.

T. P. CURRIER.

Of Mrs. Nikisch, a Leipsic graduate remarks: "Frau Nikisch, to my knowledge, never sang in public in Leipsic, except, perhaps, on some little social occasion. People in Leipsic thought a great deal of both Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, personally as well as musically, and I often heard the remark made there, 'What shall we do without them?'"

Chelsea is to have an early representation of the popular new opera "Priscilla." It will be given at the Opera House in that city with a local chorus

[83]

Boston Daily Advertiser
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 26, 1891.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday—Mme. Hopekirk as Soloist.

The American composer received recognition in the programme of Saturday in the person of Mr. Arthur Foote, and through his symphonic prologue "Francesca da Rimini." The work was both a success and a disappointment, the former as regards the clear statement of themes, the good orchestration and the technical knowledge displayed; a disappointment in the calmness which was at times evident where all should have been passion and fire, yet this was only occasionally evident, and as a whole this symphonic prologue may be ranked with the "In the Mountains" overture, which has hitherto been the composer's best work, and after all the very balance and poise which seems a defect in this instance, is in the main a virtue which one might wish to many of our native composers. Possibly the fact that Liszt has given some of this erotic style to his tone-picturing of the same heroine, made the respectability of such a "back-bay" Francesca seem more pronounced than it otherwise would have been; in any case the orchestration and the musicianly character of the themes and their presentation calls for admiration, and Mr. Foote's work may be held up as a model to those native composers who begin by being young Wagners, and end by asphyxiating in a slough of formlessness. The composer was recalled with evident enthusiasm after the excellent performance and conducting of his work.

The reappearance of Madame Helen Hopekirk, after years of absence, was an event of much interest to our piano-loving public. The artist has gained in breadth and power since she left us, and has a certain masculinity of expression which is very effective. There is, however, a degree of phlegm in her conquering of technical difficulties which might easily be mistaken for indifference. To me it recalls the intellectuality and perfect imperturbility of her great teacher, Louis Maas, who often used to perform the most difficult works with a display of gleichgültigkeit which he was far from feeling. In the Tschaikowski concerto the piano is more than once pitted against the whole orchestra, and it is not every pianist who could have achieved clearness under the circumstances as Mme. Hopekirk did. She is more than a mere piano player, she is a musician, and the development of the first movement became very lucid because of the manner of its performance, while the brilliancy of the finale proved that all the fortissimo work had not used up the reserve force of the pianist. It was perhaps just this sense of a reservation of power, a feeling of surety pervading the entire performance, which made the chief charm of the artist's work, and at the close a triple recall and floral tributes showed that the public as well as personal friends were delighted.

Volkmann's D minor symphony ended the programme. It received probably the finest reading it has ever had here, and the almanes were splendidly worked up. Volkmann shows a trace of the influence of Schumann in the style and contrasts of his themes, but is more exact in form than the latter. His development of figures is ingenious enough, but carried to too great a length. The omnipresent figure of the first movement, for example, is not quite like a seed growing into fruit, as is the case with so many of Beethoven's figures, but merely a succession of skilful reiterations at the end of which one may ask—cui bono? But after all it was not given to many to compass a thorough "first movement" and in the remaining three the composer makes ample amends. Among the many points of fine execution in the performance may be mentioned the horn playing of the second movement (how expressive that stationary horn tone is against the shifting harmonies!) the clarinet work, the quaint eighth-symphony-like figures on bassoon in the last movement and the ensemble of the entire finale. Next week comes an innovation, two full-fledged symphonies of the modern school on a single programme! Mr. Nikisch must be in an educational mood.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 26, 1891.

The Symphony Concert.

The leading features of the Symphony concert Saturday evening were the reappearance of Mme. Helen Hopekirk and the production of a symphonic poem by Arthur Foote—the latest work of Mr. Foote, and its first performance in Boston. The title of the poem was "Francesca da Rimini," and the superb interpretation, added to the scholarly reputation which Mr. Foote holds in the minds of the musical people of Boston, made this number one of the most interesting of the concert. It was greeted with hearty applause, and the entire concert was one of the best Mr. Nikisch has given this season. Of course, Mme. Hopekirk was gladly welcomed, and gave Tschaikowsky's Concerto No. 1 in B flat, for piano and orchestra, and the brilliancy of the closing movement found an apt interpreter in the soloist. The concert closed with a fairly good rendition of Volkmann's Symphony No. 1 in D minor. At the next concert there is to be no soloist, and there will be given Schumann's Symphony in B flat No. 1 and Brahms's No. 1 in C minor.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 26, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the thirteenth Symphony concert, given at Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Symphonic Prologue, "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 24. (First time.) ..... A. Foote
Concerto for piano in B flat minor, No 1. ..... Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 1, in D minor ..... Volkmann

Mr. Foote calls his new work a "Symphonic Prologue." It is practically a concert overture. The explanatory sketch prepared by him for the programme book is simply an exposition of its musical contents. The second theme is said to be the theme of the two lovers; and with this exception the sketch is free from any attempt to give the hearer in gaudy rhetoric the "meaning" of the measures. It is as modest and straightforward as the composer.

He who passes judgment upon a serious, unpublished musical work after hearing it once can give only impressions which future hearings may change. The reviewer of a book, the critic of paintings can take his time; he can read or look at his leisure. The singer, as well as the performer upon an instrument, writes by his own performance the verdict which must be pronounced. But the ear, when it is not aided by the eye and previous study of the composition, is a treacherous organ. It is easily tickled, it is easily shocked—for the moment. Unless the impression made upon it is strong, the music is at once forgotten and the labor of the composer is vain. So here impressions, and only first impressions, must take the place of a deliberate judgment. Mr. Foote's, overture, then, seems to be a thoughtfully considered, coherent work. It is clear without being common, it holds the attention without recourse to the tricks of makers of sensational programme music. Its opening is impressive; and certain passages, such as the recitative, are very effective. Mr. Foote does not ape those who have gone before him, though at the close there is a curious and undoubtedly unpremeditated reminiscence of a few well-known measures of Gounod's "Faust." The instrumentation is free from the reproach of thinness or crudity, although it suffers from a want of sufficient contrasts, and the treatment of the wood-wind is somewhat monotonous. It is an excellent piece of work, and it shows the steady growth of Mr. Foote's art. When one examines the musical ideas themselves instead of the marshalling and expression of them there is not so much to be said in praise. It should not be forgotten that the text is a tale of Italian passion and revenge. The mere recital of the woes of Francesca and Paolo so moved Dante that, for pity, he swooned away as if he had been dying, "and fell, even as a dead body falls." If the composer's music does not glow with the fire which consumed Madonna Francesca, if it does not echo the hatred of the rude cripple Gianciotto, it should be remembered that Ambroise Thomas failed in this, and how Tschaikowsy fared in his orchestral fantasia is to us unknown. Mr. Foote directed the performance of his work, and before and after it he was loudly applauded.

Mrs. Hopekirk, who played the pianoforte part of the Tschaikowsky concerto, has a remarkable individuality. She seems to belong to no particular school of playing; she recalls no other distinguished pianist. She escapes classification. While her mechanism is admirable (take for example her superb octaves), certain of her methods (as the stiffness shown in the striking of chords) would be open to criticism, did she not in spite of these methods gain the desired results. She overcame the great technical difficulties with ease, and she gave a broadly conceived and carefully finished performance. If there was an apparent absence of sympathy, if there was not a direct appeal to the emotions, possibly the concerto itself was the cause. It compels admiration; it astounds; but with the exception of the slow movement where the real beauty lies in the orchestra, and not in the pianoforte, the music is aimed at the head instead of the midriff. And yet it is most worthy of respect. How nobly inspired is the melody at the beginning of the first movement; how charming is the episode in the second movement; how full of character are even the shortest themes: how fiery the peroration! In its time-mocking length, its endless repetitions, its fantastic digressions, its mixture of realism and imagination, it is like unto a novel of Dostoievsky. Mrs. Hopekirk was most enthusiastically applauded at the end of her severe task.

The choice of the Volkmann Symphony, in connection with the other numbers of the programme, was unfortunate. It would have been well to have closed with music such as is praised by Athenæus; music "which softens moroseness of temper, dissipates sadness, and produces affability and a sort of gentleman-like joy." This symphony of Volkmann, with the exception of the finale, is a noble work. The opening with its "music of preparation and of awakening suspense;" the beautiful andante, so pure in thought and chaste in expression; the delicious trio, which is such a vivid contrast to the crabbed scherzo;—here is absolute music, far removed from the vaporing and insanity of the ultra-modern school. Its effect would, however, have been doubled, had it appeared upon another programme. The symphony and the other numbers were finely played by the orchestra.

The programme of the concert to be given Saturday evening, Jan. 31, includes Schumann's Symphony in B-flat; Handel's Concerto Grosso in D, for string orchestra (first time), and Brahms' Symphony in C minor.

PHILIP HALE.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, JANUARY 25, 1891.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mme. Helen Hopekirk.

Few of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra have given more general satisfaction than that of last evening, and Director Nikisch contributed his full share to the enjoyable results attending the performance of the programme.

Two events of unusual interest were included in the evening's happenings, the reappearance of Mme. Helen Hopekirk, the pianist, after an extended absence from America, and the first hearing of Mr. Arthur Foote's "symphonic prologue," styled "Francesca da Rimini," being op. 24 of this composer's writings.

Mme. Hopekirk, who made her popularity assured in this city in her appearance in recital programmes just before leaving America, had a hearty greeting upon making her entrance to play the Tschaikowsky concerto for piano and orchestra No. 1, in B flat minor, op. 23, and she quickly made it evident in her playing that her absence has been well improved. The grand, broad, masterly fashion in which she read the opening allegro commanded instant attention, and from the beginning to the end of the concerto she held her audience spellbound by her splendid playing. The delightfully graceful andanteno became a tone poem in very truth under the magical touch of her fingers, and the spirited final movement displayed her technical skill with admirable success. All who recall the earlier triumphs of this artist in her Boston concerts need not be told of the intellectual qualities displayed at all times in her piano work, and these evidences of her rare individuality were as distinct as ever in her performance of last evening. No artist could desire a more spontaneous recognition of her abilities than that shown at the conclusion of Mme. Hopekirk's playing, and the ovation she gained was most honestly won.

Boston and America will always be honored throughout the world of music by the work of Mr. Arthur Foote. He has already made his mark in the restricted field to which he has limited his ambition, but such a genius will yet gain a world wide hearing, and in this hearing the cause of the American musician will be the gainer. Mr. Foote, in his musical development has shown the ability of adhering to all that is good in the old schools, and aiding all that is good in the new. In other words, he evidently holds that music without ideas is valueless, but that a good idea cannot be too carefully or artistically treated and worked out. His new "Symphonic" prologue is full of ideas, good melodious ideas, and with these for a foundation, he has made a composition that will stand the severest criticism. It is most enjoyable throughout, and shows this native born musician at his very best. In intrusting the performance of the new work to its composer's direction, Mr. Nikisch did wisely, for the orchestra was most skilfully handled by Mr. Foote, and the prologue gained by the intelligent fashion in which he made its musical meaning clear to all who listened. It was gratifying to notice the strict attention given the work by the audience, and Mr. Foote had good cause for pride in the unanimous approval of his efforts as composer and conductor as he stepped from the desk at the conclusion of the prologue.

The Volkmann symphony No. 1 in D minor brought the concert to an end and Mr. Nikisch was even more than usually happy in his reading of this most interesting work.

Next Saturday evening there will be no soloist, the programme consisting of Schumann's symphony in B flat No. 1; Handel's concerto grosso, in D, for string orchestra, (first time), and Brahms' symphony in C minor No. 1.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 25.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

The Symphony Concerts.

Last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, opened with Mr. Arthur Foote's most recent composition, a Symphonic Prologue, "Francesca da Rimini," op. 24. It is the most ambitious, and on the whole, the most striking work for orchestra that Mr Foote has as yet written. It is conceived on a large scale, almost that of the first movement of a symphony, and is strongly dramatic in character, is impassioned, and the vigor with which it begins is never relaxed until the closing bars. It is richly instrumented, and with an admirable feeling for the quality and offices of the different instruments. Its ideas are perhaps, not as impressive as is their treatment, and do not always come out with all desirable clearness, owing possibly to the heaviness of the orchestration which is almost persistent. We felt a lack of contrasts in the instrumental effects, an absence of that varied tone coloring which is essential in order to avoid monotony. But the fire and force of the work are unmistakable, and the spirit in which it is conceived and treated carries the listener along with it, and keeps the attention constantly stimulated. It differs in style from anything that we have hitherto had from its composer, and, taken altogether, marks a stride forward in his art. The work was finely played, Mr. Foote conducting with excellent skill, and at its close the audience broke into a well-merited outburst of applause, recalling the composer with much enthusiasm. Volkmann's fine symphony No. 1, in D minor, ended the concert. The work is something of a compromise between the old school and the new, and has many beautiful and masterly moments; and it may safely be ranked high among contemporary symphonies. The opening movement is full of strength and dignity, though a certain stiffness is imparted to it by a too frequent obstinate adherence to its somewhat rigid opening figure. The slow movement is full of warmth and feeling, and is delightful in the grace and tenderness of its instrumentation. The scherzo has a finely marked rhythmic swing, and its trio is exquisitely beautiful. The finale shares the fate destined to so many finales by modern composers. Its interest is impaired by a tiresome monotony, though all is brought to an end brilliantly and stirringly enough. The work was sympathetically read, and was played in the best and most finished style of the orchestra. The soloist was Mad. Helen Hopekirk, who played Tschaikowsky's concerto for piano, in B-flat minor, No. 1, op. 23. This artist, whose method has undergone a great change since she was last heard here, acquitted herself with admirable technical skill. Her touch is sure and clear, and she plays with a vigor and passion strikingly masculine in character. The exacting work presented no difficulties of which she was not easily the master. She read the work with keen artistic intelligence, and her performances were marked by refined taste and intellectuality. The only fault in the effort was a certain deliberation which imparted the effect of coldness to it. The artist was cordially received and at the end of the concerto was rewarded with a storm of applause, some handsome tributes in the shape of flowers, and three recalls. The programme for the next concert is: Schumann's Symphony, No. 1; Brahms's Symphony, No. 1, and a Concerto Grosso, for strings, by Handel. There will be no soloist.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, JAN. 25, 1891.

Thirteenth Symphony Concert.

Mme. Helen Hopekirk was the soloist at last week's Symphony concert, and heartily welcome was the reappearance in Boston of this eminent pianist. The delightful recitals she gave here a few years ago are remembered with exceeding pleasure so it was not surprising that she should receive an unusually demonstrative meeting from Friday afternoon's rehearsal audience. Tschaikowsky's concerto for piano, No. 1, in B flat, has been performed at these concerts several times in seasons past, and as played by Mme. Hopekirk was gladly heard again. This scholarly composition, especially its brilliant closing movement, was superbly interpreted, and thoroughly deserved the enthusiastic applause which followed. Mme. Hopekirk was three times recalled. The place of honor on the programme was given Mr. Arthur Foote's latest work, a symphonic prologue entitled "Francesca da Rimini." The local popularity of Mr. Foote naturally awakened a great deal of interest in the production of this writing, and very cordial was the welcome given him when he appeared to direct the orchestra. It can certainly be said that the prologue made a most favorable impression. It is the most pretentious work that he has yet given to the public, and will no doubt rank among his best successes. Volkmann's symphony No. 1 in D minor was the final, and not particularly welcome, offering. It is difficult to understand why Mr. Nikisch should choose to give another performance of this symphony when so many notable works have yet to be heard. There will be no soloist at the next concert. The programme will include two symphonies, Schumann's in B flat, No. 1, and Brahms' in C minor, No. 1. The novelty will be Handel's concerto grosso in D for string orchestra.

——Mrs. Nikisch, fresh from her New York, Philadelphia and Washington triumphs, was the centre of attraction at the very agreeable reception given for her and her distinguished husband by Mr. and Mrs. Francis W. Breed, at their house on Ocean st., Lynn, Thursday evening. The parlors were fragrant with a quantity of beautiful flowers arranged by Doyle, and the supper table was a mass of bloom. Among the 200 guests assembled were ex-Gov. Ames and family, Mr. William Lloyd Garrison, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Mack, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Ames, Mr. and Mrs. F. P. Vinton, Mr. and Mrs. P. C. Chase, who went out from Boston, and Mr. and Mrs. J. H. White of Brookline and a large number of the society people of Lynn.

Clipping from Telegram, Providence R. I.

Date 1-23

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Nikisch and His Orchestra Greeted by a Great Audience.

The fourth concert of the series being given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry hall occurred last night, and the big hall was filled with an audience that improved every opportunity to testify its enjoyment and appreciation of the admirable program presented to them, which was as follows:

Mendelssohn—Overture, Scherzo, Natturno and Wedding March, from "Midsummer Night's dream."
Donizetti.....Cavatina, "Don Pasqualle."
Miss Alice Wentworth.
Cowen—Adagio and Scherzo, from Scandinavian Symphony No. 3, in C minor.
Servais.....Fantasie Characterisque.
Mr. Anton Hekking.
Songs, with piano:
(a) Reubenstein.....Les Yeux d'Azur
(b) Massenet.....Le Sais-tu
(c) Vidal.....Printemps Nouveau
Miss Wentworth.
Liszt.....Symphonic poem, "Tasso."

Though the symphony orchestra played to its largest and most enthusiastic audience, it did not give its best program nor its best soloists. Miss Wentworth has a sweet, flexible and well-trained voice; voice well adapted to ballad singing, and to a certain range of operatic selections. It lacks power and compass. Time may improve it, but at present it can hardly be said that Miss Wentworth is an artist fitted in all respects to complement vocally the magnificent work of the orchestra. Mr. Hekking's selection for the 'cello was a brilliant piece of execution, and showed that the performer is a thorough master of his instrument.

Of the orchestral numbers the first was incomparably the best, both as a musical work and as a work calculated to appeal to the popular taste. It was wonderfully well performed. The Scandinavian symphony is uneven in merit; considered from any point of view. It has excellent and most enjoyable passages and it has passages that provoke wonder and almost positive dislike. The Liszt symphonic poem is not Liszt at his best, nor music at its best. It is torn roughly in places, and has a climax which, coming as it did last night the last on the program, tends to reconcile the auditor to a speedy clearance of the hall and a tramp home through slush and over places especially planned for the downfall of the wicked.

[84]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 26, 1891.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday—Mme. Hopekirk as Soloist.

The American composer received recognition in the programme of Saturday in the person of Mr. Arthur Foote, and through his symphonic prologue "Francesca da Rimini." The work was both a success and a disappointment, the former as regards the clear statement of themes, the good orchestration and the technical knowledge displayed; a disappointment in the calmness which was at times evident where all should have been passion and fire, yet this was only occasionally evident, and as a whole this symphonic prologue may be ranked with the "In the Mountains" overture, which has hitherto been the composer's best work, and after all the very balance and poise which seems a defect in this instance, is in the main a virtue which one might wish to many of our native composers. Possibly the fact that Liszt has given some of this erotic style to his tone-picturing of the same heroine, made the respectability of such a "back-bay" Francesca seem more pronounced than it otherwise would have been; in any case the orchestration and the musicianly character of the themes and their presentation calls for admiration, and Mr. Foote's work may be held up as a model to those native composers who begin by being young Wagners, and end by asphyxiating in a slough of formlessness. The composer was recalled with evident enthusiasm after the excellent performance and conducting of his work.

The reappearance of Madame Helen Hopekirk, after years of absence, was an event of much interest to our piano loving public. The artist has gained in breadth and power since she left us, and has a certain masculinity of expression which is very effective. There is, however, a degree of phlegm in her conquering of technical difficulties which might easily be mistaken for indifference. To me it recalls the intellectuality and perfect imperturbility of her great teacher, Louis Maas, who often used to perform the most difficult works with a display of gleichgültigkeit which he was far from feeling. In the Tschaikowski concerto the piano is more than once pitted against the whole orchestra, and it is not every pianist who could have achieved clearness under the circumstances as Mme. Hopekirk did. She is more than a mere piano player, she is a musician, and the development of the first movement became very lucid because of the manner of its performance, while the brilliancy of the finale proved that all the fortissimo work had not used up the reserve force of the pianist. It was perhaps just this sense of a reservation of power, a feeling of surety pervading the entire performance, which made the chief charm of the artist's work, and at the close a triple recall and floral tributes showed that the public as well as personal friends were delighted.

Volkmann's D minor symphony ended the programme. It received probably the finest reading it has ever had here, and the climaxes were splendidly worked up. Volkmann shows a trace of the influence of Schumann in the style and contrasts of his themes, but is more exact in form than the latter. His development of figures is ingenious enough, but carried to too great a length. The omnipresent figure of the first movement, for example, is not quite like a seed growing into fruit, as is the case with so many of Beethoven's figures, but merely a succession of skilful reiterations at the end of which one may ask—cui bono? But after all it was not given to many to compass a thorough "first movement" and in the remaining three the composer makes ample amends. Among the many points of fine execution in the performance may be mentioned the horn playing of the second movement (how expressive that stationary horn tone is against the shifting harmonies!) the clarinet work, the quaint eighth-symphony-like figures on bassoon in the last movement and the ensemble of the entire finale. Next week comes an innovation, two full-fledged symphonies of the modern school on a single programme! Mr. Nikisch must be in an educational mood.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Journal.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 26, 1891.

The Symphony Concert.

The leading features of the Symphony concert Saturday evening were the reappearance of Mme. Helen Hopekirk and the production of a symphonic poem by Arthur Foote—the latest work of Mr. Foote, and its first performance in Boston. The title of the poem was "Francesca da Rimini," and the superb interpretation, added to the scholarly reputation which Mr. Foote holds in the minds of the musical people of Boston, made this number one of the most interesting of the concert. It was greeted with hearty applause, and the entire concert was one of the best Mr. Nikisch has given this season. Of course, Mme. Hopekirk was gladly welcomed, and gave Tschaikowsky's Concerto No. 1 in B flat, for piano and orchestra, and the brilliancy of the closing movement found an apt interpreter in the soloist. The concert closed with a fairly good rendition of Volkmann's Symphony No. 1 in D minor. At the next concert there is to be no soloist, and there will be given Schumann's Symphony in B flat No. 1 and Brahms's No. 1 in C minor.

Boston Post
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 26, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the thirteenth Symphony concert, given at Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Symphonic Prologue, "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 24. (First time.) ..... A. Foote
Concerto for piano in B flat minor, No 1. .... Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 1, in D minor ..... Volkmann

Mr. Foote calls his new work a "Symphonic Prologue." It is practically a concert overture. The explanatory sketch prepared by him for the programme book is simply an exposition of its musical contents. The second theme is said to be the theme of the two lovers; and with this exception the sketch is free from any attempt to give the hearer in gaudy rhetoric the "meaning" of the measures. It is as modest and straightforward as the composer.

He who passes judgment upon a serious, unpublished musical work after hearing it once can give only impressions which future hearings may change. The reviewer of a book, the critic of paintings can take his time; he can read or look at his leisure. The singer, as well as the performer upon an instrument, writes by his own performance the verdict which must be pronounced. But the ear, when it is not aided by the eye and previous study of the composition, is a treacherous organ. It is easily tickled, it is easily shocked—for the moment. Unless the impression made upon it is strong, the music is at once forgotten and the labor of the composer is vain. So here impressions, and only first impressions, must take the place of a deliberate judgment. Mr. Foote's, overture, then, seems to be a thoughtfully considered, coherent work. It is clear without being common, it holds the attention without recourse to the tricks of makers of sensational programme music. Its opening is impressive; and certain passages, such as the recitative, are very effective. Mr. Foote does not ape those who have gone before him, though at the close there is a curious and undoubtedly unpremeditated reminiscence of a few well-known measures of Gounod's "Faust." The instrumentation is free from the reproach of thinness or crudity, although it suffers from a want of sufficient contrasts, and the treatment of the wood-wind is somewhat monotonous. It is an excellent piece of work, and it shows the steady growth of Mr. Foote's art. When one examines the musical ideas themselves instead of the marshalling and expression of them there is not so much to be said in praise. It should not be forgotten that the text is a tale of Italian passion and revenge. The mere recital of the woes of Francesca and Paolo so moved Dante that, for pity, he swooned away as if he had been dying, "and fell, even as a dead body falls." If the composer's music does not glow with the fire which consumed Madonna Francesca, if it does not echo the hatred of the rude cripple Gianciotto, it should be remembered that Ambroise Thomas failed in this, and how Tschaikowsy fared in his orchestral fantasia is to us unknown. Mr. Foote directed the performance of his work, and before and after it he was loudly applauded.

Mrs. Hopekirk, who played the pianoforte part of the Tschaikowsky concerto, has a remarkable individuality. She seems to belong to no particular school of playing; she recalls no other distinguished pianist. She escapes classification. While her mechanism is admirable (take for example her superb octaves), certain of her methods (as the stiffness shown in the striking of chords) would be open to criticism, did she not in spite of these methods gain the desired results. She overcame the great technical difficulties with ease, and she gave a broadly conceived and carefully finished performance. If there was an apparent absence of sympathy, if there was not a direct appeal to the emotions, possibly the concerto itself was the cause. It compels admiration; it astounds; but with the exception of the slow movement where the real beauty lies in the orchestra, and not in the pianoforte, the music is aimed at the head instead of the midriff. And yet it is most worthy of respect. How nobly inspired is the melody at the beginning of the first movement; how charming is the episode in the second movement; how full of character are even the shortest themes; how fiery the peroration! In its time-mocking length, its endless repetitions, its fantastic digressions, its mixture of realism and imagination, it is like unto a novel of Dostoievsky. Mrs. Hopekirk was most enthusiastically applauded at the end of her severe task.

The choice of the Volkmann Symphony, in connection with the other numbers of the programme, was unfortunate. It would have been well to have closed with music such as is praised by Athenæus; music "which softens moroseness of temper, dissipates sadness, and produces affability and a sort of gentleman-like joy." This symphony of Volkmann, with the exception of the finale, is a noble work. The opening with its "music of preparation and of awakening suspense;" the beautiful andante, so pure in thought and chaste in expression; the delicious trio, which is such a vivid contrast to the crabbed scherzo;—here is absolute music, far removed from the vaporing and insanity of the ultra-modern school. Its effect would, however, have been doubled, had it appeared upon another programme. The symphony and the other numbers were finely played by the orchestra.

The programme of the concert to be given Saturday evening, Jan. 31, includes Schumann's Symphony in B-flat; Handel's Concerto Grosso in D, for string orchestra (first time), and Brahms' Symphony in C minor.

PHILIP HALE.

SUNDAY HERALD.
BOSTON, JANUARY 25, 1891.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mme. Helen Hopekirk.

Few of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra have given more general satisfaction than that of last evening, and Director Nikisch contributed his full share to the enjoyable results attending the performance of the programme.

Two events of unusual interest were included in the evening's happenings, the reappearance of Mme. Helen Hopekirk, the pianist, after an extended absence from America, and the first hearing of Mr. Arthur Foote's "symphonic prologue," styled "Francesca da Rimini," being op. 24 of this composer's writings.

Mme. Hopekirk, who made her popularity assured in this city in her appearance in recital programmes just before leaving America, had a hearty greeting upon making her entrance to play the Tschaikowsky concerto for piano and orchestra No. 1, in B flat minor, op. 23, and she quickly made it evident in her playing that her absence has been well improved. The grand, broad, masterly fashion in which she read the opening allegro commanded instant attention, and from the beginning to the end of the concerto she held her audience spellbound by her splendid playing. The delightfully graceful andanteno became a tone poem in very truth under the magical touch of her fingers, and the spirited final movement displayed her technical skill with admirable success. All who recall the earlier triumphs of this artist in her Boston concerts need not be told of the intellectual qualities displayed at all times in her piano work, and these evidences of her rare individuality were as distinct as ever in her performance of last evening. No artist could desire a more spontaneous recognition of her abilities than that shown at the conclusion of Mme. Hopekirk's playing, and the ovation she gained was most honestly won.

Boston and America will always be honored throughout the world of music by the work of Mr. Arthur Foote. He has already made his mark in the restricted field to which he has limited his ambition, but such a genius will yet gain a world wide hearing, and in this hearing the cause of the American musician will be the gainer. Mr. Foote, in his musical development has shown the ability of adhering to all that is good in the old schools, and adding all that is good in the new. In other words, he evidently holds that music without ideas is valueless, but that a good idea cannot be too carefully or artistically treated and worked out. His new "Symphonic" prologue is full of ideas, good melodious ideas, and with these for a foundation, he has made a composition that will stand the severest criticism. It is most enjoyable throughout, and shows this native born musician at his very best. In intrusting the performance of the new work to its composer's direction, Mr. Nikisch did wisely, for the orchestra was most skilfully handled by Mr. Foote, and the prologue gained by the intelligent fashion in which he made its musical meaning clear to all who listened. It was gratifying to notice the strict attention given the work by the audience, and Mr. Foote had good cause for pride in the unanimous approval of his efforts as composer and conductor as he stepped from the desk at the conclusion of the prologue.

The Volkmann symphony No. 1 in D minor brought the concert to an end and Mr. Nikisch was even more than usually happy in his reading of this most interesting work.

Next Saturday evening there will be no soloist, the programme consisting of Schumann's symphony in B flat No. 1; Handel's concerto grosso, in D, for string orchestra, (first time), and Brahms' symphony in C minor No. 1.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 25.
HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

The Symphony Concerts.

Last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, opened with Mr. Arthur Foote's most recent composition, a Symphonic Prologue, "Francesca da Rimini," op. 24. It is the most ambitious, and on the whole, the most striking work for orchestra that Mr Foote has as yet written. It is conceived on a large scale, almost that of the first movement of a symphony, and is strongly dramatic in character, is impassioned, and the vigor with which it begins is never relaxed until the closing bars. It is richly instrumented, and with an admirable feeling for the quality and offices of the different instruments. Its ideas are perhaps, not as impressive as is their treatment, and do not always come out with all desirable clearness, owing possibly to the heaviness of the orchestration which is almost persistent. We felt a lack of contrasts in the instrumental effects, an absence of that varied tone coloring which is essential in order to avoid monotony. But the fire and force of the work are unmistakable, and the spirit in which it is conceived and treated carries the listener along with it, and keeps the attention constantly stimulated. It differs in style from anything that we have hitherto had from its composer, and, taken altogether, marks a stride forward in his art. The work was finely played, Mr. Foote conducting with excellent skill, and at its close the audience broke into a well-merited outburst of applause, recalling the composer with much enthusiasm. Volkmann's fine symphony No. 1, in D minor, ended the concert. The work is something of a compromise between the old school and the new, and has many beautiful and masterly moments; and it may safely be ranked high among contemporary symphonies. The opening movement is full of strength and dignity, though a certain stiffness is imparted to it by a too frequent obstinate adherence to its somewhat rigid opening figure. The slow movement is full of warmth and feeling, and is delightful in the grace and tenderness of its instrumentation. The scherzo has a finely marked rhythmic swing, and its trio is exquisitely beautiful. The finale shares the fate destined to so many finales by modern composers. Its interest is impaired by a tiresome monotony, though all is brought to an end brilliantly and stirringly enough. The work was sympathetically read, and was played in the best and most finished style of the orchestra. The soloist was Mad. Helen Hopekirk, who played Tschaikowsky's concerto for piano, in B-flat minor, No. 1, op. 23. This artist, whose method has undergone a great change since she was last heard here, acquitted herself with admirable technical skill. Her touch is sure and clear, and she plays with a vigor and passion strikingly masculine in character. The exacting work presented no difficulties of which she was not easily the master. She read the work with keen artistic intelligence, and her performances were marked by refined taste and intellectuality. The only fault in the effort was a certain deliberation which imparted the effect of coldness to it. The artist was cordially received and at the end of the concerto was rewarded with a storm of applause, some handsome tributes in the shape of flowers, and three recalls. The programme for the next concert is: Schumann's Symphony, No. 1; Brahms's Symphony, No. 1, and a Concerto Grosso, for strings, by Handel. There will be no soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe
TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.
SUNDAY, JAN. 25, 1891.

Thirteenth Symphony Concert.

Mme. Helen Hopekirk was the soloist at last week's Symphony concert, and heartily welcome was the reappearance in Boston of this eminent pianist. The delightful recitals she gave here a few years ago are remembered with exceeding pleasure so it was not surprising that she should receive an unusually demonstrative meeting from Friday afternoon's rehearsal audience. Tschaikowsky's concerto for piano, No. 1, in B flat, has been performed at these concerts several times in seasons past, and as played by Mme. Hopekirk was gladly heard again. This scholarly composition, especially its brilliant closing movement, was superbly interpreted, and thoroughly deserved the enthusiastic applause which followed. Mme. Hopekirk was three times recalled. The place of honor on the programme was given Mr. Arthur Foote's latest work, a symphonic prologue entitled "Francesca da Rimini." The local popularity of Mr. Foote naturally awakened a great deal of interest in the production of this writing, and very cordial was the welcome given him when he appeared to direct the orchestra. It can certainly be said that the prologue made a most favorable impression. It is the most pretentious work that he has yet given to the public, and will no doubt rank among his best successes. Volkmann's symphony No. 1 in D minor was the final, and not particularly welcome, offering. It is difficult to understand why Mr. Nikisch should choose to give another performance of this symphony when so many notable works have yet to be heard. There will be no soloist at the next concert. The programme will include two symphonies, Schumann's in B flat, No. 1, and Brahms' in C minor, No. 1. The novelty will be Handel's concerto grosso in D for string orchestra.

——Mrs. Nikisch, fresh from her New York, Philadelphia and Washington triumphs, was the centre of attraction at the very agreeable reception given for her and her distinguished husband by Mr. and Mrs. Francis W. Breed, at their house on Ocean st., Lynn, Thursday evening. The parlors were fragrant with a quantity of beautiful flowers arranged by Doyle, and the supper table was a mass of bloom. Among the 200 guests assembled were ex-Gov. Ames and family, Mr. William Lloyd Garrison, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Mack, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Ames, Mr. and Mrs. F. P. Vinton, Mr. and Mrs. P. C. Chase, who went out from Boston, and Mr. and Mrs. J. H. White of Brookline and a large number of the society people of Lynn.

Clipping from.....

.....

Date.....

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Nikisch and His Orchestra Greeted by a Great Audience.

The fourth concert of the series being given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry hall occurred last night, and the big hall was filled with an audience that improved every opportunity to testify its enjoyment and appreciation of the admirable program presented to them, which was as follows:

Mendelssohn—Overture, Scherzo, Natturno and Wedding March, from "Midsummer Night's dream."
Donizetti.....Cavatina, "Don Pasquale"
Miss Alice Wentworth.
Cowen—Adagio and Scherzo, from Scandinavian Symphony No. 3, in C. minor.
Servais.....Fantasie Characterisque
Mr. Anton Hekking.
Songs, with piano:
(a) Reubenstein.....Les Yeux d'Azur
(b) Massenet.....Le Sais-tu.
(c) Vidal.....Printemps Nouveau.
Miss Wentworth.
Liszt.....Symphonic poem, "Tasso."

Though the symphony orchestra played to its largest and most enthusiastic audience, it did not give its best program nor its best soloists. Miss Wentworth has a sweet, flexible and well-trained voice; the voice well adapted to ballad singing, and to a certain range of operatic selections. It lacks power and compass. Time may improve it, but at present it can hardly be said that Miss Wentworth is an artist fitted in all respects to complement vocally the magnificent work of the orchestra. Mr. Hekking's selection for the 'cello was a brilliant piece of execution, and showed that the performer is a thorough master of his instrument.

Of the orchestral numbers the first was incomparably the best, both as a musical work and as a work calculated to appeal to the popular taste. It was wonderfully well performed. The Scandinavian symphony is uneven in merit, considered from any point of view. It has excellent and most enjoyable passages, and it has passages that provoke wonder and almost positive dislike. The Liszt symphonic poem is not Liszt at his best, nor music at its best. It is torn roughly in places, and has a climax which, coming as it did last night the last on the program, tends to reconcile the auditor to a speedy clearance of the hall and a tramp home through slush and over places especially planned for the downfall of the wicked.

[84]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 26, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The thirteenth concert of the season at the Music Hall Saturday evening, Jan. 24, had the usual large attendance and offered the following programme:

Arthur Foote—Op. 24. Symphonic Prologue, "Francesca da Rimini." (First time).
Tschaikowsky—Op. 23. Concerto for Piano, in B-flat minor, No. 1.
Volkmann—Symphony No. 1, in D minor.
Pianist, Mme. Helen Hopekirk.

Mr. Arthur Foote has made a notable stride in advance of all his earlier orchestral composition, Taking for poetic theme the immortal episode of Dante, the pathetic story of Francesca and the sad fate of the lovers, blown about by winds forever, and finding no grief so great as the recollection of the happy time in the midst of present everlasting misery, the musician could only deal with it in sober seriousness. In sombre colors, in tones of deep feeling, in fleeting, vivid contrasts of misery and bliss, of supreme felicity and peace recalled in helpless restlessness and hopelessness of passion, and laid out broadly on a large scale, in one rich blended and yet strongly contrasted picture, he has conceived it. And the work leaves a sense of unity and depth and power. We cannot think that such a technical exposition or enumeration of points, as the composer amiably consented to furnish for the "Bulletin," like a dry, unintelligible table of contents, helped the listener or the reader one bit, or made him any more at home in the music than he would have been through his own direct, unaided hearing. The music is the thing; and the way to get it is to listen.

Mr. Foote's work, allowing for a few slight occasional obscurities, is on the whole clear and well put together. It has good themes and motives, and episodes of real charm, like the trumpet passage near the middle. So, too, the flute solo; and, before that, the second theme, which one could easily associate with the two lovers. Strong warning sentences, recitative-like, from trombones and basses arouse at times a tragical presentiment—foreshadowings of fate. And the catastrophe arrives all too soon. But we think Mr. Foote must be credited with confining his attention mainly to the inner history of those lovers, of bringing music to the illustration of the soulful and poetic part of it, rather than of the literal penalty, the grim Dantesque Inferno vision of the pair whirled round in endless circle by the wind. The instrumentation of the Prologue is very clever, picturesque, expressive, with fine episodes and contrasts of tone-color. Mr. Foote conducted the performance of his own work with self-possession and with tact. It was received with warm applause.

Mme. Hopekirk showed herself a pianist thoroughly equipped, at all events for the rendering of a concerto so abounding in bravura and so bold and difficult as this earlier one by the Russian with the long name. That the composition in itself, considered as music, as a work alive with musical ideas, was ever worth all the executive art and laborious practice which Von Bülow and others have expended on it, always seemed very problematical to us. Mme. Madeline Schiller played once in the last season, the swan song as it were, of the Old Harvard Symphony Concerts—his second concerto, op. 44, in G; nor did that leave any better impression on our mind. This which Mme. Hopekirk played is sonorous, broadly laid out, brilliant, opening with the relative major of its key, D-flat major. It consists very largely, in the first movement (Allegro con spirito after a very moderate allegro, an introduction in D-flat), of great chords vigorously planted, now at the top, now at the bottom of the keyboard, of rapid bold arpeggios, and feats of bravura sprinkled in wherever the composer seems to be at a loss what to do next in his ideal musical development. The movement is very long, very wild, audacious, very Russian. It is carrying the gates of heaven by storm. That there are bits of delicacy we will not deny. But it does not take so very long to reach the point where the hearer is satisfied that he has heard all the bravura, all the virtuosity, that he will ever care to hear again. What he wants is the abiding substance, the pure gold of musical, ideal, pregnant thought, the thing in which the inspiration lies. How differently you feel after a concerto, as much so as after a symphony, of Beethoven!

In the short middle movement, to be sure, Andante semplice in D flat, there is a delicate and charming melody which somehow sounded to our ears somewhat strangely harmonized among the flutes and high reed instruments. The fiery Finale (Allegro con fuoco) had more of the Russian folksong flavor than any other part. It storms itself through relentlessly with a wild Cossack sort of vigor, growing monotonous before it is done. Mme. Hopekirk's execution was singularly clear, evenly sustained, with a strength and self-possession almost masculine. It may be an idiosyncracy of our own, a lack of some essential gift or quality, pertaining to our own subjective individuality; but we have often found that in a year or two after hearing a composition of this kind, played by however great a virtuoso, we forget whether we ever heard it at all before, and it is a considerable time before we begin to recognize it when it presents itself again. It is like an experience which many, if not all, have at times, no doubt, with certain persons whom they never can remember. Here is a problem for our prying psychical professors! We dare say, if this Russian concerto should again turn up in our Music Hall a few years hence, we should again have lost all memory or impression of it, although we heard Von Bülow play it, and were aware of the little sensational history it gave rise to here in Boston when the great pianist suddenly changed his orchestral conductor. But we will risk the chance of any such experience or lapse of memory with Beethoven. He plants something in the mind, in the imagination, in the heart, which lives and germinates, enriching one's whole inner world.

The symphony in D minor, the earliest of the two by Volkmann, has been heard here before. Volkmann studied in Leipzig, where he was very much under the influence of Schumann. The [illegible] of his life were spent in Pesth, where he acquired something of a Hungarian local [illegible]. The first movement, [illegible] symphony, reminded us all how much [illegible] and less poetic! And how much less beautiful! Beethoven follows the long opening note with a motive in short notes full of beauty and of meaning. Volkmann follows it with a phrase in hard, repulsive tones, recurring again and again, cold and startling, not enlisting sympathy, although the second subject has more warmth, but the whole protracted till the vital fire is spent. Still a certain Cherubini-like power and style have been fairly ascribed to it. There is no little beauty in the Andante. The Scherzo has the overbalance of weight in the Trio, which is the most serious and important part, having the most to say. The finale, and indeed the whole symphony, was not lacking in ideal interest, although the reviving spell of genius failed us after the elaborate bravura of the Russian Concerto. Of the orchestral performance in all three works it is impossible to complain.

The next concert, Jan. 31, offers two large symphonies, Schumann's in B flat to begin with, and Brahms's in C minor at the end. A Concerto Grosso for string orchestra in D, by Handel, forms a novelty in the middle.

J. S. D.

Schritte gethan: John W. [illegible], Verwaltungs-Bericht bestätigt; Wilhelmine Witte und W. A. Rodenmayer, Vormundschafts-Berichte sanctionirt; Wilhelmine Spies und Emma Gibson, Executore eingesetzt. [illegible]-Bericht.—Richter Devlin—Verhandlung über Susanne Warfield's Testament; unbeendet, wird Montag fortgesetzt.

Das Boston Sinfonie-Orchester gab gestern Abend im Concordia Opernhause sein zweites großes Conzert in Baltimore. Der Ruf des Orchesters, der durch die ganzen Ver. Staaten verbreitet ist, und auch der Erfolg des ersten Conzertes verursachten, daß der Besuch auch gestern Abend wieder ein recht zahlreicher war. Von Orchesterwerken hatte Herr Arthur Nikisch für diesen Abend die Geldmark'sche Ouvertüre „Prometheus", den „Danse Macabre" von Saint-Saens und Mendelssohn's Ouvertüre Scherzo Notturno und Hochzeitsmarsch aus „Sommernachts-Traum" gewählt und man muß gestehen, daß diese Werke wohl nie besser zu Gehör gebracht worden sind. Sehr schön und vollendet wurde das Raff'sche Lied „Traumkönig und sein Lieb'" wiedergegeben und auch Cowen's Adagio und Scherzo, aus der skandinavischen Sinfonie Nr. 3 in C-Moll, fand wohlverdienten Beifall. Frau Nikisch sang in „Traumkönig und sein Lieb'" das Solo und dann drei Lieder mit Pianobegleitung. Wir lernten in der Dame eine ganz vorzüglich geschulte Sängerin kennen, deren vollkommene Kunst des Gesangs d. h. Beherrschung der Stimme das Publikum veranlaßte, eine leichte Härte im Klange derselben zu übersehen. Die drei Lieder „Am Rhein", von Liszt, „Am Ufer der Manzanares", von Jensen, und „Die Quelle", von Goldmark, riefen großen Beifall hervor. Das Conzert kann als ein Erfolg im wahren Sinne des Wortes bezeichnet werden.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, JAN. 27.

Kneisel Quartet in Union Hall.

The Kneisel quartet, assisted by Mr. Ernst Perabo, pianist, gave a very fine recital in Union Hall last night. The opening number was a quartet in D minor by Mozart. The playing was as artistic and finished as always. Mr. Perabo and Anton Hekking next performed the Rubinstein sonata in D major. Mr. Perabo's interpretation of the piano part was very fine in every particular. Especially brilliant was his playing of the last movement. Mr. Hekking delighted the audience by his masterly command of the cello. The concert closed with a trio in B flat by Schubert, rendered by Mr. Kneisel, violinist, Mr. Perabo, pianist, and Mr. Hekking, celloist. The next concert by the Kneisel quartet will be given on Monday evening, Feb. 16.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 27, 1891.

The usual success attended the concert by the Kneisel quartet at Union Hall last evening, when the programme was made up of the quartet in D minor, Mozart; sonata for pianoforte and 'cello, Rubinstein, and the trio in B flat for pianoforte, violin and 'cello, Schubert. Mr Ernst Perabo was the assisting pianist, and more than made good all the pleasant anticipations attendant upon the announcement of his name as the pianist of the evening. Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Hekking played with all their usual artistic effect in the trio, and Mr. Hekking was heard with especial pleasure in the Rubinstein sonata.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 27, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert of Last Evening.

One must dip the pen forever in rose-water or honey in speaking of the Kneisel Quartette, for there is never any fault to find, and although the continuous perfection may become dull to the reader, it never can be so to the auditor. Yet I may confess that the Mozart Quartette in D minor did not move me as it evidently did the audience. It seemed too continuously calm and tranquil; it was always genial, never spirited or jovial. Nevertheless the andante was the acme of shading, clearness and refinement, and in the trio of the minuet Mr. Kneisel's beautiful bowing against the subdued pizzicato of the lower instruments was very artistic.

The heroes of the concert however were Messrs. Hekking and Perabo who performed Rubinstein's sonata for cello and piano in an inspired manner. The work has a delicacy and sweetness, as well as a symmetry unusual with Rubinstein, and the interest is sustained to the very last note in a way which one very seldom finds in modern works and least of all in the compositions of this most unequal of modern composers. Mr. Perabo showed an attention to detail, a devotion to ensemble effects, that cannot be overpraised. Mr. Hekking was at his very best, giving a beautifully smooth and sympathetic tone at almost all times, and his breadth and power, especially in passages on the C string was surprising. Occasionally one could have wished him a Stradivarius instrument such as Mr. Giese owns, but even without this the effect was in the highest degree masterly; indeed, I cannot recall ever having heard him play so magnificently. The allegretto, with its folk-song style and mysterious counter theme was charming, but the grandiose ending swept everything before it, and here Mr. Perabo's octave work was of the fieriest character, and the broad treatment of the theme by the two instruments in unison was a noble climax that won the artists two very hearty recalls.

Schubert's piano trio op. 99 ended the programme. It has became a trite remark to say that Schubert is lengthy in his sonata forms. This was felt only in the first movement, and even here the song-like first theme made amends and the reiteration was not tiresome. Mr. Perabo was a little too modest here, and subjugated his work to the strings in an unnecessary degree, but the delicate way in which he shaded the scales was artistic, and the ensemble was wonderful, even to the end of the finale, where the cadences seemed to take almost a new meaning because of the nuances. This finale is the gem of it all, and there is in it just enough of Hungarian spice to remind of Schubert's stay with the Esterhazys and the influence it exerted on his subsequent music, particularly in the instrumental forms. Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Hekking and Mr. Perabo each deserve thanks for the undiluted pleasure this finely played movement afforded, and a recall at the end of the programme proved that the public were aware of the fact that the usual high standard of the Kneisel concerts had been attained.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Daily Traveller

THURSDAY JANUARY 29, 1891.

Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet played at their fourth concert: Quartet, D minor, Mozart; sonata for piano and 'cello, in D, Rubenstein; piano trio in B flat, Schubert. Mr. Ernst Perabo was the pianist. All this is familiar music; the names are those we love among chamber composers. It was a programme eminently well-fitted to the peculiarly subjective, refined style of the Kneisel players, with whom Mr. Perabo merges in perfect sympathy. In fact, if there was a star in this serene firmament, it was Mr. Perabo, who never played more beautifully, with more consistent regard for his composer, or with a better estimate of the place in the ensemble the piano should hold. In the sonata the added breadth of tone and surer style which Mr. Hekking has lately acquired had a fine exposition. It goes without saying how beautiful was the Schubert trio in the hands of Mr. Perabo, Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Hekking. The real Kneisel audience will remember the fourth concert before all others thus far given this season.

ON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 31, 1891

The program of the thirteenth symphony concert given last Saturday evening was made up of a new overture or "Symphonic Prologue" by Mr. Foote entitled "Francesca da Rimini"; Volkmann's Symphony No. 1 in D minor, and Tschaikowsky's concerto for pianoforte in B flat minor, No. 1, the pianoforte part of which was played by Mrs. Helen Hopekirk. Mr. Foote's prologue is upon the whole a very well written work, firmly knit, without padding, and with effective episodes. He has evidently considered carefully the instrumentation, and the result is to his credit, though there might be here and there an improvement, particularly in the treatment of the wood-wind. The performance of the prologue was directed by Mr. Foote, and he was loudly applauded.

* * * * *

The fourth Kneisel concert which took place Monday evening at Union Hall was chiefly remarkable for the display of the rare qualities of the true ensemble player by Mr. Perabo, who was the pianist in the Schubert Trio in B flat. Mr. Hekking gave a noble performance of the 'cello part of the Rubinstein sonata for 'cello and pianoforte. Mozart's Quartet in D minor was the opening number of the concert.

* * * * *

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 27 1891

MUSIC.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The fourth concert of the Kneisel Quartette series was given last evening at Union Hall. The Quartette was assisted by Mrs. Ernst Perabo. The programme was as follows:

Quartette in D minor.....Mozart
Sonata for piano and violoncello in D. major, op. 18.....Rubinstein
Trio for piano, violin and violoncello, in B flat, op. 99.....Schubert

This was a delightful concert from the beginning to the end. The programme was one of great interest, and the sonata of Rubinstein (played for the first time at these concerts) was worthy of its place between the beautiful compositions of Mozart and Schubert.

And not only was the concert simply two hours of sensuous enjoyment, for the selections would probably have displeased the grave Pythagoras who gave it as his opinion that music should not be judged by the ear but by the intellect; it was here the mission of Mr. Perabo to show that the pianoforte is not necessarily the sworn foe of the strings.

Too often in chamber music, when the pianist is invited as a guest, he insists upon taking the chair of the host, and he talks arrogantly and incessantly. This comes from either a desire of exhibiting his prowess, or from an uncontrolled enthusiasm. But when a trio, such as the great work of Schubert, is written, the composer intends that the three instruments should share alike in labor and applause. Again, many pianists of excellent parts, either from excitement or from a natural lack of rhythmic feeling, when they are associated with players upon stringed instruments, are never able to agree with their fellows; and to the hearer the effect of the performance is as through two incongruous elements strove to unite and from their very nature failed.

Mr. Perabo gave last evening, particularly in the trio, a brilliant example of ensemble playing. He accompanied when it was his duty; he bore the brunt when the composer called upon him. While every detail was most carefully regarded, while every point was made, the result was not an admirable piece of mosaic; but the performance was most spontaneous, and it was quickened throughout by a rare poetic spirit. The perfection of his technique, seen, for example, in the rondo of the trio, was modestly displayed, and the emotional quality of his song was free from affection, for it came from his heart. Nor do Messrs. Kneisel and Hekking deserve one whit less praise. It was a most musical performance of a most musical composition. Schubert himself would have sat very still and listened.

Mr. Hekking played the cello part of the Rubinstein sonata with breadth and feeling and passion. The work itself is singularly self-contained and firmly knit for Rubinsteiu, and it is charming in invention and treatment.

The playing of the MozartQuartette left little to be desired, although there was not sufficient contrast between the sotto voce and the forte which follows immediately.

The next concert will be given Feb. 16.

PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third concert of its series at the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening. A pleasant feature of the concert will be the appearance of Mrs. Nikisch, who is to be the soloist of the evening. Mrs. Nikisch began her musical career on the operatic stage in 1881, at Cologne, where she sang for two seasons. In 1883 she accepted an engagement at the Stadt Theatre in Leipzic for a year, and a later engagement at the Hof Theatre in Cassel, also of a year, terminated with her marriage. Since her retirement from the operatic stage she has been very successful in concert work, singing much in Leipzic, Stuttgart, Heidelberg and other large cities. Her voice is a mezzo-soprano of beautiful quality, which she uses with great skill, and her stage presence is most attractive. She will be heard on Wednesday in Raff's song with orchestra, "The Dream King," and a group of songs with piano accompaniment by Mr. Nikisch. The orchestral numbers of the programme are the overture "Prometheus," by Goldmark, which has not been heard here before; the Schubert unfinished symphony and the overture, scherzo, notturno, and wedding march from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" of Mendelssohn.

MRS. NIKISCH.

---

[85]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 26, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The thirteenth concert of the season at the Music Hall Saturday evening, Jan. 24, had the usual large attendance and offered the following programme:

Arthur Foote—Op. 24. Symphonic Prologue, "Francesca da Rimini." (First time).
Tschaikowsky—Op. 23. Concerto for Piano, in B-flat minor, No. 1.
Volkmann—Symphony No. 1, in D minor.
Pianist, Mme. Helen Hopekirk.

Mr. Arthur Foote has made a notable stride in advance of all his earlier orchestral composition. Taking for poetic theme the immortal episode of Dante, the pathetic story of Francesca and the sad fate of the lovers, blown about by winds forever, and finding no grief so great as the recollection of the happy time in the midst of present everlasting misery, the musician could only deal with it in sober seriousness. In sombre colors, in tones of deep feeling, in fleeting, vivid contrasts of misery and bliss, of supreme felicity and peace recalled in helpless restlessness and hopelessness of passion, and laid out broadly on a large scale, in one rich blended and yet strongly contrasted picture, he has conceived it. And the work leaves a sense of unity and depth and power. We cannot think that such a technical exposition or enumeration of points, as the composer amiably consented to furnish for the "Bulletin," like a dry, unintelligible table of contents, helped the listener or the reader one bit, or made him any more at home in the music than he would have been through his own direct, unaided hearing. The music is the thing; and the way to get it is to listen.

Mr. Foote's work, allowing for a few slight occasional obscurities, is on the whole clear and well put together. It has good themes and motives, and episodes of real charm, like the trumpet passage near the middle. So, too, the flute solo; and, before that, the second theme, which one could easily associate with the two lovers. Strong warning sentences, recitative-like, from trombones and basses arouse at times a tragical presentiment—foreshadowings of fate. And the catastrophe arrives all too soon. But we think Mr. Foote must be credited with confining his attention mainly to the inner history of those lovers, of bringing music to the illustration of the soulful and poetic part of it, rather than of the literal penalty, the grim Dantesque Inferno vision of the pair whirled round in endless circle by the wind. The instrumentation of the Prologue is very clever, picturesque, expressive, with fine episodes and contrasts of tone-color. Mr. Foote conducted the performance of his own work with self-possession and with tact. It was received with warm applause.

Mme. Hopekirk showed herself a pianist thoroughly equipped, at all events for the rendering of a concerto so abounding in bravura and so bold and difficult as this earlier one by the Russian with the long name. That the composition in itself, considered as music, as a work alive with musical ideas, was ever worth all the executive art and laborious practice which Von Bülow and others have expended on it, always seemed very problematical to us. Mme. Madeline Schiller played once in the last season, the swan song as it were, of the Old Harvard Symphony Concerts—his second concerto, op. 44, in G; nor did that leave any better impression on our mind. This which Mme. Hopekirk played is sonorous, broadly laid out, brilliant, opening with the relative major of its key, D-flat major. It consists very largely, in the first movement (Allegro con spirito after a very moderate allegro, an introduction in D-flat), of great chords vigorously planted, now at the top, now at the bottom of the keyboard, of rapid bold arpeggios, and feats of bravura sprinkled in wherever the composer seems to be at a loss what to do next in his ideal musical development. The movement is very long, very wild, audacious, very Russian. It is carrying the gates of heaven by storm. That there are bits of delicacy we will not deny. But it does not take so very long to reach the point where the hearer is satisfied that he has heard all the bravura, all the virtuosity, that he will ever care to hear again. What he wants is the abiding substance, the pure gold of musical, ideal, pregnant thought, the thing in which the inspiration lies. How differently you feel after a concerto, as much so as after a symphony, of Beethoven!

In the short middle movement, to be sure, Andante semplice in D flat, there is a delicate and charming melody which somehow sounded to our ears somewhat strangely harmonized among the flutes and high reed instruments. The fiery Finale (Allegro con fuoco) had more of the Russian folksong flavor than any other part. It storms itself through relentlessly with a wild Cossack sort of vigor, growing monotonous before it is done. Mme. Hopekirk's execution was singularly clear, evenly sustained, with a strength and self-possession almost masculine. It may be an idiosyncracy of our own, a lack of some essential gift or quality, pertaining to our own subjective individuality; but we have often found that in a year or two after hearing a composition of this kind, played by however great a virtuoso, we forget whether we ever heard it at all before, and it is a considerable time before we begin to recognize it when it presents itself again. It is like an experience which many, if not all, have at times, no doubt, with certain persons whom they never can remember. Here is a problem for our prying psychical professors! We dare say, if this Russian concerto should again turn up in our Music Hall a few years hence, we should again have lost all memory or impression of it, although we heard Von Bülow play it, and were aware of the little sensational history it gave rise to here in Boston, when the great pianist suddenly changed his orchestral conductor. But we will risk the chance of any such experience or lapse of memory with Beethoven. He plants something in the mind, in the imagination, in the heart, which lives and germinates, enriching one's whole inner world.

The symphony in D minor, the earliest of the two by Volkmann, has been heard here before. Volkmann studied in Leipzig, where he was very much under the influence of Schumann. The later years of his life were spent in Pesth, where he contracted something of a Hungarian local color in his compositions. The first movement, [illegible] symphony, reminded us all [illegible] Overture, but now inferior, how much less concise and less poetic! And how much less beautiful! Beethoven follows the long opening note with a motive in short notes full of beauty and of meaning. Volkmann follows it with a phrase in hard, repulsive tones, recurring again and again, cold and startling, not enlisting sympathy, although the second subject has more warmth, but the whole protracted till the vital fire is spent. Still a certain Cherubini-like power and style have been fairly ascribed to it. There is no little beauty in the Andante. The Scherzo has the overbalance of weight in the Trio, which is the most serious and important part, having the most to say. The finale, and indeed the whole symphony, was not lacking in ideal interest, although the reviving spell of genius failed us after the elaborate bravura of the Russian Concerto. Of the orchestral performance in all three works it is impossible to complain.

The next concert, Jan. 31, offers two large symphonies, Schumann's in B flat to begin with, and Brahms's in C minor at the end. A Concerto Grosso for string orchestra in D, by Handel, forms a novelty in the middle.

J. S. D.

Schritte gethan: John [illegible] Verwaltungs-Bericht bestätigt; Wilhelmine Witte und W. A. Rosenmayer, Vormundschafts-Berichte sanktionirt; Susanne Spies und Emma Gibson, Inventare eingereicht.

Ober-Kriminalgericht.—Richter Dennis.—Verhandlung über Susanne Warfield's Testament; unbeendet, wird Montag fortgesetzt.

Das Boston Sinfonie-Orchester gab gestern Abend im Concordia Opernhause sein zweites großes Conzert in Baltimore. Der Ruf des Orchesters, der durch die ganzen Ver. Staaten verbreitet ist, und auch der Erfolg des ersten Conzertes verursachten, daß der Besuch auch gestern Abend wieder ein recht zahlreicher war. Von Orchesterwerken hatte Herr Arthur Nikisch für diesen Abend die Goldmark'sche Ouvertüre „Prometheus", den „Danse Macabre" von Saint-Saens und Mendelssohn's Ouvertüre Scherzo Notturno und Hochzeitsmarsch aus „Sommernachts-Traum" gewählt und man muß gestehen, daß diese Werke wohl nie besser zu Gehör gebracht worden sind. Sehr schön und vollendet wurde das Raff'sche Lied „Traumkönig und sein Lieb'" wiedergegeben und auch Cowen's Adagio und Scherzo, aus der skandinavischen Sinfonie Nr. 3 in C-Moll, fand wohlverdienten Beifall. Frau Nikisch sang in „Traumkönig und sein Lieb'" das Solo und dann drei Lieder mit Pianobegleitung. Wir lernten in der Dame eine ganz vorzüglich geschulte Sängerin kennen, deren vollkommene Kunst des Gesangs d. h. Beherrschung der Stimme das Publikum veranlaßte, eine leichte Härte im Klange derselben zu übersehen. Die drei Lieder „Am Rhein", von Liszt, „Am Ufer der Manzanares", von Jensen, und „Die Quelle", von Goldmark, riefen großen Beifall hervor. Das Conzert kann als ein Erfolg im wahren Sinne des Wortes bezeichnet werden.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, JAN. 27.

Kneisel Quartet in Union Hall.

The Kneisel quartet, assisted by Mr. Ernst Perabo, pianist, gave a very fine recital in Union Hall last night. The opening number was a quartet in D minor by Mozart. The playing was as artistic and finished as always. Mr. Perabo and Anton Hekking next performed the Rubinstein sonata in D major. Mr. Perabo's interpretation of the piano part was very fine in every particular. Especially brilliant was his playing of the last movement. Mr. Hekking delighted the audience by his masterly command of the cello. The concert closed with a trio in B flat by Schubert, rendered by Mr. Kneisel, violinist, Mr. Perabo, pianist, and Mr. Hekking, colloist. The next concert by the Kneisel quartet will be given on Monday evening, Feb. 16.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 27, 1891.

The usual success attended the concert by the Kneisel quartet at Union Hall last evening, when the programme was made up of the quartet in D minor, Mozart; sonata for pianoforte and 'cello, Rubinstein, and the trio in B flat for pianoforte, violin and 'cello, Schubert. Mr Ernst Perabo was the assisting pianist, and more than made good all the pleasant anticipations attendant upon the announcement of his name as the pianist of the evening. Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Hekking played with all their usual artistic effect in the trio, and Mr. Hekking was heard with especial pleasure in the Rubinstein sonata.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 27, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert of Last Evening.

One must dip the pen forever in rose-water or honey in speaking of the Kneisel Quartette, for there is never any fault to find, and although the continuous perfection may become dull to the reader, it never can be so to the auditor. Yet I may confess that the Mozart Quartette in D minor did not move me as it evidently did the audience. It seemed too continuously calm and tranquil; it was always genial, never spirited or jovial. Nevertheless the andante was the acme of shading, clearness and refinement, and in the trio ot the minuet Mr. Kneisel's beautiful bowing against the subdued pizzicato of the lower instruments was very artistic.

The heroes of the concert however were Messrs. Hekking and Perabo who performed Rubinstein's sonata for cello and piano in an inspired manner. The work has a delicacy and sweetness, as well as a symmetry unusual with Rubinstein, and the interest is sustained to the very last note in a way which one very seldom finds in modern works and least of all in the compositions of this most unequal of modern composers. Mr. Perabo showed an attention to detail, a devotion to ensemble effects, that cannot be overpraised. Mr. Hekking was at his very best, giving a beautifully smooth and sympathetic tone at almost all times, and his breadth and power, especially in passages on the C string was surprising. Occasionally one could have wished him a Stradivarius instrument such as Mr. Giese owns, but even without this the effect was in the highest degree masterly; indeed, I cannot recall ever having heard him play so magnificently. The allegretto, with its folk-song style and mysterious counter theme was charming, but the grandiose ending swept everything before it, and here Mr. Perabo's octave work was of the fieriest character, and the broad treatment of the theme by the two instruments in unison was a noble climax that won the artists two very hearty recalls.

Schubert's piano trio op. 99 ended the programme. It has became a trite remark to say that Schubert is lengthy in his sonata forms. This was felt only in the first movement, and even here the song-like first theme made amends and the reiteration was not tiresome. Mr. Perabo was a little too modest here, and subjugated his work to the strings in an unneccessary degree, but the delicate way in which he shaded the scales was artistic, and the ensemble was wonderful, even to the end of the finale, where the cadences seemed to take almost a new meaning because of the nuances. This finale is the gem of it all, and there is in it just enough of Hungarian spice to remind of Schubert's stay with the Esterhazys and the influence it exerted on his subsequent music, particularly in the instrumental forms. Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Hekking and Mr. Perabo each deserve thanks for the undiluted pleasure this finely played movement afforded, and a recall at the end of the programme proved that the public were aware of the fact that the usual high standard of the Kneisel concerts had been attained.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Daily Traveller

THURSDAY JANUARY 29. 1891.

Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet played at their fourth concert: Quartet, D minor, Mozart; sonata for piano and 'cello, in D, Rubenstein; piano trio in B flat, Schubert. Mr. Ernst Perabo was the pianist. All this is familiar music; the names are those we love among chamber composers. It was a programme eminently well-fitted to the peculiarly subjective, refined style of the Kneisel players, with whom Mr. Perabo merges in perfect sympathy. In fact, if there was a star in this serene firmament, it was Mr. Perabo, who never played more beautifully, with more consistent regard for his composer, or with a better estimate of the place in the ensemble the piano should hold. In the sonata the added breadth of tone and surer style which Mr. Hekking has lately acquired had a fine exposition. It goes without saying how beautiful was the Schubert trio in the hands of Mr. Perabo, Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Hekking. The real Kneisel audience will remember the fourth concert before all others thus far given this season.

ON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 31, 1891

The program of the thirteenth symphony concert given last Saturday evening was made up of a new overture or "Symphonic Prologue" by Mr. Foote entitled "Francesca da Rimini"; Volkmann's Symphony No. 1 in D minor, and Tschaikowsky's concerto for pianoforte in B flat minor, No. 1, the pianoforte part of which was played by Mrs. Helen Hopekirk. Mr. Foote's prologue is upon the whole a very well written work, firmly knit, without padding, and with effective episodes. He has evidently considered carefully the instrumentation, and the result is to his credit, though there might be here and there an improvement, particularly in the treatment of the wood-wind. The performance of the prologue was directed by Mr. Foote, and he was loudly applauded.

* * * * *

The fourth Kneisel concert which took place Monday evening at Union Hall was chiefly remarkable for the display of the rare qualities of the true ensemble player by Mr. Perabo, who was the pianist in the Schubert Trio in B flat. Mr. Hekking gave a noble performance of the 'cello part of the Rubinstein sonata for 'cello and pianoforte. Mozart's Quartet in D minor was the opening number of the concert.

* * * * *

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 27 1891

MUSIC.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The fourth concert of the Kneisel Quartette series was given last evening at Union Hall. The Quartette was assisted by Mrs. Ernst Perabo. The programme was as follows:

Quartette in D minor.....Mozart
Sonata for piano and violoncello in D. major, op. 18.....Rubinstein
Trio for piano, violin and violoncello, in B flat, op. 99.....Schubert

This was a delightful concert from the beginning to the end. The programme was one of great interest, and the sonata of Rubinstein (played for the first time at these concerts) was worthy of its place between the beautiful compositions of Mozart and Schubert.

And not only was the concert simply two hours of sensuous enjoyment, for the selections would probably have displeased the grave Pythagoras who gave it as his opinion that music should not be judged by the ear but by the intellect; it was here the mission of Mr. Perabo to show that the pianoforte is not necessarily the sworn foe of the strings.

Too often in chamber music, when the pianist is invited as a guest, he insists upon taking the chair of the host, and he talks arrogantly and incessantly. This comes from either a desire of exhibiting his prowess, or from an uncontrolled enthusiasm. But when a trio, such as the great work of Schubert, is written, the composer intends that the three instruments should share alike in labor and applause. Again, many pianists of excellent parts, either from excitement or from a natural lack of rhythmic feeling, when they are associated with players upon stringed instruments, are never able to agree with their fellows; and to the hearer the effect of the performance is as through two incongruous elements strove to unite and from their very nature failed.

Mr. Perabo gave last evening, particularly in the trio, a brilliant example of ensemble playing. He accompanied when it was his duty; he bore the brunt when the composer called upon him. While every detail was most carefully regarded, while every point was made, the result was not an admirable piece of mosaic; but the performance was most spontaneous, and it was quickened throughout by a rare poetic spirit. The perfection of his technique, seen, for example, in the rondo of the trio, was modestly displayed, and the emotional quality of his song was free from affection, for it came from his heart. Nor do Messrs. Kneisel and Hekking deserve one whit less praise. It was a most musical performance of a most musical composition. Schubert himself would have sat very still and listened.

Mr. Hekking played the cello part of the Rubinstein sonata with breadth and feeling and passion. The work itself is singularly self-contained and firmly knit for Rubinsteiu, and it is charming in invention and treatment.

The playing of the MozartQuartette left little to be desired, although there was not sufficient contrast between the sotto voce and the forte which follows immediately.

The next concert will be given Feb. 16.

PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third concert of its series at the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening. A pleasant feature of the concert will be the appearance of Mrs. Nikisch, who is to be the soloist of the evening. Mrs. Nikisch began her musical career on the operatic stage in 1881, at Cologne, where she sang for two seasons. In 1883 she accepted an engagement at the Stadt Theatre in Leipzic for a year, and a later engagement at the Hof Theatre in Cassel, also of a year, terminated with her marriage. Since her retirement from the operatic stage she has been very successful in concert work, singing much in Leipzic, Stuttgart, Heidelberg and other large cities. Her voice is a mezzo-soprano of beautiful quality, which she uses with great skill, and her stage presence is most attractive. She will be heard on Wednesday in Raff's song with orchestra, "The Dream King," and a group of songs with piano accompaniment by Mr. Nikisch. The orchestral numbers of the programme are the overture "Prometheus," by Goldmark, which has not been heard here before; the Schubert unfinished symphony and the overture, scherzo, notturno, and wedding march from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" of Mendelssohn.

MRS. NIKISCH.

[85]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1890-91.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 29TH, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN. OVERTURE, "Egmont."

SCHUMANN. CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in A minor, op. 54.
Allegro affettuoso.—Intermezzo; Andantino grazioso.—Allegro vivace.

SCHUBERT. SYMPHONY in C, No. 9.
Andante; Allegro ma non troppo.—Andante con moto.—Scherzo.—Allegro vivace.—Finale (Allegro vivace).

SOLOIST

MR. CARL FAELTEN.

The Piano used is a Knabe.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, FEB. 1, 1891.

THE SYMPHONIES.

THIRTEENTH CONCERT.

At the Symphony concert Saturday evening, Jan. 24, there were three works performed as follows:

Arthur Foote
Symphonic Prologue
"Francesca da Rimini."
Tschaicowski
Concerto op. 23 No. 1.
Volkmann
Symphony in D minor, No. 1.

The concert had as its most brilliant and exceptional attraction a soloist of world-wide reputation. Five years ago Mme. Helen Hopekirk won the very heart of our critical Boston public as seldom an artist has done. She was then a refined and cultivated artist, and while her virtuosal acquirements were not then so very conspicuous, yet she by no means lacked virtuosity; and to the extent that she possessed it she was exceptionally refined in her use of it. She nevertheless had certain few mannerisms of style, and was inclined to be subjective in her treatment of the composers whose works she interpreted. She was at her best perhaps with Mendelssohn and Chopin, while with Beethoven she was a trifle too young in artistic experience not to let her frank and heartfelt individuality too frequently assert itself at the expense of the higher and well-known qualities that are so justly demanded for Beethoven. Now the initial impression of her performance Saturday evening was that Mme. Hopekirk has temperamentally made a splendid advance since she was last heard here, and without losing one whit of her intrinsic and always to be desired charm. No less splendidly has she gained in point of technique; while intellectually considered her progress can best be described as simply triumphant.

Such were the most prominent suggestions of her performance of the Tschaicowski concerto. Of the work itself it can truly be said that it submits the various qualities of a great artist to a many-sided and appalling test. It is unquestionably the more interesting of the two Tschaicowski concertos that have been heard here. It is far more melodious, in a very high sense of the term, than the concerto in B flat major. True, the treatment throughout is unmistakably sympathetic with the so-called higher development school; and from this standpoint it is a gorgeous masterpiece. It is far from being confined, however, to artificial forests of a merely technical display, but with all the peculiar difficulty with which it is imbued, it notably requires the scholarly musical temperament for its effective performance.

Mme. Hopekirk's temperament did not fail to [illegible] a royal and impassive mastery [illegible] seldom exhibited [illegible] set forth the architectural design of the work that its manifold beauties could but have been transparent at a single hearing. Her strength of touch was marvelous, yet her fortes were exceptionally well-considered, resonant and musical, while as for her pianos and pianissimos, they in turn had a carrying power that was no less far-reaching and voice-like than charmingly sympathetic. The roulades of the performance were one and all remarkably clear, even, limpid and brilliant; the octave playing was as crisp, sure and awe-exciting as it was genuine; and, in brief, each and every feature of the performance was so flawlessly meritorious that at its close no doubts whatsoever could be entertained of Mme. Helen Hopekirk's right of domicile in the foremost rank of the world's ablest pianists. The pianist was applauded and recalled with intense enthusiasm at the conclusion of her performance, and none were more hearty in bestowing their plaudits than some of the most fastidious musicians and amateurs in the audience.

Mr. Foote's overture, an uncommonly dramatic work, is delightfully scored and fully as true in its relation to its chosen subject as it is replete with almost every other evidence of the composer's mastery. The playing of the orchestra throughout the concert was exceptionally brilliant, but at its best perhaps in the able treatment that Volkmann's symphony received.

THE SYMPHONIES.

The Fourteenth Concert in Music Hall Last Evening.

Two symphonies and a concerto for string orchestra were performed as follows at the fourteenth Symphony concert in Music hall last evening:

Schumann.....Symphony No. 1 in B flat
Handel.....Concerto Grosso in D for string orchestra
Brahms.....Symphony No. 1 in C minor

The Concerto was the only work heard for the first time in this city, and its somewhat antique quaintness was its most noteworthy feature. The entire programme was performed in a masterly manner, and the performance of the Schumann Symphony was uncommonly brilliant. It was rapturously applauded, and deservedly so, for Conductor Nikisch was in his worthiest mood.

The concert next Saturday evening promises to be one of the most enterprising of the series as the soloist will be none other then the world-renowned Xaver Scharwenka, who will perform his own Concerto for piano-forte in B flat minor. The Symphony will be by George W. Chadwick—the composer's second symphony in B flat major.

New York, Saturday, [illegible]

THE NEXT MUSICAL SEASON.

THE musical life of this metropolis is this winter very similar to what it was last winter; but within the last few weeks a great change has been effected in the prospects, which promises to put quite a different face on matters for next season. The engagement of Mr. Theodore Thomas by what might be called a syndicate of fifty capitalists in Chicago, each guaranteeing $1,000 a year towards maintaining a regular series of first-class concerts, has been widely discussed and as widely regretted in our musical circles. The fact that New Yorkers submitted to this arrangement without attempting to frustrate it by means of a counter-movement does not by any means argue that Mr. Thomas is less respected and admired here than formerly. His weekly concerts at the Lenox Lyceum are as popular as ever, and the patrons of the New York and Brooklyn Philharmonic Societies will almost unanimously regret his departure. The reason why Mr. Thomas was obliged to give up his former regular series of classical concerts by the specially selected "Thomas orchestra," has been more than once explained in these columns. It was simply a result of the establishment of German opera, which, by appealing to the same class of hearers as the classical concerts, inevitably took away so much patronage from the latter that they ceased to be profitable. In former times the Philharmonic Society gave as many as three public rehearsals preceding each concert. These have now been reduced to one, which has proved to be quite enough during the rule of German opera.

The determination of the Metropolitan directors to give Italian instead of German opera at their house next year promises, however, to restore the old order of things, and leave the field clear again for concerts. For it is a well-known fact that the performances of operas by Italian singers, or other singers who have adopted Italian stage methods, do not interest the lovers of classical German, French, and Russian music, for the reasons that these patrons of music consider a composer and his works of much greater importance than any singer, and that these singers, instead of trying to merge their individuality in their part, as German singers do, usually have but one aim, and that is to win applause for themselves by showing off their vocal tricks.

It is possible that Mr. Hammerstein's project of giving German opera at his new Murray Hill Opera-house next winter may be realized, although it does not seem advisable, in view of past experiences, to have two operas going at once; possible, also, that Mr. Abbey himself may listen to good advice, and, in view of the fact that almost the only operas in which he can make any money are those of the most recent French, Italian, and German school, in which the orchestra plays an important rôle, engage Mr. Seidl, the most popular operatic conductor New York has ever had, for the German operas in his repertory. But if neither of these things is done, there will be a good outlook for the next concert season, the prospects of which are now engaging the attention of music-lovers almost as much as the operatic problem.

The Philharmonic Societies of New York and Brooklyn have, it is reported, offered an engagement to Herr Gericke. It is doubtful, however, if Herr Gericke will accept, as he has taken charge again of the Viennese musical societies which he deserted when he went to Boston, and he has lately expressed himself as so delighted to get home that it is not probable he will come over here again unless a larger sum is offered him than these musical societies are able to give. Besides, it is not at all certain that the engagement of Herr Gericke would be a wise policy. He was not especially popular in Boston, and he did not succeed in making the concerts of the Boston orchestra profitable in New York, whereas Mr. Nikisch plays to crowded houses without a deadhead in them. The reason is not far to seek. Mr. Gericke is as good a musician as Mr. Nikisch, but he is less poetic and less dramatic in his interpretations. In this respect Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Seidl are alike, and if the Philharmonic Society desire to please the musical world of New York — the large number who deserted the concert-hall for opera, and will now return to their old love if proper inducements are offered—they ought to elect Mr. Seidl conductor. They surely cannot object to him on the ground that he gives Beethoven a Wagnerian reading. Even if he were in the wrong, variety in Beethoven readings is necessary to-day to preserve an interest in these oft-repeated symphonies. If the members of the Philharmonic could have attended one of the recent performances of "Fidelio" and seen the extraordinary enthusiasm [illegible] by Mr. Seidl's conducting espe- [illegible] become vacant [illegible] conductor, the Metropolitan Orchestra will no doubt give a series of Seidl concerts at the Lenox Lyceum or the new Carnegie Hall, and these, with the concerts of the Seidl Society in Brooklyn, will give our operatic conductor's numerous admirers a chance to see him occasionally during the operatic interregnum.

There is one more important point which must be briefly referred to. The consoling aspect of Mr. Thomas's departure lies in the fact that, being established in Chicago, he will no doubt be chosen to superintend the musical side of the Columbus Fair, as he ought to be. But he will probably take not a few orchestral players along from New York, nor is he at all likely to take the poorest ones. Here lies a great danger to our next musical season, for the reason that, owing to an extraordinary by-law of the Musical Protective Union, no newly imported orchestral musician is allowed to play with our local bands. If importations of new men are needed, they should therefore be attended to without delay.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 1, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The programme put forward last evening by Mr. Nikisch for the 14th of the season's concerts, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, was not an elaborate one in construction or arrangement. It began with a symphony, Schumann's No. 1, in B flat; ended with a symphony, Brahms' No. 1, in C minor; with Handel's concerto grosso No. 5, in D, for strings, between. The Schumann symphony, bright and tuneful throughout, and played as it was with consummate taste and skill, made a delightful beginning for the evening's concert, and its admirable reading by Mr. Nikisch served to put everybody in good humor and in a frame of mind to look leniently upon the make-up of the programme as a whole.

The Handel concerto had its first hearing here on this occasion, and gave an opportunity to show the value of the string orchestra, for which it is written. The composition is one of the 12 concertos for strings written by Handel when at the height of his popularity, and shows, in its several movements, the simple forms that caught the fancy of the London musical public of its day. It is a graceful piece of writing, and, with the string band at its best, made a most enjoyable work. The virtuosity of the string players was very prominently exhibited in each of the movements, and Mr. Kneisel's leading measures were brought out with great beauty by this accomplished player. Round after round of applause rewarded Mr. Nikisch at the conclusion of the concerto.

With great consideration Mr. Nikisch put the Brahms symphony last on the list, as all who heard its masterly performance had an opportunity to reflect upon its characteristics after its conclusion without the interruption of other subjects.

Next Saturday the soloist will be Xaver Scharwenka the pianist, and the programme will include Saint Saens' Symphonic Poem, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule." Scharwenka's concerto for piano in B flat minor, Wagner's Walaweben, from "Siegfried" and Chadwick's symphony No. 2, in B flat.

XAVER SCHARWENKA.

The appearance of Xaver Scharwenka at the Symphony concert of the coming week will introduce to Boston an artist whose name has for many years been a familiar one. Scharwenka is now 48 years old, and a native of Samter, Posen. He was educated at Kullak's Academy, in Berlin, where he won distinction even as a boy for his musical compositions. He made his first public appearance as a musician in Berlin when he was 27 years old. After that he became an instructor in the academy where he had found his own education, and taught there until 1873, when he was compelled to enter the army. In 1877 he returned to his beloved musical work, appearing in public for the first time as a concert pianist. He produced at Hanover his first important composition, a concerto in B flat minor, op. 32. This was also played the same year in the London Crystal Palace by Mr. Dannreuther, and the following year Scharwenka produced it at the Gewandhaus, Leipsic. In 1879 Scharwenka went to London, playing at the Crystal Palace and the Musical Union. He also appeared at the Philharmonic society's concerts. In 1881 he made his third visit to London, producing his second concerto in C minor, op. 36, which he had already played at Vienna. The same year he opened an institution for musical instruction in Berlin under the title of the Scharwenka Musikschule. Many Americans have since been his pupils.

His works now number nearly 70. In chamber music he has produced two trios, one quartet, one violin and one violoncello sonata.

His "Polnische Tanze" have become very popular, and he has written an opera which has made a success. He has made a brilliant success in New York, both as an artist and socially, and many attentions have been shown him there.

[86]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1890-91.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 29TH, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.	OVERTURE, "Egmont."
SCHUMANN.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in A minor, op. 54. Allegro affettuoso.—Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso.—Allegro vivace.
SCHUBERT.	SYMPHONY in C, No. 9. Andante; Allegro ma non troppo.—Andante con moto.—Scherzo.—Allegro vivace.—Finale (Allegro vivace).

SOLOIST

MR. CARL FAELTEN.

The Piano used is a Knabe.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, FEB. 1, 1891.

THE SYMPHONIES.

THIRTEENTH CONCERT.

At the Symphony concert Saturday evening, Jan. 24, there were three works performed as follows:

Arthur Foote
Symphonic Prologue
"Francesca da Rimini."
Tschaicowski
Concerto op. 23 No. 1.
Volkmann
Symphony in D minor, No. 1.

The concert had as its most brilliant and exceptional attraction a soloist of world-wide reputation. Five years ago Mme. Helen Hopekirk won the very heart of our critical Boston public as seldom an artist has done. She was then a refined and cultivated artist, and while her virtuosal acquirements were not then so very conspicuous, yet she by no means lacked virtuosity; and to the extent that she possessed it she was exceptionally refined in her use of it. She nevertheless had certain few mannerisms of style, and was inclined to be subjective in her treatment of the composers whose works she interpreted. She was at her best perhaps with Mendelssohn and Chopin, while with Beethoven she was a trifle too young in artistic experience not to let her frank and heartfelt individuality too frequently assert itself at the expense of the higher and well-known qualities that are so justly demanded for Beethoven. Now the initial impression of her performance Saturday evening was that Mme. Hopekirk has temperamentally made a splendid advance since she was last heard here, and without losing one whit of her intrinsic and always to be desired charm. No less splendidly has she gained in point of technique; while intellectually considered her progress can best be described as simply triumphant.

Such were the most prominent suggestions of her performance of the Tschaicowski concerto. Of the work itself it can truly be said that it submits the various qualities of a great artist to a many-sided and appalling test. It is unquestionably the more interesting of the two Tschaicowski concertos that have been heard here. It is far more melodious, in a very high sense of the term, than the concerto in B flat major. True, the treatment throughout is unmistakably sympathetic with the so-called higher development school; and from this standpoint it is a gorgeous masterpiece. It is far from being confined, however, to artificial interests of a merely technical display, but with all the peculiar difficulty with which it is imbued, it notably requires the scholarly musician's temperament for its effective performance.

Mme. Hopekirk's temperament did not fail to hold in check a royal and impassive mastery of the keyboard such as one seldom experiences and with which she constantly charmed her hearers; while the great artist so clearly set forth the architectural design of the work that its manifold beauties could but have been transparent at a single hearing. Her strength of touch was marvelous, yet her fortes were exceptionally well-considered, resonant and musical, while as for her pianos and pianissimos, they in turn had a carrying power that was no less far-reaching and voice-like than charmingly sympathetic. The roulades of the performance were one and all remarkably clear, even, limpid and brilliant; the octave playing was as crisp, sure and awe-exciting as it was genuine; and, in brief, each and every feature of the performance was so flawlessly meritorious that at its close no doubts whatsoever could be entertained of Mme. Helen Hopekirk's right of domicile in the foremost rank of the world's ablest pianists. The pianist was applauded and recalled with intense enthusiasm at the conclusion of her performance, and none were more hearty in bestowing their plaudits than some of the most fastidious musicians and amateurs in the audience.

Mr. Foote's overture, an uncommonly dramatic work, is delightfully scored and fully as true in its relation to its chosen subject as it is replete with almost every other evidence of the composer's mastery. The playing of the orchestra throughout the concert was exceptionally brilliant, but at its best perhaps in the able treatment that Volkmann's symphony received.

THE SYMPHONIES.

The Fourteenth Concert in Music Hall Last Evening.

Two symphonies and a concerto for string orchestra were performed as follows at the fourteenth Symphony concert in Music hall last evening:

Schumann.....Symphony No. 1 in B flat
Handel.....Concerto Grosso in D for string orchestra
Brahms.....Symphony No. 1 in C minor

The Concerto was the only work heard for the first time in this city, and its somewhat antique quaintness was its most noteworthy feature. The entire programme was performed in a masterly manner, and the performance of the Schumann Symphony was uncommonly brilliant. It was rapturously applauded, and deservedly so, for Conductor Nikisch was in his worthiest mood.

The concert next Saturday evening promises to be one of the most enterprising of the series as the soloist will be none other then the world-renowned Xaver Scharwenka, who will perform his own Concerto for piano-forte in B flat minor. The Symphony will be by George W. Chadwick—the composer's second symphony in B flat major.

The Evening Post.

New York, Saturday, January 24, 1891.

THE NEXT MUSICAL SEASON.

THE musical life of this metropolis is this winter very similar to what it was last winter; but within the last few weeks a great change has been effected in the prospects, which promises to put quite a different face on matters for next season. The engagement of Mr. Theodore Thomas by what might be called a syndicate of fifty capitalists in Chicago, each guaranteeing $1,000 a year towards maintaining a regular series of first-class concerts, has been widely discussed and as widely regretted in our musical circles. The fact that New Yorkers submitted to this arrangement without attempting to frustrate it by means of a counter-movement does not by any means argue that Mr. Thomas is less respected and admired here than formerly. His weekly concerts at the Lenox Lyceum are as popular as ever, and the patrons of the New York and Brooklyn Philharmonic Societies will almost unanimously regret his departure. The reason why Mr. Thomas was obliged to give up his former regular series of classical concerts by the specially selected "Thomas orchestra," has been more than once explained in these columns. It was simply a result of the establishment of German opera, which, by appealing to the same class of hearers as the classical concerts, inevitably took away so much patronage from the latter that they ceased to be profitable. In former times the Philharmonic Society gave as many as three public rehearsals preceding each concert. These have now been reduced to one, which has proved to be quite enough during the rule of German opera.

The determination of the Metropolitan directors to give Italian instead of German opera at their house next year promises, however, to restore the old order of things, and leave the field clear again for concerts. For it is a well-known fact that the performances of operas by Italian singers, or other singers who have adopted Italian stage methods, do not interest the lovers of classical German, French, and Russian music, for the reasons that these patrons of music consider a composer and his works of much greater importance than any singer, and that these singers, instead of trying to merge their individuality in their part, as German singers do, usually have but one aim, and that is to win applause for themselves by showing off their vocal tricks.

It is possible that Mr. Hammerstein's project of giving German opera at his new Murray Hill Opera-house next winter may be realized, although it does not seem advisable, in view of past experiences, to have two operas going at once; possible, also, that Mr. Abbey himself may listen to good advice, and, in view of the fact that almost the only operas in which he can make any money are those of the most recent French, Italian, and German school, in which the orchestra plays an important rôle, engage Mr. Seidl, the most popular operatic conductor New York has ever had, for the German operas in his repertory. But if neither of these things is done, there will be a good outlook for the next concert season, the prospects of which are now engaging the attention of music-lovers almost as much as the operatic problem.

The Philharmonic Societies of New York and Brooklyn have, it is reported, offered an engagement to Herr Gericke. It is doubtful, however, if Herr Gericke will accept, as he has taken charge again of the Viennese musical societies which he deserted when he went to Boston, and he has lately expressed himself as so delighted to get home that it is not probable he will come over here again unless a larger sum is offered him than these musical societies are able to give. Besides, it is not at all certain that the engagement of Herr Gericke would be a wise policy. He was not especially popular in Boston, and he did not succeed in making the concerts of the Boston orchestra profitable in New York, whereas Mr. Nikisch plays to crowded houses without a deadhead in them. The reason is not far to seek. Mr. Gericke is as good a musician as Mr. Nikisch, but he is less poetic and less dramatic in his interpretations. In this respect Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Seidl are alike, and if the Philharmonic Society desire to please the musical world of New York — the large number who deserted the concert-hall for opera, and will now return to their old love if proper inducements are offered—they ought to elect Mr. Seidl conductor. They surely cannot object to him on the ground that he gives Beethoven a Wagnerian reading. Even if he were in the wrong, variety in Beethoven readings is necessary to-day to preserve an interest in these oft-repeated symphonies. If the members of the Philharmonic could have attended one of the recent performances of "Fidelio" and seen the extraordinary enthusiasm evoked by Mr. Seidl's conducting, espe-

[illegible] would have engaged him on the spot by acclamation. If the Philharmonic commits the mistake of engaging another conductor, the Metropolitan Orchestra will no doubt give a series of Seidl concerts at the Lenox Lyceum or the new Carnegie Hall, and these, with the concerts of the Seidl Society in Brooklyn, will give our operatic conductor's numerous admirers a chance to see him occasionally during the operatic interregnum.

There is one more important point which must be briefly referred to. The consoling aspect of Mr. Thomas's departure lies in the fact that, being established in Chicago, he will no doubt be chosen to superintend the musical side of the Columbus Fair, as he ought to be. But he will probably take not a few orchestral players along from New York, nor is he at all likely to take the poorest ones. Here lies a great danger to our next musical season, for the reason that, owing to an extraordinary by-law of the Musical Protective Union, no newly imported orchestral musician is allowed to play with our local bands. If importations of new men are needed, they should therefore be attended to without delay.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 1, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The programme put forward last evening by Mr. Nikisch for the 14th of the season's concerts, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, was not an elaborate one in construction or arrangement. It began with a symphony, Schumann's No. 1, in B flat; ended with a symphony, Brahms' No. 1, in C minor; with Handel's concerto grosso No. 5, in D, for strings, between. The Schumann symphony, bright and tuneful throughout, and played as it was with consummate taste and skill, made a delightful beginning for the evening's concert, and its admirable reading by Mr. Nikisch served to put everybody in good humor and in a frame of mind to look leniently upon the make-up of the programme as a whole.

The Handel concerto had its first hearing here on this occasion, and gave an opportunity to show the value of the string orchestra, for which it is written. The composition is one of the 12 concertos for strings written by Handel when at the height of his popularity, and shows, in its several movements, the simple forms that caught the fancy of the London musical public of its day. It is a graceful piece of writing, and, with the string band at its best, made a most enjoyable work. The virtuosity of the string players was very prominently exhibited in each of the movements, and Mr. Kneisel's leading measures were brought out with great beauty by this accomplished player. Round after round of applause rewarded Mr. Nikisch at the conclusion of the concerto.

With great consideration Mr. Nikisch put the Brahms symphony last on the list, as all who heard its masterly performance had an opportunity to reflect upon its characteristics after its conclusion without the interruption of other subjects.

Next Saturday the soloist will be Xaver Scharwenka the pianist, and the programme will include Saint Saens' Symphonic Poem, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule." Scharwenka's concerto for piano in B flat minor, Wagner's Walkweben, from "Siegfried" and Chadwick's symphony No. 2, in B flat.

XAVER SCHARWENKA.

The appearance of Xaver Scharwenka at the Symphony concert of the coming week will introduce to Boston an artist whose name has for many years been a familiar one. Scharwenka is now 48 years old, and a native of Samter, Posen. He was educated at Kullak's Academy, in Berlin, where he won distinction even as a boy for his musical compositions. He made his first public appearance as a musician in Berlin when he was 27 years old. After that he became an instructor in the academy where he had found his own education, and taught there until 1873, when he was compelled to enter the army. In 1877 he returned to his beloved musical work, appearing in public for the first time as a concert pianist. He produced at Hanover his first important composition, a concerto in B flat minor, op. 32. This was also played the same year in the London Crystal Palace by Mr. Dannreuther, and the following year Scharwenka produced it at the Gewandhaus, Leipsic. In 1879 Scharwenka went to London, playing at the Crystal Palace and the Musical Union. He also appeared at the Philharmonic society's concerts. In 1881 he made his third visit to London, producing his second concerto in C minor, op. 36, which he had already played at Vienna. The same year he opened an institution for musical instruction in Berlin under the title of the Scharwenka Musikschule. Many Americans have since been his pupils.

His works now number nearly 70. In chamber music he has produced two trios, one quartet, one violin and one violoncello sonata.

His "Polnische Tanze" have become very popular, and he has written an opera which has made a success. He has made a brilliant success in New York, both as an artist and socially, and many attentions have been shown him there.

[86]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 31, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The thirteenth programme, which was of a very comfortable length, derived special eclat from two of its components—the presentation by Mr. Arthur Foote of his new "symphonic prologue" to "Francesca da Rimini" and the rentrée of Mme. Helen Hopekirk. Giving the lady place, as the gentle proverb says one should, we remark first that she brings back a great gain both in grasp of idea and in strength of rendering from her foreign sojourn and exercise of some five years. She left us an excellent interpreter of chamber music, sympathetic and suggestive in spiritual interpretation even though not always adequate in technique; she returns, retaining the same fine qualities of understanding and art, and in mechanism accomplished almost to perfection. She chose for this, her first reappearance in America, the brilliant and variable B-flat minor concerto of Tschaikowsky, which Boston has heard in past seasons played by Von Bülow and Mr. Lang, the last previous performance having been about six years ago. Some nervousness might naturally be felt by any artist under such conditions as surrounded Mme. Hopekirk, and to that should undoubtedly be attributed the false notes which here and there dotted the first movement, as to her long usage of the more a piacere renderings of chamber music was probably due the occasional disposition toward irregularity and fluctuation of tempo. These blemishes were but superficial and ephemeral, and one forgave and forgot them in the generous earnestness and energy of the larger passages, the courageous and sharp seizure of the broad detached chords, the kindly and tender consideration of the slow movement, and the clear levity of the shining and enwreathing ornament. The rendering was well proportioned and satisfying, and was doubly welcome—for its own sake and as an evidence of good results from serious study and practise on the part of this already eminent pianist. Mr. Foote's overture—if we may call it so for short—appears upon this single hearing to be his highest achievement thus far in orchestral composition, although less extended than some of his previous works. Its best qualities are as apparent to the layman as to the professed musician, which is no small merit. Its whole atmosphere is poetic, but the airs which blow through it have strength as well as sweetness, and one feels in them the thunder and the storm as well as the glamour of twilight and the serenity of lingering hours. A minute analysis, contributed by Mr. Foote, was printed in the Bulletin; but with all due regard to him and to the editor of that pamphlet, be it said that this was not in the least what the public wanted or needed. Only the musician cared to know after how many bars an oboe supplied an episodic x as a hint to a trombone for a y, and such current information his own ears ought to give him. What the average listener should have been told was what impressions concerning the famous tragedy the author had felt and desired to awaken in his hearers; so only could an intelligent and advantageous hearing be had. To us the work suggested this in its drift: A peaceful mood in harmonious and calm surroundings, upon which steal at times the dim rumors of war and faint forebodings of woe; an approach of martial days and a solemn, fateful menace; a period of sweet, languorous and lulling sympathy; the echoes, rolling nearer, of conflict and the world's hard activity; the bursting of rage and vengeance in the very spirit of the mighty warning; a swift, sharp catastrophe, and then a melting away into nothingness alike of love and hatred, of joy and pang, of material and spiritual. If it were something like this which Mr. Foote meant to depict, why could not he say so, and not leave five thousand people—many of whom, it is safe to say, did not know the story—groping and guessing to find the signification of his tone-pictures? Technically, the work is admirable; the melodies are distinct and appropriate, the coloring various and rich, the voicings of the obbligati fine and sentimentally true, and the scoring so well balanced and so symmetrically developed, as frequently to give the impression of unexpected and astonishing fulness and strength. Mr. Foote, who had the heartiest reception and recall, conducted calmly and commandingly, and the orchestra did their very best to support him perfectly. The only other number was Volkman's D-minor symphony, played in rather a melodramatic manner. The concerto work was sometimes good and sometimes bad, and not always abreast of the solo part; in the first movement the brass made some execrable blunders and the band at first was not exactly in tune with the piano. Tonight's programme is: Schumann's first symphony, Handel's "Concerto Grosso" for strings, new here, and Brahms's first symphony; the appearance of Mrs. Nikisch is again deferred until February 14.

On Monday evening the Kneisel Quartette continued their series in Union Hall, playing with that perfection which is now taken as a matter of course, Mozart's D-minor quartette and Schubert's B-flat piano trio, together with a Rubinstein sonata for 'cello and piano. Mr. Perabo was the pianist, and his beautiful handling of his own instrument was no less commendable than his unfailing attention to the interests of the others. Mr. Hekking was also at his best and has never been heard here when his tone was richer or his intonation and phrasing more true.

If the Symphony concert Bulletin is to retain esteem, it must eschew such "newspaper English" as "intellectual skill happily overcoming a doctrinal cliff on which the mind's eye sees a work foundering" and the calling melancholy hesitation a "delightful feeling."

If Mr. Gericke accepts the propositions which are said to have been made to him and comes to New York as director of the Philharmonic orchestra there, Boston may have to look to its laurels in that city. There has been from the first a disposition there to criticize Mr. Nikisch's methods and to compare him unfavorably with his predecessor, and every little point would be made the most of, [illegible] than that of local pride, [illegible] disciplined

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 2, 1891.

The Symphony Concert.

Schumann's B flat symphony, Handel's Concerto Grosso in D, and Brahms' great symphony in C minor, that was all! Yet this amazing concatenation of classical music was not as terrible as at first sight might appear, for not only was the reading of each work a triumph, but points of acceptable contrast were not lacking. Yet it was scarcely just to Handel to cause so contrapuntal a work as the concerto for strings to follow upon the heels of Schumann's glowing and passionate work, while it was certainly unjust to a work which is so complex as Brahms' first symphony, to perform it after the minds of the audience had been exercised with some eight or ten classical movements. If ever there was a symphonic movement to which the listener must bring unjaded faculties, it is the first movement of this same symphony. Schumann's first symphony, a product of his happiest epoch is an eclogue rather than an epic. It was really a budding and blooming spring in his life when he composed "Im wunderschönen Monat Mai" and its cycle, and this spring symphony, for Schumann was in this the very opposite of Schubert, who wrote nothing of any consequence when he was happy, but brought forth his noblest works under stress of misery. It detracts nothing from the B flat symphony to remember that in this instance, the "anguish of the singer" did not cause "the beauty of the strain." It is never sentimentality to speak of Schumann's life in direct connection with his works, for no composer ever wrote himself more completely into his works than this one, and symphonies, songs, sonatas, novellettes, "Carnivalscenen," "Kreisleriana," all are historiettes emphasizing some point of his career. The performance was a fine one, full of life and vigor, but I could not agree with the tremendous force with which the opening phrase of the introduction was given; it is merely a signal call to spring to awaken, and certainly should not become bombastic. The very fact that Schumann originally wrote the phrase for horns and trumpets B flat, G, A, B flat, and then followed it with a tutti on D, B flat, C and D, shows that he had a sequential crescendo in mind. The culmination in a hymn of thanksgiving (another life history here) was splendidly played, and the buoyant spirit of the finale, more of a scherzo than any of Schumann's scherzo movements, was as effective as it has ever been in Boston.

Now came the Handelian work. It was a long leap to make, from the unconstrained Schumann to the very learned Handel, but the fugato of the allegro was certainly beautiful, even if in another style of beauty, the minuet was very dainty, and the strings played with unity, even if they sometimes forced their tones in an unwarrantable degree.

At last came the Brahms work. There was a slight exodus during its movements and quite a number were willing to accept its last movement on faith without being obliged to listen to its apotheosis of secondary sevenths. Its reading and performance were simply magnificent; Mr. Nikisch never appeared in a better light than in his interpretation of this difficult work. No one can ever make that complex first movement popular or generally attractive, but its ingenuity was made sufficiently manifest, while the genial style of the third and beauty and depth of the second movement were certainly remarkably well brought out. But the culmination of it all was in the finale, as it ought to be, for this movement, in its combination of figures and themes from the preceding movements, becomes a veritable epitome of the entire work. The work of flute, and especially of the horn, must be spoken of in this connection, and the oboe was equally praiseworthy in the second movement, the capricious and mysterious pizzicato effects were perfectly done, and altogether climax of the whole concert was in its glorious ending, for which Mr. Nikisch and every member of the orchestra deserves thanks. By and by people will awaken to the fact that Brahms is not as dull as he is reputed to be. LOUIS C. ELSON.

New York

DAILY TRIBUNE, TUESDAY

JANUARY 27, 1891.

The action of the directors toward the public in the matter of a change from German to Italian opera would find an analogy if Mr. Higginson in Boston, having finally built up a patronage for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has placed them on a profitable basis and enabled him to extend his artistic ministration to the less favored cities of the country without the drain on his purse to which he submitted willingly for many years, were now to announce that he would substitute concerts by peripatetic organizations in their place. The consternation which such a step would create in Boston can only be imagined by those who have seen a Friday afternoon Symphony Orchestra audience. Week after week the audience reaches the numerical limit allowed by law. Those who come to Music Hall unprovided with tickets for twenty minutes to half an hour before the concert begins generally find that neither money nor pleadings will gain them admission. All the seats are full: scores of women sit on the staircases leading up to the stage, and scores stand wherever they are permitted to stand by the ushers. And this vast concourse listens "in a rapt ecstatic way" which makes it impossible to believe that attendance on the rehearsals is a mere "fad," as some harsh critics maintain. Even if it were a "fad," it would be a lovable one, for its consequences cannot fail to be good. What it signifies is that the people of Boston appreciate that they are a highly favored community, and so they hold up the hands of Mr. Higginson, who held them out so long with open generosity. Boston thinks New-York similarly favored in its German opera and cannot understand the change. Casting about for an explanation to fit the case, "The Advertiser" says: "'Quieta non movere' would seem to apply here if anywhere: the management, however, seems to have rather taken to heart an unquotable proverb regarding the dog returning to unmentionable things"; while "The Travel[illegible] ler'[illegible]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 1.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concerts.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was no more largely attended than have been the other concerts of the season at which no soloists have appeared. There were large gaps in the benches on the floor, and the balconies were not so well filled as usual. The programme was one of the most remarkable that Mr. Nikisch has, as yet, presented. It opened with Schumann's delightful first Symphony, and ended with the dreary first Symphony of Brahms. Between them came a Concerto Grosso, by Handel, for String Orchestra, given for the first time here. The combination was, on the whole, more novel than satisfying. Both symphonies have long been familiar here, and there is not such dearth of new works by eminent composers as to necessitate piling Pelion on Ossa after this fashion. There is nothing new to be said of the symphonies, and of the manner in which they were performed there is only praise to be written. At the same time, it is impossible to read the programmes of symphony concerts given elsewhere without a sigh of envy. The Handel concerto afforded genuine pleasure in the hearing. It has a lovely largo and a delightful minuet, and is remarkably genial and thoroughly interesting. The inevitable quaintness is there, but it is less pronounced than in other works of its order by the same composer. It was beautifully played, and met with cordial appreciation. Unfortunately it was quite out of keeping with the rest of the programme. At the next concert will be given: "La Jeunesse D'Hercule," by Saint-Saëns; Concerto for piano, by Scharwenka; "Waldweben," from Wagner's "Siegfried"; and Symphony No. 2 in B flat, by G. W. Chadwick. Mr. Xaver Scharwenka will be the soloist.

The fourth concert of the Kneisel Quartet was given in Union Hall on Monday night, Mr. Ernst Perabo assisting. The selections played were: Quartet in D-minor, Mozart; Sonata, piano and 'cello, in D, op. 18, Rubinstein; Trio for piano, violin, and 'cello, in B-flat, op. 99, Schubert. Of the performances there is nothing but praise to be written. The concert was a pleasure without alloy from first to last. The Mozart quartet was given in exquisite sympathy with the spirit of the work. The Rubinstein sonata, one of its composer's clearest and most steadily interesting works, was beautifully interpreted by Mr. Perabo and Mr. Hekking, the former manifesting the familiar fine judgment he always displays in his ensemble playing, and maintaining a steady and artistic balance between the piano and the 'cello; and the latter affording a fine exemplification of his skill and taste by the largeness, fire, and feeling with which he read and performed the 'cello part. The great Schubert trio was accorded a masterly interpretation. Here, again, Mr. Perabo was prominent in his avoidance of the prominence usually given to the piano part in works of this class. He never obtruded himself, but always kept the piano in its due place; maintaining art proportions with an artist's judgment. Of the thoroughness of his technique, the purity of his taste, and the just, poetic feeling that animates him it is unnecessary to speak. Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Hekking are fully as worthy of enthusiastic praise for the manner in which they acquitted themselves of their tasks in the trio. It was a memorable performance, and came as near to perfection as ever things mundane are permitted to come. The next concert will take place February 16th.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 2, 1891

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the fourteenth symphony concert, given Saturday evening at Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony No. 1, in B-flat.....Schumann
Concerto Grosso No. 5, in D, for string orchestra.....Handel
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 1, in C-minor.....Brahms

The concerto of Handel, played last week for the first time in this city, is one of a set of twelve written in 1739 between the 29th of September and the 30th of October. Four of these concertos, the one in D among them, were played the second day of the Handel Festival of 1784, and Dr. Burney in his "Account of the Musical Performances in Commemoration of Handel," published the year after, gives many interesting details concerning them, and he analyzes them. It appears that in Handel's time they were held in less esteem by many than similar compositions of Corelli and Geminiani. The music of Corelli was thought to be more sweet and that of Geminiani more daring and rhapsodic. Still they were much played, and the minuet of the 5th was for a long time regarded as a model for imitation. Even today much of this concerto is singularly fresh and agreeable. In one or two of the movements the wig of Handel may be too prominent and the powder may choke the music, but the largo is full of solemn beauty, and the final allegro and minuet are as frank and sprightly as though they were signed by Hayden. The concerto was well played, and it gave pleasure to the audience.

The other numbers of the programme do not call for special remark. It would have been well had some other music taken the place of the Brahms symphony. One symphony upon a programme is enough. It may be true that the First of Brahms is the Tenth of Beethoven, as some of the admirers of the former claim; and they may praise him for saying with Grillparzer: "I certainly wish to make an effect, not upon the public, however, but upon myself." Brahms is apt to take his own music too seriously, and the certificate given him at the beginning of his career by Schumann was an injury instead of a benefit. But without discussing the merits or faults of the work, it will be admitted that it is an exacting composition which demands the closest attention. Such attention cannot be given by ears which have already listened to music for over an hour.

The concert as a whole was uninteresting, although each of the separate numbers was worthy of respect. Mr. Nikisch too often shows his lack of judgment in the selection and arrangement of programmes.

The programme of the concert which will take place Feb. 7 includes Saint-Saëns' "Jennesse d' Hercule," Wagner's "Waldweben," Chadwick's Symphony No. 2, in B flat, and Scharwenka's Concerto for piano, in B flat minor, the solo part of which will be played by the composer. PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, FEB. 1, 1891.

Successes at the Symphony—

There was no soloist at the 14th Symphony concert, but the programme arranged by Director Nikisch proved a welcome offering to both rehearsal and evening concert patrons. Particularly acceptable was the opportunity given of hearing Handel's concerto grosso No. 5, in D, for string orchestra. The work had not before been played here. Handel composed this concerto during the height of his success, and confidence and cheerfulness are evinced throughout the writing. It is quaintly characteristic of the author, and abounds in delicious melodies of days long past. The concerto consists of seven short movements, and splendidly were they interpreted by Mr. Nikisch. The presto movement was brilliantly played, and the beautiful harmony of the largo was brought out with charming effect. Notable, also, was the performance of the minuet, a most graceful and dainty bit of writing.

There are undoubtedly many who object to two symphonies being played at one concert, and generally with good reason, but very few left until the conclusion of yesterday's programme. Schumann's (spring) symphony, No. 1, in B-flat, was the opening number. Familiar as this splendid work is to Bostonians, it may be safely said that they never heard a more satisfying interpretation. Even the magnificent performance given this symphony by Mr. Nikisch last season seemed improved upon. Brahm's symphony, No. 1, in C minor, was the third and concluding number of the concert programme. Seldom has this composer been interpreted with finer effect or received greater applause from a "rehearsal audience" than on Friday afternoon.

The programme announced for next week is as follows: Symphonic poem, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," Saint-Saens; concerto for piano in B flat minor, Scharwenka; "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," Wagner; symphony No. 2, in B flat, Chadwick. Mr. Xaver Scharwenka will be the soloist.

—Fifty picked men of the Symphony orchestra, with Mr. Nikisch to lead them, will play at Mrs. Theodore Havemeyer's musicale, Monday week (Feb. 9), at 4.30, which will be given in the painting room of her spacious Madison av. mansion. They leave for New York, Sunday evening, at midnight, and will return at same hour on Monday. It is said that Mrs. Havemeyer pays $2000 for the pleasure she thus affords her guests. This entertainment following so soon after that of Mrs. Vanderbilt, where the chief feature was the playing of the New York Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Walter Damrosch, is being looked forward to with all the more eagerness by the musical element in society, who will thus be enabled to contrast the performance of the two organizations.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 2, 1891.

The Symphony Concert.

Another of the programmes which the management of the Symphony Orchestra would not dare to present to any audience outside of Music Hall was given Saturday evening by Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra. There was no soloist, and there was plenty of room in the hall, many vacant seats being observed even after the few admissions had found seats unoccupied. Schumann's spring symphony opened the programme, Brahms's in C minor closed it, and those of the audience who enjoyed, understood and were able fully to appreciate these mysteries were apparently gratified, though there was little enthusiasm. A deal of monotony is being developed in the programmes, but the musical people of Boston are long suffering and are able to endure much in this direction. The symphonies were well played, and the orchestra was in good form. The novelty of the evening was a concerto for string orchestra by Handel—very characteristic, very tuneful and very beautifully rendered. It was written by the composer when he was the ideal of London—immediately after the oratorio of "Israel" was written. The solo lead of Mr. Kneisel and the solo in the first movement of the second violin were admirable, and the number was an agreeable intermezzo to the two symphonies. It was a novelty which was greeted by the audience with more applause than anything of the evening. At the next concert Xaver Schurwenka, the renowned pianist, is to be the soloist, and a symphony by Mr. Chadwick is to be performed.

THE BEACON. B

It is a fact patent to any observation that the Boston Symphony audience, as a body, does not know good singing from bad, if its applause be any criterion. Whether a Metropolitan audience is "judgmatical" or is merely cranky about Wagner, may be deduced from the New York Tribune's notice of the performance of "Siegfried" the other night. That paper says that the house "was unfeignedly enthusiastic and gave the principals numerous recalls"; but it remarks in detail that Gudehus's Siegfried was too old and unpoetical, that Reichmann did not sing in tune, that Kemlitz's Mime was harsh, grating and exaggerated, that Behrens's dragon lacked resonance of lung, and that the forest-bird "piped rather feebly." The applause, then, must have meant ignorance or prejudice.

[87]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 31, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The thirteenth programme, which was of a very comfortable length, derived special eclat from two of its components—the presentation by Mr. Arthur Foote of his new "symphonic prologue" to "Francesca da Rimini" and the rentrée of Mme. Helen Hopekirk. Giving the lady place, as the gentle proverb says one should, we remark first that she brings back a great gain both in grasp of idea and in strength of rendering from her foreign sojourn and exercise of some five years. She left us an excellent interpreter of chamber music, sympathetic and suggestive in spiritual interpretation even though not always adequate in technique; she returns, retaining the same fine qualities of understanding and art, and in mechanism accomplished almost to perfection. She chose for this, her first reappearance in America, the brilliant and variable B-flat minor concerto of Tschaikowsky, which Boston has heard in past seasons played by Von Bülow and Mr. Lang, the last previous performance having been about six years ago. Some nervousness might naturally be felt by any artist under such conditions as surrounded Mme. Hopekirk, and to that should undoubtedly be attributed the false notes which here and there dotted the first movement, as to her long usage of the more a piacere renderings of chamber music was probably due the occasional disposition toward irregularity and fluctuation of tempo. These blemishes were but superficial and ephemeral, and one forgave and forgot them in the generous earnestness and energy of the larger passages, the courageous and sharp seizure of the broad detached chords, the kindly and tender consideration of the slow movement, and the clear levity of the shining and enwreathing ornament. The rendering was well proportioned and satisfying, and was doubly welcome—for its own sake and as an evidence of good results from serious study and practise on the part of this already eminent pianist. Mr. Foote's overture—if we may call it so for short—appears upon this single hearing to be his highest achievement thus far in orchestral composition, although less extended than some of his previous works. Its best qualities are as apparent to the layman as to the professed musician, which is no small merit. Its whole atmosphere is poetic, but the airs which blow through it have strength as well as sweetness, and one feels in them the thunder and the storm as well as the glamour of twilight and the serenity of lingering hours. A minute analysis, contributed by Mr. Foote, was printed in the Bulletin; but with all due regard to him and to the editor of that pamphlet, be it said that this was not in the least what the public wanted or needed. Only the musician cared to know after how many bars an oboe supplied an episodic x as a hint to a trombone for a y, and such current information his own ears ought to give him. What the average listener should have been told was what impressions concerning the famous tragedy the author had felt and desired to awaken in his hearers; so only could an intelligent and advantageous hearing be had. To us the work suggested this in its drift: A peaceful mood in harmonious and calm surroundings, upon which steal at times the dim rumors of war and faint forebodings of woe; an approach of martial days and a solemn, fateful menace; a period of sweet, languorous and lulling sympathy; the echoes, rolling nearer, of conflict and the world's hard activity; the bursting of rage and vengeance in the very spirit of the mighty warning; a swift, sharp catastrophe, and then a melting away into nothingness alike of love and hatred, of joy and pang, of material and spiritual. If it were something like this which Mr. Foote meant to depict, why could not he say so, and not leave five thousand people—many of whom, it is safe to say, did not know the story—groping and guessing to find the signification of his tone-pictures? Technically, the work is admirable; the melodies are distinct and appropriate, the coloring various and rich, the voicings of the obbligati fine and sentimentally true, and the scoring so well balanced and so symmetrically developed, as frequently to give the impression of unexpected and astonishing fulness and strength. Mr. Foote, who had the heartiest reception and recall, conducted calmly and commandingly, and the orchestra did their very best to support him perfectly. The only other number was Volkman's D-minor symphony, played in rather a melodramatic manner. The concerto work was sometimes good and sometimes bad, and not always abreast of the solo part; in the first movement the brass made some execrable blunders and the band at first was not exactly in tune with the piano. Tonight's programme is: Schumann's first symphony, Handel's "Concerto Grosso" for strings, new here, and Brahms's first symphony; the appearance of Mrs. Nikisch is again deferred until February 14.

On Monday evening the Kneisel Quartette continued their series in Union Hall, playing with that perfection which is now taken as a matter of course, Mozart's D-minor quartette and Schubert's B-flat piano trio, together with a Rubinstein sonata for 'cello and piano. Mr. Perabo was the pianist, and his beautiful handling of his own instrument was no less commendable than his unfailing attention to the interests of the others. Mr. Hekking was also at his best and has never been heard here when his tone was richer or his intonation and phrasing more true.

If the Symphony concert Bulletin is to retain esteem, it must eschew such "newspaper English" as "intellectual skill happily overcoming a doctrinal cliff on which the mind's eye sees a work foundering" and the calling melancholy hesitation a "delightful feeling."

If Mr. Gericke accepts the propositions which are said to have been made to him and comes to New York as director of the Philharmonic orchestra there, Boston may have to look to its laurels in that city. There has been from the first a disposition there to criticise Mr. Nikisch's methods and to compare him unfavorably with his predecessor, and every little point would be made the most of, if no other reason than that of local pride, were New York to secure the strong disciplinarian and talented [illegible]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 2, 1891.

The Symphony Concert.

Schumann's B flat symphony, Handel's Concerto Grosso in D, and Brahms' great symphony in C minor, that was all! Yet this amazing concatenation of classical music was not as terrible as at first sight might appear, for not only was the reading of each work a triumph, but points of acceptable contrast were not lacking. Yet it was scarcely just to Handel to cause so contrapuntal a work as the concerto for strings to follow upon the heels of Schumann's glowing and passionate work, while it was certainly unjust to a work which is so complex as Brahms' first symphony, to perform it after the minds of the audience had been exercised with some eight or ten classical movements. If ever there was a symphonic movement to which the listener must bring unjaded faculties, it is the first movement of this same symphony. Schumann's first symphony, a product of his happiest epoch is an eclogue rather than an epic. It was really a budding and blooming spring in his life when he composed "Im wunderschönen Monat Mai" and its cycle, and this spring symphony, for Schumann was in this the very opposite of Schubert, who wrote nothing of any consequence when he was happy, but brought forth his noblest works under stress of misery. It detracts nothing from the B flat symphony to remember that in this instance, the "anguish of the singer" did not cause "the beauty of the strain." It is never sentimentality to speak of Schumann's life in direct connection with his works, for no composer ever wrote himself more completely into his works than this one, and symphonies, songs, sonatas, novellettes, "Carnivalscenen," "Kreisleriana," all are historiettes emphasizing some point of his career. The performance was a fine one, full of life and vigor, but I could not agree with the tremendous force with which the opening phrase of the introduction was given; it is merely a signal call to spring to awaken, and certainly should not become bombastic. The very fact that Schumann originally wrote the phrase for horns and trumpets B flat. G, A, B flat, and then followed it with a tutti on D, B flat, C and D, shows that he had a sequential crescendo in mind. The culmination in a hymn of thanksgiving (another life history here) was splendidly played, and the buoyant spirit of the finale, more of a scherzo than any of Schumann's scherzo movements, was as effective as it has ever been in Boston.

Now came the Handelian work. It was a long leap to make, from the unconstrained Schumann to the very learned Handel, but the fugato of the allegro was certainly beautiful, even if in another style of beauty, the minuet was very dainty, and the strings played with unity, even if they sometimes forced their tones in an unwarrantable degree.

At last came the Brahms work. There was a slight exodus during its movements and quite a number were willing to accept its last movement on faith without being obliged to listen to its apotheosis of secondary sevenths. Its reading and performance were simply magnificent; Mr. Nikisch never appeared in a better light than in his interpretation of this difficult work. No one can ever make that complex first movement popular or generally attractive, but its ingenuity was made sufficiently manifest, while the genial style of the third and beauty and depth of the second movement were certainly remarkably well brought out. But the culmination of it all was in the finale, as it ought to be, for this movement, in its combination of figures and themes from the preceding movements, becomes a veritable epitome of the entire work. The work of flute, and especially of the horn, must be spoken of in this connection, and the oboe was equally praiseworthy in the second movement, the capricious and mysterious pizzicato effects were perfectly done, and altogether climax of the whole concert was in its glorious ending, for which Mr. Nikisch and every member of the orchestra deserves thanks. By and by people will awaken to the fact that Brahms is not as dull as he is reputed to be. LOUIS C. ELSON.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 1.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concerts.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was no more largely attended than have been the other concerts of the season at which no soloists have appeared. There were large gaps in the benches on the floor, and the balconies were not so well filled as usual. The programme was one of the most remarkable that Mr. Nikisch has, as yet, presented. It opened with Schumann's delightful first Symphony, and ended with the dreary first Symphony of Brahms. Between them came a Concerto Grosso, by Handel, for String Orchestra, given for the first time here. The combination was, on the whole, more novel than satisfying. Both symphonies have long been familiar here, and there is not such dearth of new works by eminent composers as to necessitate piling Pelion on Ossa after this fashion. There is nothing new to be said of the symphonies, and of the manner in which they were performed there is only praise to be written. At the same time, it is impossible to read the programmes of symphony concerts given elsewhere without a sigh of envy. The Handel concerto afforded genuine pleasure in the hearing. It has a lovely largo and a delightful minuet, and is remarkably genial and thoroughly interesting. The inevitable quaintness is there, but it is less pronounced than in other works of its order by the same composer. It was beautifully played, and met with cordial appreciation. Unfortunately it was quite out of keeping with the rest of the programme. At the next concert will be given: "La Jeunesse D'Hercule," by Saint-Saëns; Concerto for piano, by Scharwenka; "Waldweben," from Wagner's "Siegfried"; and Symphony No. 2 in B flat, by G. W. Chadwick. Mr. Xaver Scharwenka will be the soloist.

The fourth concert of the Kneisel Quartet was given in Union Hall on Monday night, Mr. Ernst Perabo assisting. The selections played were: Quartet in D-minor, Mozart; Sonata, piano and 'cello, in D, op. 18, Rubinstein; Trio for piano, violin, and 'cello, in B-flat, op. 99, Schubert. Of the performances there is nothing but praise to be written. The concert was a pleasure without alloy from first to last. The Mozart quartet was given in exquisite sympathy with the spirit of the work. The Rubinstein sonata, one of its composer's clearest and most steadily interesting works, was beautifully interpreted by Mr. Perabo and Mr. Hekking, the former manifesting the familiar fine judgment he always displays in his ensemble playing, and maintaining a steady and artistic balance between the piano and the 'cello; and the latter affording a fine exemplification of his skill and taste by the largeness, fire, and feeling with which he read and performed the 'cello part. The great Schubert trio was accorded a masterly interpretation. Here, again, Mr. Perabo was prominent in his avoidance of the prominence usually given to the piano part in works of this class. He never obtruded himself, but always kept the piano in its due place; maintaining art proportions with an artist's judgment. Of the thoroughness of his technique, the purity of his taste, and the just, poetic feeling that animates him it is unnecessary to speak. Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Hekking are fully as worthy of enthusiastic praise for the manner in which they acquitted themselves of their tasks in the trio. It was a memorable performance, and came as near to perfection as ever things mundane are permitted to come. The next concert will take place February 16th.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 2, 1891

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the fourteenth symphony concert, given Saturday evening at Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony No. 1, in B-flat.....Schumann
Concerto Grosso No. 5, in D, for string orchestra.....Handel
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 1, in C-minor.....Brahms

The concerto of Handel, played last week for the first time in this city, is one of a set of twelve written in 1739 between the 29th of September and the 30th of October. Four of these concertos, the one in D among them, were played the second day of the Handel Festival of 1784, and Dr. Burney in his "Account of the Musical Performances in Commemoration of Handel," published the year after, gives many interesting details concerning them, and he analyzes them. It appears that in Handel's time they were held in less esteem by many than similar compositions of Corelli and Geminiani. The music of Corelli was thought to be more sweet and that of Geminiani more daring and rhapsodic. Still they were much played, and the minuet of the 5th was for a long time regarded as a model for imitation. Even today much of this concerto is singularly fresh and agreeable. In one or two of the movements the wig of Handel may be too prominent and the powder may choke the music, but the largo is full of solemn beauty, and the final allegro and minuet are as frank and sprightly as though they were signed by Hayden. The concerto was well played, and it gave pleasure to the audience.

The other numbers of the programme do not call for special remark. It would have been well had some other music taken the place of the Brahms symphony. One symphony upon a programme is enough. It may be true that the First of Brahms is the Tenth of Beethoven, as some of the admirers of the former claim; and they may praise him for saying with Grillparzer: "I certainly wish to make an effect, not upon the public, however, but upon myself." Brahms is apt to take his own music too seriously, and the certificate given him at the beginning of his career by Schumann was an injury instead of a benefit. But without discussing the merits or faults of the work, it will be admitted that it is an exacting composition which demands the closest attention. Such attention cannot be given by ears which have already listened to music for over an hour.

The concert as a whole was uninteresting, although each of the separate numbers was worthy of respect. Mr. Nikisch too often shows his lack of judgment in the selection and arrangement of programmes.

The programme of the concert which will take place Feb. 7 includes Saint-Saëns' "Jennesse d' Hercule," Wagner's "Waldweben," Chadwick's Symphony No. 2, in B flat, and Scharwenka's Concerto for piano, in B flat minor, the solo part of which will be played by the composer. PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, FEB. 1, 1891.

Successes at the Symphony—

There was no soloist at the 14th Symphony concert, but the programme arranged by Director Nikisch proved a welcome offering to both rehearsal and evening concert patrons. Particularly acceptable was the opportunity given of hearing Handel's concerto grosso No. 5, in D, for string orchestra. The work had not before been played here. Handel composed this concerto during the height of his success, and confidence and cheerfulness are evinced throughout the writing. It is quaintly characteristic of the author, and abounds in delicious melodies of days long past. The concerto consists of seven short movements, and splendidly were they interpreted by Mr. Nikisch. The presto movement was brilliantly played, and the beautiful harmony of the largo was brought out with charming effect. Notable, also, was the performance of the minuet, a most graceful and dainty bit of writing.

There are undoubtedly many who object to two symphonies being played at one concert, and generally with good reason, but very few left until the conclusion of yesterday's programme. Schumann's (spring) symphony, No. 1, in B-flat, was the opening number. Familiar as this splendid work is to Bostonians, it may be safely said that they never heard a more satisfying interpretation. Even the magnificent performance given this symphony by Mr. Nikisch last season seemed improved upon. Brahm's symphony, No. 1, in C minor, was the third and concluding number of the concert programme. Seldom has this composer been interpreted with finer effect or received greater applause from a "rehearsal audience" than on Friday afternoon.

The programme announced for next week is as follows: Symphonic poem, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," Saint-Saens; concerto for piano in B flat minor, Scharwenka; "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," Wagner; symphony No. 2, in B flat, Chadwick. Mr. Xaver Scharwenka will be the soloist.

——Fifty picked men of the Symphony orchestra, with Mr. Nikisch to lead them, will play at Mrs. Theodore Havemeyer's musicale, Monday week (Feb. 9), at 4.30, which will be given in the painting room of her spacious Madison av. mansion. They leave for New York, Sunday evening, at midnight, and will return at same hour on Monday. It is said that Mrs. Havemeyer pays $2000 for the pleasure she thus affords her guests. This entertainment following so soon after that of Mrs. Vanderbilt, where the chief feature was the playing of the New York Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Walter Damrosch, is being looked forward to with all the more eagerness by the musical element in society, who will thus be enabled to contrast the performances of the two organizations.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 2, 1891.

The Symphony Concert.

Another of the programmes which the management of the Symphony Orchestra would not dare to present to any audience outside of Music Hall was given Saturday evening by Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra. There was no soloist, and there was plenty of room in the hall, many vacant seats being observed even after the few admissions had found seats unoccupied. Schumann's spring symphony opened the programme, Brahms's in C minor closed it, and those of the audience who enjoyed, understood and were able fully to appreciate these mysteries were apparently gratified, though there was little enthusiasm. A deal of monotony is being developed in the programmes, but the musical people of Boston are long suffering and are able to endure much in this direction. The symphonies were well played, and the orchestra was in good form. The novelty of the evening was a concerto for string orchestra by Handel—very characteristic, very tuneful and very beautifully rendered. It was written by the composer when he was the ideal of London—immediately after the oratorio of "Israel" was written. The solo lead of Mr. Kneisel and the solo in the first movement of the second violin were admirable, and the number was an agreeable intermezzo to the two symphonies. It was a novelty which was greeted by the audience with more applause than anything of the evening. At the next concert Xaver Schurwenka, the renowned pianist, is to be the soloist, and a symphony by Mr. Chadwick is to be performed.

DAILY TRIBUNE, TUESDAY

JANUARY 27, 1891.

The action of the directors toward the public in the matter of a change from German to Italian opera would find an analogy if Mr. Higginson in Boston, having finally built up a patronage for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has placed them on a profitable basis and enabled him to extend his artistic ministration to the less favored cities of the country without the drain on his purse to which he submitted willingly for many years, were now to announce that he would substitute concerts by peripatetic organizations in their place. The consternation which such a step would create in Boston can only be imagined by those who have seen a Friday afternoon Symphony Orchestra audience. Week after week the audience reaches the numerical limit allowed by law. Those who come to Music Hall unprovided with tickets for twenty minutes to half an hour before the concert begins generally find that neither money nor pleadings will gain them admission. All the seats are full; scores of women sit on the staircases leading up to the stage, and scores stand wherever they are permitted to stand by the ushers. And this vast concourse listens "in a rapt ecstatic way" which makes it impossible to believe that attendance on the rehearsals is a mere "fad," as some harsh critics maintain. Even if it were a "fad," it would be a lovable one, for its consequences cannot fail to be good. What it signifies is that the people of Boston appreciate that they are a highly favored community, and so they hold up the hands of Mr. Higginson, who held them out so long with open generosity. Boston thinks New-York similarly favored in its German opera and cannot understand the change. Casting about for an explanation to fit the case, "The Advertiser" says: "'Quieta non movere' would seem to apply here if anywhere: the management, however, seems to have rather taken to heart an unquotable proverb regarding the dog returning to unmentionable things"; while "The Travel-

THE BEACON. B

It is a fact patent to any observation that the Boston Symphony audience, as a body, does not know good singing from bad, if its applause be any criterion. Whether a Metropolitan audience is "judgmatical" or is merely cranky about Wagner, may be deduced from the New York Tribune's notice of the performance of "Siegfried" the other night. That paper says that the house "was unfeignedly enthusiastic and gave the principals numerous recalls"; but it remarks in detail that Gudehus's Siegfried was to old and unpoetical, that Reichmann did not sing in tune, that Kemlitz's Mime was harsh, grating and exaggerated, that Behrens's dragon lacked resonance of lung, and that the forest-bird "piped rather feebly." The applause, then, must have meant ignorance or prejudice.

[87]

Boston Courier.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last evening of January brought the fourteenth of the twenty-four concerts which Mr. Arthur Nikisch knows so well to prepare for us and give us. The Music Hall showed but a few vacant seats. The programme offered three names:

Schumann—Op. 38. Symphony No. 1, in B flat.
Handel—Concerto Grosso No. 5, in D, for String Orchestra. Introduction. Allegro. Presto. Largo. Allegro. Minuet.
(First time in Boston.)
Brahms—Op. 68. Symphony No. 1, in C minor.

Schumann's all-alive "Spring" symphony, his first full triumph over the troubles that beset his path, a brilliant and resistless blaze of genius on grasping in good earnest the problem of musical creation in one of the highest forms, made a splendid, an inspiring, opening of the concert. Yet we should have liked it better for the end. If there were to be two large symphonies, Brahms seemed over much for one of them; and we could have wished it over before Schumann came on. A lighter symphony at the beginning, with Schumann at the end, we cannot help thinking, would have been enjoyed with greater zest,—except by the Brahms coterie, who are yet in the minority. The first phrase (horns and trumpets) of the B-flat symphony was taken rather slow; but it was majestic and engrossing, weighty prelude of much to come. How grandly it sweeps both down and up in great wide chords, drops leisurely by semi-tones from the highest A of the flute, into a reflective mood, with fluttering triplets in the middle strings, gradually accelerating, until the Allegro molto vivace leaps forth, running away with that horn and trumpet motive, gathering new thoughts by the way, and developing into that whole splendid movement with irrepressible energy and never-failing promise. The cantabile episode toward the close, for the strings alone, very legato, is full of feeling, which seems born of the very ardor of the movement, which was admirably read as a whole, even if the introduction was a little slower than we have been wont to hear it.

The larghetto, in E flat, three-eighths, so full of deep and tender sentiment, was most warmly, delicately rendered. Every syncopation, every little grace flowering into trill, every crescendo, light and shade, in short, every detail of expression was exact without stiffness, and all sweetly, richly, softly blended. The Scherzo, with its two Trios, one in two-four, the other in three-four time, went charmingly. And what could be more entrancing than the coda, where we take lingering leave of the Scherzo, through those fond phrases of the oboe and the flute—then presto! down glide the violins against the upward chromatic pressure of the basses; a close is made on D, and off starts the irrepressible Finale (Allegro animato e grazioso) in the original key—B flat. With subtle speed and a light, crepitant sound, now loud, now half-suppressed, it runs along the grass-like fire, consuming as it goes, launching anon into strong, bold passages. Then a halt! Poco Adagio and Andante. A signal from a single horn; then two in thirds, then a long trill on the flute, leading into a florid cadenza (exquisitely done, of course, by M. Molé), and the movement gathers up its strength for a last attack, a long triumphant close. But it is idle thus to fondly try to recall and bring back salient bits, like sparkling foam from the surface of a tone-ocean, which can only describe itself.

To such a work why make a symphony of of Brahms the pendant? Both, to be sure, are works of high emprise; both sprang from great ambition; perhaps both from genius, though in the latter case that question can not be considered yet quite settled. Both are elaborate, learned, earnest efforts, it cannot be denied. But one is quickening and inspiring, without a dull place in it. Brahms is sometimes heavy and depressing, sometimes rasping to the nerves; his contrapuntal complication is forced through like unpopular bills by obstinate partisans in Congress. He may carry his point with you, grammatically, logically, but you do not thank him, while you admit that it is all very ingenious and very brave. We fancy such to have been the experience of the majority of the audience with the interminable, cheerless, thankless first movement of that C-minor Symphony. Many times it has been heard in Boston; better played it could hardly be than it was this time; yet does it really gain ground with the most appreciative mass of genuine music-lovers? Are they not mostly glad when the movement is over? In the sustained Andante movement we admit sweetness, euphony, dignity and depth of feeling. And in the lighter movement marked un poco allegretto e grazioso, which stands in the customary place of Minuet or Scherzo (perhaps, rather Intermezzo) there is, indeed, a soft and gentle pastoral simplicity, with a melodious flow of mingling wood-wind tones, which rests and soothes the listening sense. It is an ingratiating episode. But when the long Finale begins, first Adagio, it sounds so melancholy and discouraging, that, when the horns announce a new hope, and curiosity is much excited (if you have not heard that shepherd's cry too often) you think that something fine is really at hand; and when the tune is taken up, which you think must have been dreamed after hearing the Joy hymn in Beethoven's Choral Symphony; and yet hope fades away again, and all the trio of the bustling climax seems so much confusion, leading nowhere, you wonder, after all, whether you have heard something great or not; and the chances are that you will still wonder after a twentieth hearing. But we are open to conviction, when so many for whose musical experience and convictions we have great respect, fire with enthusiasm at the very name of Brahms—Joachim, Henschel and so many more. As to Schumann's proclamation of a musical Messiah in Brahms, it must be borne in mind that the insanity which clouded Schumann's later life was somewhat advanced when he wrote that; so some who knew him say.

Handel! We know him well in oratorio. We know precious arias out of his forty odd Italian operas, which Robert Franz and Otto Dresel have furnished with pianoforte accompaniments conceived in the very spirit of the master. "Acis and Galatea," "Alexander's Feast" much of his Suites and of his organ music, is not unfamiliar here. But his concertos are much better known in England. He published twelve "concerti grossi," concertos on a great scale, for two solo violins, with [illegible]

[illegible] which came between the symphonies, on Saturday, is written in seven string parts, and consists of seven movements. Played by such a body of strings, all of such good heart tone, so pure, it sounded rich in color; you imagined you heard oboes, clarinets, bassoons and horns, and looked unwittingly to see them. For there was musical marrow in the combination. Old-fashioned, partly formal as the strains were, seven of them, without change of key, they were as cordial as they were quaint; they make a little go a great way. You feel at every turn the heartiness, the strength, the sweetness, the fresh, invigorating fountain of the inexhaustible Handelian genius. The Introduction, strong and simple, stalks along with majesty and pride. The Allegro, flowing, imitative, contrupuntal, is a graceful, cheerful, wholesome strain. Then the Presto, in six-eighths, off-setting short staccato notes against running figures, is takingly playful. Then comes a Largo in even half-notes, 3-2, quite legato, very serious, making fine contrast. Then another Allegro, plentifully sprinkled with trills and reiterated sixteenths, which is pleasing; and finally a Minuet, rather deliberate in tempo, which is perhaps the most fresh and charming piece of all. The Handelian big wig is not without attractions; and with what a courtly dignity and grace each strain salutes you with its conventional cadence at the close! It sounded strangely between two modern, full-blown symphonies: yet was the contrast interesting, and the old fashion had a smack of novelty, a right Handelian flavor.

Next Saturday the pianist and composer, Xaver Scharwenka, makes his appearance in a concerto of his own (in B-flat minor), preceded by the symphonic poem of Saint-Saëns, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," and followed by "Waldweben," from Wagner's "Siegfried," and the second symphony by Chadwick. J. S. D.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1891.

Symphony Concert A Novelty by George Frideric.

The programme of the fourteenth Symphony concert was:

Schumann. Symphony No. 1, in B flat.
Handel. Concerto Grosso, No. 5, in D, for string orchestra.
Introduction—Allegro—Presto—Largo. Allegro—Minuet.
(First time in Boston.)
Brahms. Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.

The Handel piece is one of a set of 12, for two solo violins, solo 'cello and string orchestra, which the composer of "The Messiah" wrote in England. This particular one was never finished, the introductory movement bears no time mark and, as will be noticed, a minuet ends the work. The "water mark" of Handelian genuis (?) is visible at every page of this concerto, which as a whole is not strikingly characteristic. It was played well, the solo portions by Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Adamowski and Mr. Hekking.

Mr. Nikisch is repeating works played last year with significant and painful frequency; both the symphonies on Saturday's programme were heard here last season, nor were they novelties then. The B flat of Schumann is a beautiful work, and Brahms's C minor is such an expression of artistic pedantry as comes but rarely in a generation, but this does not warrant their performance annually. Mr. Nikisch read both works in the most finished manner; the preroration of each symphony, that of the pupil and that of the master, was grandly played.

There will be a great deal to interest at the next concert. It is seldom that a European celebrity appears with our orchestra, the species generally preferring an independent introduction, with consequent financial mortification; but Mr. Scharwenka is wiser, and it is he who will play his B-flat minor piano concerto for the first time here next Saturday night. Scharwenka is one of the most-sought piano teachers in Berlin. He is making a tournee of the United States, and comes to us after a real success in New York. At this concert Mr. Chadwick's B-flat symphony, Saint-Saens's "Youth of Hercules," and the "Waldweben" of Wagner will be the orchestral numbers.

DAILY MERCURY

SATURDAY, FEB. 7, 1891.

NEW BEDFORD,

Chamber Concert.

The programme of the concert given in the hall in the Odd Fellows Building by the Kneisel Quartet was as follows:

Beethoven. Quartet in C minor, op. 18.
Allegro, ma non tanto.
Andante scherzando (quasi allegretto).
Minuetto—Allegretto.
Bach. Air for Cello.
Schumann. Traumerei.
Popper. Papillon.
Mr. Hekking.
Schubert. Variation from quartet in D minor.
Schumann. Quintet in E flat.
Allegro Brillante.
In modo d'una Marcia.
Scherzo. Allegro, ma non troppo.

The large audience was in no manner disappointed in its realization of the expectations which had brought it together. Much as was anticipated, much more was enjoyed. The programme was most admirable, affording a fair variety, and its interpretation was beyond our ability to adequately praise. Few concerts of this character in this city have so delighted their audiences.

The Quartet consists of Franz Kneisel, [illegible] violin, Otto Roth, second violin, Louis [illegible], viola, Anton Hekking, cello, [illegible] the pianist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 1, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY.

Schumann's first symphony, a concerto for string orchestra, and Brahm's first symphony present in appearance a programme formidable enough to make the stoutest hearts of the Symphony concert devotees quake. But this programme of the thirteenth rehearsal and concert proved far less formidable than it looked; for the first number is not heavy, the second fortunately proved to be brief in length, and light in character, and the last formed a splendid climax to the whole.

Schumann's "Spring" symphony, the most delightful, if not the most profound of the four, shows no signs of age. Coming straight from the heart of a genius, at the happiest period of his life, why should it? The bold, commanding opening measures of the introduction, are as suggestive as ever of the triumph over all the disheartening obstacles that had beset Schumann from the time he began in earnest the study of music. From this point to the end the work never loses its buoyancy, spontaneity and charm. The irrepressible joyousness of the first allegro; the passionate expressiveness of the larghetto; the stateliness and vigor of the scherzo, partaking more of the nature of the minuet than of the jolly, reckless scherzo that Beethoven frequently wrote; the light heartedness of the finale,—all testify to the same condition of mind that is indicated at the outset. Schumann was happy. He had won the battle against the crabbed old man, whose whole body was worth less than his would-be son-in-law's little finger, and the woman he wanted besides. Having had the courage of his convictions for so long a time what wonder that he laid bare his heart to the world, and bade it rejoice with him!

Mr. Nikisch has always reached a high level in his masterly readings of the Schumann symphonies, and this performance was no exception to the rule. The tempi were appropriate, although a trifle slow, perhaps, the scherzo being played almost in minuet time. Still, this fault, if it were a fault, gave opportunity for greater breadth and clearness; of energy and fire there was no lack throughout.

It was very interesting to hear in the same concert the first symphonies of the greatest writers of this form of composition since Beethoven. Schumann and Brahms both wrote much before giving these works to the world. But when that momentous event in their lives took place the former was about twenty-six, while the latter was forty-nine—eighth years older than Schumann was at his death. If Schumann had lived and had the health and experience of Brahms there seems no reason for doubt whatever that he would have risen to heights that Brahms apparently will never attain. For, while being distinctly a man of progress, he had a heart more overflowing with human nature than seemingly has his great successor, which would have kept him more closely in touch with the people; while Brahms, on the contrary, to all appearances, has that within him that seems to force him steadily, if slowly, in the opposite direction. But after all this is mere speculation. No one knows what Schumann might have done, and no one knows what Brahms may yet do. Like Schumann, Brahms does not not write for babes. "Haven't you found out that much in my music," Schumann writes, in the letter already quoted, "that I have got other aims than amusing children and amateurs?"

Brahms's first symphony is truly a noble, thrilling work. How could it have been otherwise welcomed by many of the strongest musicians, including the great, if sometimes fickle, Hans Von Bulow, than as the "tenth symphony." Although there are occasional passages in which the composer's "angularity" of expression are still unwelcome to the ear, the work is so full of great thoughts and deep emotions, that it will never come to be regarded as a mere curiosity, so long as men are as they are. Mr. Nikisch has made the scores of Brahms his own, as well as those of Schumann, and this fact, and the familiarity of the orchestra with this work, was quite sufficient to insure a magnificent performance.

The concerto is the second of a dozen that Handel "turned out," presumably when he had nothing else to do. Three of its seven short movements are quaintly attractive; the larghetto, the minuet, and the finale. The chief reason for the resuscitation of the work, however, lies in its educational value. It is a good thing for the present generation to listen to the instrumental works of the grandfathers of modern music; and occasional performances of similar compositions by Bach would prove even more valuable than the frequent repetitions of the later classics, to which the Symphony audiences have been treated so liberally this season. Schumann, ever the warm, encouraging friend of talented youth, never failed to urge upon such as came to him for advice a constant study of the works of the old masters. In an exceedingly interesting and unusual letter (from the new collection recently published) to a young man who had presumed to advise him to "give up romanticism, and always to write clearly, and so that all could understand him," he replied: "And don't my compositions, especially the greater ones, bear traces here and there of my being more or less acquainted with the great masters? I can always go for advice to them, and have ever done so,—to simple Gluck, to the more intricate Handel, and to the most intricate of all—Bach. Only study the last-named thoroughly, and the most complicated of my works will seem simple to you." So wrote the earnest, sensitive Schumann. He could not bear to be misunderstood, even by a block-head, without trying to set himself aright. The concerto was well played in quite the style of its time, when such dynamic effects as crescendo and diminuendo were unknown, and piano and forte alone prevailed; and the movements just mentioned were applauded with much evident sincerity.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The fourth concert of the series was given last Monday evening in Union Hall. In a programme, of which two of the three numbers consisted of a duo for piano and 'cello, and a trio for piano, violin and 'cello, the string quartet playing of the organization necessarily occupied a retired position. In one number only four members appeared—in Mozart's quartet in D minor, one of the six dedicated to Haydn. Much might be written in detail of the beautiful playing that was done in this delightful work, but it would only be a tale that has been often repeated. Suffice it to say that the quartet were individually and collectively at their best, and that the performance gave evidence of the usual careful preparation. In Rubinstein's sonata for piano and 'cello, Mr. Hekking had Mr. Ernst Perabo as companion. It is rarely indeed that better ensemble playing is heard. Mr. Perabo, perhaps more than any other pianist in the city, has the temperament requisite for this kind of musical performance. His imagination is quickly aroused by the suggestions of responsive emotions that are embodied in the several parts of a composition in chamber-music form; and there is no question, given one or more performers of equal ability, that he at times, rises to great heights of expression. With Mr. Hekking doing unusually heart-felt and brilliant work, it is small wonder that these artists should have reacted on each other, until a reading of the sonata replete with fire, breadth, and the many involuntary touches that mark the performances of born artists was the result. Like the tale that has been told over and over, regarding the Kneisel Quartet, an attempted description of the remarkable interpretation of Schubert's piano trio, opus 99, involves the saying over again of what has just been said. With Messrs. Perabo, Kneisel and Hekking at their best, there remains little to be added. Each player rejoiced not only in his own part, but in the parts of his companions; and artistic taste and skill prevailed to a degree that is all too seldom the case in ensemble playing. That the audience was strongly impressed was quite apparent, for their enthusiastic applause had the true ring to it.

T. P. CURRIER.

Boston Daily Traveller

THURSDAY FEBRUARY 5, 1891.

The programme of the Symphony concert this week is: Symphonic Poem, "Youth of Hercules," St. Saëns; concerto for piano and orchestra, in B-flat minor, X. Scharwenka (piano part to be played by the composer); "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," Wagner; Symphony No. 2, in B flat, Chadwick.

The appearance of Xaver Scharwenka at the Symphony concert this week will introduce to Boston an artist whose name has long been familiar. Scharwenka, now 48 years old and a native of Samter, Posen, was educated at Kullak's Academy, Berlin, where he won distinction even as a boy for his compositions. He made his first public appearance in Berlin when he was 27 years old. After that he became an instructor under Kullak and taught until 1873, when he was compelled to enter the army. In 1877 he returned to his work, appearing in public for the first time as a concert pianist. He produced at Hanover his first important composition, a concerto, op. 32. This was played by the same year in the London Crystal Palace by Mr. Dannreuther, and the following year Scharwenka produced it at the Gewandhaus, Leipsic. In 1879 Scharwenka went to London, and played at the Crystal Palace, the Musical Union and the Philharmonic concerts. In 1881 he made another visit to London, producing his second concerto, op. 36, which he had already played at Vienna. The same year he opened an institution for musical instruction in Berlin, under the title of Scharwenka Musikschule. Many Americans have since been his pupils. His works number nearly 70. In chamber music he has produced two trios, one quartet, one violin and one violoncello sonata. His Polish dances have become very popular, and he has written an opera which has made a success.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 7, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Two symphonies and a great concerto made up a tremendous provision for last Saturday's concert. But, although a better arrangement could have been made in fifty ways, there was one real draw-back in the performance—that the programme was half an hour too long, which is a constant fault with Mr. Nikisch's programmes. The playing of the symphonies, Schubert's first and Brahms's first, was virtually unexceptionable; the unnecessary vehemence with which the introductory "molto" phrase of the former was given out and a few moments of excessive emphasis later on could be easily ignored in view of the noble spirit and the just proportion which prevailed in both works. Indeed, the reading of the Brahms may be set down fairly as Mr. Nikisch's highest achievement in a symphony, for he made the daylight shine through all the complexity of figure and rhythm and yet had his men so well in hand as to temper the gentler movements with soft grace. The intermediate number, one of Handel's dozen concerti grossi for two solo violins and string-band support, was new to Boston and proved to be a delightful acquaintance. Its seven little movements, diverse in tempo and accent, have a family unity of key and likeness in thought, but they are fresh, flowing and only in the fugato of the introduction show the master's severer style. The work was charmingly played, the little solo passages for Messrs. Kneisel and Adamowski standing out purely, and several of the parts getting much applause.

Tonight Mr. Xaver Scharwenka, a celebrity among masters and players of the piano, will make his Boston début, appearing in his own B-flat minor concerto, which he has given to great acceptance in New York. The rest of the programme is standard—Saint-Saëns's "Youth of Hercules," the wood music from Wagner's "Seigfried," and Mr. G. W. Chadwick's second symphony.

[88]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last evening of January brought the fourteenth of the twenty-four concerts which Mr. Arthur Nikisch knows so well to prepare for us and give us. The Music Hall showed but a few vacant seats. The programme offered three names:

Schumann—Op. 38. Symphony No. 1, in B flat.
Handel—Concerto Grosso No. 5, in D, for String Orchestra. Introduction. Allegro. Presto. Largo. Allegro. Minuet.
(First time in Boston.)
Brahms—Op. 68. Symphony No. 1, in C minor.

Schumann's all-alive "Spring" symphony, his first full triumph over the troubles that beset his path, a brilliant and resistless blaze of genius on grasping in good earnest the problem of musical creation in one of the highest forms, made a splendid, an inspiring, opening of the concert. Yet we should have liked it better for the end. If there were to be two large symphonies, Brahms seemed over much for one of them; and we could have wished it over before Schumann came on. A lighter symphony at the beginning, with Schumann at the end, we cannot help thinking, would have been enjoyed with greater zest,—except by the Brahms coterie, who are yet in the minority. The first phrase (horns and trumpets) of the B-flat symphony was taken rather slow; but it was majestic and engrossing, weighty prelude of much to come. How grandly it sweeps both down and up in great wide chords, drops leisurely by semi-tones from the highest A of the flute, into a reflective mood, with fluttering triplets in the middle strings, gradually accelerating, until the Allegro molto vivace leaps forth, running away with that horn and trumpet motive, gathering new thoughts by the way, and developing into that whole splendid movement with irrepressible energy and never-failing promise. The cantabile episode toward the close, for the strings alone, very legato, is full of feeling, which seems born of the very ardor of the movement, which was admirably read as a whole, even if the introduction was a little slower than we have been wont to hear it.

The larghetto, in E flat, three-eighths, so full of deep and tender sentiment, was most warmly, delicately rendered. Every syncopation, every little grace flowering into trill, every crescendo, light and shade, in short, every detail of expression was exact without stiffness, and all sweetly, richly, softly blended. The Scherzo, with its two Trios, one in two-four, the other in three-four time, went charmingly. And what could be more entrancing than the coda, where we take lingering leave of the Scherzo, through those fond phrases of the oboe and the flute—then presto! down glide the violins against the upward chromatic pressure of the basses; a close is made on D, and off starts the irrepressible Finale (Allegro animato e grazioso) in the original key—B flat. With subtle speed and a light, crepitant sound, now loud, now half-suppressed, it runs along the grass like fire, consuming as it goes, launching anon into strong, bold passages. Then a halt! Poco Adagio and Andante. A signal from a single horn; then two in thirds, then a long trill on the flute, leading into a florid cadenza (exquisitely done, of course, by M. Molé), and the movement gathers up its strength for a last attack, a long triumphant close. But it is idle thus to fondly try to recall and bring back salient bits, like sparkling foam from the surface of a tone-ocean, which can only describe itself.

To such a work why make a symphony of of Brahms the pendant? Both, to be sure, are works of high emprise; both sprang from great ambition; perhaps both from genius, though in the latter case that question can not be considered yet quite settled. Both are elaborate, learned, earnest efforts, it cannot be denied. But one is quickening and inspiring, without a dull place in it. Brahms is sometimes heavy and depressing, sometimes rasping to the nerves; his contrapuntal complication is forced through like unpopular bills by obstinate partisans in Congress. He may carry his point with you, grammatically, logically, but you do not thank him, while you admit that it is all very ingenious and very brave. We fancy such to have been the experience of the majority of the audience with the interminable, cheerless, thankless first movement of that C-minor Symphony. Many times it has been heard in Boston; better played it could hardly be than it was this time; yet does it really gain ground with the most appreciative mass of genuine music-lovers? Are they not mostly glad when the movement is over? In the sustained Andante movement we admit sweetness, euphony, dignity and depth of feeling. And in the lighter movement marked un poco allegretto e grazioso, which stands in the customary place of Minuet or Scherzo (perhaps, rather Intermezzo) there is, indeed, a soft and gentle pastoral simplicity, with a melodious flow of mingling wood-wind tones, which rests and soothes the listening sense. It is an ingratiating episode. But when the long Finale begins, first Adagio, it sounds so melancholy and discouraging, that, when the horns announce a new hope, and curiosity is much excited (if you have not heard that shepherd's cry too often) you think that something fine is really at hand; and when the tune is taken up, which you think must have been dreamed after hearing the Joy hymn in Beethoven's Choral Symphony; and yet hope fades away again, and all the brio of the bustling climax seems so much confusion, leading nowhere, you wonder, after all, whether you have heard something great or not; and the chances are that you will still wonder after a twentieth hearing. But we are open to conviction, when so many for whose musical experience and convictions we have great respect, fire with enthusiasm at the very name of Brahms—Joachim, Henschel and so many more. As to Schumann's proclamation of a musical Messiah in Brahms, it must be borne in mind that the insanity which clouded Schumann's later life was somewhat advanced when he wrote that; so some who knew him say.

Handel! We know him well in oratorio. We know precious arias out of his forty odd Italian operas, which Robert Franz and Otto Dressel have furnished with pianoforte accompaniments conceived in the very spirit of the master. "Acis and Galatea," "Alexander's Feast" much of his Suites and of his organ music, is not unfamiliar here. But his concertos are much better known in England. He published twelve "concerti grossi," concertos on a great scale, for two solo violins, with [illegible] violins, 'cellt and bass (that we call string orchestra) accompanying. The one in D, which came between the symphonies, on Saturday, is written in seven string parts, and consists of seven movements. Played by such a body of strings, all of such good heart tone, so pure, it sounded rich in color; you imagined you heard oboes, clarinets, bassoons and horns, and looked unwittingly to see them. For there was musical marrow in the combination. Old-fashioned, partly formal as the strains were, seven of them, without change of key, they were as cordial as they were quaint; they make a little go a great way. You feel at every turn the heartiness, the strength, the sweetness, the fresh, invigorating fountain of the inexhaustible Handelian genius. The Introduction, strong and simple, stalks along with majesty and pride. The Allegro, flowing, imitative, contrupuntal, is a graceful, cheerful, wholesome strain. Then the Presto, in six-eighths, off-setting short staccato notes against running figures, is takingly playful. Then comes a Largo in even half-notes, 3-2, quite legato, very serious, making fine contrast. Then another Allegro, plentifully sprinkled with trills and reiterated sixteenths, which is pleasing; and finally a Minuet, rather deliberate in tempo, which is perhaps the most fresh and charming piece of all. The Handelian big wig is not without attractions; and with what a courtly dignity and grace each strain salutes you with its conventional cadence at the close! It sounded strangely between two modern, full-blown symphonies; yet was the contrast interesting, and the old fashion had a smack of novelty, a right Handelian flavor.

Next Saturday the pianist and composer, Xaver Scharwenka, makes his appearance in a concerto of his own (in B-flat minor), preceded by the symphonic poem of Saint-Saëns, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," and followed by "Waldweben," from Wagner's "Siegfried," and the second symphony by Chadwick. J. S. D.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1891.

Symphony Concert A Novelty by George Frideric.

The programme of the fourteenth Symphony concert was:

Schumann. Symphony No. 1, in B flat.
Handel. Concerto Grosso, No. 5, in D, for string orchestra.
Introduction—Allegro—Presto—Largo. Allegro—Minuet.
(First time in Boston.)
Brahms. Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.

The Handel piece is one of a set of 12, for two solo violins, solo 'cello and string orchestra, which the composer of "The Messiah" wrote in England. This particular one was never finished, the introductory movement bears no time mark and, as will be noticed, a minuet ends the work. The "water mark" of Handelian genuis (?) is visible at every page of this concerto, which as a whole is not strikingly characteristic. It was played well, the solo portions by Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Adamowski and Mr. Hekking.

Mr. Nikisch is repeating works played last year with significant and painful frequency; both the symphonies on Saturday's programme were heard here last season, nor were they novelties then. The B flat of Schumann is a beautiful work, and Brahms's C minor is such an expression of artistic pedantry as comes but rarely in a generation, but this does not warrant their performance annually. Mr. Nikisch read both works in the most finished manner; the prerogation of each symphony, that of the pupil and that of the master, was grandly played.

There will be a great deal to interest at the next concert. It is seldom that a European celebrity appears with our orchestra, the species generally preferring an independent introduction, with consequent financial mortification; but Mr. Scharwenka is wiser, and it is he who will play his B-flat minor piano concerto for the first time here next Saturday night. Scharwenka is one of the most-sought piano teachers in Berlin. He is making a tournee of the United States, and comes to us after a real success in New York. At this concert Mr. Chadwick's B-flat symphony, Saint-Saens's "Youth of Hercules," and the "Waldweben" of Wagner will be the orchestral numbers.

DAILY MERCURY

SATURDAY, FEB. 7, 1891.

NEW BEDFORD,

Chamber Concert.

The programme of the concert given in the hall in the Odd Fellows Building by the Kneisel Quartet was as follows:

Beethoven. Quartet in C minor, op. 18.
Allegro, ma non tanto.
Andante scherzando (quasi allegretto).
Minuetto—Allegretto.
Bach. Air for Cello.
Schumann. Traumerei.
Popper. Papillon.
Mr. Hekking.
Schubert. Variation from quartet in D minor.
Schumann. Quintet in E flat.
Allegro Brillante.
In modo d'una Marcia.
Scherzo. Allegro, ma non troppo.

The large audience was in no manner disappointed in its realization of the expectations which had brought it together. Much as was anticipated, much more was enjoyed. The programme was most admirable, affording a fair variety, and its interpretation was beyond our ability to adequately praise. Few concerts of this character in this city have so delighted their audiences.

The Quartet consists of Franz Kneisel, first violin, Otto Roth, second violin, Louis Svecenski, viola, Anton Hekking, cello. Howard E. Peirce is the pianist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 1, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY.

Schumann's first symphony, a concerto for string orchestra, and Brahm's first symphony present in appearance a programme formidable enough to make the stoutest hearts of the Symphony concert devotees quake. But this programme of the thirteenth rehearsal and concert proved far less formidable than it looked; for the first number is not heavy, the second fortunately proved to be brief in length, and light in character, and the last formed a splendid climax to the whole.

Schumann's "Spring" symphony, the most delightful, if not the most profound of the four, shows no signs of age. Coming straight from the heart of a genius, at the happiest period of his life, why should it? The bold, commanding opening measures of the introduction, are as suggestive as ever of the triumph over all the disheartening obstacles that had beset Schumann from the time he began in earnest the study of music. From this point to the end the work never loses its buoyancy, spontaneity and charm. The irrepressible joyousness of the first allegro; the passionate expressiveness of the larghetto; the stateliness and vigor of the scherzo, partaking more of the nature of the minuet than of the jolly, reckless scherzo that Beethoven frequently wrote; the light heartedness of the finale,—all testify to the same condition of mind that is indicated at the outset. Schumann was happy. He had won the battle against the crabbed old man, whose whole body was worth less than his would-be son-in-law's liltle finger, and the woman he wanted besides. Having had the courage of his convictions for so long a time what wonder that he laid bare his heart to the world, and bade it rejoice with him!

Mr. Nikisch has always reached a high level in his masterly readings of the Schumann symphonies, and this performance was no exception to the rule. The tempi were appropriate, although a trifle slow, perhaps, the scherzo being played almost in minuet time. Still, this fault, if it were a fault, gave opportunity for greater breadth and clearness; of energy and fire there was no lack throughout.

It was very interesting to hear in the same concert the first symphonies of the greatest writers of this form of composition since Beethoven. Schumann and Brahms both wrote much before giving these works to the world. But when that momentous event in their lives took place the former was about twenty-six, while the latter was forty-nine—eighth years older than Schumann was at his death. If Schumann had lived and had the health and experience of Brahms there seems no reason for doubt whatever that he would have risen to heights that Brahms apparently will never attain. For, while being distinctly a man of progress, he had a heart more overflowing with human nature than seemingly has his great successor, which would have kept him more closely in touch with the people; while Brahms, on the contrary, to all appearances, has that within him that seems to force him steadily, if slowly, in the opposite direction. But after all this is mere speculation. No one knows what Schumann might have done, and no one knows what Brahms may yet do. Like Schumann, Brahms does not not write for babes. "Haven't you found out that much in my music," Schumann writes, in the letter already quoted, "that I have got other aims than amusing children and amateurs?"

Brahms's first symphony is truly a noble, thrilling work. How could it have been otherwise welcomed by many of the strongest musicians, including the great, if sometimes fickle, Hans Von Bulow, than as the "tenth symphony." Although there are occasional passages in which the composer's "angularity" of expression are still unwelcome to the ear, the work is so full of great thoughts and deep emotions, that it will never come to be regarded as a mere curiosity, so long as men are as they are. Mr. Nikisch has made the scores of Brahms his own, as well as those of Schumann, and this fact, and the familiarity of the orchestra with this work, was quite sufficient to insure a magnificent performance.

The concerto is the second of a dozen that Handel "turned out," presumably when he had nothing else to do. Three of its seven short movements are quaintly attractive; the larghetto, the minuet, and the finale. The chief reason for the resuscitation of the work, however, lies in its educational value. It is a good thing for the present generation to listen to the instrumental works of the grandfathers of modern music; and occasional performances of similar compositions by Bach would prove even more valuable than the frequent repetitions of the later classics, to which the Symphony audiences have been treated so liberally this season. Schumann, ever the warm, encouraging friend of talented youth, never failed to urge upon such as came to him for advice a constant study of the works of the old masters. In an exceedingly interesting and unusual letter (from the new collection recently published) to a young man who had presumed to advise him to "give up romanticism, and always to write clearly, and so that all could understand him," he replied: "And don't my compositions, especially the greater ones, bear traces here and there of my being more or less acquainted with the great masters? I can always go for advice to them, and have ever done so,—to simple Gluck, to the more intricate Handel, and to the most intricate of all—Bach. Only study the last-named thoroughly, and the most complicated of my works will seem simple to you." So wrote the earnest, sensitive Schumann. He could not bear to be misunderstood, even by a block-head, without trying to set himself aright. The concerto was well played in quite the style of its time, when such dynamic effects as crescendo and diminuendo were unknown, and piano and forte alone prevailed; and the movements just mentioned were applauded with much evident sincerity.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The fourth concert of the series was given last Monday evening in Union Hall. In a programme, of which two of the three numbers consisted of a duo for piano and 'cello, and a trio for piano, violin and 'cello, the string quartet playing of the organization necessarily occupied a retired position. In one number only four members appeared—in Mozart's quartet in D minor, one of the six dedicated to Haydn. Much might be written in detail of the beautiful playing that was done in this delightful work, but it would only be a tale that has been often repeated. Suffice it to say that the quartet were individually and collectively at their best, and that the performance gave evidence of the usual careful preparation. In Rubinstein's sonata for piano and 'cello, Mr. Hekking had Mr. Ernst Perabo as companion. It is rarely indeed that better ensemble playing is heard. Mr. Perabo, perhaps more than any other pianist in the city, has the temperament requisite for this kind of musical performance. His imagination is quickly aroused by the suggestions of responsive emotions that are embodied in the several parts of a composition in chamber-music form; and there is no question, given one or more performers of equal ability, that he at times, rises to great heights of expression. With Mr. Hekking doing unusually heart-felt and brilliant work, it is small wonder that these artists should have reacted on each other, until a reading of the sonata replete with fire, breadth, and the many involuntary touches that mark the performances of born artists was the result. Like the tale that has been told over and over, regarding the Kneisel Quartet, an attempted description of the remarkable interpretation of Schubert's piano trio, opus 99, involves the saying over again of what has just been said. With Messrs. Perabo, Kneisel and Hekking at their best, there remains little to be added. Each player rejoiced not only in his own part, but in the parts of his companions; and artistic taste and skill prevailed to a degree that is all too seldom the case in ensemble playing. That the audience was strongly impressed was quite apparent, for their enthusiastic applause had the true ring to it.

T. P. CURRIER.

Boston Daily Traveller

THURSDAY FEBRUARY 5, 1891.

The programme of the Symphony concert this week is: Symphonic Poem, "Youth of Hercules," St. Saëns; concerto for piano and orchestra, in B-flat minor, X. Scharwenka (piano part to be played by the composer); "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," Wagner; Symphony No. 2, in B flat, Chadwick.

The appearance of Xaver Scharwenka at the Symphony concert this week will introduce to Boston an artist whose name has long been familiar. Scharwenka, now 48 years old and a native of Samter, Posen, was educated at Kullak's Academy, Berlin, where he won distinction even as a boy for his compositions. He made his first public appearance in Berlin when he was 27 years old. After that he became an instructor under Kullak and taught until 1873, when he was compelled to enter the army. In 1877 he returned to his work, appearing in public for the first time as a concert pianist. He produced at Hanover his first important composition, a concerto, op. 32. This was played by the same year in the London Crystal Palace by Mr. Dannreuther, and the following year Scharwenka produced it at the Gewandhaus, Leipsic. In 1879 Scharwenka went to London, and played at the Crystal Palace, the Musical Union and the Philharmonic concerts. In 1881 he made another visit to London, producing his second concerto, op. 36, which he had already played at Vienna. The same year he opened an institution for musical instruction in Berlin, under the title of Scharwenka Musikschule. Many Americans have since been his pupils. His works number nearly 70. In chamber music he has produced two trios, one quartet, one violin and one violoncello sonata. His Polish dances have become very popular, and he has written an opera which has made a success.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 7, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Two symphonies and a great concerto made up a tremendous provision for last Saturday's concert. But, although a better arrangement could have been made in fifty ways, there was one real draw-back in the performance—that the programme was half an hour too long, which is a constant fault with Mr. Nikisch's programmes. The playing of the symphonies, Schubert's first and Brahms's first, was virtually unexceptionable; the unnecessary vehemence with which the introductory "molto" phrase of the former was given out and a few moments of excessive emphasis later on could be easily ignored in view of the noble spirit and the just proportion which prevailed in both works. Indeed, the reading of the Brahms may be set down fairly as Mr. Nikisch's highest achievement in a symphony, for he made the daylight shine through all the complexity of figure and rhythm and yet had his men so well in hand as to temper the gentler movements with soft grace. The intermediate number, one of Handel's dozen concerti grossi for two solo violins and string-band support, was new to Boston and proved to be a delightful acquaintance. Its seven little movements, diverse in tempo and accent, have a family unity of key and likeness in thought, but they are fresh, flowing and only in the fugato of the introduction show the master's severer style. The work was charmingly played, the little solo passages for Messrs. Kneisel and Adamowski standing out purely, and several of the parts getting much applause.

Tonight Mr. Xaver Scharwenka, a celebrity among masters and players of the piano, will make his Boston début, appearing in his own B flat minor concerto, which he has given to great acceptance in New York. The rest of the programme is standard—Saint-Saëns's "Youth of Hercules," the wood music from Wagner's "Seigfried," and Mr. G. W. Chadwick's second symphony.

[88]

Stockbridge Programme

CIRCULATION, 32,000. PORTLAND, FEB. 4, 1891. CHAS. PAINE, PRINTER.

HINDS' HONEY AND ALMOND CREAM

FOR THE FACE, HANDS, SKIN, AND COMPLEXION.

FROM ANNIE LOUISE CARY (Raymond.)

My thanks for the bottle of HONEY AND ALMOND CREAM are late in being made, but I wished to test it thoroughly. I am greatly delighted with it, and wish you would send a dozen bottles to my New York address.

Sept. 21, 1888. ANNIE LOUISE RAYMOND.

BY TELEGRAPH.

(From the distinguished prima donna, who sang in the Stockbridge Course last season.)

NEW YORK, April 21, 1888.

TO A. S. HINDS, Portland, Me. :—I leave for Europe next Tuesday. Send me at once six large bottles HONEY AND ALMOND CREAM to Westminster Hotel.

FRUSCH MADI.

LONDON, Eng., Aug. 8, 1888.

MR. A. S. HINDS:

Sir:—Having had a bottle of your HONEY AND ALMOND CREAM from Mme. Frusch Madi, and finding it agreeable to me, would you kindly send six bottles of the same to

MR. RUDI LANDAUER,
Rue et hotel de Helder, Paris.

HOTEL VENDOME, NEW YORK, Feb. 4, 1887.

MR. HINDS:

Will you please send me as soon as possible, one and a half dozen HONEY AND ALMOND CREAM. I got two bottles when in Portland last fall, and like it so much that I want to distribute some among my friends in the hotel. I have never used anything for rendering the skin smooth that I like so much as this CREAM.

Yours very truly,
MRS. STANLEY.

HOTEL VENDOME, NEW YORK, April 20, 1887.

MR. HINDS:—My friends are delighted with the CREAM. One lady has sent an order through her druggist for six bottles. She told me she has never found anything before that she could use, her skin being very sensitive.

MRS. STANLEY.

MR. A. S. HINDS:

Dear Sir:—I have used your HONEY AND ALMOND CREAM for a long time, in families where I have been called, and consider it invaluable for chafing and irritation of infants. I invariably recommend it in preference to anything else, and have always derived great satisfaction from its use.

Also, as a dressing for blisters, I have found it superior to anything I ever used, giving immediate relief and healing quickly.

MRS. H. J. POTTER, Nurse,
124 Emery Street, Portland.

MR. A. S. HINDS:

I have been troubled with Salt Rheum on my hands very badly for several years; at times they have been so bad that I could not use them. I have tried everything. Last March I saw your CREAM advertised and thought, as a last resort, I would try it; before I had used one bottle my hands were perfectly well. I think I cannot be without it. Thanking you for ever making such a blessing, I remain, etc.,

MRS. E. A. THOMAS.

PRICE, - - 50 CENTS
SPECIAL SIZE, - $1.00

PREPARED BY

A. S. HINDS, Pharmacist,
PORTLAND, MAINE.

WIT AND HUMOR.

"A little nonsense now and then
Is relished by the wisest men."

He—Do you believe in marrying for money, Miss Antique? She—I don't know; how much have you got?

Guest—You seem musical. I always hear you whistling. What is your favorite song? Waiter—Remember me, sah. He got a quarter.

Prodley—I hear you have been getting married. Todley—Yes. Prodley—Whom did you marry? Todley—Millie Jones, her mother, her step-father, and two maiden aunts.

Nowadays the young men of the period don't go down on their knees in nervous agony before their future wives. They hold a solataire diamond ring above their heads and the girls jump for them.

"When your practicing friend across the way has learned to play the cornet, he will entertain the whole neighborhood," said Mrs. Brown. "Yes," said Mrs. Crown, "but by that time there won't be any neighborhood here.

"I see you have mortgaged your house, Jones; what does that mean?" "Oh, I merely bought a ton of hard coal, that's all."

Mr. Goodcatch (calling on the eldest sister) Why, Johnny, how you are growing! You'll be a man before your sister, if you keep on. Johnny—You bet I will. Sister'll never be a man if she keeps on being twenty like she has for the last five years.

Tommy—Are we going to take the cat with us when we go to see grandma next week? Mrs. Figg—Mercy, no, child! Why do you ask such a foolish question? Tommy—'Cause I heard pa tell Mr. Braggs that the mice would have a high old time while the cat was away next week, that's all.

Marthy—Did ye hear any singin' when ye was up ter the city, pap? Farmer Parsely—Waal, I went to the uproar one night; but durn me if I could make out what was goin'. Half the time two or three fellers was singin' at once and pretty often the whole kit and boodle of 'em chimed in together. Marthy—Funny they couldn't be perlite enough to let one get through afore the rest commenced.

Full of Suggestions.

You gaze into our store windows and the thought suggests itself, "that Chamber Set would look better in my room." You enter the store and promenade through the Parlor and Drapery Departments, and the tempting display of rich and entirely new goods suggest a few changes that might be made in your home, and to advantage.

Our Drapery Room Furniture is as exquisite as our Draperies are rich. Chenille and Irish Point, both have equal claims on your attention. The Library and Dining Room Oddities cannot fail to impress you, and when you draw out your check for your purchases the amount required to make your home a spot of beauty will be a pleasant surprise on account of it's small proportions.

No pains have been spared in selecting the goods, they are the first fruits of the New York and Western markets, Carpets especially. Portland citizens can revel in the luxuries of the East without leaving their city.

If medium grades of Furnishing are required, they are equally low in price and late in pattern. Visit our store and we guarantee you perfect satisfaction.

—THE—

Atkinson House Furnishing Co.,

COR. PEARL AND MIDDLE STS.,

PORTLAND, ME.

BRANCHES: Bangor, Auburn, Rockland, Biddeford, Norway, Gardiner, Waterville, Bath.

ISAAC C. ATKINSON, General Manager.

Journal, Augusta, Me
Date 2-3

Next Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a grand concert at the City Hall in Portland. Mr. Arthur Nikisch will be the conductor and he will have 70 musicians on this occasion, Mr. C. M. Loeffler, the famous violinist, will be the soloist. Tickets can be secured at Hunt's music store. Half fare on Maine Central to all holding tickets for the concert.

N HOME JOURNAL.
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1891

The most interesting number of the program of the fourteenth symphony concert given the 31st ult at Music Hall was Handel's "Concerto Grosso," No. 5 in D for string orchestra. It is one of twelve written in October, 1739. It consists of an introduction, allegro, presto, largo, allegro and minuet. The first three movements are treated conventionally in the manner of the time, but the largo, somewhat in the style of Corelli, is very beautiful, and the two last movements are full of freshness and sprightliness. The concerto was well played, and the audience evidently enjoyed it. It is to be wished that more of the music of the eighteenth century could be heard in our symphony concerts. It would not only give pleasure to the audience, it would also serve as an education. It would show what men of genius could do with simple means. In these days a young composer is too apt to think that the expression of even the simplest musical idea demands the resources of the complete orchestra with all the percussion instruments. The other numbers of the program were familiar, and they do not call for special notice. They were Schumann's Symphony No. 1 in B flat, and Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in C minor, op. 68.

[29]

pping from Argus, Portland, Me.
to 2-3

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the tenth entertainment in the regular Stockbridge course Wednesday evening. On this occasion the orchestra will consist of 70 men and Mr. Nikisch will be the conductor. Mr. Hekking, the eminent 'cello player, will be the soloist, in place of Mr. Loeffler, the violinist, who is unable to appear on account of sickness. Many people will not regret the change, considering the wonderful playing of Mr. Hekking at the First Parish church last week. The following excellent programme is offered:

Symphony in B flat, No. 1.....Schumann
{ Andante un poco maestoso.
{ Allegro molto vivace.—
Larghetto.—Scherzo.—
Allegro animato e grazioso.
Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony in F minor, No. 4.....Tschaikowsky
Solo for cello—"O Cara Memoria".....Servais
Mr. Hekking.
Danse Macabre.....Saint-Saens
Vorspiel "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner

Good seats for the concert may be obtained at Stockbridge's. For an entertainment [illegible] any seat in the hall is good, no matter

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.
Date 2-3

Music will be furnished by Given's Orchestra.

Symphony Concert.

At the City Hall, Portland, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a grand festival concert next Wednesday evening. Seventy players will take part. The soloist will be Anton Hekking, the eminent cello player. The programme will be as follows:

1. Symphony in B flat, No. 1, Schumann.
{ Adante un poco maestoso.
{ Allegro molto vivace.—
Larghetto.—Scherzo.—
Allegro animato e grazioso.
2. Adantino and Scherzo from Symphony in F. minor, No. 4, Tschaikowsky.
3. Solo for Cello—"O Cara Memoria," Servais.
Mr. Hekking.
4. Danse Macabre, Saint-Saens.
5. Vorspiel "Die Meistersinger," Wagner

Half fare on the railroads to those holding concert tickets. Late train on the Grand Trunk main line.

McKenna's Flirtation

Gazette, Auburn, Me.
Date 2-3

Quite a number from Auburn and Lewiston attended the Boston Symphony Concert at Portland last evening. Among them were the Rev. G. M. Howe, F. G. Payne, A. L. Winslow, Miss Maud Gulliver, Mr. and Mrs. Calvert, Arthur G. Staples, W. R. Miller, J. L. Wade, and H. L. Plummer.

Times, Bath, Me.
Date

At the City Hall in Portland the Boston Symphony orchestra will give a grand festival concert next Wednesday evening. Seventy players will take part, and the soloist will be Anton Hekking the eminent cello player. The programme is as follows. Symphony in B flat, No. 1, Schumann; Andante un poco maestoso, Allegro molto vivace, Larghetto, — Scherzo, — Allegro animato e grazioso, Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony in F miner, No. 4, Tschaikowsky: Solo for Cello,—"O Cara Memoria," Servais; Mr. Hekking. Danse Macvbre, Saint Saens; Vorspiel "Die Meistersinger," Wagner.

Half fare on the Maine Central to those holding concert tickets.

Stockbridge Programme

CIRCULATION, 32,000. PORTLAND, FEB. 4, 1891. CHAS. PAINE, PRINTER.

HINDS' HONEY AND ALMOND CREAM

FOR THE FACE, HANDS, SKIN, AND COMPLEXION.

FROM ANNIE LOUISE CARY (Raymond.)

My thanks for the bottle of HONEY AND ALMOND CREAM are late in being made, but I wished to test it thoroughly. I am greatly delighted with it, and wish you would send a dozen bottles to my New York address.

Sept. 21, 1888. ANNIE LOUISE RAYMOND.

BY TELEGRAPH.

(From the distinguished prima donna, who sang in the Stockbridge Course last season.)

NEW YORK, April 21, 1888.

To A. S. HINDS, Portland, Me. :—I leave for Europe next Tuesday. Send me at once six large bottles HONEY AND ALMOND CREAM to Westminster Hotel.

FRUSCH MADI.

LONDON, Eng., Aug. 8, 1888.

MR. A. S. HINDS:

Sir:—Having had a bottle of your HONEY AND ALMOND CREAM from Mme. Frusch Madi, and finding it agreeable to me, would you kindly send six bottles of the same to

MR. RUDI LANDAUER,
Rue et hotel de Helder, Paris.

HOTEL VENDOME, NEW YORK, Feb. 4, 1887.

MR. HINDS:

Will you please send me as soon as possible, one and a half dozen HONEY AND ALMOND CREAM. I got two bottles when in Portland last fall, and like it so much that I want to distribute some among my friends in the hotel. I have never used anything for rendering the skin smooth that I like so much as this CREAM.

Yours very truly,
MRS. STANLEY.

HOTEL VENDOME, NEW YORK, April 20, 1887.

MR. HINDS:—My friends are delighted with the CREAM. One lady has sent an order through her druggist for six bottles. She told me she has never found anything before that she could use, her skin being very sensitive. MRS. STANLEY.

MR. A. S. HINDS:

Dear Sir:—I have used your HONEY AND ALMOND CREAM for a long time, in families where I have been called, and consider it invaluable for chafing and irritation of infants. I invariably recommend it in preference to anything else, and have always derived great satisfaction from its use.

Also, as a dressing for blisters, I have found it superior to anything I ever used, giving immediate relief and healing quickly.

MRS. H. J. POTTER, Nurse,
124 Emery Street, Portland.

MR. A. S. HINDS:

I have been troubled with Salt Rheum on my hands very badly for several years; at times they have been so bad that I could not use them. I have tried everything. Last March I saw your CREAM advertised and thought, as a last resort, I would try it; before I had used one bottle my hands were perfectly well. I think I cannot be without it. Thanking you for ever making such a blessing, I remain, etc.,

MRS. E. A. THOMAS.

PRICE, - - 50 CENTS
SPECIAL SIZE, - $1.00

PREPARED BY

A. S. HINDS, Pharmacist,

PORTLAND, MAINE.

WIT AND HUMOR.

"A little nonsense now and then
Is relished by the wisest men."

He—Do you believe in marrying for money, Miss Antique? She—I don't know; how much have you got?

Guest—You seem musical. I always hear you whistling. What is your favorite song? Waiter—Remember me, sah. He got a quarter.

Prodley—I hear you have been getting married. Todley—Yes. Prodley—Whom did you marry? Todley—Millie Jones, her mother, her step-father, and two maiden aunts.

Nowadays the young men of the period don't go down on their knees in nervous agony before their future wives. They hold a solataire diamond ring above their heads and the girls jump for them.

"When your practicing friend across the way has learned to play the cornet, he will entertain the whole neighborhood," said Mrs. Brown. "Yes," said Mrs. Crown, "but by that time there won't be any neighborhood here.

"I see you have mortgaged your house, Jones; what does that mean?" "Oh, I merely bought a ton of hard coal, that's all."

Mr. Goodcatch (calling on the eldest sister) Why, Johnny, how you are growing! You'll be a man before your sister, if you keep on. Johnny—You bet I will. Sister'll never be a man if she keeps on being twenty like she has for the last five years.

Tommy—Are we going to take the cat with us when we go to see grandma next week? Mrs. Figg—Mercy, no, child! Why do you ask such a foolish question? Tommy—'Cause I heard pa tell Mr. Braggs that the mice would have a high old time while the cat was away next week, that's all.

Marthy—Did ye hear any singin' when ye was up ter the city, pap? Farmer Parsely—Waal, I went to the uproar one night; but durn me if I could make out what was goin'. Half the time two or three fellers was singin' at once and pretty often the whole kit and boodle of 'em chimed in together. Marthy—Funny they couldn't be perlite enough to let one get through afore the rest commenced.

Full of Suggestions.

You gaze into our store windows and the thought suggests itself, "that Chamber Set would look better in my room." You enter the store and promenade through the Parlor and Drapery Departments, and the tempting display of rich and entirely new goods suggest a few changes that might be made in your home, and to advantage.

Our Drapery Room Furniture is as exquisite as our Draperies are rich. Chenille and Irish Point, both have equal claims on your attention. The Library and Dining Room Oddities cannot fail to impress you, and when you draw out your check for your purchases the amount required to make your home a spot of beauty will be a pleasant surprise on account of it's small proportions.

No pains have been spared in selecting the goods, they are the first fruits of the New York and Western markets. Carpets especially. Portland citizens can revel in the luxuries of the East without leaving their city.

If medium grades of Furnishing are required, they are equally low in price and late in pattern. Visit our store and we guarantee you perfect satisfaction.

—THE—

Atkinson House Furnishing Co.,

COR. PEARL AND MIDDLE STS.,

PORTLAND, ME.

BRANCHES: Bangor, Auburn, Rockland, Biddeford, Norway, Gardiner, Waterville, Bath.

ISAAC C. ATKINSON, General Manager.

Journal, Augusta, Me

Date 2-3

Next Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a grand concert at the City Hall in Portland. Mr. Arthur Nikisch will be the conductor and he will have 70 musicians on this occasion, Mr. C. M. Loeffler, the famous violinist, will be the soloist. Tickets can be secured at Hunt's music store. Half fare on Maine Central to all holding tickets for the concert.

...pping from ...Augusta, Me.

...te 2-3

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1891

The most interesting number of the program of the fourteenth symphony concert given the 31st ult at Music Hall was Handel's "Concerto Grosso," No. 5 in D for string orchestra. It is one of twelve written in October, 1739. It consists of an introduction, allegro, presto, largo, allegro and minuet. The first three movements are treated conventionally in the manner of the time, but the largo, somewhat in the style of Corelli, is very beautiful, and the two last movements are full of freshness and sprightliness. The concerto was well played, and the audience evidently enjoyed it. It is to be wished that more of the music of the eighteenth century could be heard in our symphony concerts. It would not only give pleasure to the audience, it would also serve as an education. It would show what men of genius could do with simple means. In these days a young composer is too apt to think that the expression of even the simplest musical idea demands the resources of the complete orchestra with all the percussion instruments. The other numbers of the program were familiar, and they do not call for special notice. They were Schumann's Symphony No. 1 in B flat, and Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in C minor, op. 68.

[89]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the tenth entertainment in the regular Stockbridge course Wednesday evening. On this occasion the orchestra will consist of 70 men and Mr. Nikisch will be the conductor. Mr. Hekking, the eminent 'cello player, will be the soloist, in place of Mr. Laeffler, the violinist, who is unable to appear on account of sickness. Many people will not regret the change, considering the wonderful playing of Mr. Hekking at the First Parish church last week. The following excellent programme is offered:

Symphony in B flat, No. 1 ..... Schumann
{ Andante un poco maestoso.
{ Allegro molto vivace.—
Larghetto.—Scherzo.—
Allegro animato e grazioso.
Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony in F minor, No. 4 ..... Tschaikowsky
Solo for cello—"O Cara Memoria" ..... Servais
Mr. Hekking.
Danse Macabre ..... Saint-Saens
Vorspiel "Die Meistersinger" ..... Wagner

Good seats for the concert may be obtained at Stockbridge's. For an entertainment of this kind any seat in the hall is good, no matter how far back it may be.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.

Date 2-3

Music will be furnished by Given's Orchestra.

Symphony Concert.

At the City Hall, Portland, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a grand festival concert next Wednesday evening. Seventy players will take part. The soloist will be Anton Hekking, the eminent 'cello player. The program will be as follows:

1. Symphony in B flat, No. 1, Schumann.
{ Adante un poco maestoso.
{ Allegro molto vivace.—
Larghetto.—Scherzo.—
Allegro animato e grazioso.
2. Adantino and Scherzo from Symphony in F. minor, No. 4, Tschaikowsky.
3. Solo for Cello—"O Cara Memoria," Servais.
Mr. Hekking.
4. Danse Macabre, Saint-Saens.
5. Vorspiel "Die Meistersinger," Wagner

Half fare on the railroads to those holding concert tickets. Late train on the Grand Trunk main line.

McHenna's Flirtation.

Gazette, Auburn, Me.

Date 2-3

Quite a number from Auburn and Lewiston attended the Boston Symphony Concert at Portland last evening. Among them were the Rev. G. M. Howe, F. G. Payne, A. D. Winslow, Miss Maud Gulliver, Mr. and Mrs. Calvert, Arthur G. Staples, W. R. Miller, J. L. Meade, and H. L. Plummer.

Times, Bath, Me.

Date

At the City Hall in Portland the Boston Symphony orchestra will give a grand festival concert next Wednesday evening. Seventy players will take part, and the soloist will be Anton Hekking the eminent cello player. The programme is as follows. Symphony in B flat, No. 1, Schumann; Andante un poco maestoso, Allegro molto vivace, Larghetto, — Scherzo, — Allegro animato e grazioso, Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony in F miner, No. 4, Tschaikowsky: Solo for Cello,—"O Cara Memoria," Servais; Mr. Hekking. Danse Macvbre, Saint Saens; Vorspiel "Die Meistersinger," Wagner.

Half fare on the Maine Central to those holding concert tickets.

In drawing attention to their new linens department, Messrs. OWEN, MOORE & Co. are encouraged by the belief that in offering a choice and carefully selected stock of the finer grades of house-keeping linens at rather lower price than such goods are commonly sold for they accomplish a two-fold object,—do themselves and the linen buying public a good turn which will be more and more appreciated as the new department becomes better known.

Fine Leather Goods,

HOLIDAY GOODS,

Artistic Wall Papers,

—AT—

LORING, SHORT & HARMON'S,

Booksellers and Stationers,

Opp. Preble House, - CONGRESS STREET.

$4.50.

That is awful cheap for a Black Enamel Clock, eight day, half hour strike, Cathedral Gong.

95 cents for a first class Nickle Alarm Clock.

Only $1.50 for a genuine Peep O'Day Alarm Clock.

Only $14.99 for a genuine French Clock, Marble Case, Cathedral Gong, Visible Escapement. This clock will surely please you.

Largest stock of clocks in the city. Of course, my prices are the lowest.

First-class clock repairing by a first-class clock repairer.

McKenney the Jeweler,

MONUMENT SQ., UNDER U. S. HOTEL.

HENRY A. HARDING,

Formerly TIMMONS & HAWES,

Ladies' and Gents' Oyster Rooms,

No. 15 MONUMENT SQUARE,

New Brown Block.

The Finest Ladies' Room East of Boston.
Ladies' Room up one flight.

TELEPHONE, 586.

PROGRAMME.

TENTH ENTERTAINMENT,

Wednesday Evening, Feb. 4th.

BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra,

70—MUSICIANS—70

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor,

MR. ANTON HEKKING, Soloist

1. Symphony in B flat, No. 1, Schumann
   { Andante un poco maestoso.
   { Allegro molto vivace.—
   Larghetto.—Scherzo.—
   Allegro animato e grazioso.
2. Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony in F minor, No. 4, Tschaikowsky
3. Solo for Cello,—"O Cara Memoria," Servais

   MR. HEKKING.
4. Danse Macabre, Saint-Saens
5. Vorspiel "Die Meistersinger," Wagner

NOTE.—The doors will be kept closed during the performance of each number on the Programme.

FOSS'

PURE FLAVORING

EXTRACTS

—ARE THE—

Purest, Strongest, and Best!

Sold and recommended as the finest by some of the largest and best dealers in the country.

—PREPARED BY—

Schlotterbeck & Foss,

Manufacturing Chemists,

PORTLAND, ME.

Our valuable Receipts for Ice Cream and Sherberts, sent to anybody who will inclose a two cent stamp to pay postage.

HASKELL & JONES,

Manufacturers and Retailers of

MEN'S, YOUTHS' AND BOYS'

MEDIUM AND FINE CLOTHING.

In point of fit, style, and excellence of trimmings and workmanship, our Clothing is excelled by none in the Market.

Our Furnishing Goods Department is full of choice things for Fall and Winter.

Full Dress Furishings a Specialty. Dress Suits to Loan.

470 CONGRESS ST., MONUMENT SQUARE.

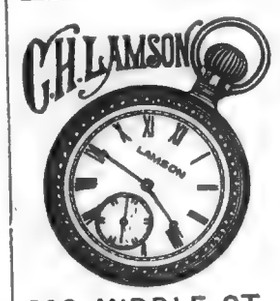
ABNER W. LOWELL,

Successor to W. S. LOWELL,

Fashionable Stationer.

Wedding, Party and Visiting Cards.

513 CONGRESS ST.



REMOVAL.

New Store, New Goods.

Watches, Jewelry.

SPECIAL SALE OF

OPERA GLASSES,

Best Imported Makers, now at 203 MIDDLE ST., Nearly Opp. Falmouth Hotel.

M. STEINERT & SONS,

Of Steinert Hall, Boston, Mass.,

Wholesale and Retail Representatives in the New England States for the Celebrated PIANOS of Steinway & Sons,

Hardman,

Gabler & Bro.,

Henning, and

Pease,

Respectfully announce to the public that they have opened a branch house at 540 CONGRESS STREET, Portland, Me., under the management of

MR. T. C. McGOULDRICK, and they will constantly carry a large and varied stock of these world renowned Pianos.

M. STEINERT & SONS,

540 Congress St., Portland, Me.

BAKER'S TOILET WATERS are of greatest strength, consistent with their high quality.

BAKER'S PERFUMES.

are perfect reproductions of the original flowers in a concentrated form. Sold in ¼, ½, 2, 4 and 8 ounce patent shell stopper bottles.

BAKER'S FLORIDA WATER.

Superior to any on the market for Toilet and Bath.

BAKER'S BAY RUM.

Imported by us, and sold only in 8 ounce bottles. Domestic, distilled from the leaves at our laboratory and highly recommended for ladies desiring a superior article.

Our Perfumes, Toilet Waters and Bay Rum are sold by the leading dealers from Maine to California, and accepted as great favorites, by those desiring an article of Purity.

Always FULL WEIGHT and never adulterated. Try them. Sold everywhere.

MAURICE BAKER & CO.,
PORTLAND, ME.

ROBERT B. SWIFT,

OPTICIAN.

513 CONGRESS STREET.

Stockbridge's Music Store,

540 CONGRESS ST.,

Sheet Music, Music Books,

Musical Instruments,

STRINGS, TRIMMINGS,

MUSICAL MERCHANDISE,

Foreign Editions. Cheap Editions.

Maine ecture and Musical Agency.

TELEPHONE, 415-B.

IRA C. STOCKBRIDGE.

Kleyler's Candies

We are the Sole Agents for these CANDIES which are acknowledged to be the Finest in the World.

Schlotterbeck & Foss,

PORTLAND, ME.

The Eleventh Entertainment in this Course will be given by the Hermanns. Date to be announced later. Tickets now on sale at Stockbridge's.

All Pianos used at these Entertainments are from the Warerooms of
M. STEINERT & SONS,
T. C. McGOULDRIC. MANAGER. 540 Congress St.

The small boy brightly defines a bachelor as "a man who hasn't got no wife, and doesn't want no wife, and can't get no wife."

The following talk, overheard at an orchestral concert, seemed awful funny at the time, passing as it did, between two innocent girls who spoke in dead earnest. The orchestra had just rendered the "Swedish March (No. 2)," and, notwithstanding the vociferous applause, would not respond to an encore. "Why don't they repeat it?" asked one maiden of the other. "O," was the reply, "you don't understand. Don't you see that the programme says 'No two?' That means it is not to be repeated."

One of the prominent ministers of Hartford, Conn., was pacing a hotel corridor not long ago, when a Christian worker approached him with the question, "Are you a Christian?" "I hope so," replied the clergyman, modestly. "Hope so! Don't you know so?" persisted his interlocutor. No reponse from the divine. "Well, now," said the stranger, "if a man strike you on the right cheek, would you turn to him the other also?" "No, I wouldn't, if he had as much cheek as you have," was the reply.

Deutsches Kolinshes Wasser

(OUR NEW GERMAN COLOGNE.)

Made from the Formula of JOHANN MARIE FARINA.

FRAGRANT! DELICATE! LASTING!

—BOTTLED BY—

Schlotterbeck & Foss,

PORTLAND, ME.

Grewer's Vienna Cafe,

508 CONGRESS STREET.

After the Entertainment, call at GREWER'S CAFE for ICE CREAM OR LUNCH.

Oysters served in Every Style.

I have fitted up rooms elegantly, for private parties, and most cordially invite your inspection.

LADIES

Who are accustomed to wearing FINE SHOES, will please take notice that

WYER GREENE & CO.,

Have the exclusive sale in Portland of the celebrated Laird, Schober & Mitchell Fine Shoes.
A larger variety than ever in SPRING GOODS.
539 CONGRESS ST.

CHAS. PAINE,

PRINTING.

118 EXCHANGE ST.,

Telephone, 555. PORTLAND.

PUT UP EXPRESSLY

FOR FAMILY USE

in 3, 5, and 10 lb. pails and 10 lb. tubs; also by the tierce, barrel, half barrels and tubs; is for sale by every first-class grocer and provision dealer—all lard rendered by us is free from all Cotton Seed Oil, Tallow, Suet, and other adulterations so commonly used, and WARRANTED STRICTLY PURE. None genuine without our name stamped upon the package.

PURE LARD

JOHN P. SQUIRE & CO.,
BOSTON, MASS.

MILLINERY.

We now have on exhibition some of the finest PATTERN HATS AND BONNETS ever offered by us.

All Ladies should visit our store while we have so large an assortment of fine goods.

JOHN E. PALMER,

543 Congress Street.

Journal, Augusta, Me
Date 2-3

Next Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a grand concert at the City Hall in Portland. Mr. Arthur Nikisch will be the conductor and he will have 70 musicians on this occasion, Mr. C. M. Loeffler, the famous violinist, will be the soloist. Tickets can be secured at Hunt's music store. Half fare on Maine Central to all holding tickets for the concert.

HOME JOURNAL.
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1891

The most interesting number of the program of the fourteenth symphony concert given the 31st ult at Music Hall was Handel's "Concerto Grosso," No. 5 in D for string orchestra. It is one of twelve written in October, 1739. It consists of an introduction, allegro, presto, largo, Allegro and minuet. The first three movements are treated conventionally in the manner of the time, but the largo, somewhat in the style of Corelli, is very beautiful, and the two last movements are full of freshness and sprightliness. The concerto was well played, and the audience evidently enjoyed it. It is to be wished that more of the music of the eighteenth century could be heard in our symphony concerts. It would not only give pleasure to the audience, it would also serve as an education. It would show what men of genius could do with simple means. In these days a young composer is too apt to think that the expression of even the simplest musical idea demands the resources of the complete orchestra with all the percussion instruments. The other numbers of the program were familiar, and they do not call for special notice. They were Schumann's Symphony No. 1 in B flat, and Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in C minor, op. 68.

pping from Argus, Portland, Me.
te 2-3

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the tenth entertainment in the regular Stockbridge course Wednesday evening. On this occasion the orchestra will consist of 70 men and Mr. Nikisch will be the conductor. Mr. Hekking, the eminent 'cello player, will be the soloist, in place of Mr. Laeffler, the violinist, who is unable to appear on account of sickness. Many people will not regret the change, considering the wonderful playing of Mr. Hekking at the First Parish church last week. The following excellent programme is offered:

Symphony in B flat, No. 1 ..... Schumann
{ Andante un poco maestoso.
{ Allegro molto vivace.—
Larghetto.—Scherzo.—
Allegro animato e grazioso.
Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony in F minor, No. 4 ..... Tschaikowsky
Solo for cello—"O Cara Memoria" ..... Servais
Mr. Hekking.
Danse Macabre ..... Saint-Saens
Vorspiel "Die Meistersinger" ..... Wagner

Good seats for the concert may be obtained at Stockbridge's. For an entertainment of this kind any seat in the hall is good, no matter how far back it may be.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.
Date 2-3

Music will be furnished by Given's Orchestra.

Symphony Concert.

At the City Hall, Portland, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a grand festival concert next Wednesday evening. Seventy players will take part. The soloist will be Anton Hekking, the eminent cello player. The program will be as follows:

1. Symphony in B flat, No. 1, Schumann.
{ Adante un poco maestoso.
{ Allegro molto vivace.—
Larghetto.—Scherzo.—
Allegro animato e grazioso.
2. Adantino and Scherzo from Symphony in F. minor, No. 4, Tschaikowsky.
3. Solo for Cello—"O Cara Memoria," Servais.
Mr. Hekking.
4. Danse Macabre, Saint-Saens.
5. Vorspiel "Die Meistersinger," Wagner

Half fare on the railroads to those holding concert tickets. Late train on the Grand Trunk main line.

McKenna's Flirtation

Gazette, Auburn, Me.
Date 2-5

Quite a number from Auburn and Lewiston attended the Boston Symphony Concert at Portland last evening. Among them were the Rev. G. M. Howe, F. G. Payne, A. L. Winslow, Miss Maud Gulliver, Mr. and Mrs. Calvert, Arthur G. Staples, W. R. Miller, J. L. Beede, and H. L. Plummer.

Times, Bath, Me.
Date

At the City Hall in Portland the Boston Symphony orchestra will give a grand festival concert next Wednesday evening. Seventy players will take part, and the soloist will be Anton Hekking the eminent cello player. The programme is as follows. Symphony in B flat, No. 1, Schumann; Andante un poco maestoso, Allegro molto vivace, Larghetto, — Scherzo, — Allegro animato e grazioso, Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony in F miner, No. 4, Tschaikowsky; Solo for Cello,—"O Cara Memoria," Servais; Mr. Hekking. Danse Macvbre, Saint Saens; Vorspiel "Die Meistersinger," Wagner.

Half fare on the Maine Central to those holding concert tickets.

DIAMONDS! FINE JEWELRY!
Waltham Watches.
WM. SENTER & CO.,
51 Exchange Street, - PORTLAND.

ARTHUR W. BEALE & CO.,
Clothing and Furnishings,
177 MIDDLE ST.,
Two Doors above Post-Office. PORTLAND, ME.

BUSINESS Education.
Shaw's Business College,
507 1-2 Congress St., Over Owen, Moore & Co.
Has Theoretical, Practical and Ladies' Departments in Separate rooms, and accepts no payment in advance.
F. L. SHAW, Principal.

OVERCOATINGS.
We offer for your inspection in our Tailoring Department, an elegant assortment of Kersey and Melton Overcoatings,
For Fall and Winter use. The most popular fabric for this season's wear.
Tailoring Department,
ALLEN & COMPANY,
MIDDLE STREET.

A CARD.

I take pleasure in announcing to the patrons of this Course, that I have fitted up an elegant LADIES' ROOM on the second floor, in addition to the Gents' Room, which is the finest in its furnishings east of Boston. Oysters served in every style. Please give me a call. Very respectfully yours,

HENRY A. HARDING,
Formerly Timmons & Hawes,
15 Monument Square.

Up in the parlor the young folks sat;
With each hour their words grew sweeter,
While her father grim,
With a lantern dim,
Sat down in the cellar and swore with a vim
As he watched every skip of the meter.

Little Ethel (at the close of her first Sunday school)—I fink you ought to div' my money back, mister, 'cause I don't yike dis matinee.

He read the papers: Aunt Clarissa (taking Johhny under the chin)—Good morning, Johnny. Have you— Little Johnny (six years old)—No, mum! I haven't used nobody's soap!

Miss Clef—What is that Miss D'Howlar is singing—isn't it mezzo soprano? Mr. Bowler (whose musical education has been sadly neglected)—Well, that may be the German for it, but in English we call it "Comin' Thro' the Rye." Awfully old song, you know.

A serious mistake: Enraged Father—Well, that's the last time I'll ever be fool enough to give any of my daughters a wedding check! Mother—Why, Charles, there's nothing wrong, I hope. Enraged Father—Yes, but there is. That fool of a son-in-law has gone and had it cashed.

"Then, Miss Antique, you cannot be my wife?" said the young gentleman to the ballet girl to whom he had proposed and by whom he had been gently rejected. "No, Mr. Dood, I cannot be your wife but I will be a grandmother to you."

Peddler—I have here a book entitled "How to Get a Good Complexion—" Woman—I don't want it. Get out. "Pardon me; madam. How could I have made that mistake. I sold that book next door. What I wanted to show you was this book, 'How to Preserve Your Complexion.'" "How much is it?" "Two dollars." "I'll take it."

"But when the stream
Which overflowed the soul was fanned away,
A consciousness remained that it had left,
Deposited upon the silent shore
Of memory, images and precious thoughts
That shall not die, and cannot be destroyed."
Thus the exquisite odor or BAKER'S PERFUME
Will linger long after its substance has fled,
As fragrant, as sweet as a breath of fair June,
The soul of a flower that's withered and dead.

If you want to keep yourself comfortable and happy through our cold winter, buy a Hot Water Bottle and use it.

A soft, warm Lung Protector will add to your comfort, and often prevent a cold. We have a large assortment of both. H. H. HAY & SON.

J. A. MERRILL & CO.,
Jewelers.
DIAMONDS.
503 Congress St., - PORTLAND.
J. A. MERRILL. A. KEITH.

CHAS. F. DAM,
SIGN PAINTER.
Glass Signs and Cards a Specialty.
118 EXCHANGE ST.,
PORTLAND, - MAINE.

THURSTON'S
PIANO HOUSE.
The Largest Assortment of Pianos and Organs,
STOOLS, COVERS, SCARFS,
—AND—
MUSIC CABINETS.
Tuning to Order.
SAMUEL THURSTON,
3 Free St. Block, - 12 Free St.

N HOME JOURNAL.
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1891

The most interesting number of the program of the fourteenth symphony concert given the 31st ult at Music Hall was Handel's "Concerto Grosso," No. 5 in D for string orchestra. It is one of twelve written in October, 1739. It consists of an introduction, allegro, presto, largo, allegro and minuet. The first three movements are treated conventionally in the manner of the time, but the largo, somewhat in the style of Corelli, is very beautiful, and the two last movements are full of freshness and sprightliness. The concerto was well played, and the audience evidently enjoyed it. It is to be wished that more of the music of the eighteenth century could be heard in our symphony concerts. It would not only give pleasure to the audience, it would also serve as an education. It would show what men of genius could do with simple means. In these days a young composer is too apt to think that the expression of even the simplest musical idea demands the resources of the complete orchestra with all the percussion instruments. The other numbers of the program were familiar, and they do not call for special notice. They were Schumann's Symphony No. 1 in B flat, and Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in C minor, op. 68.

[89]

pping from
Argus, Portland, Me.
to 2-3

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the tenth entertainment in the regular Stockbridge course Wednesday evening. On this occasion the orchestra will consist of 70 men and Mr. Nikisch will be the conductor. Mr. Hekking, the eminent 'cello player, will be the soloist, in place of Mr. Laeffler, the violinist, who is unable to appear on account of sickness. Many people will not regret the change, considering the wonderful playing of Mr. Hekking at the First Parish church last week. The following excellent programme is offered:

Symphony in B flat, No. 1.....Schumann
Andante un poco maestoso.
Allegro molto vivace.—
Larghetto.—Scherzo.—
Allegro animato e grazioso.
Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony in F minor, No. 4.....Tschaikowsky
Solo for cello—"O Cara Memoria".....Servais
Mr. Hekking.
Danse Macabre.....Saint Saens
Vorspiel "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner

Good seats for the concert may be obtained at Stockbridge's. For an entertainment

JOURNAL, Lewis
Date 2-
Music will be furnished by G
Symphony
At the City Hall, Portland, t phony Orchestra will give a gr cert next Wednesday evening, ers will take part. The solo
Hekking, the eminent cello pl
gram will be as follows:
1. Symphony in B flat, No. 1,
Adante un poco maest
Allegro molto vivace.
Larghetto.—Scherzo.—
Allegro animato e gra
2. Adantino and Scherzo from minor, No. 4,
3. Solo for Cello—"O Cara Me
Mr. Hekking.
4. Danse Macabre,
5. Vorspiel "Die Meistersing
Half fare on the railroads concert tickets. Late train
Trunk main line.
McKenna's Flir

Gazette, Au
Date 2-5
Quite a number from Au attended the Boston Sym
Portland last evening. A the Rev. G. [illegible] I slow, Miss [illegible]
ert, Ar[illegible]

THE PRESS.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 5.

PORTLAND,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Symphony concert, which formed the tenth entertainment in the Stockbridge course, last evening was a symphony concert indeed. It embraced the whole of the beautiful "spring." Symphony by Schumann, symphony by Tscharkowsky, besides Saint-Saens's "Danse Maccabre," Wagner's "Introduction to the Meistersinger," and a solo for the cello played by Hekking. This, as can readily be seen at a glance, was a pretty hearty meal for a miscellaneous audience, but it was evident that it was fully enjoyed.

The first grand movement in the Schumann Symphony, for horns and trumpets, is grand and engrossing. It sweeps down and up the chords majestically, and then drops leisurely from the highest A of the flute into a reflective mood, with fluttering triplets in the middle strings, gradually accelerating, until the Allegro molto vivace leaps forth, running away with the horn and trumpet motive, gathering new thoughts by the way, and developing into that whole splendid movement with irrepressible energy and never failing promise. The cantabile episode toward the close, for the strings alone, very legato, is full of feeling, which seems born of the very ardor of the movement. The larghetto is full of sentiment. The scherzo, with its two trios, is charming, while the coda is entrancing, with its fond phrases for oboe and flute, its finale on D, and then the allegro animato, in the original key of B, as it rushes along into bold passages, when there is a stop, there comes a signal from a horn, then two in thirds, then a long trill on the flute, leading into a florid cadenza, and then the movement gathers strength and makes a triumphant close. The symphony was magnificently rendered, every little detail was elaborated with great delicacy, and the work of the flute, by Mr. Mole, was especially noticeable.

The "Introduction to the Meistersinger," is a realistic picture executed in robust colors, full of bold antitheses and surprising combinations. In the overture, the leading motives of the drama are displayed singly and in combination, with picturesque effect and striking art. The first subject is the pompous "Mastersinger's" motive. The trumpets and harp in march rythm sound the theme of the Procession of the Mastersingers (from act III). Walther's Prize Song is the third theme, a lovely melody; then comes the representative of the Apprentices, a bustling, chattering subject. The manner in which the two last mentioned subjects play against each other—the first indicative of the freedom of Wagner's art, the second the stilted voice of conventional pedantry—command marked attention.

The weird "Danse Maccabre," which has been heard here before, gave as much pleasure now as then. Beginning with the striking of the hour of twelve the dead rise from their graves and skeletons join in a grewsome dance. The audience wanted a repetition. The two movements from the Russian symphony had the national color. In the andantino each instrument, flute, piccolo, bassoon, etc., play a variaton on the theme that is very taking, while in the second the string are played pizzicato, and a delightful wedding dance motif is introduced.

Mr. Hekking played his solo superbly. His tones were beautiful, his variations most delicately handled and his accompaniments were admirably played by Mr. Zach. For an encore he gave the "Tranmerie."

The audience was very large and for such a concert quite demonstrative.

Portland Advertiser.

SECOND EDITION.

THURSDAY, ... February 5, 1891

The Symphony Concert Last Evening.

The hour and a half, during which the Boston Symphony Orchestra played at City Hall last evening, in the Stockbridge course, seemed short to the great audience which filled every seat. The orchestra numbered 70 men and thus obtained a magnificent volume of tone, without losing a particle of its former delicacy of expression. Mr. Nikisch, who conducted, as usual, all through the intricate programme, without a note of the score before him, could not help feeling complete satisfaction at the perfection of drill to which he has brought his talented players. The Schumann Symphony, No. 1, in B flat was rendered exquisitely, with a vivacity, varied with a depth of expression, that has rarely been surpassed before a Portland audience. Striking effects were produced in the two movements from the Techaikowsky Symphony, No. 4, in F minor. The "Danse Macabre," by Saint-Saens, so pleased the audience that they asked a repetition, which, however, was not granted. The Wagner selection from "the Meistersinger" brought out the tremendous volume of the combined instruments. Mr. Hekking, the 'cello soloist, fairly charmed his hearers by his wonderful playing of "O Cara Memoria" by Servais. (He received so enthusiastic an encore that he responded with the "Traumerei," which he rendered beautifully.

The Symphony orchestra will give its second concert in the Stockbridge course, April 1.

Eastern Argus.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1891.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

City Hall was filled last evening by one of the largest and most fashionable audiences of the season.

The occasion was the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the tenth entertainment in the Stockbridge Course.

To speak at length of the merits of this organization would be a useless as well as unnecessary task, for not only are the people of Portland well acquainted with them, but there is no part of the country which the fame of this organization has not penetrated.

It need only be said that the numbers were rendered with the precision and finish characteristic of the orchestra and were most enthusiastically received. The numbers receiving the most liberal recognition were "Allegro animato e grazioso" from Schumann's Symphony in B flat No. 1, "Danse Macarbe" by Saint-Saens and the cello solo, "O Cara Memoria," by Mr. Hekking. Too much cannot be said in praise of Mr. Hekking's cello playing. His tone was grand, his execution magnificent. At the close of his solo he received a perfect ovation and was compelled to respond to an encore which he did by giving a superb rendition of "Tranmerei."

Taken as a whole the entertainment was one of the best of the course and the Symphony Orchestra can always be assured of an appreciative audience and a cordial welcome from the people of Portland.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 8, 1891.

The Symphony Concert Soloist, Xaver Scharwenka.

A Fine Reception Given Him—The Operatic Festival Matinee Attended by an Immense Audience—"Ship Ahoy!" Begins Its Second Month at the Park—News, Notes, Gossip.

Xaver Scharwenka's appearance as soloist was the event of the Symphony concert last evening, and it is pleasant to record the triumph won by this most talented pianist and composer upon his debut before a Boston public.

The name of Scharwenka has long been familiar to the American musical public, and the interest in the coming of this most admirable artist has been anticipated with great pleasure, so much so that the attendance at last evening's concert largely exceeded that of recent works, and when the soloist of the occasion made his entrance he was received with a most hearty and cheering greeting.

Herr Scharwenka is such a wholesome specimen of a man, he carries his nature so plainly in his bright face and shows his courteous character in so marked a fashion that he has his audience before he touches the piano and has their favor before he has displayed his skill and musical worth as a composer.

This was certainly the case last evening, and few pianists have had a more attentive hearing than that given Herr Scharwenka.

He selected as his number on the programme his own concerto for piano and orchestra in B flat minor, op. 32, a work which has not had a hearing here before, though it is not unfamiliar to pianists in this country. The choice made was thus well calculated to show the pianist at his best, and this best was certainly all that had been anticipated by the most ardent admirer of the evening's soloist.

He is, first of all, a born musician, a man whose nature is fitted to the duties which have occupied his life, and one who fitly represents the composers of today. He has, as a matter of course, all the technical work of the piano at his fingers' tips, but his skill in this direction is a means, not an end, in his playing. He has a delicacy of touch, at pleasure, which makes his playing have all the charm of a woman's daintiest work, and yet he commands all the resources of the instrument with perfect ease. His touch is delightfully free, clear and elastic, and his playing is characterized at all times by admirably good taste, sentiment and expression.

His concerto proved a work of remarkable interest, and the three movements are singularly even in their diversified merits. The contrasting divisions of the opening movement maintain the hearer's interest unabated throughout, and it tends most happily to the dainty, graceful scherzo which makes the second movement. The final allegro is a piece of writing well calculated to command attention and serves to display the skill of the performer with great success. The whole concerto is full of good melodious ideas well developed and elaborated, and makes a composition that commands the approval of the most critical.

No artist could ask for a more pronounced recognition of his abilities than was shown to Herr Scherwenka. The opening movement was heartily applauded, but after the charming scherzo the audience gave him an ovation, and at the finish he was recalled again and again to bow his acknowledgements.

The programme began with Saint Saen's symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," which was splendidly played, and after the concerto an equally gratifying performance of Wagner's "Waldweben" from "Siegfried."

The programme, somewhat over long, by the way, was ended with Mr. C. W. Chadwick's symphony No. 2, in B flat, which has not had a hearing since its first production, about five years ago. It was played under the composer's direction, and more than confirmed all the good impressions it conveyed upon its first hearing. It is a work of rare merit throughout, and its tuneful ideas, so skilfully and artistically treated, charm the hearer and command attention at all times. The work was received with enthusiasm, and the composer has ample cause to take pride in the success attending the performance.

Next Saturday the soloist will be Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, and the programme will include the seventh Beethoven symphony.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 9, 1891

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the fifteenth Symphony concert, given Saturday evening, was as follows:

Symphonic Poem, "The Youth of Hercules" ..... Saint-Saëns
Concerto pianoforte No. 1, in B flat minor, op. 32 ..... Scharwenka
Waldweben, from "Siegfried" ..... Wagner
Symphony No. 2, in B flat, op. 32 ..... Chadwick

Mr. Xaver Scharwenka was heard last week as a pianist for the first time in this city. The heartiness of the welcome which greeted his appearance must have shown him at once that he was not looked upon as a stranger. Indeed, he is no stranger, for his compositions, so well known and so highly appreciated, have endeared to us the man himself. His personality strengthened the impression formed before he came among us. The elegance and fastidious taste seen in his playing, the chivalric nature of many of his themes—these are but the reflection of the man in his works. It is true that his is no longer the lithe and sinewy figure which ten years ago so charmed the women of Berlin. For then when he came upon the stage, you seemed to hear the click of the spurs and the jangling of a sword. He is stouter now; and he looks more like a professor than an officer in civilian's dress. The charm of his manner remains unchanged; the elegance of his playing is still the chief characteristic.

For it is in this quiet elegance of mien and execution that he excels, and the concerto chosen by him displays most fully his personality. It is not a great work, but, as a whole, it is delightful to the ear. It is stronger in the development of the themes than in the themes themselves; but the development is not free from the charge of occasional diffuseness, and the themes sometimes indulge in reminiscences. Scharwenka seems to have taken as a model for the first movement that of the Liszt concerto in E flat. The subjects are well divided between the pianoforte and the orchestra, and the manner in which the return of the first subject is effected is admirably contrived. This movement is too long. The scherzo is charming, thematically and rhythmically; and the instrumentation is very piquant. It was played exquisitely. The last movement is too episodic; yet there is more strength than originality or beauty; the player is given an opportunity for the display of the qualities of the virtuoso.

As a bravura player, Mr. Scharwenka is a curious mixture of the old style and the new. Elegance, as has been before stated, is the most noticeable feature of his playing; such elegance as was formerly set off by small-clothes and diamond buckles. This elegance is not cold; on the contrary it is full of blood. He has been said to remind one of Hummel. This is an apt comparison, if the traditions can be believed, for he, too, has a bravura of crystalline purity, a neat and finished trill, a quiet ease of deportment. But he is a Hummel of today, who lives in the city on the Spree.

If his touch at times seemed thin, if his tone was devoid of sonority, the reason was apparent the moment he struck the keys of the pianoforte. Surely they who have heard him play in his own city will not deny him fullness of tone or marked virility. I remember his performance of this same concerto in 1884 at a concert given by the Philharmonic Orchestra in the large ramshackle building in the Bernburger street, a building once used as a skating rink, the acoustic properties of which were miserable. The dash and fire of his playing were irresistible, and the great audience broke out in applause, perhaps more boisterous, but no more spontaneous and sincere, than that which greeted him last Saturday.

The concert opened with Saint-Saën's "Youth of Hercules," a symphonic poem descriptive of the choice given the hero to follow pleasure or virtue. Although it is a later work (op. 50) than "Omphale" or "Phaëton" or the "Danse Macabre," although it contains beautiful ideas and excellent workmanship, it is not so strong a composition as any one of the last named. It is not so full of inspiration; its episodes are tacked together. Nor can the music which should describe the advances of Pleasure be regarded as truly poetical or musically realistic. When Venus woos, she is quieter in her attack, more subtle in suggestion.

The arranged excerpt from "Siegfried" is one of the more favorable examples of Wagner's genius. Whatever pleasurable emotion may be derived from hearing it depends upon the music itself; there is no need of an adjoined catalogue of cues. Mime, the incestuous couple, the advice-giving birds—can the thought of these fantastic creatures make the music more or less delightful? The title "Waldweben" is enough; it covers the ground.

Mr. Chadwick's Symphony brought this exceedingly interesting concert to a close. It is a work of long breath, well-conceived, well expressed. It is the work of a musician by birth and breeding. It is an honor not only to himself but to his country. It shows a strongly-marked, well-defined individuality. You can not say when you hear it, "Mr. Chadwick is a disciple of X or Z." The music is that which comes out of Mr. Chadwick. It is his way of looking musically at musical things. Without speaking in detail of the many beauties of the work, the second movement must not be passed by. In the first place, it is a scherzo, i. e., it is a jest. He uses the term as Schubert in the eighteenth century in his Sixth Sonata, as Monteverde long before in his three-voiced madrigals. It is not merely a conventional title applied to a fast movement of more or less passionate character with a romantic trio; it is a jolly, jocose movement which approaches the edge of vulgarity. (And there are dealers in words who allege that true fun must be tinged with coarseness.) The opening measures might serve to beat out the time to the heavy feet of roustabouts dancing on the levee. There is a smell of American soil in this same scherza: a suggestion of the good-natured recklessness of the citizens of these States. We have as yet no truly American music; for the great number of compositions written by native composers, however excellent they may be, might be signed by foreign names. Perhaps the melodies written by Dave Braham for the plays of Edward Harrigan are the most serious contribution as yet to American music; for they are eminently characteristic, they suit the persons who appear in these realistic sketches of life in New York, and you cannot imagine them sung with appreciation by the people of other lands. Now, Mr. Chadwick's scherzo could only have been written by an American, for its fun is intensely local, as is its color.

Mr. Chadwick conducted his own symphony, and he was loudly applauded.

The programme for the concert which will be given Saturday evening, Feb. 13, includes Weber's "Freischütz" overture; "Nikia's Dream" and "In the Hammock" from Godard's Symphonie Orientale, and Beethoven's Symphony in A. Mrs. Nikisch will sing the Page's canzonetta and aria from "Figaro" and songs by Schumann, Bizet and Brahms.

PHILIP HALE.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, FEB. 8, 1891.

THE SYMPHONIES.

FIFTEENTH CONCERT.

At last comes the most brilliant concert of the season. It comes none too early, for several of the concerts this year have been very stupid affairs; and on the whole there has been, so far as the audience in Music hall on Saturday evenings is concerned, some such winter of discontent as will be followed by the glorious summer of not hearing any concerts at all. Twenty-four Symphony concerts in one season are a dozen too many. Of the fifteen concerts thus far, six have been classically irreproachable; two, including last night's, may be chronicled as very brilliant affairs, yet slightly unorthodox; and as for the remaining concerts to date, inclusive, their inherent orthodoxy has only been surpassed by their intrinsic stupidity.

This is the way the programme read for last night's concert:

Saint-Saens ...Symphonic Poem, "The Youth of Hercules."
Scharwenka .....Concerto for Piano, No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 32.
Allegro patetico; Adagio; Allegro animato.
Scherzo (Allegro assai).
Allegro non tanto, quasi adagio; allegro molto e passionato.
Wagner.....Waldweben from "Siegfried"
Chadwick....Symphony No. 2, in B-flat, Op. 21
Andante non troppo; Allegro con brio.
Allegretto scherzando.
Largo e maestoso.
Finale.

Saint-Saens's symphonic poem is such an exuberantly "fresh" piece of writing that there surely could have been no impropriety in naming it "The Youth of Saint-Saens." It is wonderfully well scored, however, and like nearly all that its composer writes, it abundantly entertains. Then followed the Scharwenka Concerto, No. 1, in B flat minor, op. 32. The pianist for the work was none other than Xaver Scharwenka himself. Of the work itself the most that can be said of it as the result of a single hearing is that it is a Lisztean work in the most significant sense of the term. It is just such a Concerto as Liszt might have dictated while Scharwenka held the pen. It is virile, brilliant, awe-exciting, immensely difficult, and masterly, while containing very little that would not suggest its composer to be possessed of a truly poetic nature. It is occasionally emphasized by such national characteristics as Scharwenka, like all other Slavonic composers, not excepting Dvorak, seem to find it impossible wholly to disassociate himself from, and in this instance quite to the advantage of the work itself, for in certain respects it lacks any such originality as might otherwise entitle it to rank with the greatest compositions of its class.

Of the composer's performance of the work, too much cannot be said in its praise. Whatsoever rank Herr Scharwenka may enjoy aside from his absolutely flawless playing of last evening, it is no exaggeration to affirm that no pianist who has visited us can be imagined as performing the Scharwenka concerto so magnificently as did the composer himself. His technique was as crisp, clear, reliable and well regulated as it was in every other respect superbly artistic, and Herr Scharwenka's technique was by no means at fault as regards tone.

This opinion, we are well aware, is decidedly at variance with that expressed in a New York evening paper, in which an artist of the highest rank, and a musical creator as well, namely, Xaver Scharwenka, was berated, seemingly because the instrument upon which he performed was not the critic's well-known favorite. This in itself was a piece of impertinence, which really carries with it, although inadvertently, the highest compliment that could possibly be paid the Behr piano, the chosen instrument as it is of a far-famed tone-poet. His exquisite playing showed him to be in perfect sympathy with this instrument, responding as it did to his every inspiration in tones no less voice-like than brilliantly clear and far-reaching.

At the conclusion of Herr Scharwenka's effort, he might well have exclaimed, "Veni, vidi, vici!" for his triumph surpassed anything of the kind that has been witnessed in Boston this season. The remarkable musician, artist and composer was many times recalled.

Then followed the kaleidoscopic effect of the Waldweben music, which is one of the most abnormal specimens of a profane composer's art that Wagner ever wrote.

Chadwick's Second Sympnony came last. Of the work itself it is unnecessary to speak, except to acknowledge that as a musical composition it is radically outrivaled by the composer's Quintet in E flat major. Mr. Chadwick's opus 21 simply proves him capable of writing an immortal symphony, but the great work has not yet been written. His Symphony No. 2 is simply creditable. It is the praiseworthy effort of America's second greatest composer, J. N. Paine still holding the highest rank; Chadwick second, and Arthur Foote, or Mac Dowell—it is a "toss up" between the two,—third.

[90]

THE PRESS.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 5.

PORTLAND,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Symphony concert, which formed the tenth entertainment in the Stockbridge course, last evening was a symphony concert indeed. It embraced the whole of the beautiful "spring." Symphony by Schumann, symphony by Tscharkowsky, besides Saint-Saens's "Danse Maccabre," Wagner's "Introduction to the Meistersinger," and a solo for the cello played by Hekking. This, as can readily be seen at a glance, was a pretty hearty meal for a miscellaneous audience, but it was evident that it was fully enjoyed.

The first grand movement in the Schumann Symphony, for horns and trumpets, is grand and engrossing. It sweeps down and up the chords majestically, and then drops leisurely from the highest A of the flute into a reflective mood, with fluttering triplets in the middle strings, gradually accelerating, until the Allegro molto vivace leaps forth, running away with the horn and trumpet motive, gathering new thoughts by the way, and developing into that whole splendid movement with irrepressible energy and never failing promise. The cantabile episode toward the close, for the strings alone, very legato, is full of feeling, which seems born of the very ardor of the movement. The larghetto is full of sentiment. The scherzo, with its two trios, is charming, while the coda is entrancing, with its fond phrases for oboe and flute, its finale on D, and then the allegro animato, in the original key of B, as it rushes along into bold passages, when there is a stop, there comes a signal from a horn, then two in thirds, then a long trill on the flute, leading into a florid cadenza, and then the movement gathers strength and makes a triumphant close. The symphony was magnificently rendered, every little detail was elaborated with great delicacy, and the work of the flute, by Mr. Mole, was especially noticeable.

The "Introduction to the Meistersinger," is a realistic picture executed in robust colors, full of bold antitheses and surprising combinations. In the overture, the leading motives of the drama are displayed singly and in combination, with picturesque effect and striking art. The first subject is the pompous "Mastersinger's" motive. The trumpets and harp in march rythm sound the theme of the Procession of the Mastersingers (from act III). Walther's Prize Song is the third theme, a lovely melody; then comes the representative of the Apprentices, a bustling, chattering subject. The manner in which the two last mentioned subjects play against each other—the first indicative of the freedom of Wagner's art, the second the stilted voice of conventional pedantry—command marked attention.

The weird "Danse Maccabre," which has been heard here before, gave as much pleasure now as then. Beginning with the striking of the hour of twelve the dead rise from their graves and skeletons join in a grewsome dance. The audience wanted a repetition. The two movements from the Russian symphony had the national color. In the andantino each instrument, flute, piccolo, bassoon, etc., play a variaton on the theme that is very taking, while in the second the string are played pizzicato, and a delightful wedding dance motif is introduced.

Mr. Hekking played his solo superbly. His tones were beautiful, his variations most delicately handled and his accompaniments were admirably played by Mr. Zach. For an encore he gave the "Tranmerei."

The audience was very large and for such a concert quite demonstrative.

Portland Advertiser.

SECOND EDITION.

THURSDAY, ... February 5, 1891

The Symphony Concert Last Evening.

The hour and a half, during which the Boston Symphony Orchestra played at City Hall last evening, in the Stockbridge course, seemed short to the great audience which filled every seat. The orchestra numbered 70 men and thus obtained a magnificent volume of tone, without losing a particle of its former delicacy of expression. Mr. Nikisch, who conducted, as usual, all through the intricate programme, without a note of the score before him, could not help feeling complete satisfaction at the perfection of drill to which he has brought his talented players. The Schumann Symphony, No. 1, in B flat was rendered exquisitely, with a vivacity, varied with a depth of expression, that has rarely been surpassed before a Portland audience. Striking effects were produced in the two movements from the Tschaikowsky Symphony, No. 4, in F minor. The "Danse Macabre," by Saint-Saens, so pleased the audience that they asked a repetition, which, however, was not granted. The Wagner selection from "the Meistersinger" brought out the tremendous volume of the combined instruments. Mr. Hekking, the 'cello soloist, fairly charmed his hearers by his wonderful playing of "O Cara Memoria" by Servais. He received so enthusiastic an encore that he responded with the "Traumerei," which he rendered beautifully.

The Symphony orchestra will give its second concert in the Stockbridge course, April 1.

Eastern Argus.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1891.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

City Hall was filled last evening by one of the largest and most fashionable audiences of the season.

The occasion was the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the tenth entertainment in the Stockbridge Course.

To speak at length of the merits of this organization would be a useless as well as unnecessary task, for not only are the people of Portland well acquainted with them, but there is no part of the country which the fame of this organization has not penetrated.

It need only be said that the numbers were rendered with the precision and finish characteristic of the orchestra and were most enthusiastically received. The numbers receiving the most liberal recognition were "Allegro animato e grazioso" from Schumann's Symphony in B flat No. 1, "Danse Macarbe" by Saint-Saens and the cello solo, "O Cara Memoria," by Mr. Hekking. Too much cannot be said in praise of Mr. Hekking's cello playing. His tone was grand, his execution magnificent. At the close of his solo he received a perfect ovation and was compelled to respond to an encore which he did by giving a superb rendition of "Tranmerei."

Taken as a whole the entertainment was one of the best of the course and the Symphony Orchestra can always be assured of an appreciative audience and a cordial welcome from the people of Portland.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 8, 1891.

The Symphony Concert Soloist, Xaver Scharwenka.

A Fine Reception Given Him—The Operatic Festival Matinee Attended by an Immense Audience—"Ship Ahoy!" Begins Its Second Month at the Park—News, Notes, Gossip.

Xaver Scharwenka's appearance as soloist was the event of the Symphony concert last evening, and it is pleasant to record the triumph won by this most talented pianist and composer upon his debut before a Boston public.

The name of Scharwenka has long been familiar to the American musical public, and the interest in the coming of this most admirable artist has been anticipated with great pleasure, so much so that the attendance at last evening's concert largely exceeded that of recent works, and when the soloist of the occasion made his entrance he was received with a most hearty and cheering greeting.

Herr Scharwenka is such a wholesome specimen of a man, he carries his nature so plainly in his bright face and shows his courteous character in so marked a fashion that he has his audience before he touches the piano and has their favor before he has displayed his skill and musical worth as a composer.

This was certainly the case last evening, and few pianists have had a more attentive hearing than that given Herr Scharwenka.

He selected as his number on the programme his own concerto for piano and orchestra in B flat minor, op. 32, a work which has not had a hearing here before, though it is not unfamiliar to pianists in this country. The choice made was thus well calculated to show the pianist at his best, and this best was certainly all that had been anticipated by the most ardent admirer of the evening's soloist.

He is, first of all, a born musician, a man whose nature is fitted to the duties which have occupied his life, and one who fitly represents the composers of today. He has, as a matter of course, all the technical work of the piano at his fingers' tips, but his skill in this direction is a means, not an end, in his playing. He has a delicacy of touch, at pleasure, which makes his playing have all the charm of a woman's daintiest work, and yet he commands all the resources of the instrument with perfect ease. His touch is delightfully free, clear and elastic, and his playing is characterized at all times by admirably good taste, sentiment and expression.

His concerto proved a work of remarkable interest, and the three movements are singularly even in their diversified merits. The contrasting divisions of the opening movement maintain the hearer's interest unabated throughout, and it tends most happily to the dainty, graceful scherzo which makes the second movement. The final allegro is a piece of writing well calculated to command attention and serves to display the skill of the performer with great success. The whole concerto is full of good melodious ideas well developed and elaborated, and makes a composition that commands the approval of the most critical.

No artist could ask for a more pronounced recognition of his abilities than was shown to Herr Scherwenka. The opening movement was heartily applauded, but after the charming scherzo the audience gave him an ovation, and at the finish he was recalled again and again to bow his acknowledgements.

The programme began with Saint Saen's symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," which was splendidly played, and after the concerto an equally gratifying performance of Wagner's "Waldweben" from "Siegfried."

The programme, somewhat over long, by the way, was ended with Mr. C. W. Chadwick's symphony No. 2, in B flat, which has not had a hearing since its first production, about five years ago. It was played under the composer's direction, and more than confirmed all the good impressions it conveyed upon its first hearing. It is a work of rare merit throughout, and its tuneful ideas, so skilfully and artistically treated, charm the hearer and command attention at all times. The work was received with enthusiasm, and the composer has ample cause to take pride in the success attending the performance.

Next Saturday the soloist will be Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, and the programme will include the seventh Beethoven symphony.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 9, 1891

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the fifteenth Symphony concert, given Saturday evening, was as follows:

Symphonic Poem, "The Youth of Hercules" ..... Saint-Saëns
Concerto pianoforte No. 1, in B flat minor, op. 32 ..... Scharwenka
Waldweben, from "Siegfried" ..... Wagner
Symphony No. 2, in B flat, op. 32 ..... Chadwick

Mr. Xaver Scharwenka was heard last week as a pianist for the first time in this city. The heartiness of the welcome which greeted his appearance must have shown him at once that he was not looked upon as a stranger. Indeed, he is no stranger, for his compositions, so well known and so highly appreciated, have endeared to us the man himself. His personality strengthened the impression formed before he came among us. The elegance and fastidious taste seen in his playing, the chivalric nature of many of his themes—these are but the reflection of the man in his works. It is true that his is no longer the lithe and sinewy figure which ten years ago so charmed the women of Berlin. For then when he came upon the stage, you seemed to hear the click of the spurs and the jangling of a sword. He is stouter now; and he looks more like a professor than an officer in civilian's dress. The charm of his manner remains unchanged; the elegance of his playing is still the chief characteristic.

For it is in this quiet elegance of mien and execution that he excels, and the concerto chosen by him displays most fully his personality. It is not a great work, but, as a whole, it is delightful to the ear. It is stronger in the development of the themes than in the themes themselves; but the development is not free from the charge of occasional diffuseness, and the themes sometimes indulge in reminiscences. Scharwenka seems to have taken as a model for the first movement that of the Liszt concerto in E flat. The subjects are well divided between the pianoforte and the orchestra, and the manner in which the return of the first subject is effected is admirably contrived. This movement is too long. The scherzo is charming, thematically and rhythmically; and the instrumentation is very piquant. It was played exquisitely. The last movement is too episodic; yet there is more strength than originality or beauty; the player is given an opportunity for the display of the qualities of the virtuoso.

As a bravura player, Mr. Scharwenka is a curious mixture of the old style and the new. Elegance, as has been before stated, is the most noticeable feature of his playing; such elegance as was formerly set off by small-clothes and diamond buckles. This elegance is not cold; on the contrary it is full of blood. He has been said to remind one of Hummel. This is an apt comparison, if the traditions can be believed, for he, too, has a bravura of crystalline purity, a neat and finished trill, a quiet ease of deportment. But he is a Hummel of today, who lives in the city on the Spree.

If his touch at times seemed thin, if his tone was devoid of sonority, the reason was apparent the moment he struck the keys of the pianoforte. Surely they who have heard him play in his own city will not deny him fullness of tone or marked virility. I remember his performance of this same concerto in 1884 at a concert given by the Philharmonic Orchestra in the large ramshackle building in the Bernburger street, a building once used as a skating rink, the acoustic properties of which were miserable. The dash and fire of his playing were irresistible, and the great audience broke out in applause, perhaps more boisterous, but no more spontaneous and sincere, than that which greeted him last Saturday.

The concert opened with Saint-Saën's "Youth of Hercules," a symphonic poem descriptive of the choice given the hero to follow pleasure or virtue. Although it is a later work (op. 50) than "Omphale" or "Phaéton" or the "Danse Macabre," although it contains beautiful ideas and excellent workmanship, it is not so strong a composition as any one of the last named. It is not so full of inspiration; its episodes are tacked together. Nor can the music which should describe the advances of Pleasure be regarded as truly poetical or musically realistic. When Venus woos, she is quieter in her attack; more subtle in suggestion.

The arranged excerpt from "Siegfried" is one of the more favorable examples of Wagner's genius. Whatever pleasurable emotion may be derived from hearing it depends upon the music itself; there is no need of an adjoined catalogue of cues. Mime, the incestuous couple, the advice-giving birds—can the thought of these fantastic creatures make the music more or less delightful? The title "Waldweben" is enough; it covers the ground.

Mr. Chadwick's Symphony brought this exceedingly interesting concert to a close. It is a work of long-breath, well-conceived, well expressed. It is the work of a musician by birth and breeding. It is an honor not only to himself but to his country. It shows a strongly-marked, well-defined individuality. You can not say when you hear it, "Mr. Chadwick is a disciple of X or Z." The music is that which comes out of Mr. Chadwick. It is his way of looking musically at musical things. Without speaking in detail of the many beauties of the work, the second movement must not be passed by. In the first place, it is a scherzo, i. e., it is a jest. He uses the term as Schubert in the eighteenth century in his Sixth Sonata, as Monteverde long before in his three-voiced madrigals. It is not merely a conventional title applied to a fast movement of more or less passionate character with a romantic trio; it is a jolly, jocose movement which approaches the edge of vulgarity. (And there are dealers in words who allege that true fun must be tinged with coarseness.) The opening measures might serve to beat out the time to the heavy feet of roustabouts dancing on the levee. There is a smell of American soil in this same scherza: a suggestion of the good-natured recklessness of the citizens of these States. We have as yet no truly American music; for the great number of compositions written by native composers, however excellent they may be, might be signed by foreign names. Perhaps the melodies written by Dave Braham for the plays of Edward Harrigan are the most serious contribution as yet to American music; for they are eminently characteristic, they suit the persons who appear in these realistic sketches of life in New York, and you cannot imagine them sung with appreciation by the people of other lands. Now, Mr. Chadwick's scherzo could only have been written by an American, for its fun is intensely local, as is its color.

Mr. Chadwick conducted his own symphony, and he was loudly applauded.

The programme for the concert which will be given Saturday evening, Feb. 13, includes Weber's "Freischütz" overture; "Nikia's Dream" and "In the Hammock" from Godard's Symphonie Orientale, and Beethoven's Symphony in A. Mrs. Nikisch will sing the Page's canzonetta and aria from "Figaro" and songs by Schumann, Bizet and Brahms.

PHILIP HALE.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, FEB. 8, 1891.

THE SYMPHONIES.

FIFTEENTH CONCERT.

At last comes the most brilliant concert of the season. It comes none too early, for several of the concerts this year have been very stupid affairs; and on the whole there has been, so far as the audience in Music hall on Saturday evenings is concerned, some such winter of discontent as will be followed by the glorious summer of not hearing any concerts at all. Twenty-four Symphony concerts in one season are a dozen too many. Of the fifteen concerts thus far, six have been classically irreproachable; two, including last night's, may be chronicled as very brilliant affairs, yet slightly unorthodox; and as for the remaining concerts to date, inclusive, their inherent orthodoxy has only been surpassed by their intrinsic stupidity.

This is the way the programme read for last night's concert:

Saint-Saens ...Symphonic Poem, "The Youth of Hercules."
Scharwenka .....Concerto for Piano, No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 32.
  Allegro patetico; Adagio; Allegro animato.
  Scherzo (Allegro assai).
  Allegro non tanto, quasi adagio; allegro molto e passionato.
Wagner.....Waldweben from "Siegfried"
Chadwick....Symphony No. 2, in B-flat, Op. 21
  Andante non troppo; Allegro con brio.
  Allegretto scherzando.
  Largo e maestoso.
  Finale.

Saint-Saens's symphonic poem is such an exuberantly "fresh" piece of writing that there surely could have been no impropriety in naming it "The Youth of Saint-Saens." It is wonderfully well scored, however, and like nearly all that its composer writes, it abundantly entertains. Then followed the Scharwenka Concerto, No. 1, in B flat minor, op. 32. The pianist for the work was none other than Xaver Scharwenka himself. Of the work itself the most that can be said of it as the result of a single hearing is that it is a Lisztean work in the most significant sense of the term. It is just such a Concerto as Liszt might have dictated while Scharwenka held the pen. It is virile, brilliant, awe-exciting, immensely difficult, and masterly, while containing very little that would not suggest its composer to be possessed of a truly poetic nature. It is occasionally emphasized by such national characteristics as Scharwenka, like all other Slavonic composers, not excepting Dvorak, seem to find it impossible wholly to disassociate himself from, and in this instance quite to the advantage of the work itself, for in certain respects it lacks any such originality as might otherwise entitle it to rank with the greatest compositions of its class.

Of the composer's performance of the work, too much cannot be said in its praise. Whatsoever rank Herr Scharwenka may enjoy aside from his absolutely flawless playing of last evening, it is no exaggeration to affirm that no pianist who has visited us can be imagined as performing the Scharwenka concerto so magnificently as did the composer himself. His technique was as crisp, clear, reliable and well regulated as it was in every other respect superbly artistic, and Herr Scharwenka's technique was by no means at fault as regards tone.

This opinion, we are well aware, is decidedly at variance with that expressed in a New York evening paper, in which an artist of the highest rank, and a musical creator as well, namely, Xaver Scharwenka, was berated, seemingly because the instrument upon which he performed was not the critic's well-known favorite. This in itself was a piece of impertinence, which really carries with it, although inadvertently, the highest compliment that could possibly be paid the Behr piano, the chosen instrument as it is of a far-famed tone-poet. His exquisite playing showed him to be in perfect sympathy with this instrument, responding as it did to his every inspiration in tones no less voice-like than brilliantly clear and far-reaching.

At the conclusion of Herr Scharwenka's effort, he might well have exclaimed, "Veni, vidi, vici!" for his triumph surpassed anything of the kind that has been witnessed in Boston this season. The remarkable musician, artist and composer was many times recalled.

Then followed the kaleidoscopic effect of the Waldweben music, which is one of the most abnormal specimens of a profane composer's art that Wagner ever wrote.

Chadwick's Second Sympnony came last. Of the work itself it is unnecessary to speak, except to acknowledge that as a musical composition it is radically outrivaled by the composer's Quintet in E flat major. Mr. Chadwick's opus 21 simply proves him capable of writing an immortal symphony, but the great work has not yet been written. His Symphony No. 2 is simply creditable. It is the praiseworthy effort of America's second greatest composer, J. N. Paine still holding the highest rank; Chadwick second, and Arthur Foote, or Mac Dowell—'t is a "toss up" between the two,—third.

[90]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 8, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY.

A wholly delightful programme, that of the fifteenth rehearsal and concert! The music was fresh, spontaneous, bubbling over with melody, and each number fitted its place to a charm. The concert opened with St. Saens's symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules." "On his entrance into life Hercules sees open before him two roads, that of pleasure and that of virtue. Insensible to the seductions of nymphs, and Bacchantes, the hero enters the road of struggles and combats, at the end of which he sees immortality." This is what St. Saens attempts to illustrate. The poem begins with a serene, peaceful theme, which is developed into a movement presumably describing the path of virtue, and the feelings of joy and contentment that invariably fill the breast of its faithful follower. Seductive passages for flute and piccolo, which, thanks to the perseverance of many composers, unflinchingly bring before the mind's eye scenes of wild Bacchanalian orgies, now make a timid appearance before the preceding movement comes to a full close, and are rapidly developed into a graphic picture of the kind of enjoyment those who relapse from virtue are supposed to experience. This scene of unhallowed delight is suddenly interrupted by martial strains describing the "struggles and combats"; and after a brilliant working out of all the themes, the poem ends as serenely as it begins. The work is skillfully put together and is full of the charm that the best of St. Saens's music possesses. Its style and orchestration recall to mind his other and better known symphonic poems; and although it does not contain so many elements of popularity its artistic finish should always insure it a welcome. It was delightfully played and warmly applauded.

Mr. Xaver Scharwenka, the noted composer, pianist and teacher, of Berlin, who has recently come to this country on a concert tour, appeared as soloist in his own concerto in B flat minor, opus 32. This work proved to be unusually interesting. Its freedom of form, melodiousness, brilliant and eminently pianistic treatment of the solo part, skillful construction and orchestration, all combine to command one's attention throughout. The first and last movements have bold, fiery themes, alternating with quiet, sometimes tender, episodes in adagio form; and the middle movement, which is a scherzo, instead of the conventional adagio or andante, is full of grace and fancy. The orchestral part is carefully worked out and is in admirable keeping with the piano part. As a whole, the concerto is not deep in thought nor weighty in matter. But it is an especially graceful, attractive composition that gives much pleasure in the hearing.

Mr. Scharwenka's pianoforte playing is a splendid example of the elegant Kullak school. Perfect ease, freedom, evenness of finger technique, beautifully clear and "feathery" octaves, and firm, resonant chord-playing are its characteristics. It is not the "orchestral" school of playing; it is more like De Pachmann's (with De Pachmann's affectations omitted). As a player, Mr. Scharwenka is wholly sincere and entirely free from clap-trap; but his touch is altogether too light for Music Hall. He was received with manifest delight by the audience, who recalled him again and again. It is to be hoped that he will be heard again in some piano recitals here before his return to Europe.

Following the concerto, came the Forest music, from Wagner's "Siegfried," which has been arranged for concert purposes, under the title of "Waldweben." The selection is well known; and it is unnecessary to say that it was exquisitely played.

The symphony was Chadwick's second in B flat, opus 21, which was conducted by the composer. It is a pity that this work, so full of youthful spirit, independence and talent should have received only two performances in Boston previous to the one under notice. When the amount of labored "Capelmeister" music that has found its way into the symphony concert programmes is taken into consideration, this neglect seems the more reprehensible. If an American can write with the strength that Mr. Chadwick displays in this symphony, his work should be performed at least frequently enough to afford him more than a grain of encouragement. Boston is not fast in acknowledging the talent of its resident artists.

The four movements of the symphony are happily contrasted. The first is broad and strong, possessing all the characteristics of the most important part of a symphony. The scherzo, which follows, is delightfully jolly and melodious; and the largo e maestoso forms a fine introduction to the finale, which is to some extent an epitome of the chief themes of the previous movements. The whole work is thoroughly musical in character, and leaves no impression of uncertainty in design or of straining after mere effect. Mr. Chadwick conducted with a skill and freedom that left no doubt of his capacity in this direction; and the performance was the cause of many enthusiastic demonstrations on the part of the audience.

T. P. CURRIER.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, FEB. 8, 1891.

SYMPHONY OFFERINGS.

An Enjoyable Programme Has for Soloist Xaver Scharwenka.

Patrons of last week's symphony concert had the pleasure of welcoming to Boston a pianist whose fame had long preceded his appearance here. Xaver Scharwenka as a composer was already a favorite. As a performer he came a stranger. His greeting was cordial, but it was not until after he had played the second number of his own concerto that the symphony audience was stirred to a display of genuine enthusiasm. Rarely has a pianist won such unqualified approval. Friday afternoon's assemblage was not at all like the "proverbably undemonstrative rehearsal audience." They recalled him no less than five times, and really seemed to wish that he would disregard time-honored precedent and contribute an encore number.

Xaver Scharwenka is undoubtedly a great pianist, but he is by no means greater than several players who have recently been heard here. His playing is not strikingly brilliant, but it is uncommonly satisfying. His touch is true and clear, and his execution is equal to all ordinary demands. While he is not lacking in force, his pianissimo effects are particularly pleasing. His playing, no less than his personal appearance, is notable for absence of ornate display. There is never a suggestion of affectation in his work, and his thoroughly honest, straightforward methods are quite refreshing. But it is as an interpreter, rather than as an exponent, of technical possibilities, that Mr. Scharwenka most commands our admiration.

The concerto played yesterday is numbered 32 in this versatile composer's list of works and is generally considered his best writing for the pianoforte. It was played at a symphony concert several years ago and a second hearing has strengthened the favorable impression already created. The first movement is fresh and vigorous in its treatment of two good subjects which depend as much for their development upon the orchestra as they do upon the piano. The scherzo is deliciously melodious, and its dainty effects are heightened by brilliant orchestral coloring. The final movement is energetic if not particularly melodious, and affords the performer excellent opportunities.

Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," was the first number of Director Nikisch's programme. This characteristic work of the brilliant French composer was superbly interpreted. No less delightful was the performance of Wagner's "Voices of the Forest" from "Siegfried." Seldom has Mr. Nikisch been more happy in portraying the master's tone pictures. Mr. George W. Chadwick's symphony No. 2 in B flat, op. 21, was the final offering, and this splendid work was heard again with genuine pleasure. It is one of the most notable orchestral compositions ever written by an American, and Bostonians are justly proud of the fact that the composer is one of their number.

The programme announced for the next concert is unusually attractive. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will be the soloist, and she will sing a suit of songs from Schuman, Bizet and Brahms, with piano accompaniment. The orchestral numbers will include the overture from "Freischuetz," the page's cauzonetta and page's aria from the "Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's beautiful symphony in A No. 7, and, for the first time, the "Nikia's Dream" and "In the Hammock" from the Symphonic Orientale by Benjamin Godard.

Boston Journal.

WITH SUPPLEMENT.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 9, 1891.

MORNING EDITION.

The Symphony Concert.

The applause which greeted Mr. Nikisch at the close of the performance of Wagner's "Waldweben" Saturday evening on his retirement to allow Mr. Chadwick to conduct his own symphony must have convinced the symphony director that the audience is able to appreciate a programme as well arranged and as full of excellent music as was this one. The event of the concert, of course, was the appearance of Scharwenka, but, in addition, there was a symphonic poem by Saint Saens, a selection by Wagner and Chadwick's symphony. There was certainly an array of modern and American composition sufficient to satisfy the most enthusiastic devotee of the new school, and, what was better, it was all good music. A selection because of its novelty alone is often less to be commended than the oft-heard work of the old masters, and the series of concerts is drawing to a close without many things which had been anticipated with pleasure.

Scharwenka was warmly greeted and made a favorable impression as he seated himself at the piano. There was an unusually large attendance on admission tickets, which was diminished materially at the end of his concert, showing that with them he was the attraction. He has been the recipient of many social attentions during the week, which may or may not have accounted for it. At all events, they were very enthusiastic over his performance, and this may be said, also, of the regular audience, to whom the Concerto in B flat, his most ambitious work, as well as his masterly delivery of it, were equally enjoyable. At the end of the scherzo he was the recipient of an ovation, and at the close of the number he was recalled five times. The piano is not necessarily obtrusive in the concerto and the orchestra as well as the solo pianist were recognizable in the ensemble. The work of the orchestra was admirable in this as in the other numbers. The closing selection was the symphony in B flat by G. W. Chadwick, given here in 1886 and performed since in Cincinnati and Chicago. Mr. Chadwick himself conducted, a very unusual thing in the history of these concerts, and the young composer, who is a favorite here, had a very cordial reception. The work was well played, and the impressions formed at its first rendition were more than confirmed by a second hearing. Next Saturday evening Mrs. Arthur Nikisch is to be the soloist.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 8.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concerts.

Last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened with a splendidly-colored and perfect performance of Saint-Saëns's "The Youth of Hercules," perhaps the most serious and the best of his symphonic poems. Then followed Xaver Scharwenka's concerto No. 1, in B-flat, for piano, played by the composer himself. It is a well-written and musicianly work, with many interesting moments, but on the whole it is dull and over-long. In the first and last movements there is much rambling toward nowhere in particular, and the effect is tiresome. The Scherzo is the most melodious movement and the clearest in meaning and results. It is all well-made music, pure in style and taste and artistic in every essential, but it is wanting in continuous interest, and perhaps too, in decided character. As a player Mr. Scharwenka may be heartily praised for the clearness, the precision and the brilliancy of his technique. He plays with ease, and with much of that delicate grace, finish and easy fluency that characterized the Hummel school. His scale runs were delightful in their evenness, their clear, pearly touch and their liquid flow. Fine taste and a freedom from all sensationalism are striking characteristics of his playing, and the refinement that characterized all that he did made listening to him a genuine pleasure. He does not seem to have much physical power, but that may be owing to the instrument on which he played, which was dull and muffled in tone and was wanting in carrying quality generally. Mr. Scharwenka was applauded with immense enthusiasm, and received four recalls. After this followed Wagner's exasperatingly unmeaning "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," which was exquisitely played, but which could well have been spared. The concert ended with Mr. G. W. Chadwick's fine Symphony No. 2, in B-flat, which had been heard at these concerts once before. It is the most lofty and most impressive, and, taken altogether, the strongest and best orchestral work of its composer, by whom it was conducted, and with great fire and effect. It made a brilliant impression, despite the fact that the audience was somewhat wearied before the symphony was reached owing to the unnecessary Wagner selection which preceded it. It was listened to with interest and was heartily, and appreciatively applauded, the composer receiving especial and cordial acknowledgment. For the next concert the programme is: Weber's "Freyschutz" overture, two selections from Godard's "Symphonie Orientale," and Beethoven's seventh symphony. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch is to be the soloist, and will sing two airs by Mozart, and a group of songs.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

BOSTON, FEB. 15, 1891.

— The men of the Symphony Orchestra express much gratification at the reception awarded them in New York last week at Mrs. Havemeyer's musicale. The hostess treated the orchestra in the most princely fashion, ordering an elaborate breakfast to be served after the rehearsal in the morning, and at night personally seeing that they received every attention with the invited guests.

— The musicale given by Mrs. Theodore Havemeyer at her magnificent residence in New York, last week, was signalized by having the Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Nikisch perform the programme. The affair was the most delightful of the season, and it is said that it takes the lead of all the musicales that have been given this year. The music was given in the white and gold ball-room which was recently completed, and was decorated with gold flowers, the tall golden candelabra being banks of tulips, daffodils, jonquils and other beautiful blooms. Following the music, a superb supper was served in the dining-room, which is hung with magnificent tapestries and is one of the finest rooms in a city of palaces. Mrs. Havemeyer wore a gown of pearl gray faille embroidered with steel; and her daughter, a very pretty girl, who assisted her mother in receiving, was gowned in rose silk with soft frills of chiffon. Among the guests present were Sir Roderick Cameron and the Misses Cameron, Miss May Jaffray, Mrs. J. P. Kernochan, Mrs. Orme Wilson, Mrs. Robert Goelet, Miss Sallie Hargous, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Whitney, the Misses Hewitt, Mrs. William Jaffray and Mrs. Henry Sloane.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fifteenth concert of the season, Saturday evening, Feb. 7, did not offer a first-class programme from the point of view of intrinsically good music. It consisted of four modern works more or less original and interesting in various ways; namely these:

Saint-Saëns: Symphonic Poem: "The Youth of Hercules."
Scharwenka: Op. 32. Piano Concerto, No. 1, in B-flat minor.
Wagner: Waldweben, from "Siegfried."
Chadwick: Op. 21. Second Symphony in B-flat.
Soloist: Mr. Xaver Scharwenka.

Musically, the French composer's "La Jeunesse d'Hercule" pleased us most. It is, perhaps, the most serious, the least fantastical, sensational, of his symphonic poems. It takes up Hercules at the parting of the two ways—the way of virtue and the way of pleasure. With great beauty of orchestration, pleasing, quiet and contented themes, melodious and clear development, youth in its innocence and freshness, its frankness and pure aspiration, is suggested in a music that is lovely and refined. As passions gain the upper hand the harmony becomes more turbid, the movement more restless, agitated and sensational, at times outré and overwrought and even furious; but the good genius in the end prevails, and we have a tone poem of a high, consistent quality. It was both delicately and powerfully rendered, every instrument at hand and equal to each requirement.

Doubtless the central point of interest with the larger portion of the audience was the new pianist—the pianist himself, rather than his own concerto. We have been all but deluged with notable piano virtuosos during the past fortnight. Helen Hopekirk, Rummel, Pachmann, our own Perabo and Baermann; nor are they all; and now comes Xaver Scharwenka, known here already as composer, heralded as master in one of the highest modern schools of pianoforte playing. Indeed, this little globe threatens to be drenched and soaked with wonderful piano virtuosity. Hosts of young women and young knights go off all over Europe in quest of the magnetic stone which shall draw greater wonders from their fingers than were ever heard or seen before. Here we have just read a book in which an English lady, Bettina Walker, relates her "musical experiences" as a pianoforte student. With a good deal of gush, yet with good sense and literary cleverness, she tells how she studied with Sterndale Bennett; how, he dying, she rushed to Taussig, only a few weeks before he, too, was called away; then to Rome to study with Sgambati, making the acquaintance there of Liszt; then to Berlin, where she was long under the influence of Deppe, and Scharwenka likewise; finally to Russia, where, best of all, she won her way into the friendship as well as the severe schooling of that real poet-musician, then advanced in years, Adolph Henselt. Surely she should have learned and treasured up more than a little in that long and multifarious crusade! But the striking feature of the business is the enormous consequence attached to modern pianoforte virtuosity. To be a pianist in the front rank of the famous masters seems to absorb all the other interests of life. If it were to be a genial and complete musician, if music were the real theme of so much rhapsody and gush and so much cruel discipline of nerves and cords and muscles, it would be worth the while for real talent, genius. But no, the goal of human effort is piano-playing. And when the wonderful execution is acquired, what of it? Does it not soon shrink, to the mind's eye, in the measure of the heart and the imagination, to tiresome commonplace like any other? How frequently the long concert or "recital" of the most technically marvellous pianist leaves you with that question on your mind!

Now this is meant in no disparagement of Mr. Scharwenka or his function, or profession. We found real pleasure in his playing. It had fine finish and proportion. It was free from extravagances; no pounding, no startling sensational effects, no charlatanry of mere show. It was an easy, graceful, refined, tasteful rendering of the difficult concerto he had written to give him field for the illustration of those qualities. Not a concerto great or of marked originality as music. Not a work of genius, of depth of thought or feeling, or kindling with poetic imagination. On the other hand it was free from extravagance, well composed, consistent, musical; under his fingers it read like a genial, tasteful work of good style. We have said that Mr. Scharwenka did not pound; yet he did bring out genuine heart-tone, all that the musical thought required—at least to the extent permitted by the instrument he used, which was not a Chickering nor a Steinway! His performance was self-possessed and manly; not dry, not weak, nor frivolous, nor overdone, nor sentimental. And the whole manner and bearing of the man were worthy of an artist of his fame.

Then came Wagner,—a scene or fragment of him as arranged by somebody for orchestral concert performance. "Waldweben" a term often used by German poets, hardly has its equivalent in English. Literally it is "wood-weaving," meaning the intermingling sounds of life and stir in the forest, —the breeze, the leaves, birds, insects and what not. The French "susurre" comes near it,—hum, buzz, whisper. Anyhow, Wagner describes the sensations which steal over the young Siegfried in his day-dream as he sits rapt and full of wonder in the wood. It opens with a creeping, whispering, monotonous interweaving of soft instrumental sounds, not mysteriously beautiful nor novel. Then the birds begin to sing from flute, oboe, clarinet, horn, in characteristic phrases, pretty enough when played so well, but occupying time which might better have been saved for fresher listening to the long symphony which followed.

Mr. Chadwick's B-flat Symphony is on the whole the most important of his orchestral productions, and should, by good rights, have been heard more than once or twice among us by this time. It is the repeated hearing that tests the stuff of which a symphony is woven. He conducted the performance in person, and in a way to make the musicians sure and at home on their journey. It had every advantage of skilled performance and artistic rendering. It shows throughout the art of handling the orchestra; it shows musical ideas, with good skill in working them. Most of the work is interesting. The opening Andante, led in by the horns, is beautiful and fraught with promise which does not fail. The Allegro con brio sustains the interest and has much fire and spirit. The Allegretto scherzando was the most charming movement. The Largo e maestoso, too, seems well conceived and forms good contrast by its deeper mood. It was in the Finale, with its recapitulation of much from the other movements, that we felt some vagueness, some lack of spontaneous development and growth; but mind and sense were weary then.

Next Saturday holds out a fascinating promise—the "Freyschütz" overture; two numbers from Godard's "Symphonie Orientale;" Beethoven's Seventh Symphony for final climax; besides which all will be eager to hear Mrs. Arthur Nikisch sing the Page's songs from Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro," and songs with piano by Bizet, Schumann and Brahms.

J. S. D.

[91]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 8, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY.

A wholly delightful programme, that of the fifteenth rehearsal and concert! The music was fresh, spontaneous, bubbling over with melody, and each number fitted its place to a charm. The concert opened with St. Saens's symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules." "On his entrance into life Hercules sees open before him two roads, that of pleasure and that of virtue. Insensible to the seductions of nymphs, and Bacchantes, the hero enters the road of struggles and combats, at the end of which he sees immortality." This is what St. Saens attempts to illustrate. The poem begins with a serene, peaceful theme, which is developed into a movement presumably describing the path of virtue, and the feelings of joy and contentment that invariably fill the breast of its faithful follower. Seductive passages for flute and piccolo, which, thanks to the perseverance of many composers, unflinchingly bring before the mind's eye scenes of wild Bacchanalian orgies, now make a timid appearance before the preceding movement comes to a full close, and are rapidly developed into a graphic picture of the kind of enjoyment those who relapse from virtue are supposed to experience. This scene of unhallowed delight is suddenly interrupted by martial strains describing the "struggles and combats"; and after a brilliant working out of all the themes, the poem ends as serenely as it begins. The work is skillfully put together and is full of the charm that the best of St. Saens's music possesses. Its style and orchestration recall to mind his other and better known symphonic poems; and although it does not contain so many elements of popularity its artistic finish should always insure it a welcome. It was delightfully played and warmly applauded.

Mr. Xaver Scharwenka, the noted composer, pianist and teacher, of Berlin, who has recently come to this country on a concert tour, appeared as soloist in his own concerto in B flat minor, opus 32. This work proved to be unusually interesting. Its freedom of form, melodiousness, brilliant and eminently pianistic treatment of the solo part, skillful construction and orchestration, all combine to command one's attention throughout. The first and last movements have bold, fiery themes, alternating with quiet, sometimes tender, episodes in adagio form; and the middle movement, which is a scherzo, instead of the conventional adagio or andante, is full of grace and fancy. The orchestral part is carefully worked out and is in admirable keeping with the piano part. As a whole, the concerto is not deep in thought nor weighty in matter. But it is an especially graceful, attractive composition that gives much pleasure in the hearing.

Mr. Scharwenka's pianoforte playing is a splendid example of the elegant Kullak school. Perfect ease, freedom, evenness of finger technique, beautifully clear and "feathery" octaves, and firm, resonant chord-playing are its characteristics. It is not the "orchestral" school of playing; it is more like De Pachmann's (with De Pachmann's affectations omitted). As a player, Mr. Scharwenka is wholly sincere and entirely free from clap-trap; but his touch is altogether too light for Music Hall. He was received with manifest delight by the audience, who recalled him again and again. It is to be hoped that he will be heard again in some piano recitals here before his return to Europe.

Following the concerto, came the Forest music, from Wagner's "Siegfried," which has been arranged for concert purposes, under the title of "Waldweben." The selection is well known; and it is unnecessary to say that it was exquisitely played.

The symphony was Chadwick's second in B flat, opus 21, which was conducted by the composer. It is a pity that this work, so full of youthful spirit, independence and talent should have received only two performances in Boston previous to the one under notice. When the amount of labored "Capelmeister" music that has found its way into the symphony concert programmes is taken into consideration, this neglect seems the more reprehensible. If an American can write with the strength that Mr. Chadwick displays in this symphony, his work should be performed at least frequently enough to afford him more than a grain of encouragement. Boston is not fast in acknowledging the talent of its resident artists.

The four movements of the symphony are happily contrasted. The first is broad and strong, possessing all the characteristics of the most important part of a symphony. The scherzo, which follows, is delightfully jolly and melodious; and the largo e maestoso forms a fine introduction to the finale, which is to some extent an epitome of the chief themes of the previous movements. The whole work is thoroughly musical in character, and leaves no impression of uncertainty in design or of straining after mere effect. Mr. Chadwick conducted with a skill and freedom that left no doubt of his capacity in this direction; and the performance was the cause of many enthusiastic demonstrations on the part of the audience.

T. P. CURRIER.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, FEB. 8, 1891.

SYMPHONY OFFERINGS.

An Enjoyable Programme Has for Soloist Xaver Scharwenka.

Patrons of last week's symphony concert had the pleasure of welcoming to Boston a pianist whose fame had long preceded his appearance here. Xaver Scharwenka as a composer was already a favorite. As a performer he came a stranger. His greeting was cordial, but it was not until after he had played the second number of his own concerto that the symphony audience was stirred to a display of genuine enthusiasm. Rarely has a pianist won such unqualified approval. Friday afternoon's assemblage was not at all like the "proverbably undemonstrative rehearsal audience." They recalled him no less than five times, and really seemed to wish that he would disregard time-honored precedent and contribute an encore number.

Xaver Scharwenka is undoubtedly a great pianist, but he is by no means greater than several players who have recently been heard here. His playing is not strikingly brilliant, but it is uncommonly satisfying. His touch is true and clear, and his execution is equal to all ordinary demands. While he is not lacking in force, his pianissimo effects are particularly pleasing. His playing, no less than his personal appearance, is notable for absence of ornate display. There is never a suggestion of affectation in his work, and his thoroughly honest, straightforward methods are quite refreshing. But it is as an interpreter, rather than as an exponent, of technical possibilities, that Mr. Scharwenka most commands our admiration.

The concerto played yesterday is numbered 32 in this versatile composer's list of works and is generally considered his best writing for the pianoforte. It was played at a symphony concert several years ago and a second hearing has strengthened the favorable impression already created. The first movement is fresh and vigorous in its treatment of two good subjects which depend as much for their development upon the orchestra as they do upon the piano. The scherzo is deliciously melodious, and its dainty effects are heightened by brilliant orchestral coloring. The final movement is energetic if not particularly melodious, and affords the performer excellent opportunities.

Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," was the first number of Director Nikisch's programme. This characteristic work of the brilliant French composer was superbly interpreted. No less delightful was the performance of Wagner's "Voices of the Forest" from "Siegfried." Seldom has Mr. Nikisch been more happy in portraying the master's tone pictures. Mr. George W. Chadwick's symphony No. 2 in B flat, op. 21, was the final offering, and this splendid work was heard again with genuine pleasure. It is one of the most notable orchestral compositions ever written by an American, and Bostonians are justly proud of the fact that the composer is one of their number.

The programme announced for the next concert is unusually attractive. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will be the soloist, and she will sing a suit of songs from Schuman, Bizet and Brahms, with piano accompaniment. The orchestral numbers will include the overture from "Freischuetz," the page's cauzonetta and page's aria from the "Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's beautiful symphony in A No. 7, and, for the first time, the "Nikia's Dream" and "In the Hammock" from the Symphonie Orientale by Benjamin Godard.

Boston Journal.

WITH SUPPLEMENT.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 9, 1891.

MORNING EDITION.

The Symphony Concert.

The applause which greeted Mr. Nikisch at the close of the performance of Wagner's "Waldweben" Saturday evening on his retirement to allow Mr. Chadwick to conduct his own symphony must have convinced the symphony director that the audience is able to appreciate a programme as well arranged and as full of excellent music as was this one. The event of the concert, of course, was the appearance of Scharwenka, but, in addition, there was a symphonic poem by Saint Saens, a selection by Wagner and Chadwick's symphony. There was certainly an array of modern and American composition sufficient to satisfy the most enthusiastic devotee of the new school, and, what was better, it was all good music. A selection because of its novelty alone is often less to be commended than the oft-heard work of the old masters, and the series of concerts is drawing to a close without many things which had been anticipated with pleasure.

Scharwenka was warmly greeted and made a favorable impression as he seated himself at the piano. There was an unusually large attendance on admission tickets, which was diminished materially at the end of his concert, showing that with them he was the attraction. He has been the recipient of many social attentions during the week, which may or may not have accounted for it. At all events, they were very enthusiastic over his performance, and this may be said, also, of the regular audience, to whom the Concerto in B flat, his most ambitious work, as well as his masterly delivery of it, were equally enjoyable. At the end of the scherzo he was the recipient of an ovation, and at the close of the number he was recalled five times. The piano is not necessarily obtrusive in the concerto and the orchestra as well as the solo pianist were recognizable in the ensemble. The work of the orchestra was admirable in this as in the other numbers. The closing selection was the symphony in B flat by G. W. Chadwick, given here in 1886 and performed since in Cincinnati and Chicago. Mr. Chadwick himself conducted, a very unusual thing in the history of these concerts, and the young composer, who is a favorite here, had a very cordial reception. The work was well played, and the impressions formed at its first rendition were more than confirmed by a second hearing. Next Saturday evening Mrs. Arthur Nikisch is to be the soloist.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 8.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concerts.

Last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened with a splendidly-colored and perfect performance of Saint-Saëns's "The Youth of Hercules," perhaps the most serious and the best of his symphonic poems. Then followed Xaver Scharwenka's concerto No. 1, in B-flat, for piano, played by the composer himself. It is a well-written and musicianly work, with many interesting moments, but on the whole it is dull and over-long. In the first and last movements there is much rambling toward nowhere in particular, and the effect is tiresome. The Scherzo is the most melodious movement and the clearest in meaning and results. It is all well-made music, pure in style and taste and artistic in every essential, but it is wanting in continuous interest, and perhaps too, in decided character. As a player Mr. Scharwenka may be heartily praised for the clearness, the precision and the brilliancy of his technique. He plays with ease, and with much of that delicate grace, finish and easy fluency that characterized the Hummel school. His scale runs were delightful in their evenness, their clear, pearly touch and their liquid flow. Fine taste and a freedom from all sensationalism are striking characteristics of his playing, and the refinement that characterized all that he did made listening to him a genuine pleasure. He does not seem to have much physical power, but that may be owing to the instrument on which he played, which was dull and muffled in tone and was wanting in carrying quality generally. Mr. Scharwenka was applauded with immense enthusiasm, and received four recalls. After this followed Wagner's exasperatingly unmeaning "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," which was exquisitely played, but which could well have been spared. The concert ended with Mr. G. W. Chadwick's fine Symphony No. 2, in B-flat, which had been heard at these concerts once before. It is the most lofty and most impressive, and, taken altogether, the strongest and best orchestral work of its composer, by whom it was conducted, and with great fire and effect. It made a brilliant impression, despite the fact that the audience was somewhat wearied before the symphony was reached owing to the unnecessary Wagner selection which preceded it. It was listened to with interest and was heartily, and appreciatively applauded, the composer receiving especial and cordial acknowledgment. For the next concert the programme is: Weber's "Freyschutz" overture, two selections from Godard's "Symphonie Orientale," and Beethoven's seventh ssmphony. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch is to be the soloist, and will sing two airs by Mozart, and a group of songs.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fifteenth concert of the season, Saturday evening, Feb. 7, did not offer a first-class programme from the point of view of intrinsically good music. It consisted of four modern works more or less original and interesting in various ways; namely these:

Saint-Saëns: Symphonic Poem: "The Youth of Hercules."
Scharwenka: Op. 32. Piano Concerto, No. 1, in B-flat minor.
Wagner: Waldweben, from "Siegfried."
Chadwick: Op. 21. Second Symphony in B-flat.
Soloist: Mr. Xaver Scharwenka.

Musically, the French composer's "La Jeunesse d'Hercule" pleased us most. It is, perhaps, the most serious, the least fantastical, sensational, of his symphonic poems. It takes up Hercules at the parting of the two ways—the way of virtue and the way of pleasure. With great beauty of orchestration, pleasing, quiet and contented themes, melodious and clear development, youth in its innocence and freshness, its frankness and pure aspiration, is suggested in a music that is lovely and refined. As passions gain the upper hand the harmony becomes more turbid, the movement more restless, agitated and sensational, at times outré and overwrought and even furious; but the good genius in the end prevails, and we have a tone poem of a high, consistent quality. It was both delicately and powerfully rendered, every instrument at hand and equal to each requirement.

Doubtless the central point of interest with the larger portion of the audience was the new pianist—the pianist himself, rather than his own concerto. We have been all but deluged with notable piano virtuosos during the past fortnight. Helen Hopekirk, Rummel, Pachmann, our own Perabo and Baermann; nor are they all; and now comes Xaver Scharwenka, known here already as composer, heralded as master in one of the highest modern schools of pianoforte playing. Indeed, this little globe threatens to be drenched and soaked with wonderful piano virtuosity. Hosts of young women and young knights go off all over Europe in quest of the magnetic stone which shall draw greater wonders from their fingers than were ever heard or seen before. Here we have just read a book in which an English lady, Bettina Walker, relates her "musical experiences" as a pianoforte student. With a good deal of gush, yet with good sense and literary cleverness, she tells how she studied with Sterndale Bennett; how, he dying, she rushed to Taussig, only a few weeks before he, too, was called away; then to Rome to study with Sgambati, making the acquaintance there of Liszt; then to Berlin, where she was long under the influence of Deppe, and Scharwenka likewise; finally to Russia, where, best of all, she won her way into the friendship as well as the severe schooling of that real poet-musician, then advanced in years, Adolph Henselt. Surely she should have learned and treasured up more than a little in that long and multifarious crusade! But the striking feature of the business is the enormous consequence attached to modern pianoforte virtuosity. To be a pianist in the front rank of the famous masters seems to absorb all the other interests of life. If it were to be a genial and complete musician, if music were the real theme of so much rhapsody and gush and so much cruel discipline of nerves and cords and muscles, it would be worth the while for real talent, genius. But no, the goal of human effort is piano-playing. And when the wonderful execution is acquired, what of it? Does it not soon shrink, to the mind's eye, in the measure of the heart and the imagination, to tiresome commonplace like any other? How frequently the long concert or "recital" of the most technically marvellous pianist leaves you with that question on your mind!

Now this is meant in no disparagement of Mr. Scharwenka or his function, or profession. We found real pleasure in his playing. It had fine finish and proportion. It was free from extravagances; no pounding, no startling sensational effects, no charlatanry of mere show. It was an easy, graceful, refined, tasteful rendering of the difficult concerto he had written to give him field for the illustration of those qualities. Not a concerto great or of marked originality as music. Not a work of genius, of depth of thought or feeling, or kindling with poetic imagination. On the other hand it was free from extravagance, well composed, consistent, musical; under his fingers it read like a genial, tasteful work of good style. We have said that Mr. Scharwenka did not pound; yet he did bring out genuine heart-tone, all that the musical thought required—at least to the extent permitted by the instrument he used, which was not a Chickering nor a Steinway! His performance was self-possessed and manly; not dry, not weak, nor frivolous, nor overdone, nor sentimental. And the whole manner and bearing of the man were worthy of an artist of his fame.

Then came Wagner,—a scene or fragment of him as arranged by somebody for orchestral concert performance. "Waldweben" a term often used by German poets, hardly has its equivalent in English. Literally it is "wood-weaving," meaning the intermingling sounds of life and stir in the forest, —the breeze, the leaves, birds, insects and what not. The French "susurre" comes near it,—hum, buzz, whisper. Anyhow, Wagner describes the sensations which steal over the young Siegfried in his day-dream as he sits rapt and full of wonder in the wood. It opens with a creeping, whispering, monotonous interweaving of soft instrumental sounds, not mysteriously beautiful nor novel. Then the birds begin to sing from flute, oboe, clarinet, horn, in characteristic phrases, pretty enough when played so well, but occupying time which might better have been saved for fresher listening to the long symphony which followed.

Mr. Chadwick's B-flat Symphony is on the whole the most important of his orchestral productions, and should, by good rights, have been heard more than once or twice among us by this time. It is the repeated hearing that tests the stuff of which a symphony is woven. He conducted the performance in person, and in a way to make the musicians sure and at home on their journey. It had every advantage of skilled performance and artistic rendering. It shows throughout the art of handling the orchestra; it shows musical ideas, with good skill in working them. Most of the work is interesting. The opening Andante, led in by the horns, is beautiful and fraught with promise which does not fail. The Allegro con brio sustains the interest and has much fire and spirit. The Allegretto scherzando was the most charming movement. The Largo e maestoso, too, seems well conceived and forms good contrast by its deeper mood. It was in the Finale, with its recapitulation of much from the other movements, that we felt some vagueness, some lack of spontaneous development and growth; but mind and sense were weary then.

Next Saturday holds out a fascinating promise—the "Freyschütz" overture; two numbers from Godard's "Symphonie Orientale;" Beethoven's Seventh Symphony for final climax; besides which all will be eager to hear Mrs. Arthur Nikisch sing the Page's songs from Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro," and songs with piano by Bizet, Schumann and Brahms.

J. S. D.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

BOSTON, FEB. 15, 1891.

—The men of the Symphony Orchestra express much gratification at the reception awarded them in New York last week at Mrs. Havemeyer's musicale. The hostess treated the orchestra in the most princely fashion, ordering an elaborate breakfast to be served after the rehearsal in the morning, and at night personally seeing that they received every attention with the invited guests.

—The musicale given by Mrs. Theodore Havemeyer at her magnificent residence in New York, last week, was signalized by having the Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Nikisch perform the programme. The affair was the most delightful of the season, and it is said that it takes the lead of all the musicales that have been given this year. The music was given in the white and gold ball-room which was recently completed, and was decorated with gold flowers, the tall golden candelabra being banks of tulips, daffodils, jonquils and other beautiful blooms. Following the music, a superb supper was served in the dining-room, which is hung with magnificent tapestries and is one of the finest rooms in a city of palaces. Mrs. Havemeyer wore a gown of pearl gray faille embroidered with steel; and her daughter, a very pretty girl, who assisted her mother in receiving, was gowned in rose silk with soft frills of chiffon. Among the guests present were Sir Roderick Cameron and the Misses Cameron, Miss May Jaffray, Mrs. J. P. Kernochan, Mrs. Orme Wilson, Mrs. Robert Goelet, Miss Sallie Hargous, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Whitney, the Misses Hewitt, Mrs. William Jaffray and Mrs. Henry Sloane.

[91]

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1891.

MUSIC.

Symphony Concert — A Modern Programme.

Xaver Scharwenka: His Piano Concerto and His Playing.

The programme of the fifteenth Symphony concert with Xaver Scharwenka, soloist, was:

Saint-Saens.....
Symphonic Poem, "The Youth of Hercules"
Scharwenka.....
Concerto for Piano, No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 32.
Allegro patetico; Adagio; Allegro animato.
Scherzo (Allegro assai).
Allegro non tanto, quasi adagio; allegro molto e passionato.
Wagner.....Waldweben from "Siegfried"
Chadwick..Symphony No. 2, in B-flat, Op. 21
Andante non troppo; Allegro con brio.
Allegretto scherzando.
Largo e maestoso.
Finale.

The interest and pleasure in this admirable programme of modern composers was enhanced by the presence as soloist of the composer of the concerto, Mr. Xaver Scharwenka. Scharwenka is one of the most active of the younger coterie of Berlin musicians. Though he has written a symphony, two piano concertos and an opera, he is known to Americans chiefly through his piano music. Desiring an artistic outing among a new people, Scharwenka, whose concert tours have covered the greater part of civilized Europe, including a country as dubiously musical as England, turns his face to the United States. It is but a step, and a most natural one, for a man of his ability, from the dock in New York to Boston Music Hall. His B-flat minor concerto, previously heard in this vicinity at a Thomas concert in Cambridge, with Mme. Schiller, pianist, is an interesting work. It is neither profound in thought nor treatment, but it is full of ideas, and the composer leaves himself plenty of freedom to express them. The ease of the writing both for solo instrument and orchestra is no less conspicuous than the grace of expression which obtains. The scherzo is charmingly put, one of the most fanciful of its kind, while there is much that is vital and musical in the other movements. A tendency to rhapsodical treatment apparent in the two more important movements is maintained at the expense of continuity, but, as we have said, the composer sets aside the classic model at the start and writes unreservedly. The scoring throughout is admirable and the humorous touches which occur, the quaint use of the bassoons, for example, are part and parcel of this spontaneous, brief, and attractive work. Scharwenka's playing is manly and musicianly. His touch is lovely, and he commands tone with a sureness only possible with one who is a thorough master of technique. At the close of the concerto the pianist was recalled five times. His appearance at the Symphony concerts marks an event in their history.

The orchestral portions of this concert had the great merit of freshness. Saint Saëns's "Hercules" is less often heard than any of the set of symphonic poems, though it is the most fluent in treatment. The beautiful "Waldweben" was listened to with delight. Mr. Chadwick's B-flat symphony is well worth the favor Mr. Nikisch shows it. Even after so long an interval since its first performance the work unfolds new beauties. The workmanship is artistic and the spontaniety of the whole is unquestioned. Mr. Chadwick conducted his work with marked success, showing evident gain in those requisites which go to make up a trustworthy conductor.

The sixteenth concert will be given next Saturday night. The orchestra will play the overture to "Der Freischütz," two movements from Godard's "Oriental Symphony," and Beethoven's seventh symphony. Mrs. Nikisch will sing arias from Mozart's "Figaro" and songs by Schumann, Bizet and Brahms.

PROGRAMME.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 9TH, 1891.

244 MADISON AVENUE.

UNION, Springfield, Mass.

Date 2/9

Chadwick's Symphony No. 2.

The program of the symphony concert at Boston, Saturday evening, closed with the performance of George W. Chadwick's Symphony No. 2 in B flat, op. 32, conducted by the composer. Of this work, Philip Hale, the Boston Post's critic says: It is a work of long breath, well-conceived, well expressed. It is the work of a musician by birth and breeding. It is an honor not only to himself but to his country. It shows a strongly marked, well-defined individuality. You can not say when you hear it, "Mr. Chadwick is a disciple of X or Z." The music is that which comes out of Mr. Chadwick. It is his way of looking musically at musical things. Without speaking in detail of the many beauties of the work, the second movement must not be passed by. In the first place it is a scherzo, i. e., it is a jest. He uses the term as Schubert in the 18th century in his Sixth sonata, as Monteverde long before in his three-voiced madrigals. It is not merely a conventional title applied to a fast movement of more or less passionate character with a romantic trio; it is a jolly, jocose movement which approaches the edge of vulgarity. (And there are dealers in words who allege that true fun must be tinged with coarseness.) The opening measures might serve to beat out the time to the heavy feet of roustabouts dancing on the levee. There is a smell of American soil in this same scherza; a suggestion of the good-natured recklessness of the citizens of these States. We have as yet no truly American music, for the great number of compositions written by native composers, however excellent they may be, might be signed by foreign names. Perhaps the melodies written by Dave Braham for the plays of Edward Harrigan are the most serious contribution as yet to American music; for they are eminently characteristic, they suit the persons who appear in these realistic sketches of life in New York, and you cannot imagine them sung with appreciation by the people of other lands. Now, Mr. Chadwick's scherzo could only have been written by an American for [illegible] is intensely local, as is its color.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 14, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

In spite of his having placed himself at a disadvantage from the outset by the choice of a piano favorable only to one phase of his ability, Mr. Xaver Scharwenka made a remarkably auspicious debut at last Saturday night's concert and won the unusual testimonial of five recalls, some part of which were due possibly as much to his reputation as to the absolute appreciation of the audience. For there was a good deal of his playing which had to be taken on trust by any but those who sat near the stage. The piano which he has engaged to use is an instrument excellently suited for a drawing-room or a small hall, being sweet, smooth and refined in tone; but it lacks the resonance, brilliance and solidity essential in a great room or in conjunction with an orchestra. As a consequence, Mr. Scharwenka could often be only seen playing in the tutti passages when only occasional notes reached the ear, and the excellence of his work at those times had to be estimated from the lighter and clearly audible pages and from the masterful ease which his hands displayed. He chose his own B-flat minor concerto, a known but not familiar work, in which there are fanciful and sometimes poetic thoughts, a modern freedom and variety of treatment, ample opportunity for both taste and technique and an impartial apportionment of the labor and the glory between the solo instrument and the orchestra. Mr. Scharwenka belongs to the honorable school of undemonstrative pianists, an occasional lofty rebound of the hand or nervous settling of the head and shoulders being the only breaks in the quietude of his manner. His touch is decided but never dense, and its delicacy does not descend to trivialities, and while he plays as one who can do all that he professes to teach, he is never coldly or severely academic. That he is rich in strength as well as in grace, his tall large person and his confident hand implied, but the full measure of his power could only be guessed, since it could not be exerted to good purpose. Playing his own composition, there could be no lack of clearness in statement or of suggestion in sentiment; and as the concerto is interesting in itself, his performance could not help placing itself in the front rank of pianism. His appearance in other music and in some smaller room will be anticipated pleasurably. Mr. Nikisch had as usual made too long a programme, which did not end until about ten o'clock; so that hundreds of people lost what they wanted to hear, or heard it with tired ears. The concert, which should have begun with a short overture, opened with Saint-Säens's long symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," the least interesting and significant of all his works in that class, which often approaches jingling triviality and rarely suggests strength. If it was necessary to play this, the third number, which was the somewhat over worn "Waldweben," from Wagner's "Siegfried," might have been omitted; but a change in the first number would have been better. The last piece was assigned to Mr. G. W. Chadwick's delightful second symphony, which has so much freshness, beauty, character and power and repays the best attention which a listener can give it. The orchestra played exceedingly well all the evening and there were some bits of pianissimo unexceptionably delicate, equable and pliant. Mr. Chadwick led his own symphony—to the evident gratification of the audience—and had close and sympathetic support from the orchestra, although that dreadful kettle-drum player reduced some bars of the first and second movements into solos for himself. Tonight Mrs. Nikisch is to make her long expected début, her first number being two airs from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," with orchestra; she will sing later three songs by Schumann, Bizet and Brahms, Mr. Nikisch at the piano. The novelty of the evening will be a couple of selections from Godard's "Oriental" symphony, and the orchestra will also play the "Der Freischütz" overture to begin with and Beethoven's seventh symphony for the finale.

The fifth concert of the Kneisel Quartet promises several attractive features, the chief novelty being a quartet by Mr. Arthur Foote (manuscript) to be played for the first time. The Boccherini Menuet, No. 2, will also be heard for the first time at these concerts. The soloists will be Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and Mr. Arthur Foote. Union Hall will doubtless be crowded next Monday evening.

Date 2-7

CHAMBER CONCERT.

A MAGNIFICENT PROGRAMME RENDERED BY THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE AND MR. HOWARD F. PEIRCE.

The programme presented last evening at the first of the three chamber concerts was of the very highest character, containing as it did some of the most precious jewels of classic music. Two such works as the Beethoven Quartette in C minor and the great Schumann Quintette in E flat were in themselves a rich feast. To these were added a group of solos for 'cello, and the theme and variations from Schubert's Quartette in D minor.

This fine programme was performed by the Kneisel Quartette of Boston, consisting of Franz Kneisel, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; Louis Svecenski, viola; Anton Hekking, 'cello, and by Howard F. Peirce, pianist. The widespread reputation of the quartette was a sufficient guarantee that their part would be executed with perfection, and it was. Mr. Peirce is a young pianist of fine ability who has just returned from extended studies in Europe.

The first piece on the programme was the Beethoven Quartette, which begins softly, with a smoothly flowing theme in C minor, given out by the first violin, accompanied by the other parts, with a crescendo to some fortissimo chords at the end of the period. As is usually the case in minor compositions in the sonata form, the modulation which follows leads to the second theme in the relative major, E flat. Beethoven, never at a loss for a melody, gives us one here, simple in construction and not differing much from a part of the first theme. In its ever widening intervals, first a sixth, next a seventh and finally an octave, it gives the effect of reaching out after something which it finally attains, this being accomplished first by the second violin, and afterward by the first violin and viola. The 'cello has it later on in the development part. The whole movement is very beautiful alternating between the major and minor, and is worked out with Beethoven's usual skill. There is a delicate little motive which appears now and then, winding in and out like a golden thread. The andante scherzando (quasi allegretto), was exquisitely played. A fine minuetto and trio follow, and the work is brought to a close by a lively allegro in the rondo form. By the way, this movement was not mentioned on the programme. In theme, key, and certain other points, this rondo is suggestive of the closing movement of the Sonata Pathetique. The rendering of the whole work was wonderfully perfect, and each movement was heartily applauded.

The next number was the group of solos by Mr. Hekking. First came the familiar Bach Air, which was magnificently played. It fairly glowed with an intensity of tone such as we never heard from a single 'cello. Schumann's Traumerei sounded a little odd at first by the transposition into B-flat (the original key is F), but was none the less beautiful on that account. Popper's Papillion was pleasing of course, and Mr. Hekking kindly responded to an encore, playing something not familiar to us, but on the style of a "perpetual motion," and very rapid motion at that. The beautiful selection from the Schubert Quartette was another example of perfection in all the parts, some of the variations which require sustained power being especially noticeable and satisfactory.

The great Schumann Quintette brought the concert to a close. Laid out on the broadest lines, it is a noble monument to Schumann's genius, containing as it does, strong, vigorous life, a wealth of melody, a poetic, but always healthy, sentiment, originality and a masterly treatment of form. Like his great Concerto in A minor, every note is pure gold.

We understand that Mr. Peirce learned his part at very short notice. Certainly no one would have suspected it, unless perfectly familiar with the work. The giving out of the opening theme in the first movement was not quite as broad and strong as we like, but a portion of the tone of the piano seemed to be lost in the alcove in which it stood, and would have come out better if the cover had been raised. Although string players generally object to that Mr. Peirce is so admirable an accompanist, and the quartette can produce such an amount of pure tone, that no ill effect need have been feared. The composition as a whole was finely performed, and the Scherzo and Finale had an especially good effect. We hope to hear Mr. Peirce again in some solo work.

A large and cultivated audience was present and expressed their delight by hearty applause. The only incidents which occurred to mar the perfect enjoyment of the music were the rattling of the chandelier from a heavy jar on the floor above, and that "relic of antiquity," the curfew bell.

ALLEN W. SW[illegible].

[92]

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1891.

MUSIC.

Symphony Concert — A Modern Programme.

Xaver Scharwenka: His Piano Concerto and His Playing.

The programme of the fifteenth Symphony concert with Xaver Scharwenka, soloist, was:

Saint-Saens.....
Symphonic Poem, "The Youth of Hercules"
Scharwenka.....
Concerto for Piano, No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 32.
Allegro patetico; Adagio; Allegro animato.
Scherzo (Allegro assai).
Allegro non tanto, quasi adagio; allegro molto e passionato.
Wagner.....Waldweben from "Siegfried"
Chadwick..Symphony No. 2, in B-flat, Op. 21
Andante non troppo; Allegro con brio.
Allegretto scherzando.
Largo e maestoso.
Finale.

The interest and pleasure in this admirable programme of modern composers was enhanced by the presence as soloist of the composer of the concerto, Mr. Xaver Scharwenka. Scharwenka is one of the most active of the younger coterie of Berlin musicians. Though he has written a symphony, two piano concertos and an opera, he is known to Americans chiefly through his piano music. Desiring an artistic outing among a new people, Scharwenka, whose concert tours have covered the greater part of civilized Europe, including a country as dubiously musical as England, turns his face to the United States. It is but a step, and a most natural one, for a man of his ability, from the dock in New York to Boston Music Hall. His B-flat minor concerto, previously heard in this vicinity at a Thomas concert in Cambridge, with Mme. Schiller, pianist, is an interesting work. It is neither profound in thought nor treatment, but it is full of ideas, and the composer leaves himself plenty of freedom to express them. The ease of the writing both for solo instrument and orchestra is no less conspicuous than the grace of expression which obtains. The scherzo is charmingly put, one of the most fanciful of its kind, while there is much that is vital and musical in the other movements. A tendency to rhapsodical treatment apparent in the two more important movements is maintained at the expense of continuity, but, as we have said, the composer sets aside the classic model at the start and writes unreservedly. The scoring throughout is admirable and the humorous touches which occur, the quaint use of the bassoons, for example, are part and parcel of this spontaneous, brief, and attractive work. Scharwenka's playing is manly and musicianly. His touch is lovely, and he commands tone with a sureness only possible with one who is a thorough master of technique. At the close of the concerto the pianist was recalled five times. His appearance at the Symphony concerts marks an event in their history.

The orchestral portions of this concert had the great merit of freshness. Saint Saëns's "Hercules" is less often heard than any of the set of symphonic poems, though it is the most fluent in treatment. The beautiful "Waldweben" was listened to with delight. Mr. Chadwick's B-flat symphony is well worth the favor Mr. Nikisch shows it. Even after so long an interval since its first performance the work unfolds new beauties. The workmanship is artistic and the spontaniety of the whole is unquestioned. Mr. Chadwick conducted his work with marked success, showing evident gain in those requisites which go to make up a trustworthy conductor.

The sixteenth concert will be given next Saturday night. The orchestra will play the overture to "Der Freischütz," two movements from Godard's "Oriental Symphony," and Beethoven's seventh symphony. Mrs. Nikisch will sing arias from Mozart's "Figaro" and songs by Schumann, Bizet and Brahms.

PROGRAMME.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 9TH, 1891.

244 MADISON AVENUE.

UNION, Springfield, Mass.

Date 2/9

Chadwick's Symphony No. 2.

The program of the symphony concert at Boston, Saturday evening, closed with the performance of George W. Chadwick's Symphony No. 2 in B flat, op. 32, conducted by the composer. Of this work, Philip Hale, the Boston Post's critic says: It is a work of long-breath, well-conceived, well expressed. It is the work of a musician by birth and breeding. It is an honor not only to himself but to his country. It shows a strongly marked, well-defined individuality. You can not say when you hear it, "Mr. Chadwick is a dicsiple of X or Z." The music is that which comes out of Mr. Chadwick. It is his way of looking musically at musical things. Without speaking in detail of the many beauties of the work, the second movement must not be passed by. In the first place it is a scherzo, i. e., it is a jest. He uses the term as Schubert in the 18th century in his Sixth sonata, as Monteverde long before in his three-voiced madrigals. It is not merely a conventional title applied to a fast movement of more or less passionate character with a romantic trio; it is a jolly, jocose movement which approaches the edge of vulgarity. (And there are dealers in words who allege that true fun must be tinged with coarseness.) The opening measures might serve to beat out the time to the heavy feet of roustabouts dancing on the levee. There is a smell of American soil in this same scherza; a suggestion of the good-natured recklessness of the citizens of these States. We have as yet no truly American music, for the great number of compositions written by native composers, however excellent they may be, might be signed by foreign names. Perhaps the melodies written by Dave Braham for the plays of Edward Harrigan are the most serious contribution as yet to American music; for they are eminently characteristic, they suit the persons who appear in these realistic sketches of life in New York, and you cannot imagine them sung with appreciation by the people of other lands. Now, Mr. Chadwick's scherzo could only have been written by an American, for it is intensely local, as is its color.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 14, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

In spite of his having placed himself at a disadvantage from the outset by the choice of a piano favorable only to one phase of his ability, Mr. Xaver Scharwenka made a remarkably auspicious debut at last Saturday night's concert and won the unusual testimonial of five recalls, some part of which were due possibly as much to his reputation as to the absolute appreciation of the audience. For there was a good deal of his playing which had to be taken on trust by any but those who sat near the stage. The piano which he has engaged to use is an instrument excellently suited for a drawing-room or a small hall, being sweet, smooth and refined in tone; but it lacks the resonance, brilliance and solidity essential in a great room or in conjunction with an orchestra. As a consequence, Mr. Scharwenka could often be only seen playing in the tutti passages when only occasional notes reached the ear, and the excellence of his work at those times had to be estimated from the lighter and clearly audible pages and from the masterful ease which his hands displayed. He chose his own B-flat minor concerto, a known but not familiar work, in which there are fanciful and sometimes poetic thoughts, a modern freedom and variety of treatment, ample opportunity for both taste and technique and an impartial apportionment of the labor and the glory between the solo instrument and the orchestra. Mr. Scharwenka belongs to the honorable school of undemonstrative pianists, an occasional lofty rebound of the hand or nervous settling of the head and shoulders being the only breaks in the quietude of his manner. His touch is decided but never dense, and its delicacy does not descend to trivialities, and while he plays as one who can do all that he professes to teach, he is never coldly or severely academic. That he is rich in strength as well as in grace, his tall large person and his confident hand implied, but the full measure of his power could only be guessed, since it could not be exerted to good purpose. Playing his own composition, there could be no lack of clearness in statement or of suggestion in sentiment; and as the concerto is interesting in itself, his performance could not help placing itself in the front rank of pianism. His appearance in other music and in some smaller room will be anticipated pleasurably. Mr. Nikisch had as usual made too long a programme, which did not end until about ten o'clock; so that hundreds of people lost what they wanted to hear, or heard it with tired ears. The concert, which should have begun with a short overture, opened with Saint-Säens's long symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," the least interesting and significant of all his works in that class, which often approaches jingling triviality and rarely suggests strength. If it was necessary to play this, the third number, which was the somewhat over worn "Waldweben," from Wagner's "Siegfried," might have been omitted; but a change in the first number would have been better. The last piece was assigned to Mr. G. W. Chadwick's delightful second symphony, which has so much freshness, beauty, character and power and repays the best attention which a listener can give it. The orchestra played exceedingly well all the evening and there were some bits of pianissimo unexceptionably delicate, equable and pliant. Mr. Chadwick led his own symphony—to the evident gratification of the audience—and had close and sympathetic support from the orchestra, although that dreadful kettle-drum player reduced some bars of the first and second movements into solos for himself. Tonight Mrs. Nikisch is to make her long expected début, her first number being two airs from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," with orchestra; she will sing later three songs by Schumann, Bizet and Brahms, Mr. Nikisch at the piano. The novelty of the evening will be a couple of selections from Godard's "Oriental" symphony, and the orchestra will also play the "Der Freischütz" overture to begin with and Beethoven's seventh symphony for the finale.

The fifth concert of the Kneisel Quartet promises several attractive features, the chief novelty being a quartet by Mr. Arthur Foote (manuscript) to be played for the first time. The Boccherini Menuet, No. 2, will also be heard for the first time at these concerts. The soloists will be Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and Mr. Arthur Foote. Union Hall will doubtless be crowded next Monday evening.

Journal, NewBedford, Mass.

Date 2-7

CHAMBER CONCERT.

A MAGNIFICENT PROGRAMME RENDERED BY THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE AND MR. HOWARD F. PEIRCE.

The programme presented last evening at the first of the three chamber concerts was of the very highest character, containing as it did some of the most precious jewels of classic music. Two such works as the Beethoven Quartette in C minor and the great Schumann Quintette in E flat were in themselves a rich feast. To these were added a group of solos for 'cello, and the theme and variations from Schubert's Quartette in D minor.

This fine programme was performed by the Kneisel Quartette of Boston, consisting of Franz Kneisel, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; Louis Svecenski, viola; Anton Hekking, 'cello, and by Howard F. Peirce, pianist. The widespread reputation of the quartette was a sufficient guarantee that their part would be executed with perfection, and it was. Mr. Peirce is a young pianist of fine ability who has just returned from extended studies in Europe.

The first piece on the programme was the Beethoven Quartette, which begins softly, with a smoothly flowing theme in C minor, given out by the first violin, accompanied by the other parts, with a crescendo to some fortissimo chords at the end of the period. As is usually the case in minor compositions in the sonata form, the modulation which follows leads to the second theme in the relative major, E flat. Beethoven, never at a loss for a melody, gives us one here, simple in construction and not differing much from a part of the first theme. In its ever widening intervals, first a sixth, next a seventh and finally an octave, it gives the effect of reaching out after something which it finally attains, this being accomplished first by the second violin, and afterward by the first violin and viola. The 'cello has it later on in the development part. The whole movement is very beautiful alternating between the major and minor, and is worked out with Beethoven's usual skill. There is a delicate little motive which appears now and then, winding in and out like a golden thread. The andante scherzando (quasi allegretto), was exquisitely played. A fine minuetto and trio follow, and the work is brought to a close by a lively allegro in the rondo form. By the way, this movement was not mentioned on the programme. In theme, key, and certain other points, this rondo is suggestive of the closing movement of the Sonata Pathetique. The rendering of the whole work was wonderfully perfect, and each movement was heartily applauded.

The next number was the group of solos by Mr. Hekking. First came the familiar Bach Air, which was magnificently played. It fairly glowed with an intensity of tone such as we never heard from a single 'cello. Schumann's Traumerei sounded a little odd at first by the transposition into B-flat (the original key is F), but was none the less beautiful on that account. Popper's Papillion was pleasing of course, and Mr. Hekking kindly responded to an encore, playing something not familiar to us, but on the style of a "perpetual motion," and very rapid motion at that. The beautiful selection from the Schubert Quartette was another example of perfection in all the parts, some of the variations which require sustained power being especially noticeable and satisfactory.

The great Schumann Quintette brought the concert to a close. Laid out on the broadest lines, it is a noble monument to Schumann's genius, containing as it does, strong, vigorous life, a wealth of melody, a poetic, but always healthy, sentiment, originality and a masterly treatment of form. Like his great Concerto in A minor, every note is pure gold.

We understand that Mr. Peirce learned his part at very short notice. Certainly no one would have suspected it, unless perfectly familiar with the work. The giving out of the opening theme in the first movement was not quite as broad and strong as we like, but a portion of the tone of the piano seemed to be lost in the alcove in which it stood, and would have come out better if the cover had been raised. Although string players generally object to that Mr. Peirce is so admirable an accompanist, and the quartette can produce such an amount of pure tone, that no ill effect need have been feared. The composition as a whole was finely performed, and the Scherzo and Finale had an especially good effect. We hope to hear Mr. Peirce again in some solo work.

A large and cultivated audience was present and expressed their delight by hearty applause. The only incidents which occurred to mar the perfect enjoyment of the music were the rattling of the chandelier from a heavy jar on the floor above, and that "relic of antiquity," the curfew bell.

ALLEN W. SWAN.

[92]

MR. NIKISCH

AND

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

PROGRAMME.

—o—

POLONAISE IN E, - - - - - - - - - LISZT

MARCHE HONGROISE, - - - - - FRANZ SCHUBERT

"AM SPRINGQUELL," from "Manfred," - - SCHUMANN

MINUETTO DELLA REGINA, - - - MAX VOGRICH

SCHERZO from "Midsummer Night's Dream," MENDELSSOHN

"VORSPIEL," from "Lohengrin," "WALDWEBEN," from "SIEGFRIED,"
"FEUERZAUBER," from "Die Walküre," } RICHARD WAGNER

---

face to the United States. It is but a step, and a most natural one, for a man of his ability, from the dock in New York to Boston Music Hall. His B-flat minor concerto, previously heard in this vicinity at a Thomas concert in Cambridge, with Mme. Schiller, pianist, is an interesting work. It is neither profound in thought nor treatment, but it is full of ideas, and the composer leaves himself plenty of freedom to express them. The ease of the writing both for solo instrument and orchestra is no less conspicuous than the grace of expression which obtains. The scherzo is charmingly put, one of the most fanciful of its kind, while there is much that is vital and musical in the other movements. A tendency to rhapsodical treatment apparent in the two more important movements is maintained at the expense of continuity, but, as we have said, the composer sets aside the classic model at the start and writes unreservedly. The scoring throughout is admirable and the humorous touches which occur, the quaint use of the bassoons, for example, are part and parcel of this spontaneous, brief, and attractive work. Scharwenka's playing is manly and musicianly. His touch is lovely, and he commands tone with a sureness only possible with one who is a thorough master of technique. At the close of the concerto the pianist was recalled five times. His appearance at the Symphony concerts marks an event in their history.

The orchestral portions of this concert had the great merit of freshness. Saint Saëns's "Hercules" is less often heard than any of the set of symphonic poems, though it is the most fluent in treatment. The beautiful "Waldweben" was listened to with delight. Mr. Chadwick's B-flat symphony is well worth the favor Mr. Nikisch shows it. Even after so long an interval since its first performance the work unfolds new beauties. The workmanship is artistic and the spontaniety of the whole is unquestioned. Mr. Chadwick conducted his work with marked success, showing evident gain in those requisites which go to make up a trustworthy conductor.

The sixteenth concert will be given next Saturday night. The orchestra will play the overture to "Der Freischütz," two movements from Godard's "Oriental Symphony," and Beethoven's seventh symphony. Mrs. Nikisch will sing arias from Mozart's "Figaro" and songs by Schumann, Bizet and Brahms.

UNION, Springfield, Mass.

Date 2/9

Chadwick's Symphony No. 2.

The program of the symphony concert at Boston, Saturday evening, closed with the performance of George W. Chadwick's Symphony No. 2 in B flat, op. 32, conducted by the composer. Of this work, Philip Hale, the Boston Post's critic says: It is a work of long-breathed, well-conceived, well expressed. It is the work of a musician by birth and breeding. It is an honor not only to himself but to his country. It shows strongly marked, well-defined individuality. You can not say when you hear it, "Mr. Chadwick is a dicsiple of X or Z." The music is that which comes out of Mr. Chadwick. It is his way of looking musically at musical things. Without speaking in detail of the many beauties of the work, the second movement must not be passed by. In the first place it is a scherzo, i. e., it is a jest. He uses the term as Schubert in the 18th century in his Sixth sonata, as Monteverde long before in his three-voiced madrigals. It is not merely a conventional title applied to a fast movement of more or less passionate character with a romantic trio; it is a jolly, jocose movement which approaches the edge of vulgarity. (And there are dealers in words who allege that true fun must be tinged with coarseness.) The opening measures might serve to beat out the time to the heavy feet of roustabouts dancing on the levee. There is a smell of American soil in this same scherza; a suggestion of the good-natured recklessness of the citizens of these States. We have as yet no truly American music, for the great number of compositions written by native composers, however excellent they may be, might be signed by foreign names. Perhaps the melodies written by Dave Braham for the plays of Edward Harrigan are the most serious contribution as yet to American music; for they are eminently characteristic, they suit the persons who appear in these realistic sketches of life in New York, and you cannot imagine them sung with appreciation by the people of other lands. Now, Mr. Chadwick's scherzo could only have been written by an American, for it is intensely local, as is its color.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 14, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

In spite of his having placed himself at a disadvantage from the outset by the choice of a piano favorable only to one phase of his ability, Mr. Xaver Scharwenka made a remarkably auspicious debut at last Saturday night's concert and won the unusual testimonial of five recalls, some part of which were due possibly as much to his reputation as to the absolute appreciation of the audience. For there was a good deal of his playing which had to be taken on trust by any but those who sat near the stage. The piano which he has engaged to use is an instrument excellently suited for a drawing-room or a small hall, being sweet, smooth and refined in tone; but it lacks the resonance, brilliance and solidity essential in a great room or in conjunction with an orchestra. As a consequence, Mr. Scharwenka could often be only seen playing in the tutti passages when only occasional notes reached the ear, and the excellence of his work at those times had to be estimated from the lighter and clearly audible pages and from the masterful ease which his hands displayed. He chose his own B-flat minor concerto, a known but not familiar work, in which there are fanciful and sometimes poetic thoughts, a modern freedom and variety of treatment, ample opportunity for both taste and technique and an impartial apportionment of the labor and the glory between the solo instrument and the orchestra. Mr. Scharwenka belongs to the honorable school of undemonstrative pianists, an occasional lofty rebound of the hand or nervous settling of the head and shoulders being the only breaks in the quietude of his manner. His touch is decided but never dense, and its delicacy does not descend to trivialities, and while he plays as one who can do all that he professes to teach, he is never coldly or severely academic. That he is rich in strength as well as in grace, his tall large person and his confident hand implied, but the full measure of his power could only be guessed, since it could not be exerted to good purpose. Playing his own composition, there could be no lack of clearness in statement or of suggestion in sentiment; and as the concerto is interesting in itself, his performance could not help placing itself in the front rank of pianism. His appearance in other music and in some smaller room will be anticipated pleasurably. Mr. Nikisch had as usual made too long a programme, which did not end until about ten o'clock; so that hundreds of people lost what they wanted to hear, or heard it with tired ears. The concert, which should have begun with a short overture, opened with Saint-Säens's long symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," the least interesting and significant of all his works in that class, which often approaches jingling triviality and rarely suggests strength. If it was necessary to play this, the third number, which was the somewhat over worn "Waldweben," from Wagner's "Siegfried," might have been omitted; but a change in the first number would have been better. The last piece was assigned to Mr. G. W. Chadwick's delightful second symphony, which has so much freshness, beauty, character and power and repays the best attention which a listener can give it. The orchestra played exceedingly well all the evening and there were some bits of pianissimo unexceptionably delicate, equable and pliant. Mr. Chadwick led his own symphony—to the evident gratification of the audience—and had close and sympathetic support from the orchestra, although that dreadful kettle-drum player re-

---

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

A MAGNIFICENT PROGRAMME RENDERED BY THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE AND MR. HOWARD F. PEIRCE.

The programme presented last evening at the first of the three chamber concerts was of the very highest character, containing as it did some of the most precious jewels of classic music. Two such works as the Beethoven Quartette in C minor and the great Schumann Quintette in E flat were in themselves a rich feast. To these were added a group of solos for 'cello, and the theme and variations from Schubert's Quartette in D minor.

This fine programme was performed by the Kneisel Quartette of Boston, consisting of Franz Kneisel, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; Louis Svecenski, viola; Anton Hekking, 'cello, and by Howard F. Peirce, pianist. The widespread reputation of the quartette was a sufficient guarantee that their part would be executed with perfection, and it was. Mr. Peirce is a young pianist of fine ability who has just returned from extended studies in Europe.

The first piece on the programme was the Beethoven Quartette, which begins softly, with a smoothly flowing theme in C minor, given out by the first violin, accompanied by the other parts, with a crescendo to some fortissimo chords at the end of the period. As is usually the case in minor compositions in the sonata form, the modulation which follows leads to the second theme in the relative major, E flat. Beethoven, never at a loss for a melody, gives us one here, simple in construction and not differing much from a part of the first theme. In its ever widening intervals, first a sixth, next a seventh and finally an octave, it gives the effect of reaching out after something which it finally attains, this being accomplished first by the second violin, and afterward by the first violin and viola. The 'cello has it later on in the development part. The whole movement is very beautiful alternating between the major and minor, and is worked out with Beethoven's usual skill. There is a delicate little motive which appears now and then, winding in and out like a golden thread. The andante scherzando (quasi allegretto), was exquisitely played. A fine minuetto and trio follow, and the work is brought to a close by a lively allegro in the rondo form. By the way, this movement was not mentioned on the programme. In theme, key, and certain other points, this rondo is suggestive of the closing movement of the Sonata Pathetique. The rendering of the whole work was wonderfully perfect, and each movement was heartily applauded.

The next number was the group of solos by Mr. Hekking. First came the familiar Bach Air, which was magnificently played. It fairly glowed with an intensity of tone such as we never heard from a single 'cello. Schumann's Traumerei sounded a little odd at first by the transposition into B-flat (the original key is F), but was none the less beautiful on that account. Popper's Papillion was pleasing of course, and Mr. Hekking kindly responded to an encore, playing something not familiar to us, but on the style of a "perpetual motion," and very rapid motion at that. The beautiful selection from the Schubert Quartette was another example of perfection in all the parts, some of the variations which require sustained power being especially noticeable and satisfactory.

The great Schumann Quintette brought the concert to a close. Laid out on the broadest lines, it is a noble monument to Schumann's genius, containing as it does, strong, vigorous life, a wealth of melody, a poetic, but always healthy, sentiment, originality and a masterly treatment of form. Like his great Concerto in A minor, every note is pure gold.

We understand that Mr. Peirce learned his part at very short notice. Certainly no one would have suspected it, unless perfectly familiar with the work. The giving out of the opening theme in the first movement was not quite as broad and strong as we like, but a portion of the tone of the piano seemed to be lost in the alcove in which it stood, and would have come out better if the cover had been raised. Although string players generally object to that Mr. Peirce is so admirable an accompanist, and the quartette can produce such an amount of pure tone, that no ill effect need have been feared. The composition as a whole was finely performed, and the Scherzo and Finale had an especially good effect. We hope to hear Mr. Peirce again in some solo work.

A large and cultivated audience was present and expressed their delight by hearty applause. The only incidents which occurred to mar the perfect enjoyment of the music were the rattling of the chandelier from a heavy jar on the floor above, and that "relic of antiquity," the curfew bell.

ALLEN W. SWAN.

Your little friend,
CARROLL A. FARWELL.

[92]

N HOME JOURNAL.
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1891

Music.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK.

Xaver Scharwenka played his concerto for the pianoforte in B-flat minor last Saturday evening at the fifteenth symphony concert. He made his first appearance as a pianist in this city at the rehearsal and concert of last week, but he has long been known in this country as a composer. There are few players of the pianoforte who have not pounded out the Polish dances with delight, and occasionally his name appears upon the programs of concerts of chamber music. So he did not come before us as a stranger.

* * * * *

Scharwenka studied the pianoforte under Theodore Kullak, who was an excellent teacher, fortunate in his pupils. About the same time that Scharwenka was with Kullak, Moszkowski and Sherwood were pupils, and they all as performers show many common traits; for Kullak was a man of great force and many ideas, and his disciples were plainly stamped with his mark. Although Moszkowski met with great favor as a concert-player, his health was not robust enough to stand the strain, a nervous affection of the hand compelled him to give up public performances, and he devoted himself to teaching and composition. Mr. Sherwood's career is known to us all, and it is to be regretted that he is not more often heard here. Scharwenka made many concert-tours, and in '81 he started a conservatory in Berlin which is to-day in a flourishing condition. And now he is in America, the country which is constantly spoken of and described by foreign actors and musicians as the land of dollars, although many of our countrymen who struggle in these professions might doubt with justice the accuracy of this definition.

* * * * *

There are many in this town who remember Xaver and his brother Philip ten to twenty years ago. The brothers were a marked contrast. Xaver was at that time one of the most striking personalities in Berlin. He was of military bearing, handsome, alert, a man of action. Philip was shorter, witty, and inclined to laziness. This laziness was, perhaps, assumed, for as a composer he has been fertile. Xaver was always a favorite with women of all ages. After he founded his Conservatory many a girl who studied under another master, would frequent the classes of Scharwenka as a guest, that she might watch the face of the teacher rather than the progress of her rivals. And yet he had met the tragical end of Hugo's Captain Phœbus, for in '77 he took to himself as wife a Russian of beauty and wealth.

* * * * *

But let no one think that he paraded as a beau cavalier. He was a hard working man; faithful in instruction, taking the same interest in the beginner and advanced pupil. He played frequently in public. Associated with Emile Sauret and Heinrich Grünfeld he gave chamber concerts at the Singakademie. His symphony in C minor was played at a Wüllner concert in Berlin March 3, '84, and was favorably criticised by the men of the Berlin press. He has written two pianoforte trios, a pianoforte quartet, a 'cello sonata, a violin sonata, two sonatas for the pianoforte and many smaller pieces. And portions of his grand opera, "Mataswintha" have been given lately in New York with success. His compositions are distinguished by dash, ingenious rhythm and piquant harmony, and they are of Polish character.

* * * * *

The years have changed him in face and figure. He bears the outward marks of prosperity. He is sleek, and there are symptoms of approaching baldness. But his playing is as delightful as in former years, and its chief characteristics are elegance and taste. He is the Chesterfield of the piano.

* * * * *

Now, Saturday night the concerto fitted the player. The music was merely Scharwenka's manner of expressing himself. He was sincere, manly, incapable of rudeness, polished in manners, quick at repartee, keen of wit, blithe and debonaire. His remarks showed no great depth of thought, but how gracefully he spoke, and how admirably chosen were his words. Occasionally he seemed a little garrulous, but you easily forgave him.

* * * * *

The scherzo is the best movement of the work; it is the most original, it is the most pleasing. Its brilliancy is dazzling, its diamonds are not paste. In theme and rhythm, idea and instrumentation it is an excellent piece of work. And the large audience applauded at its close most spontaneously and heartily.

* * * * *

What a relief it is to hear a man like Scharwenka who respects both his profession and his audience, who shows such modesty in bearing and performance. He gave last Saturday a most delightful exhibition of refined and artistic pianoforte playing; and from him as from Rummel and de Pachmann, our younger pianists, male and female, may learn that brute strength is not the one essential quality in the outfit of a modern pianist.

* * * * *

The other numbers of the program were Saint-Saëns "Youth of Hercules," "Waldweben," from Wagner's "Siegfried," and Chadwick's second symphony in B flat, which was skilfully directed by the composer. This symphony is distinguished by its strength and originality. The first movement shows Mr. Chadwick's mastery of form, and at the same time it is eminently musical and never dry. The scherzo is the most characteristic of the movements. It is so tuneful, its jollity is so pronounced, and its fun is more American than European. It breathes the spirit of devil-me-care independence, it snaps its fingers at comments, it is not free from irreverence; and it is withal goodnatured. The other movements are serious; the largo is broadly conceived and is dramatic, and the finale sums up the whole matter, like a judge's charge to a jury. The verdict of the audience was not merely one of acquittal, it was heartily and unanimously expressed in Mr. Chadwick's favor.

* * * * *

It could be wished that more attention were paid to our American composers in the symphony concerts. Our song writers are treated better in the concert halls, for we have had frequent opportunities of hearing and judging the melodious songs of Nevin, MacDowell, Johns and others. It may be said that few orchestral works by American composers are worthy of a place upon a symphony program, but they should certainly have a hearing, that they may be judged. A composer who has no opportunity of hearing his own compositions and receiving judicious criticism, can not be expected to improve or long remain ambitious. There are native orchestral works which have met with approval elsewhere and are unknown to us here. And in this connection it may not be impertinent to remark that the honored name of Professor Paine [illegible] appeared upon a symphony program [illegible] departure of Mr. William Gericke.

[illegible] Kneisel quartet con-

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 15, 1891.

The first appearances of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch in Music Hall, at the sixteenth rehearsal and concert, were greeted by audiences that filled every seat, and every foot of standing room. Mrs. Nikisch fully sustained the favorable reports concerning her exceptional ability as a singer, that preceded her debut. Her voice is a mezzo-soprano, fine and musical in quality, of fair compass, and even throughout its range. She is in the truest sense a singer, there being few traces of the declamatory style, which the German school of singing has so largely propagated. Mrs. Nikisch quickly demonstrated the fact that she possesses the temperament of an artist. Such music as the romanza, "Voi che sapete," and the aria, "Non so piu cosa son," from "The Marriage of Figaro," causes every nerve to vibrate, and her whole body to sway in sympathy with its exquisite phrases. In this, she at once recalls Mrs. Henschel, whose singing is far from being forgotten in Boston. The Mozart music was delightfully rendered. The pure, fresh voice of Mrs. Nikisch was in admirable keeping with these marvellous love songs, while in taste and expressiveness she was wholly satisfactory. Between two movements of Godard's "Symphonie Orientale," and the closing number, she sang three songs to Mr. Nikisch's accompaniment. The first, a pastorale, by Bizet, was sung in French, its beautiful melody being sustained and colored with much artistic skill. The rhythmical swing of a "Provencalisches Lied," by Schumann and the spirit of Brahms's "Vergebliches Staendchen," were also happily indicated, and were sung with the finish and style that characterized her interpretations of the Mozart selections. Mrs. Nikisch was warmly received, and after each number recalled many times.

The programme began with the overture to "Der Freischuetz." However one may feel inclined to growl at the continued reappearances of Mr. Nikisch's old favorites, his absolutely masterly readings of them are generally sufficient to turn growls into shouts of admiration. And, if it were the highest mission of the Symphony organization to present works that have been heard in Boston ever since the first notes of an overture and a symphony were sounded here, its audiences might well rejoice over the privilege of hearing them performed in such masterly fashion. But this is not its highest mission. In the ten years of its existence its concerts have revolutionized musical taste in the city to an extent that is simply marvellous. This musical growth is clearly indicated by the large number of musical enterprises of the highest class that now flourish, in place of a few of the same nature that formerly languished.

It is the duty of the symphony orchestra still to lead, not to retard this progress; and, while it is true that its programmes should be thoughtfully constructed—that the works of the older masters should not be shelved, and those of the day substituted—it is equally true that they should exhibit the broadest catholicity of taste and judgment. Even if the management are not disposed to buy new scores, there are already many of importance in its library that have been all two seldom performed; this fact in itself is sufficient to render invalid any excuses that might be made for the narrow range to which the programmes are confined. Mr. Nikisch should bestir himself and recall to memory a few of the many splendid ideas that he gave expression to soon after his arrival last year regarding the good he meant to accomplish during his stay here.

The overture was magnificently performed. The opening horn passages were given perfectly, the first clarinet outdid himself in smoothness and beauty of phrasing, and the grand climax was worked up with tremendous power; even the closing chords seemed eloquently expressive, so admirably were they timed. It was an unforgetable performance.

Godard's Oriental Symphony consists of five movements, illustrating poems that describe characteristic scenes in Arabia, China, Greece, Persia and Turkey. The third and fourth were played; "Sara la Baigneuse," (Greece); and "Le reve de la Nikia," (Persia). The last, which was given first, is a short movement (quasi adagio), beginning with a charming melody for oboe, that is taken up by the clarinet and strings, and continued until a new subject is announced. This subject is developed until it reaches a strong climax, in which the full orchestra takes part, and is followed by the return of the first melody with a more elaborate accompaniment. The "Grecian" movement is in effect, a swing-song, the rhythm of which is maintained in the accompaniment, while a fleeting melody is heard in the wood-wind. It contains some novel effects, notably the pizzicato by the strings, flute and the sharp upper notes of the harp. Both movements are richly harmonized, and illustrate the poems in the most captivating manner. They were perfectly played and heartily applauded.

The symphony was Beethoven's seventh, in A. Mr. Nikisch aroused considerable discussion last season by his reading of this work. Nevertheless his courage has not failed him, and this year finds his opinions on the matter unchanged. His conception of the symphony that Beethoven himself declared to be one of his greatest, does, in truth, put an entirely different face on it; and, to us, it reveals a wealth of new meaning that fully justifies it. The slow tempo of the first allegro brings to the surface that sadness which oftener than otherwise underlies Beethoven's gayest moods. The deliberate utterance of the figure of dotted eighths and sixteenth notes, and the sigh-like effect of the appogiatura destroys the vivacity they so easily express when taken faster, but the whole movement gains in breadth and impressiveness. The allegretto becomes an andante, imbued with a deep-rooted vein of romantic melancholy that instantly recalls Schubert. The scherzo is practically unchanged except that sadness again prevails in the impassioned phrases of the trio. And now comes the climax of all the restlessness of the preceding movements that has hitherto been permitted to be felt rather than seen. The finale, instead of being a conventionally lively movement, with every sixteenth note, and every figure clearly defined, becomes through its strong accents and roughly-played figures, a scene of reckless gayety, which steadily gains headway until it reaches its climax in the overwhelming f f f chords.

One must have a purpose if one wishes successfully to overturn tradition; and whether Mr. Nikisch's conception of this symphony be accepted or not, his purpose is as clear as is De Pachmann's entire lack of purpose in his unique readings of Chopin.

—Part of the Symphony orchestra, with Herr Nikisch as director, furnished the principal entertainment on Monday afternoon at a private concert given by Mrs. Theodore Havemeyer, at her house on Fifth avenue. The concert was given in the ballroom, which was beautifully decorated with jonquils, tulips and other spring flowers, after which an elegant luncheon was served. There were over 300 guests present. Mrs. Havemeyer is a genuine lover of music and a skilful player on the organ, piano and banjo.

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, FEB. 15, 1891.

THE SYMPHONIES.

SIXTEENTH CONCERT.

The programme last evening at Music hall was:

Weber.....Overture, "Der Frieschuetz"
Mozart, { Romanza, "Voi che sapete." / Aria, "Non so piu cosa son." From "The Marriage of Figaro."
Benjamin Godard { Nikia's Dream. / In the Hammock
From "Symphonie Orientale," Op. 84. (First time in Boston).

Songs with Piano.

Bizet.....Pastorale
Schumann.....Provencalisches Lied
Brahms.....Vergebliches Staendchen
Beethoven.....Symphony in A, No. 7

Soloist, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.

There was every indication that in the singing of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, it being the artiste's first public appearance in this city, the entire audience was deeply interested. From the moment of her entré the artist could but have won the personal admiration of all present, for Mrs. Nikisch is an exceptionally handsome and attractive personality. She has a mezzo soprano voice of good compass, the individual tones of which are each not only voluminous but in a certain sense, effective. She is also an intensely subjective artist and a very earnest and painstaking interpreter; but it must be frankly stated, that her method of tone-production is unquestionably inartistic, is very disagreeable. She does not sing in tune, and her sostenuto is undeniably inartistic. Such in brief is Mrs. Arthur Nikisch as a singer.

The overture to Der Freischuetz was not well played. It had been evidently neglected at the rehearsals; the clarinetist was both slovenly and careless in his phrasing; the horns were radically at variance with the pitch; and the ensemble as a whole was very imperfect. The Godard selections, both very charming, were admirably played, and the performance of the Symphony was in many respects excellent.

The programme for the next Kneisel quartette concert at Union hall tomorrow evening is as follows; Quartette (MS.), A. Foote, (first time); songs with piano, Chopin's Lithauisches Lied, Schumann's Die Rose, Jensen's Staendchen; Sphaerenmusik, from string quartette. No. 2, Rubinstein; Menuet, No. 2, Boccherini, (first time); songs with piano, Liszt's Jugendglueck, Jensen's Am Manzanares, Brahms's Liebeslied, quartette in E flat, op. 74, Beethoven. The soloists are Arthur Foote and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch. It will be a very interesting concert, as can be judged.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 15.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concerts.

The sixteenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, attracted an audience that filled all the seats and all the available standing room. The performances began with Weber's "Der Freyschutz" overture. Its reading was not one of Mr. Nikisch's best successes. The work was given with so many unaccustomed breaks in the time that its continuity was nearly destroyed, and a disjointed effect was given to it as a whole. The introductory movement was taken at an almost distressingly slow pace, and a propensity to retard the tempo was manifested all through the overture, and even the fiery culmination lost much of its usual effect for lack of appropriate spirit in the reading. It was finely played; but the interpretation was a mistake. There was a novelty on the programme, in the shape of two movements from Godard's "Symphonie Orientale," Op. 84, one entitled "Nikia's Dream," a sensuous adagio, warm and graceful in its themes, and the other "In the Hammock," in more animated time, also very charming in its melodies. The music is in the modern style, in all save its tender and flowing tunefulness. The orchestral coloring is rich and masterly, and like all French orchestration is notable for the dainty skill and beautiful effect with which the wood wind is used. A fine poetic feeling pervades the music and its instrumental treatment. It was all very fresh, very original and wholly delightful in the hearing. It was played in the best and most finished manner of the orchestra, and was listened to with so much pleasure and interest that it is surprising it did not win more applause than rewarded it. The concert ended with Beethoven's Symphony in A. On the whole it was carefully interpreted and well played, the only serious criticism to be made upon the performance of the work being the heavy and labored manner in which the vivace was read. Here, again, Mr. Nikisch showed a leaning toward an over slow tempo, and the result was that the life and spirit nearly disappeared from the movement, and a dry and rigid formality replaced them. Of "vivace" scarcely a trace was left. With the interpretation of the rest of the work there is little fault to be found, except in respect to that frequent unauthorized retarding of the time in which Mr. Nikisch indulges. This propensity disappears every now and then, and two or three concerts pass without any exhibition of it; but suddenly it reappears in full force and characterizes an entire concert. It is always well to read Beethoven according to the indications he has given in his score. New readings of him are liable to be more daring than satisfactory or edifying. The soloist was Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who was received with cordial enthusiasm. Her first contributions to the concert were "Voi Che Sapete" and "Non so piu cosa son," from Mozart's "Figaro;" and, later in the evening, she sang Bizet's "Pastorale," Schumann's "Provencalisches Lied" and Brahms's "Vergebliches Staendchen." She has a full and resonant voice, not very sympathetic in quality, and not showing the best training or method; but she sings with spirit and confidence, though in a style not marked by the highest artistic refinement. She sang the Mozart selections carefully, but with a persistent use of portamento both ascending and descending that was far from good in musical effects. In the songs, however, she was heard to better advantage, and her singing of Brahms's song was really charming in style and expressiveness. The artist was recalled after each group, three times after the second with the most stormy applause. The success of this last group was largely assisted by Mr. Nikisch's exquisitely artistic playing of the pianoforte accompaniments. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky; Concerto for piano, in F-minor, Chopin, and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" Symphony. M. Vladimir De Pachmann is to be the soloist.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 16, 1891.

MRS. NIKISCH'S DEBUT.

Her First Boston Appearance With the Symphony Orchestra.

While bearing in mind the strictly musical features of the symphony concert in Music Hall, Saturday evening, it may not for once seem either irrelevant or uncritical to refer to the artistic significance of the applause with which the distinguished soloist for the evening was received. Without making the slightest insinuation against the proverbial intelligence of a symphony concert audience, neither referring in any disrespectful terms to the fair artiste in question, it can not be gainsaid that that any artistic criterion for judgment is by no means with applause. It is also true that all the unanimity and enthusiasm with which Mrs. Nikisch was greeted at her first appearance in this city seemed as some compliment all too flattering, and was neither respectful nor discriminating in its relation to the worthiest characteristics of an unmistakably charming and cultivated woman, who, being the wife of the esteemed conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra was, quite as enthusiastically welcomed as her most ardent admirer could have wished. Though the plaudits bestowed were both prolonged and vociferous, it is also true that the highly favored artiste seemed quite too easily induced to infringe upon the well-known yet unwritten law of the symphony concerts, regarding encores, the acceptance of which is very unusual at these concerts, and is almost always attended with a serious breach of taste, as was notably the case on Saturday evening. Such, however, was the somewhat superfluous assumption with which the artiste regarded the reception both cordial and heartfelt that she received, from a distinguished and fashionable audience. Any musician's opinion of her effort must be as considerately, candidly and respectfully expressed as is consistent with any true basis of musical judgment.

Mrs. Nikisch sang the familiar yet always beautiful romanza "Voi Che Sapete" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro;" also, from the same opera, the "Non so piu Cosa son" aria, and a charmingly well-chosen group of songs by Bizet, Schumann and Brahms. While waiving for a moment the consideration of any such limitations as any artist is liable to, it would simply be unjust to her chosen art not to state that while a musical temperament of the artiste in question undoubtedly exists, and is inherently sympathetic, and is the real musician's temperament, so far as nature itself is concerned; yet that this temperament has been more or less, mal-cultivated in certain important directions is also true. The artiste's singing of the Mozart, the Bizet and the Schumann selections was, to be no less candid, than friendly and respectful, quite evenly inartistic, and quite as evenly unmusical. Not that the artiste was to any extent insincere in her readings, nor that she lacked to any perceptible extent the courage of her sincerity. Beyond cavil, she was most ardently painstaking, yet in this respect it is also true that the artiste seemed somewhat more mindful of her audience than her art in all that she did.

But the most serious fault to be found, is that even her very careful singing of the repertoire quoted was lamentably perverted by certain inartistic not to say crude vocal conditions to which the singer well nigh constantly adhered. While her interpretations regarded from the pardonable subjectivity of her own point of view were piquantly interesting, yet from the standpoint to which the world's real artists have heretofore accustomed us they were at least in one instance, radically in error, and there was also an unfortunate void of a true artistic delivery in much that the artist did. That the vocal pedagogue might naturally attribute any such deficiencies to an ill-founded vocal method is true, yet we are all aware that the very term vocal method has fallen into disrepute, and quite naturally, as there can exist no such method in purely artistic and spontaneous singing as will laboriously control the vocal apparatus. Upon its instant trespass the artistic singing will cease and the artificial result will be laid bare. And so in the case of Mrs. Nikisch she invariably seems conscious of her every tone, and she often produces it with a conspicuous avoidance of any directness. The result has all the effect of a vocal drawl, and is correspondingly unmusical. The artist's singing of the Mozart romanza was no true Mozart singing, for it lacked the quiet, the refined and unaffected simplicity that is the ever desirable complement of the great master's art. Her "vergebliches staendchen," however, was a charming interpretation. Briefly stated, Mrs. Nikisch has a voluminous yet not very pleasing soprano voice—a mezzo soprano of good range. That she is a musical enthusiast was noticeable in almost every measure that she sang. Her musical conceptions and inceptions are instinct with an exuberant vitality, but her tone-production both labored and unnatural, and as in this respect her asperating corresponds. There is neither any naturalness and but very little art in her phrasing. In her singing of the group of three songs, as in her encore selection, the really artistic pleasure derived was from the masterly accompaniments so fortunately well played by Mr. Nikisch at the piano. The orchestral selections on the programme were superbly interpreted, save the overture to "Der Freischuetz" in which the mournfully slow tempi taken enabled both the woodwind and the brass to impart a tragic untunefulness to the work that Von Weber never could have anticipated. The two movements from Godard's unique, richly colored and altogether gorgeous "symphonie orientale" were finely played, as was also the seventh symphony. Next Saturday evening Mr. Vladimir Pachmann will be the soloist, and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony, Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasie, and Chopin's F-minor concerto will be performed.

C. L. CAPEN.

[93]

N HOME JOURNAL.
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1891

Music.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK.

Xaver Scharwenka played his concerto for the pianoforte in B-flat minor last Saturday evening at the fifteenth symphony concert. He made his first appearance as a pianist in this city at the rehearsal and concert of last week, but he has long been known in this country as a composer. There are few players of the pianoforte who have not pounded out the Polish dances with delight, and occasionally his name appears upon the programs of concerts of chamber music. So he did not come before us as a stranger.

* * * * *

Scharwenka studied the pianoforte under Theodore Kullak, who was an excellent teacher, fortunate in his pupils. About the same time that Scharwenka was with Kullak, Moszkowski and Sherwood were pupils, and they all as performers show many common traits; for Kullak was a man of great force and many ideas, and his disciples were plainly stamped with his mark. Although Moszkowski met with great favor as a concert player, his health was not robust enough to stand the strain, a nervous affection of the hand compelled him to give up public performances, and he devoted himself to teaching and composition. Mr. Sherwood's career is known to us all, and it is to be regretted that he is not more often heard here. Scharwenka made many concert-tours, and in '81 he started a conservatory in Berlin which is to-day in a flourishing condition. And now he is in America, the country which is constantly spoken of and described by foreign actors and musicians as the land of dollars, although many of our countrymen who struggle in these professions might doubt with justice the accuracy of this definition.

* * * * *

There are many in this town who remember Xaver and his brother Philip ten to twenty years ago. The brothers were a marked contrast. Xaver was at that time one of the most striking personalities in Berlin. He was of military bearing, handsome, alert, a man of action. Philip was shorter, witty, and inclined to laziness. This laziness was, perhaps, assumed, for as a composer he has been fertile. Xaver was always a favorite with women of all ages. After he founded his Conservatory many a girl who studied under another master, would frequent the classes of Scharwenka as a guest, that she might watch the face of the teacher rather than the progress of her rivals. And yet he had met the tragical end of Hugo's Captain Phœbus, for in '77 he took to himself as wife a Russian of beauty and wealth.

* * * * *

But let no one think that he paraded as a beau cavalier. He was a hard working man; faithful in instruction, taking the same interest in the beginner and advanced pupil. He played frequently in public. Associated with Emile Sauret and Heinrich Grünfeld he gave chamber concerts at the Singakademie. His symphony in C minor was played at a Wüllner concert in Berlin March 3, '84, and was favorably criticised by the men of the Berlin press. He has written two pianoforte trios, a pianoforte quartet, a 'cello sonata, a violin sonata, two sonatas for the pianoforte and many smaller pieces. And portions of his grand opera, "Mataswintha" have been given lately in New York with success. His compositions are distinguished by dash, ingenious rhythm and piquant harmony, and they are of Polish character.

* * * * *

The years have changed him in face and figure. He bears the outward marks of prosperity. He is sleek, and there are symptoms of approaching baldness. But his playing is as delightful as in former years, and its chief characteristics are elegance and taste. He is the Chesterfield of the piano.

* * * * *

Now, Saturday night the concerto fitted the player. The music was merely Scharwenka's manner of expressing himself. He was sincere, manly, incapable of rudeness, polished in manners, quick at repartee, keen of wit, blithe and debonaire. His remarks showed no great depth of thought, but how gracefully he spoke, and how admirably chosen were his words. Occasionally he seemed a little garrulous, but you easily forgave him.

* * * * *

The scherzo is the best movement of the work; it is the most original, it is the most pleasing. Its brilliancy is dazzling, its diamonds are not paste. In theme and rhythm, idea and instrumentation it is an excellent piece of work. And the large audience applauded at its close most spontaneously and heartily.

* * * * *

What a relief it is to hear a man like Scharwenka who respects both his profession and his audience, who shows such modesty in bearing and performance. He gave last Saturday a most delightful exhibition of refined and artistic pianoforte playing; and from him as from Rummel and de Pachmann, our younger pianists, male and female, may learn that brute strength is not the one essential quality in the outfit of a modern pianist.

* * * * *

The other numbers of the program were Saint-Saëns "Youth of Hercules," "Waldweben," from Wagner's "Siegfried," and Chadwick's second symphony in B flat, which was skilfully directed by the composer. This symphony is distinguished by its strength and originality. The first movement shows Mr. Chadwick's mastery of form, and at the same time it is eminently musical and never dry. The scherzo is the most characteristic of the movements. It is so tuneful, its jollity is so pronounced, and its fun is more American than European. It breathes the spirit of devil-me-care independence, it snaps its fingers at comments, it is not free from irreverence; and it is withal goodnatured. The other movements are serious; the largo is broadly conceived and is dramatic, and the finale sums up the whole matter, like a judge's charge to a jury. The verdict of the audience was not merely one of acquittal, it was heartily and unanimously expressed in Mr. Chadwick's favor.

* * * * *

It could be wished that more attention were paid to our American composers in the symphony concerts. Our song writers are treated better in the concert halls, for we have had frequent opportunities of hearing and judging the melodious songs of Nevin, MacDowell, Johns and others. It may be said that few orchestral works by American composers are worthy of a place upon a symphony program, but they should certainly have a hearing, that they may be judged. A composer who has no opportunity of hearing his own compositions and receiving judicious criticism, can not be expected to improve or long remain ambitious. There are native orchestral works which have met with approval elsewhere and are unknown to us here. And in this connection it may not be impertinent to remark that the honored name of Professor Paine has not appeared upon a symphony program since the departure of Mr. William Gericke.

* * * * *

The programme for the next Kneisel quartette concert at Union hall tomorrow evening is as follows; Quartette (MS.), A. Foote, (first time); songs with piano, Chopin's Lithauisches Lied, Schumann's Die Rose, Jensen's Staendchen; Sphaerenmusik, from string quartette. No. 2, Rubinstein; Menuet, No. 2, Boccherini, (first time); songs with piano, Liszt's Jugendglueck, Jensen's Am Manzanares, Brahms's Liebeslied, quartette in E flat, op. 74, Beethoven. The soloists are Arthur Foote and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch. It will be a very interesting concert, as can be judged.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 15, 1891.

The first appearances of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch in Music Hall, at the sixteenth rehearsal and concert, were greeted by audiences that filled every seat, and every foot of standing room. Mrs. Nikisch fully sustained the favorable reports concerning her exceptional ability as a singer, that preceded her debut. Her voice is a mezzo-soprano, fine and musical in quality, of fair compass, and even throughout its range. She is in the truest sense a singer, there being few traces of the declamatory style, which the German school of singing has so largely propagated. Mrs. Nikisch quickly demonstrated the fact that she possesses the temperament of an artist. Such music as the romanza, "Voi che sapete," and the aria, "Non so piu cosa son," from "The Marriage of Figaro," causes every nerve to vibrate, and her whole body to sway in sympathy with its exquisite phrases. In this, she at once recalls Mrs. Henschel, whose singing is far from being forgotten in Boston. The Mozart music was delightfully rendered. The pure, fresh voice of Mrs. Nikisch was in admirable keeping with these marvellous love songs, while in taste and expressiveness she was wholly satisfactory. Between two movements of Godard's "Symphonie Orientale," and the closing number, she sang three songs to Mr. Nikisch's accompaniment. The first, a pastorale, by Bizet, was sung in French, its beautiful melody being sustained and colored with much artistic skill. The rhythmical swing of a "Provencalisches Lied," by Schumann and the spirit of Brahms's "Vergebliches Staendchen," were also happily indicated, and were sung with the finish and style that characterized her interpretations of the Mozart selections. Mrs. Nikisch was warmly received, and after each number recalled many times.

The programme began with the overture to "Der Freischuetz." However one may feel inclined to growl at the continued reappearances of Mr. Nikisch's old favorites, his absolutely masterly readings of them are generally sufficient to turn growls into shouts of admiration. And, if it were the highest mission of the Symphony organization to present works that have been heard in Boston ever since the first notes of an overture and a symphony were sounded here, its audiences might well rejoice over the privilege of hearing them performed in such masterly fashion. But this is not its highest mission. In the ten years of its existence its concerts have revolutionized musical taste in the city to an extent that is simply marvellous. This musical growth is clearly indicated by the large number of musical enterprises of the highest class that now flourish, in place of a few of the same nature that formerly languished.

It is the duty of the symphony orchestra still to lead, not to retard this progress; and, while it is true that its programmes should be thoughtfully constructed—that the works of the older masters should not be shelved, and those of the day substituted—it is equally true that they should exhibit the broadest catholicity of taste and judgment. Even if the management are not disposed to buy new scores, there are already many of importance in its library that have been all two seldom performed; this fact in itself is sufficient to render invalid any excuses that might be made for the narrow range to which the programmes are confined. Mr. Nikisch should bestir himself and recall to memory a few of the many splendid ideas that he gave expression to soon after his arrival last year regarding the good he meant to accomplish during his stay here.

The overture was magnificently performed. The opening horn passages were given perfectly, the first clarinet outdid himself in smoothness and beauty of phrasing, and the grand climax was worked up with tremendous power; even the closing chords seemed eloquently expressive, so admirably were they timed. It was an unforgetable performance.

Godard's Oriental Symphony consists of five movements, illustrating poems that describe characteristic scenes in Arabia, China, Greece, Persia and Turkey. The third and fourth were played; "Sara la Baigneuse," (Greece); and "Le reve de la Nikia," (Persia). The last, which was given first, is a short movement (quasi adagio), beginning with a charming melody for oboe, that is taken up by the clarinet and strings, and continued until a new subject is announced. This subject is developed until it reaches a strong climax, in which the full orchestra takes part, and is followed by the return of the first melody with a more elaborate accompaniment. The "Grecian" movement is in effect, a swing-song, the rhythm of which is maintained in the accompaniment, while a fleeting melody is heard in the wood-wind. It contains some novel effects, notably the pizzicato by the strings, flute and the sharp upper notes of the harp. Both movements are richly harmonized, and illustrate the poems in the most captivating manner. They were perfectly played and heartily applauded.

The symphony was Beethoven's seventh, in A. Mr. Nikisch aroused considerable discussion last season by his reading of this work. Nevertheless his courage has not failed him, and this year finds his opinions on the matter unchanged. His conception of the symphony that Beethoven himself declared to be one of his greatest, does, in truth, put an entirely different face on it; and, to us, it reveals a wealth of new meaning that fully justifies it. The slow tempo of the first allegro brings to the surface that sadness which oftener than otherwise underlies Beethoven's gayest moods. The deliberate utterance of the figure of dotted eighths and sixteenth notes, and the sigh-like effect of the appogiatura destroys the vivacity they so easily express when taken faster, but the whole movement gains in breadth and impressiveness. The allegretto becomes an andante, imbued with a deep-rooted vein of romantic melancholy that instantly recalls Schubert. The scherzo is practically unchanged except that sadness again prevails in the impassioned phrases of the trio. And now comes the climax of all the restlessness of the preceding movements that has hitherto been permitted to be felt rather than seen. The finale, instead of being a conventionally lively movement, with every sixteenth note, and every figure clearly defined, becomes through its strong accents and roughly-played figures, a scene of reckless gayety, which steadily gains headway until it reaches its climax in the overwhelming f f f chords.

One must have a purpose if one wishes successfully to overturn tradition; and whether Mr. Nikisch's conception of this symphony be accepted or not, his purpose is as clear as is De Pachmann's entire lack of purpose in his unique readings of Chopin.

—Part of the Symphony orchestra, with Herr Nikisch as director, furnished the principal entertainment on Monday afternoon at a private concert given by Mrs. Theodore Havemeyer, at her house on Fifth avenue. The concert was given in the ballroom, which was beautifully decorated with jonquils, tulips and other spring flowers, after which an elegant luncheon was served. There were over 300 guests present. Mrs. Havemeyer is a genuine lover of music and a skilful player on the organ, piano and banjo.

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, FEB. 15, 1891.

THE SYMPHONIES.

SIXTEENTH CONCERT.

The programme last evening at Music hall was:

Weber.....Overture, "Der Frieschuetz"
Mozart, { Romanza, "Voi che sapete."
Aria, "Non so piu cosa son."
From "The Marriage of Figaro."
Benjamin Godard { Nikia's Dream,
In the Hammock
From "Symphonie Orientale," Op. 84.
(First time in Boston).

Songs with Piano.

Bizet.....Pastorale
Schumann.....Provencalisches Lied
Brahms.....Vergebliches Staendchen
Beethoven.....Symphony in A, No. 7

Soloist, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.

There was every indication that in the singing of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, it being the artiste's first public appearance in this city, the entire audience was deeply interested. From the moment of her entré the artist could but have won the personal admiration of all present, for Mrs. Nikisch is an exceptionally handsome and attractive personality. She has a mezzo soprano voice of good compass, the individual tones of which are each not only voluminous but in a certain sense, effective. She is also an intensely subjective artist and a very earnest and painstaking interpreter; but it must be frankly stated, that her method of tone-production is unquestionably inartistic, is very disagreeable. She does not sing in tune, and her sostenuto is undeniably inartistic. Such in brief is Mrs. Arthur Nikisch as a singer.

The overture to Der Freischuetz was not well played. It had been evidently neglected at the rehearsals; the clarinetist was both slovenly and careless in his phrasing; the horns were radically at variance with the pitch; and the ensemble as a whole was very imperfect. The Godard selections, both very charming, were admirably played, and the performance of the Symphony was in many respects excellent.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 15.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concerts.

The sixteenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, attracted an audience that filled all the seats and all the available standing room. The performances began with Weber's "Der Freyschutz" overture. Its reading was not one of Mr. Nikisch's best successes. The work was given with so many unaccustomed breaks in the time that its continuity was nearly destroyed, and a disjointed effect was given to it as a whole. The introductory movement was taken at an almost distressingly slow pace, and a propensity to retard the tempo was manifested all through the overture, and even the fiery culmination lost much of its usual effect for lack of appropriate spirit in the reading. It was finely played; but the interpretation was a mistake. There was a novelty on the programme, in the shape of two movements from Godard's "Symphonie Orientale," Op. 84, one entitled "Nikia's Dream," a sensuous adagio, warm and graceful in its themes, and the other "In the Hammock," in more animated time, also very charming in its melodies. The music is in the modern style, in all save its tender and flowing tunefulness. The orchestral coloring is rich and masterly, and like all French orchestration is notable for the dainty skill and beautiful effect with which the wood wind is used. A fine poetic feeling pervades the music and its instrumental treatment. It was all very fresh, very original and wholly delightful in the hearing. It was played in the best and most finished manner of the orchestra, and was listened to with so much pleasure and interest, that it is surprising it did not win more applause than rewarded it. The concert ended with Bethoven's Symphony in A. On the whole it was carefully interpreted and well played, the only serious criticism to be made upon the performance of the work being the heavy and labored manner in which the vivace was read. Here, again, Mr. Nikisch showed a leaning toward an over slow tempo, and the result was that the life and spirit nearly disappeared from the movement, and a dry and rigid formality replaced them. Of "vivace" scarcely a trace was left. With the interpretation of the rest of the work there is little fault to be found, except in respect to that frequent unauthorized retarding of the time in which Mr. Nikisch indulges. This propensity disappears every now and then, and two or three concerts pass without any exhibition of it; but suddenly it reappears in full force and characterizes an entire concert. It is always well to read Beethoven according to the indications he has given in his score. New readings of him are liable to be more daring than satisfactory or edifying. The soloist was Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who was received with cordial enthusiasm. Her first contributions to the concert were "Voi Che Sapete" and "Non so piu cosa son," from Mozart's "Figaro;" and, later in the evening, she sang Bizet's "Pastorale," Schumann's "Provencalisches Lied" and Brahms's "Vergebliches Staendchen." She has a full and resonant voice, not very sympathetic in quality, and not showing the best training or method; but she sings with spirit and confidence, though in a style not marked by the highest artistic refinement. She sang the Mozart selections carefully, but with a persistent use of portamento both ascending and descending that was far from good in musical effects. In the songs, however, she was heard to better advantage, and her singing of Brahms's song was really charming in style and expressiveness. The artist was recalled after each group, three times after the second with the most stormy applause. The success of this last group was largely assisted by Mr. Nikisch's exquisitely artistic playing of the pianoforte accompaniments. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky; Concerto for piano, in F-minor, Chopin, and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" Symphony. M. Vladimir De Pachmann is to be the soloist.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 16, 1891.

MRS. NIKISCH'S DEBUT.

Her First Boston Appearance With the Symphony Orchestra.

While bearing in mind the strictly musical features of the symphony concert in Music Hall, Saturday evening, it may not for once seem either irrelevant or uncritical to refer to the artistic significance of the applause with which the distinguished soloist for the evening was received. Without making the slightest insinuation against the proverbial intelligence of a symphony concert audience, neither referring in any disrespectful terms to the fair artiste in question, it can not be gainsaid that that any artistic criterion for judgment is by no means with applause. It is also true that all the unanimity and enthusiasm with which Mrs. Nikisch was greeted at her first appearance in this city seemed as some compliment all too flattering, and was neither respectful nor discriminating in its relation to the worthiest characteristics of an unmistakably charming and cultivated woman, who, being the wife of the esteemed conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, was, quite as enthusiastically welcomed as her most ardent admirer could have wished. Though the plaudits bestowed were both prolonged and vociferous, it is also true that the highly favored artiste seemed quite too easily induced to infringe upon the well-known yet unwritten law of the symphony concerts, regarding encores, the acceptance of which is very unusual at these concerts, and is almost always attended with a serious breach of taste, as was notably the case on Saturday evening. Such, however, was the somewhat superfluous assumption with which the artiste regarded the reception both cordial and heartfelt that she received, from a distinguished and fashionable audience. Any musician's opinion of her effort must be as considerately, candidly and respectfully expressed as is consistent with any true basis of musical judgment.

Mrs. Nikisch sang the familiar yet always beautiful romanza "Voi Che Sapete" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro;" also, from the same opera, the "Non so piu Cosa son" aria, and a charmingly well-chosen group of songs by Bizet, Schumann and Brahms. While waiving for a moment the consideration of any such limitations as any artist is liable to, it would simply be unjust to her chosen art not to state that while a musical temperament of the artiste in question undoubtedly exists, and is inherently sympathetic, and is the real musician's temperament, so far as nature itself is concerned; yet that this temperament has been more or less mal-cultivated in certain important directions is also true. The artiste's singing of the Mozart, the Bizet and the Schumann selections was, to be no less candid, than friendly and respectful, quite evenly inartistic, and quite as evenly unmusical. Not that the artiste was to any extent insincere in her readings, nor that she lacked to any perceptible extent the courage of her sincerity. Beyond cavil, she was most ardently painstaking, yet in this respect it is also true that the artiste seemed somewhat more mindful of her audience than her art in all that she did.

But the most serious fault to be found is that even her very careful singing of the repertoire quoted was lamentably perverted by certain inartistic not to say crude vocal conditions to which the singer well nigh constantly adhered. While her interpretations regarded from the pardonable subjectivity of her own point of view were piquantly interesting, yet from the standpoint to which the world's real artists have heretofore accustomed us they were at least in one instance, radically in error, and there was also an unfortunate void of a true artistic delivery in much that the artist did. That the vocal pedagogue might naturally attribute any such deficiencies to an ill-founded vocal method is true, yet we are all aware that the very term vocal method has fallen into disrepute, and quite naturally, as there can exist no such method in purely artistic and spontaneous singing as will laboriously control the vocal apparatus. Upon its instant trespass the artistic singing will cease and the artificial result will be laid bare. And so in the case of Mrs. Nikisch she invariably seems conscious of her every tone, and she often produces it with a conspicuous avoidance of any directness. The result has all the effect of a vocal drawl, and is correspondingly unmusical. The artist's singing of the Mozart romanza was no true Mozart singing, for it lacked the quiet, the refined and unaffected simplicity that is the ever desirable complement of the great master's art. Her "vergebliches staendchen," however, was a charming interpretation. Briefly stated, Mrs. Nikisch has a voluminous yet not very pleasing soprano voice—a mezzo soprano of good range. That she is a musical enthusiast was noticeable in almost every measure that she sang. Her musical conceptions and inceptions are instinct with an exuberant vitality, but her tone-production both labored and unnatural, and as in this respect her asperating corresponds. There is neither any naturalness and but very little art in her phrasing. In her singing of the group of three songs, as in her encore selection, the really artistic pleasure derived was from the masterly accompaniments so fortunately well played by Mr. Nikisch at the piano. The orchestral selections on the programme were superbly interpreted, save the overture to "Der Freischuetz" in which the mournfully slow tempi taken enabled both the woodwind and the brass to impart a tragic untunefulness to the work that Von Weber never could have anticipated. The two movements from Godard's unique, richly colored and altogether gorgeous "symphonie orientale" were finely played, as was also the seventh symphony. Next Saturday evening Mr. Vladimir Pachmann will be the soloist, and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony, Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasie, and Chopin's F-minor concerto will be performed.

C. L. CAPEN.

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

SIXTH SEASON 1890-91.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mrs. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Soprano.
Mr. ARTHUR FOOTE, Pianist.

V. CONCERT.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 16TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

ARTHUR FOOTE.	QUARTET for PIANO and STRINGS, in C major, op. 23. (MS.) Allegro comodo.—Adagio ma non troppo.—Scherzo; vivace.—Allegro non troppo. (First time.)
	SONGS WITH PIANO.
a) CHOPIN.	LITHAUISCHES LIED.
b) SCHUMANN.	DIE ROSE.
c) JENSEN.	STANDCHEN.
RUBINSTEIN.	ANDANTE, from String Quartet, C minor, No. 2.
BOCCHERINI.	MINUET, in A, No. 2.
	SONGS WITH PIANO.
a) LISZT.	JUGENDGLÜCK.
b) JENSEN.	AM MANZANARES.
c) BRAHMS.	LIEBESLIED.
BEETHOVEN.	QUARTET in E flat major. op. 74. Allegro.—Adagio non troppo.—Presto.—Allegretto.

The Pianoforte used is a Chickering.

The next Concert will be given Monday, March 9.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1890-91.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 19TH, AT 7.45, P.M.

PROGRAMME.

CHERUBINI.	OVERTURE, "Anacreon."
SAINT-SAËNS	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in C minor.
BACH.	AIR from SUITE in D major.
BRAHMS.	SYMPHONY in D major, No. 2. Allegro ma non troppo.—Adagio non troppo. Allegretto grazioso.—Finale (Allegro con spirito.)

SOLOIST:

MME. FANNIE BLOOMFIELD ZEISLER.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

—A WEEKLY PAPER—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1891.

Important.

IT is barely possible that the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society's concerts may not be resumed next season, but in place of the same the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Arthur Nikisch's direction will supply Brooklyn with the six public rehearsals and concerts of the Philharmonic series. The negotiations are now pending with Mr. Ellis, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That would give us at least eighteen decent orchestral concerts in New York and Brooklyn, besides those to be given by Seidl, in case the New York Philharmonic Society does not weed out its mummies and at the same time take in a man like Seidl, or like Van der Stucken, to conduct its concerts next season. Mr. Thomas cannot come to New York without making botch work of it, as he will not have the time for proper rehearsals. Besides, Chicago is big enough without the balance of the earth being thrown in the bargain.

XAVER SCHARWENKA played in Boston on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening last in conjunction with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch.

The performances created a genuine sensation in musical circles and Scharwenka was the lion of the occasion.

Scharwenka goes from Boston to Detroit, and under the guidance of Mr. Harry Williams, the energetic representative of the Behr piano there, we are sure that he will create an interest in the Behr grand in the City by the Straits such as will be beneficial to all concerned.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 15, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.

The concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall last evening, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conducting and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch soloist, made a notable event of the season's series, and an audience limited only by the seating and standing capacity of the auditorium was present. Mr. Nikisch arranged a peculiarly interesting programme for the evening, the several selections being as follows:

Weber.....Overture, "Der Freischuetz"
Mozart { a. Romanza, "Voi che sapete." b. Aria, "Non so piu cosa son." } From "The Marriage of Figaro"
Benjamin Godard { a. "Nikia's Dream." b. "In the Hammock." } From "Symphonie Orientale," Op. 84
a. Bizet.....Pastorale
b. Schuman.....Provencalisches Lied
c. Brahms.....Vergebliches Staendchen
Beethoven.....Symphony in A, No. 7

The singing of Mrs. Nikisch was most enjoyable in both her appearances, and the numbers chosen served to display her varied abilities as a vocalist to excellent advantage. One of her chief charms as a singer is caused by the rare sympathetic quality of her voice; and her fine taste, intelligence and pleasing stage presence all go to enhance the measure of gratification given by her vocal efforts. The romanza and aria from the "Marriage of Figaro" were sung with orchestral accompaniment, and both these numbers gave much pleasure. The songs making the second group of vocal selections were sung at the piano, with the aid of Mr. Nikisch as accompanist, and in these delightful compositions the singer was at her best, the Schumann and Brahms songs especially displaying the excellent characteristics of the singer with marked prominence.

In the Brahms song the singer made the meaning of the lines apparent, even to those unfamiliar with the German language, by her facial expression, and no more charming song singing has been heard for many a day than that of this artist in this number.

Mr. Nikisch has established a standard for the playing of song accompaniments which few have equalled, and his last evening's efforts in this line surpassed any in former concerts, his assistance at the piano giving an artistic finish to his wife's efforts quite beyond description.

The custom of ignoring all demands for encore numbers at these concerts was not followed on this occasion, for Mrs. Nikisch took the initiative in responding to the applause of the audience, and, after repeatedly acknowledging the plaudits, she stepped to the desk and led Mr. Nikisch to the piano, when she added a very pleasing interpretation of Goldmark's pretty song, "The Spring."

Mrs. Nikisch has good cause to recall this appearance with pride and satisfaction, for she not only received evidence of the kindly feeling of the Boston public toward her as the wife of the accomplished director of the orchestra, but also gained a flattering recognition of her abilities as a concert artist.

A more effective reading of the familiar "Der Freischuetz" overture has been seldom given in this city, and the pronounced favor with which this number was received suggests the wisdom of placing other equally well known overtures upon the programmes of the season.

The selections from Godard's symphonie proved to be very interesting tone pictures, and they were both played with fine taste. The Beethoven seventh symphony gave genuine pleasure as read at the end of the programme, and its several movements were enthusiastically applauded.

Next Saturday evening the soloist, Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann, will be heard in the F minor concert by Chopin.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, FEB. 15, 1891.

MUSIC'S REIGN.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch's Honors at the Symphony.

It was one of the largest "rehearsal" gatherings of the season that greeted the charming wife of the director of the Boston Symphony orchestra when she made her debut in this city on Friday. Nor was there less eagerness and interest to see and hear Mrs. Arthur Nikisch at the concert proper yesterday evening. The lady made a most agreeable impression. Her voice is sweet, well modulated, sympathetic, and of singularly even quality, without ranking as a great singer. She is so good a vocalist that Boston is sure to like her, and to like her very much.

With a great deal of expression Mrs. Nikisch gave the romance, "Say, Ye Who Know," and the air, "I Cannot Tell," both assigned to Cherubino, the page in Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro." Later in the programme she gave a group of songs, Mr. Nikisch accompanying her at the pianoforte very skilfully and sympathetically. These offerings included a pretty pastoral by Bizet, with Colin wooing the maid of his heart, sung in French; Schumann's "Song of Provence" and Brahm's "The Serenade in Vain." The artist was recalled again and again to bow her acknowledgments, and in truth her singing was delightfully expressive and her manner most pleasing and prepossessing.

The symphony was Beethoven's seventh in A, that work of curious contrasts, yet of constant interest. The allegretto could hardly have been performed more delicately; indeed, the whole interpretation was one to give much pleasure to all who appreciate this master work. Two dreamy, sensuous movements from the "Oriental Symphony" of Benjamin Goddard, heard for the first time in this city, gave a pleasing variety to the programme, which was opened by a fine, spirited, and wholly successful giving of Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture.

This will be another red-letter week for symphony-goers. Vladimir de Pachmann is to be the soloist. He is to perform, with the orchestra, Chopin's great concerto; Tschaikovski's overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," with Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding."

——Mrs. Nikisch had a most cordial reception upon her first Boston appearance, Friday, at the rehearsal. She looked extremely pretty and stylish in black, with gray at the throat. After her first song a great loose bunch of pink roses tied with ribbon was handed her, and she carried them in her hand during the subsequent songs.

Kneisel Quartet Concert.

Union Hall is likely to be the scene of a brilliant gathering tomorrow evening. It will hear the Kneisel quartet, with Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and Mr. Arthur Foote, in an unusually noteworthy entertainment. For one thing there will be a MSS. quartet by Mr. Foote, to be given for the first time. A Boccherini minuet will be another novelty here. Other selections for the instrumentalists include the "Music of the Spheres" from Rubinstein's second quartet, and Beethoven's quartet in E flat, work 74. Mrs. Nikisch's numbers are to be Chopin's "Lithuanian song," Schumann's [illegible] Jensen's "Serenade," Liszt's "Joy of Youth," Jensen's "On the banks of the Manzanares," and a Brahms "Love song."

[94]

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

SIXTH SEASON 1890-91.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mrs. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Soprano.
Mr. ARTHUR FOOTE, Pianist.

V. CONCERT.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 16TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

ARTHUR FOOTE.	QUARTET for PIANO and STRINGS, in C major, op. 23. (MS.) Allegro comodo.—Adagio ma non troppo.—Scherzo; vivace.—Allegro non troppo. (First time.)
	SONGS WITH PIANO.
a) CHOPIN.	LITHAUISCHES LIED.
b) SCHUMANN.	DIE ROSE.
c) JENSEN.	STANDCHEN.
RUBINSTEIN.	ANDANTE, from String Quartet, C minor, No. 2.
BOCCHERINI.	MINUET, in A, No. 2.
	SONGS WITH PIANO.
a) LISZT.	JUGENDGLUCK.
b) JENSEN.	AM MANZANARES.
c) BRAHMS.	LIEBESLIED.
BEETHOVEN.	QUARTET in E flat major. op. 74. Allegro.—Adagio non troppo.—Presto.—Allegretto.

The Pianoforte used is a Chickering.

The next Concert will be given Monday, March 9.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1890-91.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 19TH, AT 7.45, P.M.

PROGRAMME.

CHERUBINI.	OVERTURE, "Anacreon."
SAINT-SAËNS	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in C minor.
BACH.	AIR from SUITE in D major.
BRAHMS.	SYMPHONY in D major, No. 2. Allegro ma non troppo.—Adagio non troppo. Allegretto grazioso.—Finale (Allegro con spirito.)

SOLOIST:

MME. FANNIE BLOOMFIELD ZEISLER.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

—A WEEKLY PAPER—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1891.

Important.

IT is barely possible that the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society's concerts may not be resumed next season, but in place of the same the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Arthur Nikisch's direction will supply Brooklyn with the six public rehearsals and concerts of the Philharmonic series. The negotiations are now pending with Mr. Ellis, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That would give us at least eighteen decent orchestral concerts in New York and Brooklyn, besides those to be given by Seidl, in case the New York Philharmonic Society does not weed out its mummies and at the same time take in a man like Seidl, or like Van der Stucken, to conduct its concerts next season. Mr. Thomas cannot come to New York without making botch work of it, as he will not have the time for proper rehearsals. Besides, Chicago is big enough without the balance of the earth being thrown in the bargain.

XAVER SCHARWENKA played in Boston on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening last in conjunction with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch.

The performances created a genuine sensation in musical circles and Scharwenka was the lion of the occasion.

Scharwenka goes from Boston to Detroit, and under the guidance of Mr. Harry Williams, the energetic representative of the Behr piano there, we are sure that he will create an interest in the Behr grand in the City by the Straits such as will be beneficial to all concerned.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 15, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.

The concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall last evening, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conducting and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch soloist, made a notable event of the season's series, and an audience limited only by the seating and standing capacity of the auditorium was present. Mr. Nikisch arranged a peculiarly interesting programme for the evening, the several selections being as follows:

Weber.....Overture, "Der Freischuetz"
Mozart { a. Romanza, "Voi che sapete." / b. Aria, "Non so piu cosa son." } From "The Marriage of Figaro"
Benjamin Godard { a. "Nikia's Dream." / b. "In the Hammock." } From "Symphonie Orientale," Op. 84
a. Bizet.....Pastorale
b. Schuman.....Provencalisches Lied
c. Brahms.....Vergebliches Staendchen
Beethoven.....Symphony in A, No. 7

The singing of Mrs. Nikisch was most enjoyable in both her appearances, and the numbers chosen served to display her varied abilities as a vocalist to excellent advantage. One of her chief charms as a singer is caused by the rare sympathetic quality of her voice; and her fine taste, intelligence and pleasing stage presence all go to enhance the measure of gratification given by her vocal efforts. The romanza and aria from the "Marriage of Figaro" were sung with orchestral accompaniment, and both these numbers gave much pleasure. The songs making the second group of vocal selections were sung at the piano, with the aid of Mr. Nikisch as accompanist, and in these delightful compositions the singer was at her best, the Schumann and Brahms songs especially displaying the excellent characteristics of the singer with marked prominence.

In the Brahms song the singer made the meaning of the lines apparent, even to those unfamiliar with the German language, by her facial expression, and no more charming song singing has been heard for many a day than that of this artist in this number.

Mr. Nikisch has established a standard for the playing of song accompaniments which few have equalled, and his last evening's efforts in this line surpassed any in former concerts, his assistance at the piano giving an artistic finish to his wife's efforts quite beyond description.

The custom of ignoring all demands for encore numbers at these concerts was not followed on this occasion, for Mrs. Nikisch took the initiative in responding to the applause of the audience, and, after repeatedly acknowledging the plaudits, she stepped to the desk and led Mr. Nikisch to the piano, when she added a very pleasing interpretation of Goldmark's pretty song, "The Spring."

Mrs. Nikisch has good cause to recall this appearance with pride and satisfaction, for she not only received evidence of the kindly feeling of the Boston public toward her as the wife of the accomplished director of the orchestra, but also gained a flattering recognition of her abilities as a concert artist.

A more effective reading of the familiar "Der Freischuetz" overture has been seldom given in this city, and the pronounced favor with which this number was received suggests the wisdom of placing other equally well known overtures upon the programmes of the season.

The selections from Godard's symphonie proved to be very interesting tone pictures, and they were both played with fine taste. The Beethoven seventh symphony gave genuine pleasure as read at the end of the programme, and its several movements were enthusiastically applauded.

Next Saturday evening the soloist, Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann, will be heard in the F minor concert by Chopin.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, FEB. 15, 1891.

MUSIC'S REIGN.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch's Honors at the Symphony.

It was one of the largest "rehearsal" gatherings of the season that greeted the charming wife of the director of the Boston Symphony orchestra when she made her debut in this city on Friday. Nor was there less eagerness and interest to see and hear Mrs Arthur Nikisch at the concert proper yesterday evening. The lady made a most agreeable impression. Her voice is sweet, well modulated, sympathetic, and of singularly even quality, without ranking as a great singer. She is so good a vocalist that Boston is sure to like her, and to like her very much.

With a great deal of expression Mrs. Nikisch gave the romance, "Say, Ye Who Know," and the air, "I Cannot Tell," both assigned to Cherubino, the page in Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro." Later in the programme she gave a group of songs, Mr. Nikisch accompanying her at the pianoforte very skilfully and sympathetically. These offerings included a pretty pastoral by Bizet, with Colin wooing the maid of his heart, sung in French; Schumann's "Song of Provence" and Brahm's "The Serenade in Vain." The artist was recalled again and again to bow her acknowledgments, and in truth her singing was delightfully expressive and her manner most pleasing and prepossessing.

The symphony was Beethoven's seventh in A, that work of curious contrasts, yet of constant interest. The allegretto could hardly have been performed more delicately; indeed, the whole interpretation was one to give much pleasure to all who appreciate this master work. Two dreamy, sensuous movements from the "Oriental Symphony" of Benjamin Goddard, heard for the first time in this city, gave a pleasing variety to the programme, which was opened by a fine, spirited, and wholly successful giving of Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture.

This will be another red-letter week for symphony-goers. Vladimir de Pachmann is to be the soloist. He is to perform, with the orchestra, Chopin's great concerto; Tschaikovski's overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," with Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding."

——Mrs. Nikisch had a most cordial reception upon her first Boston appearance, Friday, at the rehearsal. She looked extremely pretty and stylish in black, with gray at the throat. After her first song a great loose bunch of pink roses tied with ribbon was handed her, and she carried them in her hand during the subsequent songs.

Kneisel Quartet Concert.

Union Hall is likely to be the scene of a brilliant gathering tomorrow evening. It will hear the Kneisel quartet, with Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and Mr. Arthur Foote, in an unusually noteworthy entertainment. For one thing there will be a MSS. quartet by Mr. Foote, to be given for the first time. A Boccherini minuet will be another novelty here. Other selections for the instrumentalists include the "Music of the Spheres" from Rubinstein's second quartet, and Beethoven's quartet in E flat, work 74. Mrs. Nikisch's numbers are to be Chopin's "Lithuanian song," Schumann's "Rose," Jensen's "Serenade," Liszt's "Joys of Youth," Jensen's "On the banks of the Manzanares," and a Brahms "Love song."

[94]

The allegro comodo of Mr. Foote's new quartet opens with the first theme by the strings, an accompaniment in short arpeggios being given to the pianoforte. After this has been pretty fully stated, it is interrupted by a brief episode, which enters on the first violin (in A minor), and which leads back to another concise return of the theme. To this succeeds the second theme, in G major, also by the strings, at the end of which with a full cadence in G major, begins the working-out section. This is quite extended, and is about equally derived from the two themes, and the episode referred to The first and second themes then return in the orthodox manner, and with a short coda the movement ends.

The adagio, in A flat major, opens with an extended cantabile theme upon the strings, with accompaniment by the pianoforte; after an episode in which a short theme is taken alternately by the strings and pianoforte, remaining unchanged in character, but constantly modulating, a second theme appears in F minor; this closes in C minor, and is followed by a sort of long coda in E flat major, by the strings alone. At the end of this (in E flat minor) the main theme of the movement is taken and treated in imitation by the different instruments; this finally ending with a little rec tative passage by the violin, which leads to the return of the first theme in A flat major; the 'cello now accompanying pizzicato and the piano with richer figuration than before. The movement is ended by a coda, (that which before was given to the strings alone), the pianoforte being added this time.

The scherzo, in G minor, is chiefly characterized by irregular rhythms, groups of five, seven and eight bars being intermingled in a way that would hardly be recognized at first hearing. The trio in E flat major is more flowing in character, the melody being almost entirely taken by the strings.

The finale begins in C minor, but ends, naturally, in C major. It is in the form of the first movement of a sonata, and calls for no especial mention so far as technical points are concerned. Mr. Foote dedicates his quartet to Prof. P ine.

Boccherini, a once famous Italian composer, produced in the course of his very active life no fewer than 366 instrumental works; among them 91 string quartets and 113 string quintets. Boccherini and Haydn were contemporaries. They even corresponded and sent complimentary letters to each other. No characterization of their respective abilities is more apt than that of Puppo, the violinist, who called Boccherini the "wife of Haydn." Boccherini's music had its influence, but it lacked the inventive genius of his great confrere. He died in 1806, at the age of sixty-six, having had the satisfaction, while alive, of witnessing an extended appreciation of his works.

Separated only two years from the Rasoumoffsky quartets, this E-flat quartet shows birth under very different circumstances. The proud, brilliant objectivity almost given up, only clear, plastic, formal treatment allies it with op. 59. In op. 74, the master had turned within himself, a psychological picture with peculiarly idiosyncratic subjectivity marked by progressive development. Here we hear an orchestra; the problem of the quartet is a new one. Beethoven has changed, this quartet marks it. Note the grand introduction and its close relationship to the following allegro. This is a soul story, former considerations are forgotten. The motive,—the expression of the mood,—one of longing, self-searching in its treatment. Throughout the whole of the succeeding allegro use of this introductory motive is made. As the picture grows, as the musical flood flows, one cries out, comparing this quartet with one in F major, op. 18: "This is modern music, music with color, never to grow old!" This quartet is called the "Harp quartet," from the treatment of the triad figure which ushers in the allegro. Beethoven toys with the arpeggioed harp treatment. Note the marked digressions, charm of second theme, contrast of mood, the soft and heavenly, and the realistic-forceful; frequent rhythms, keen-cutting counter accents; mighty treatment of the second subject in development. The mood becomes so dark, hard, fearful; then comes the harp motive with its light! Toward the end of the movement its treatment becomes pizzicato. The adagio is a noble sentimentality, an over-full heart. Trace its language; no hypocrisy of emotion here, all is living truth. No note can be changed. Peace is in the first theme, pain is in the second. Marx has said, "Every note was dipped in a tear." The scherzo is the firmest, most manly, perhaps pugnacious mood. Listen for the grand modulation in F minor. The trio has a song, a cantus firmus, against which the bass battles manfully and joyfully; it suggests Bach. Here Beethoven can find no end; he repeats the trio. The variations are a song of renunciation, sung often with many words, but ever the same. Again the two moods, one following the other. But they no longer oppose each other; the composer is the victor; as man he has conquered; he mirrors himself in his music. As the variations end, one feels that the old heroic, one might almost say, Hellenic, force of the quartet, op. 59, no longer exists; the man Beethoven had his tried soul in his music. (Resolved from the original German of Theodor Helm for this programme.) (Second performance at Kneisel Concerts.)

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

—A WEEKLY PAPER—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1891.

Important.

IT is barely possible that the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society's concerts may not be resumed next season, but in place of the same the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Arthur Nikisch's direction will supply Brooklyn with the six public rehearsals and concerts of the Philharmonic series. The negotiations are now pending with Mr. Ellis, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That would give us at least eighteen decent orchestral concerts in New York and Brooklyn, besides those to be given by Seidl, in case the New York Philharmonic Society does not weed out its mummies and at the same time take in a man like Seidl, or like Van der Stucken, to conduct its concerts next season. Mr. Thomas cannot come to New York without making botch work of it, as he will not have the time for proper rehearsals. Besides, Chicago is big enough without the balance of the earth being thrown in the bargain.

XAVER SCHARWENKA played in Boston on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening last in conjunction with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch.

The performances created a genuine sensation in musical circles and Scharwenka was the lion of the occasion.

Scharwenka goes from Boston to Detroit, and under the guidance of Mr. Harry Williams, the energetic representative of the Behr piano there, we are sure that he will create an interest in the Behr grand in the City by the Straits such as will be beneficial to all concerned.

[94]

Sand

BOSTON

MR. A

THURSDAY,

CHERUBINI.

SAINT-SAËNS

BACH.

BRAHMS.

MME. FAN

SUNDAY HERAL

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 16, 18

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, So
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.

The concert by the Boston Symphon chestra at Music Hall last evening, M thur Nikisch conducting and Mrs. Arthu kisch soloist, made a notable event o season's series, and an audience limited by the seating and standing capacity o auditorium was present. Mr. Nikisch ranged a peculiarly interesting progra for the evening, the several selections b as follows:

Weber.....Overture, "Der Freischu
Mozart { a. Romanza, "Voi che sapete."
{ b. Aria, "Non so piu cosa son."
From "The Marriage of Fig
Benjamin Godard { a. "Nikia's Dream."
{ b. "In the Hammock."
From "Symphonie Orientale," O
a. Bizet.....Past
b. Schuman.....Provencalisches
c. Brahms.....Vergebliches Staend
Beethoven.....Symphony in A, N

The singing of Mrs. Nikisch was most joyable in both her appearances, and numbers chosen served to display her va abilities as a vocalist to excellent advanta
One of her chief charms as a singer is cau by the rare sympathetic quality of voice; and her fine taste, intelligence pleasing stage presence all go to enha the measure of gratification given by her cal efforts. The romanza and aria from "Marriage of Figaro" were sung with chestral accompaniment, and both th numbers gave much pleasure. The so making the second group of vocal selectio were sung at the piano, with the aid of M Nikisch as accompanist, and in these delig ful compositions the singer was at her be the Schumann and Brahms songs especia displaying the excellent characteristics of t singer with marked prominence.

In the Brahms song the singer made th meaning of the lines apparent, even to tho unfamiliar with the German language, by h facial expression, and no more charming so singing has been heard for many a day tha that of this artist in this number.

Mr. Nikisch has established a standard fo the playing of song accompaniments whic few have equalled, and his last evening' efforts in this line surpassed any in forme concerts, his assistance at the piano giving a artistic finish to his wife's efforts quite be yond description.

The custom of ignoring all demands for en core numbers at these concerts was not fol lowed on this occasion, for Mrs. Nikisch took the initiative in responding to the applause of the audience, and, after repeatedly acknowledging the plaudits, she stepped to the desk and led Mr. Nikisch to the piano, when she added a very pleasing interpretation of Goldmark's pretty song,
"The Spring."

Mrs. Nikisch has good cause to recall this appearance with pride and satisfaction, for she not only received evidence of the kindly feeling of the Boston public toward her as the wife of the accomplished director of the orchestra, but also gained a flattering recognition of her abilities as a concert artist.

A more effective reading of the familiar "Der Freischuetz" overture has been seldom given in this city, and the pronounced favor with which this number was received suggests the wisdom of placing other equally well known overtures upon the programmes of the season.

The selections from Godard's symphonic proved to be very interesting tone pictures, and they were both played with fine taste.
The Beethoven seventh symphony gave g-n-uine pleasure as read at the end of the programme, and its several movements were enthusiastically applauded.

Next Saturday evening the soloist, Mr.
Vladimir de Pachmann, will be heard in the E minor concert by Chopin.

Boston Journal.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 16, 1891.

The Symphony Concert.

The attendance at the last Symphony concert and the Friday afternoon rehearsal that preceded it was only limited by the number of admission tickets which the management would sell. It is said that a very large number of people were unable to obtain the admissions for Friday afternoon, and Saturday evening every inch of space was occupied around the sides of Music Hall—the fortunate ones being ladies as well as gentlemen, who were compelled to stand during the entire performance—it being one of the occasions when the regular patrons were out in full force. The attraction was the appearance of Mrs. Nikisch, the wife of the director, as the soloist. Curiosity, added to the generous notoriety which she has enjoyed through the press for several weeks on account of her social position, served to bring out the musical public who are not regular attendants on the Symphony concerts. It was Mrs. Nikisch's first public appearance in this city, though many had heard her sing at other times and in appearances elsewhere. Personally she is very attractive, and this goes a long way even with the Symphony audiences. She gave as her selections the "Voi che Sapete" and the aria of Cherubino from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and later songs with the piano from Bizet, Schumann and Brahms. In the songs she had the assistance of her husband in his artistic and very remarkable accompaniments, which contributed very largely to the pleasure with which the offerings were received. In these songs, however, she was the happiest, and received such applause that she added another, contrary to the dictum of Conductor Nikisch, but which he is compelled to permit on some occasions. Mrs. Nikisch has musical instinct, and an articulation and facial expression which place her at once en rapport with the thought of the composer, and bring her into sympathy with the audience. But she is by no means a great artist, and there was much in her method of singing and the delivery of the Mozart selections to which exception must be taken. Her best number was the Brahms song, and in all her renditions it is undoubtedly true that she was the more cordially received from the fact that she is the wife of the director of the Symphony Orchestra. It may be that the anticipations of the audience had been too great; yet it cannot be denied that she received a handsome ovation that was very creditable to the audience. Her voice is a mezzo soprano, and is sweet and telling in the medium register, while her high notes, particularly in sostenuto passages, are forced, harsh and characteristic of a false method. She was loaded with flowers, as would naturally be anticipated, and she was certainly a drawing card for the management.

The orchestral contributions consisted of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, the familiar overture to "Der Freischutz" and some selections from Godard's Oriental symphony, the latter new to Boston. The orchestra played unusually well, and the characteristics of Mr. Nikisch's readings were particularly prominent. The "Der Freischutz" overture received an interpretation entirely at variance with its accepted playing. The opening tempo was painfully slow, while in other respects effects were brought out which revealed new beauties in the composition. The delivery was enthusiastically received, as are all familiar numbers as interpreted by this orchestra. The Godard number was exceedingly interesting, and the symphony was magnificently rendered. At the next concert De Pachmann is to be the soloist, and he will play Chopin's Concerto in F minor. This will undoubtedly call out a large attendance, but it is to be regretted that such a plethora of pianists and instrumental soloists has prevented the hearing of many vocal artists whose appearance was certainly hoped for. But the public must be content with what is offered.

Argus
Feb 2-3

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

City Hall was filled last evening by one of the largest and most fashionable audiences of the season.

The occasion was the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the tenth entertainment in the Stockbridge Course.

To speak at length of the merits of this organization would be a useless as well as unnecessary task, for not only are the people of Portland well acquainted with them, but there is no part of the country which the fame of this organization has not penetrated.

It need only be said that the numbers were rendered with the precision and finish characteristic of the orchestra and were most enthusiastically received. The numbers receiving the most liberal recognition were "Allegro animato e grazioso" from Schumann's Symphony in B flat No. 1, "Danse Macarbe" by Saint-Saens and the cello solo, "O Cara Memoria," by Mr. Hekking. Too much cannot be said in praise of Mr. Hekking's cello playing. His tone was grand, his execution magnificent. At the close of his solo he received a perfect ovation and was compelled to respond to an encore which he did by giving a superb rendition of "Tranmerei."

Taken as a whole the entertainment was one of the best of the course and the Symphony Orchestra can always be assured of an appreciative audience and a cordial welcome from the people of Portland.

Clipping from Whig, Bangor Me.
Date 2-3

The traveling arrangements for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was to have given a concert in Portland last evening were quite complete and made the trip to and from Portland a quick and comfortable one. A special Pullman car was detailed for the use of the orchestra. After the concert the members were to go at once to the car, take their berths, and upon awakening were to be in Boston.

On account of the severe storm raging outside Tuesday the steamer Lewis F. Brunswick Steamship Company, was obliged to put into Bar Harbor, while on her

[95]

Boston Post
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 16, 1891.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the Sixteenth Symphony Concert, given at Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Overture, "Der Freischütz" ..... Weber
Romanza, "Voi che sapete," } from "The Mar- } Mozart Aria, "Non so piu cosa son," } riage of Figaro" }
a. Nikia's Dream } from "Symphonie Ori- } Godard
b. In the Hammock } entale," Op. 84 }
(First time in Boston.)
Songs with piano { Pastorale ..... Bizet
{ Provencalisches Lied .... Schumann
{ Vergebliches Staendchen ... Brahms
Symphony in A, No. 7 ..... Beethoven

The title of Godard's "Symphonie Oriental," two numbers of which were played Saturday evening, is misleading; for this opus 84 is merely a set of five descriptive musical pieces suggested by poems which treat of oriental subjects. Of the two sketches chosen by Mr. Nikisch for performance, the first, "Nikia's Dream," is a charming adagio, but of such distinguished character that it is doubtful whether it will ever prove as popular a number as its companion piece, "In the Hammock." This is a musical description of Hugo's poem, "Sara la Baigneuse," which poem, by the way, suggested to our fellow-townsman, Mr. MacDowell, the second of his three exquisite pianoforte pieces, "Les Orientelles." "In the Hammock" is not unlike a barcarole in rhythm and character; it is melodious and exceedingly graceful. The two pieces are pleasing examples of the modern school of French orchestral writing. They are not deep, it is true; neither are they pretentious. The melodies are free from vulgarity, the harmonies and rhythms are piquant, and the instrumentation, so rich and at the same time so discreet, is worthy of the closest attention of the student. Whether they illustrate the poems, whether the coloring is Eastern—these are other questions. The music would be just as delightful if the words of Godard and Hugo were not annexed; and, as regards color, Felicien David had one advantage in this field of Oriental music; he had lived in the East. He not only saw his camel; he sat upon it. The others, Godard included, follow well-approved receipts when making Eastern music.

Three pieces by Godard were played for the first time, and they may justly be called novelties; yet they were not so new and strange Saturday evening as the "Freischütz" overture and the vivace of the first movement of the Seventh Symphony under the direction of Mr. Nikisch. There were such liberties taken with the tempo of both, and there were so many efforts to gain effects, that the effect of the whole in each was almost entirely destroyed. It is true that the proper tempo often depends upon circumstances accompanying the performance, and great latitude should be given a skilled and sincere director. To so take the tempo that it is impossible for the musical intentions of the composer to come clearly to the surface; to introduce meaningless ritards that the unexpected may attract the attention of an audience; to lose sight of the swing of the movement; to forget the pulse which should beat steadily—this is another affair. The great contrast between the opening and the allegro of the overture was hardly noticeable, first, on account of the extreme and unmusical slowness with which the opening movement was taken, second, on account of the desire of Mr. Nikisch to make every measure of the allegro tell. But the headlong rush and the demoniac fury were missing, and even the jubilant chorus at the end seemed less exultant. And this was because his preparations for an effect were so plotted and so ostentatious that when the effect came it was disappointing. The same can be said of his treatment of the allegro vivace of the symphony, which became a rather heavy dance with sundry rubato passages; that is to say, the straightforward jollity of Beethoven become a somewhat monotonous Hungarian rhapsodie with nerve-irritating tendencies. These more than questionable liberties taken by Mr. Nikisch are to be regretted, as the playing of the orchestra was excellent throughout the concert.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who sang publicly in Boston last week for the first time, appeared some time ago in a symphony concert at the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, and then made a favorable impression, if applause be the outward token of sincere appreciation, and so Saturday evening she was most vigorously applauded before and after each group of songs. She is a mezzo-soprano; her voice is not of extended range, and it is naturally a pleasing one, for her medium register is of warm and sympathetic quality. Her high notes are weak, and she takes them badly; her lower ones are unstable. Her singing is more marked by the display of carefully studied taste and a cheerfulness of personality than by purity of tone, production or technical skill. From the singing teacher's point of view, Mrs. Nikisch is not a well-trained vocalist; but she will undoubtedly be a favorite, for here, as elsewhere, audiences regard more today the personal appearance and magnetic qualities of a singer than the use or abuse of the portamento. Her best work was observed in Brahm's song. Her performance of the Mozart arias showed the deficiencies of her technique and also established beyond a doubt that she was wanting in dramatic instinct; for nothing could have been more foreign to Mozart's music, the words of the libretto and the traditions which have come down from the day's of Mozart than Mrs. Nikisch's interpretation of these two immortal songs of passion. The accompaniments played upon the pianoforte by Mr. Nikisch were remarkably good.

The programme of the concert which will be given Saturday evening, Feb. 21, includes Tschaikowsky's Overture Fantasie "Romeo and Juliet"; Chopin's Concerto for pianoforte in F minor; and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony. Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann will play the pianoforte part of the concerto.

PHILIP HALE.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will sing this evening at the Kneisel Quartette concert at Union Hall, and Mr. Arthur Foote's new quartette (MS.) will be played for the first time. Other numbers are by Beethoven and Rubinstein.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert of Saturday evening had the distinction of a fine programme, one of more than a few fine ones with which the season so far has been rich:

Weber—Overture to "Der Freischütz."
Mozart—(a.) Romanza: "Voi che sapete." } From "Marriage of Figaro."
(b.) Aria: "Non so piu cosa son" }
Benj. Godard—(a) Nikia's Dream. } From "Symphonie Orientale," Op. 84.
(b) In the Hammock }
(First time in Boston.)
Songs with piano:
(a) Bizet—Pastorale.
(b) Schumann—Provençalisches Lied.
(c) Brahms—Vergebliches Ständchen.
Beethoven—Seventh Symphony. In A.
Singer: Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.

A fine programme, we say; and its finest features are the oldest. Why quarrel with the sunset, with Jupiter, or Venus, or the Pleiades, or the moon, because we have seen them many times? Until new composers can produce things not incomparably less beautiful, less noble and less interesting, why not cling to what is best? Why compel us to exchange the joy, the inspiration of a real, a live, symphony concert, for the tame gratification of a critical sense of duty in hearing, weighing, verifying every new succes d'estime? When you can have "Hamlet," "Henry IV.," "The Tempest," "As You Like It," what care you for the latest fashion of the footlights, or the cleverest invention of the last young play-monger? But perhaps you think us antiquated, unprogressive, narrow. Perhaps you see the question from the point of view of a person whom we met and passed in the street one evening many years ago. There were two of them, who evidently carried with them an odor of the stage, not to say of liberal potations. Their conversation was argumentative, excited. As they passed and vanished into darkness behind us, we caught just one remark from the more excited of the two, a playwright in his way, as it would seem: "Well, I know, Shakspeare was a great man; but then he and I go to work in a different way" (meaning, of course, different ways). This mellow genius had a right to his way, you suggest, as well as Shakspeare. But have we no right, we, the many-headed, to hear and enjoy and get the good of what we like, to drink in poetry and music for its own sake and for our souls' sake, without having the divine feast turned into a lower court of judgment, where we must all sacrifice ourselves to the amiable but unedifying task of pronouncing on the merits of new comers? At all events we state one point of view which has its reasonableness. Without exclusiveness, without discouragement to fresh young effort, without ignoring the "progress of the age" or "rapid transit," that futile substitute for progress, we claim credit for the common sense as well as courage of our conviction.

Therefore we were very happy, as we always are, to hear a good performance of the immortal "Freischütz" overture. Perhaps we had a subjective leaning that way from the fact that the earliest positive and deep impression we are able to recall of orchestral music away back in our boyhood, when orchestras in Boston were worse than caricatures of what we now demand, was this same "Freischütz" overture, with all its weird, mysterious harmony, its alternating light and shade, its strains of love and hope, its chalumeau tones and tremolo of darkening influences, its rapturous triumph of the good. Where music is so wonderfully great, a thin and weak suggestion of it is enough, as we have often felt in hearing the most threadbare transcriptions of Beethoven,—enough, we mean, to sow the seeds of a lifelong passion for intrinsically fine music, although one have to wade through many bad performances before arriving at a good one. The make-shift rendering of the overture which we remember was at a performance of "Der Freischütz" as a spoken play at the old Federal Street Theatre, when also the singing of the Chorus of Bridesmaids and the ringing Hunters' Chorus left an impress, half pleasure and half pain, or restlessness, in the boy brain just awakening to music. We remember getting hold of a few loose orchestral parts of that overture and trying to spell out a little of the mystic language. Oh! such glories, like those of rise and set of sun, never fade utterly away. The performance of Saturday evening was admirable in many ways; every instrument was at its best; the four horns were enchanting, full of woodland romance; the clarinet love melody was humanly pathetic, while its mysterious low tones (of which Weber was so fond) helped out the weird suggestions of the shuddering tremolo of the strings in the dark passages where Zamiel is felt to hover in the background. And the great aria, first in its maidenly joy and tenderness, then in its blaze of triumph, was all one could desire. And yet we could not help feeling that the tempo of the beginning was held back to a degree that fretted and chilled the musical impulse with which we have been wont to listen. Something within us seemed to say: All very beautiful, but why will it refuse to move? Why hang back? Expectation, sympathy, lose courage. The hush before the climax somehow seemed to weaken it, instantaneous and electric as the outburst was.

Greater, deeper and more welcome was the Seventh Symphony, the one which Beethoven himself ranked among his greatest compositions. Does anybody "grumble" at another chance to hear, to relight the flame of life and faith anew at the undying fire of so inspired a work? As well grumble because Christmas comes round, or because the suns and planets still roll in their orbits, glorious and young as on the morning of creation. Will you grumble at a symphony because you cannot have it hot and smoking right from the composer's brain or oven? Must everything be new and of new fashion before you will condescend to listen to it? If enduring interest and charm be the criterion of excellence, shall its very excellence be the condemnation of a thing? Shall newness be the paramount desideratum? Will you have new sun and moon, a new religion, new republic, or a new wife, new mother (if you are happy enough not yet to have outlived so dear and true a friend)? Will you have a new vernacular, no matter how outlandish, or a new art of music (if you do not find it in your Wagner), or a new Shakspeare to the extent that you are willing to forget the one you have? Will you have the stars less frequent and less lustrous to make room for new patterns and new patents of fireworks, torches and rush lights? Thank God! the Seventh Symphony is not consequent.

[illegible] opinions this last interpretation of it. That is owing to the various conceptions of the ideal scope and meaning of the composition. Many, taking their cue from Berlioz's interpretation of it, regard it as a playful, joyful, almost frolic musical picture of a merry rustic festival, and so take for granted that the unflagging triplet rhythm of the first Allegro should be very lively, quick, elastic. Is this a true notion of the meaning and spirit of this symphony? After the noble and majestic introduction, has not the six-eight movement, which urges itself onward with such stern, unvarying persistency, a much grander character, something more like the sublime revolution of the planets and the solar systems, or the all-impelling universal principle of motion, than a gay, buoyant dance? Then the mysterious Quasi Allegretto throbs with the pulse of a profound life. Then again the Scherzo, with its repeated Trio, throughout which the A, whether as keynote or harmonic of another, still sounds on persistently like a long organ point, marking as it were the horizon line in the broad, clear picture, thrills you as if the heavens had suddenly opened,—is it not one of the sublimest strains of instrumental music ever written or conceived, and all the more sublime because this breath-suspending transfiguration overtakes us in the very midst of the unbounded joy and freedom of the Scherzo? And the Finale, freest of all, a march upborne on wings, does not it, too, carry out the same sense of a triumphant, all-pervading and undying force whereof we too are sharers so long as we are true to the faith of this great music? In this view of the intention of the symphony we were not sorry to hear the first movement held to a rigid tempo, uniform and steadfast, where law is quietly superior to hurry. To the tempo in the other movements could any plausible exception be well taken? The character of the symphony we had, its grand ideal scope and import, its beauty, depth, unspeakable significance, as only such an orchestra, and under such a leader, can bring it out. And we believe the majority of the audience—at least what the Quakers used to call "the weight of the meeting"—felt it.

The novelty of the programme, the modern French-Oriental "symphony" by Godard (if symphony that can be called which, judging by the two pieces given, seems to be a binding up in one bouquet or volume of five descriptive pieces illustrative of so many poems by so many authors), is wholly of another character, dreamy, languorous and local, melodious, warmly colored, sensuous, romantic. There are beautiful motives and combinations of the woodwind instruments relieving the comfortable and sleepy swing of "In the Hammock," properly "Sara la Baigneuse," who dreams of yet more exalted and luxurious indolence while she swings.

Now of the lady, the long anticipated singer, charming partner of our good conductor, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch. She had been already heard in several private houses, as well as smaller halls, in this neighborhood, where she was received most favorably. There were and must have been various estimates of her success in our great Music Hall. She made herself well heard there, for her tones were true, clear, well sustained; she sang for the most part well, like one with a musical, artistic nature, but not, in so large a space, with all the ease essential to the complete charm of singing. It cost an effort, a tension of the nerves and muscles very manifest. And then, too, she indulges in that portamento, or scooping up to a higher tone, which, with the censors of vocalization is as much abhorred as "consecutive fifths" are among the critics of harmony. Yet its expression is not always bad. The lady, we have said, is musical by nature and has had good musical experience. She sings heartily, with feeling and expression, and with unaffected quick dramatic instincts. She feels and acts the spirit of her song, with easy and expressive gesture, as if her sphere were the lyric stage. Her ways are winning, and sympathies flow out to her without reserve. There were unyielding critics, but there were far more uncritical laymen who were sincerely delighted by her singing, and who jealously clung to it to the last note, and could not be completely happy until she volunteered another song. The Cherubino melodies, with orchestra, called forth her finest art; but the group of Lieder, exquisitely accompanied on the piano by her husband, was evidently more appreciated. If not a great singer, Mrs. Nikisch is an interesting and a charming artist in her way.

Next time look out for Pachmann, who, after bringing home to Boston ears almost everything by Chopin, will play with orchestra his F-minor Concerto. The concert will open with Tschaikowsky's (another Russian) Overture-Fantasie "Romeo and Juliet," and close with Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding Symphony." J. S D.

Clipping from
Date 2-4

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

To-night the Boston Symphony orchestra will give the 10th entertainment in the regular Stockbridge course. The principal work will be the Schumann symphony, No. 1, in B flat. The soloist will be Mr. Hekking, violoncello. The orchestra will be composed of 70 players and Herr Nikisch will be the conductor.

INQUIRER, Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 2-15

Boston Symphony Concert.

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of the celebrated conductor, Arthur Nikisch, will give their fourth concert at the Academy of Music, on Wednesday evening, February 25, at 8 o'clock. Vladimir de Pachmann will be the soloist. The programme will be one of the best of the series, and a most enjoyable entertainment may be looked forward to by all lovers of good music. The sale of seats opens to-morrow morning at 1119 Chestnut street, and, no doubt, will speedily reach large proportions. The concert will be given under the management of C. A. Ellis.

Boston Daily Courier

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1891.

MUSIC.

Symphony Concert—Debut of Mrs. Nikisch.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, and Some French Music.

The programme of the sixteenth symphony concert, with Mrs. Arthur Nikisch soloist, was:

Weber.....Overture, "Der Freischuetz"
Mozart { a. Romanza, "Voi che sapete." / b. Aria, "Non so piu cosa son." }
From "The Marriage of Figaro."
Benjamin Godard { a. "Nikia's Dream." / b. "In the Harem mock." }
From "Symphonie Orientale," Op. 84
Songs—
a. Mozart.....Pastorale
b. Schumann.....Provencalisches Lied
c. Brahms.....Vergebliches Staendchen
Beethoven.....Symphony in A, No. 7

It is not too much to say that Mrs. Nikisch dominated this concert. Did the jammed aisles represent a desire to hear the Seventh symphony, the "Freischütz" melodies, or even the new pieces of the Frenchman, Godard? No, the crowd came to satisfy their curiosity, to see as well as hear the wife of the most conspicuous man in music in the United States. Mrs. Nikisch in her pretty gown was as fair a vision as the bare platform of Music Hall ever frames, and it was with a piquaint and charming air that she composed herself for her first selection. Of her singing we can but repeat in effect our comments on her Cambridge performance some weeks ago. Her voice is a sympathetic mezzo soprano of fair size; in the use of it faults appear—the attack is not always true, that is, the tone is not hit squarely, and because of a too frequent use of open tones the timore of the voice is more of one tint than it need be. But Mrs. Nikisch is more interpreter than vocalist; one need only look into her face as she sings to read the meaning of the words. She is ardent, sympathetic, emotional, and bubbling over with music. The familiar Mozart tunes were sung with much sentiment, the distinction which Cherubini makes between his love for a lowly maid and a lady of high degree being aptly marked by the singer; but it was in the songs Mrs. Nikisch charmed most. After the group was finished and the singer had answered some four recalls, flower-laden and radiant she confronted her spouse, and for this occasion, superior, her mute appeal to be permitted to sing another song was answered favorably (there is not a conductor on earth who could have done differently under the circumstances), and a charming song by Goldmark resulted. The piano accompaniments were played by Mr. Nikisch, whose ability in this direction is remarkable.

The two movements from Godard's "Symphonie Orientale" are charming bits, having the grace of manner and method which belongs to the modern French school. Gracious, too, is the coloring. How much these Frenchmen make of rhythm! The performance of the seventh Symphony and of the overture presented many beautiful examples of finished orchestral playing. At the next concert De Pachmann will play Chopin's F minor concerto; the orchestral selections will be Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet," and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding."

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
Vol. LXXXIX, No. 48.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1891.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The fifth of the season's concerts by the Kneisel string quartet, at Union Hall last evening, took on a special interest by reason of the assistance of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch as soloist, and the usual large attendance was increased to the utmost limit of the auditorium on this occasion.

Mr. Arthur Foote's new quartet for piano and strings had its first hearing in this programme and its several movements showed the composer at his best, their tuneful themes and skilful development giving still further evidence of his value as a representative American musician.

The adagio was particularly admired, and the brilliant final allegro gave a finish to the composition that commanded a hearty commendation from all who heard it. The composer took the piano part, and was superbly supported by Mr. Kneisel and his associates. At the close, Mr. Foote was honored with repeated recalls, and he is to be congratulated upon having made a thoroughly pleasing addition to the chamber music repertoire of the season.

The other instrumental numbers were the "Andante," from Rubinstein's quartet in C minor, No. 2; the "Menuet," No. 2, by Boccherini, and Beethoven's Quartet in E flat, op. 74; in all of which Mr. Kneisel and his fellow-musicians gave the keenest pleasure.

Mrs. Nikisch chose for her numbers Chopin's "Lithauisches Lied," Schumann's "Die Rose," Jensen's "Staendchen," Liszt's "Jugendglueck," Jensen's "Am Manzanares" and Brahms' "Liebestied," all of which were sung to piano accompaniments played by Mr. Nikisch. This artist fully confirmed the good impression formed of her value as a singer of songs at her appearance on Saturday night last, and all of her numbers were received with spontaneous applause which recalled her after each appearance. The songs by Jansen and that by Brahms were especially pleasing, and the accompaniments played by Mr. Nikisch made not a little of the pleasure attending the singer's numbers.

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 17, 1891

MUSIC.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The fifth concert of the Kneisel Quartette series was given at Union Hall last evening. The Quartette was assisted by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, soprano, and Mr. Arthur Foote, pianist. The programme was as follows:

Quartette for piano and strings, in C major, op. 23 (MS.), (First time.).....Arthur Foote
[Songs with piano—
Lithauisches Lied.....(a) Chopin
Die Rose.....(b) Schumann
Standchen.....(c) Jensen
Andante, from string Quartet, C minor, No. 2.....Rubenstein
Minuet, in A, No. 2.....Boccherini
[Songs with piano—
Tugendglueck.....(a) Liszt
Am Manzanares.....(c) Jensen
Liebeslied.....(c) Brahms
Quartette in E flat major, op. 74.....Beethoven

Mr. Foote's quartette was played last evening for the first time. It is a melodious, interesting, genial and thoroughly musical work. The themes of the first movement, an allegro comodo, are well contrasted, and the developments are natural and devoid of padding. The whole movement is fresh and spontaneous, and the impassioned close is full of strength. In the second, an adagio, Mr. Foote departs from the rules of the school, and we find, instead of strict polyphonic treatment, the aria and accompaniment; nor is this departure to be deplored, for the melody is genuine, and the refined taste of the composer shuns that which, without care, might easily be trivial. It is an eminently musical and flowing movement. The scherzo has not so much to say that is new, but it is interesting in rhythm and ingenious in construction. The last movement is more conventional, and much of it is, in fact, commonplace; but this is, unfortunately, the case with the finales of men of greater talent; for how seldom is a fourth movement found which gives excuse for its traditional and enforced existence. Yet the close of the finale is well written, and it will always provoke applause. Mr. Foote was fortunate in the first performance of his work. It was played by his associates with the care and exquisite finish which distinguish the playing of these admirable artists, and Mr. Foote is to be congratulated upon his work and its performance. He was recalled after the finale.

And nothing but words of praise can be written concerning the performance of the other quartette numbers. The closing number has been given at a former concert of this quartette and the playing of it needs no empty words of eulogy; but it is impossible to refrain from speaking of the most musical rendering of the Rubenstein andante and the dainty minuet of Boccherini with its flavor of melancholy. It is to be wished that the name of Boccherini were often met with in such concerts, for he is one of the great masters of chamber music. Mrs. Nikisch was very heartily applauded by the audience, which filled completely Union Hall. If the voice of the people is the voice of God, Mrs. Nikisch has every mark of divine approbation. Whether this applause was given for her singing or for her personality is a doubtful question. If she is to be judged by the rules laid down by all teachers of song and all masters of the art, her work of last evening can not be praised. When she sang in Cambridge, it was said in the POST that she was a delightful contrast to many German singers, for she did not force her tones and she was not guilty of false intonation. Last evening, however, she wandered at times from the pitch, and her attack was often slovenly. Instead of striking her upper notes firmly, she struck under them and climbed with her voice until she secured them—a most amateurish trick. Nor are the physical efforts by which she succeeds in producing tones, even in her medium register, pleasant to look upon. Her voice is naturally agreeable, and it is a pity that it has not been subjected to a sterner and wiser discipline. Mr. Nikisch played charmingly the accompaniments to her songs, so charmingly that the ear listened with more delight to the pianoforte than to the singer.

The next concert of the series will be given Monday, March 9. PHILIP HALE.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, FEB. 17.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. Arthur Foote's New Work—Mme. Nikisch's Singing.

Last evening Union Hall was filled with a most appreciative audience. The entertainment opened with a quartet for piano and strings in G major. The composer, Mr. Arthur Foote, presided at the piano and its introduction to a Boston audience was highly flattering to the author—who was repeatedly applauded.

This most acceptable feature was followed by another of equal interest in the person of Mme. Nikisch, who came before the audience leaning on the arm of her husband, who later accompanied her on the piano. She rendered selections from Chopin, Schumann and Jensen with rare grace, and it was evident at the finish she had many friends in the audience.

The next number proved to be an andante for string quartet, C minor, No. 2, by Rubinstein, and a minuet in A, No. 2, by Boccherini, two selections of special softness which the Kneisel quartet rendered most acceptably. Mme. Nikisch once more appeared and sang three selections from Liszt, Jensen and Brahms. These numbers were better adapted for a display of the executive qualities of her voice, and Mr. Nikisch attracted much attention by the charming quality of his touch in rendering the several accompaniments. This most acceptable programme was closed with Beethoven's quartet in E flat major, op. 74.

The next of the Kneisel concerts will be given Monday, March 9.

Critic, Washington, D. C

Date 2-16

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth concert of the series by this noble orchestra will take place on Thursday evening, February 26. Besides the attraction of the most charming programme that Mr. Nikisch can select, the occasion is to be made still further noteworthy by the appearance of Vladimir de Pachmann, the distinguished pianiste, who enjoys the highest distinction in this [illegible]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 17, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Kneisel Quartette's Concert Last Night.

The fifth concert of the season by the Kneisel Quartette, in Union Hall last evening, was a very long one, especially as there were six long songs, and in other respects the programme was so inconsiderately arranged that even the great Beethoven quartette in E flat major, op. 74, with which the concert ended, could but have been somewhat drearily heard by all present. The work itself, however, is noble beyond praise, is rich with glow, yet deeply tender and no less characteristic in design than colossally grand.

The concert opened with Arthur Foote's quartette for pianoforte and strings in C major. A masterpiece in which the purest style, the finest taste and the most available scholarship of the sterling musician is this quartette; it fairly seems to preach of art's immortal beauty. Everything is omitted in it that is not convertible to some useful end, and all that the composer has to say is no less thoughtfully said than warmly felt. The songs of the concert were by Chopin, Schumann, Jansen, Liszt and Brahms, and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch was the singer. Again the singer's faults were chiefly vocal faults, and the singer looked the sentiment of her songs with so much charm that although the ever to be desired refinement and culture of the true artist were absent, and there was much singing out of tune also, yet the singer was in the heartiest manner again applauded and recalled, whereas, for once, if any encore was deserved, the able accompanist seemed the more entitled to it. The playing by the Kneisel Quartette of the Foote, Rubinstein, Boccherini and Beethoven selections was all that could have been wished. C. L. CAPEN.

NEW HAVEN EVENING R
TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 17

Hyperion Theater - - Nikisch
MONDAY EVE'G, FEB. 23, at 8.
LAST CONCERT by the
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.
Soloist—Mme. FANNIE BLOOMFIELD ZEISLER
The brilliant Young Pianiste,
(Her first appearance in this city.)
The programme includes—Overture "Jubel" (Weber); Concerto for Pianoforte in F minor (Chopin); Waldweben, from "Siegfried" (Wagner); and the EROICA SYMPHONY (Beethoven).
Tickets at M. Steinert & Sons, 777 Chap[illegible]
f15 1su6d C. A. ELLIS, Man[illegible]

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give the last of the series of concerts at the Hyperion next Monday night. A large number of tickets have already been sold, but a number of good seats can be obtained at Steinert & Sons. Miss Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, a brilliant young pianist, will be the soloist of the occasion. The program includes overture "Jubel," concerto for pianoforte in F minor, Waldweben, from "Siegfried," and the Eroica symphony, Beethoven.

Music Hall, Fall River.

CONCERT,

—BY—

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.
WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF
Mrs. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Soprano.
Mr. EMIL MOLLENHAUER, Accompanist.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 17TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in E flat major. op. 74.
Allegro.—Adagio non troppo.—Presto.—Allegretto.

SONGS WITH PIANO.
C. K. ROGERS. "OH, MY GARDEN."
M. R. LANG. "MEG MERRILES."
MEYER-HELMUND. "DAILY QUESTION."
MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

SVENDSEN. a) ROMANZA.
SARASATE. b) SPANISH DANCE.
MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

SCHUBERT. VARIATIONS. (By request.)

SONGS WITH PIANO.
LASSEN. VORSATZ.
FRANZ. IM MAI.
DELIBES. BONJOUR.
MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

SERVAIS. FANTASIE for VIOLONCELLO.
MR. ANTON HEKKING.

RUBINSTEIN. ANDANTE, from String Quartet, C minor, No. 2.
BOCCHERINI. MINUET, in A, No. 2.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering, from the Warerooms of N. Arnzen & Son.

PUBLIC LEDGER, Philadelphia, Pa

Date 2-17

Herr Xavier Scharwenka, composer and pianist, is to make his local début next Monday evening in the Academy of Music. Gustav Hille, violinist; Miss Maud Morgan, harper, and the Philomena Ladies' Quartet will assist in the concert, which is to be given under the auspices of the Exchange for Woman's Work. Herr Scharwenka came to this country from Europe bearing a very enviable reputation as an artist, and his work in New York has met with general favor. His programme on Monday evening will comprise three Chopin numbers, two of his own compositions and a Liszt polonaise.

The next Boston symphony concert in the Academy of [illegible] day evening of next week, when Vladimir de Pachmann, a pianist who made a fine impression here last season, will be the soloist. The programme is to be as follows: Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz; concerto for piano, F Minor (Op. 21), Chopin, Pachman; Andantino and Scherzo, from Symphony No. 4, F minor, Tschaikowsky; Symphony, "Im Walde," Raff.

Clipping from Call, Philadelphia, PA.

Date 2-17

Next Boston Symphony Concert.

The next Boston Symphony Concert under the direction of Mr. Nikisch, will take place at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, February 25. The orchestra's selections include Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," the andantino and scherzo from Schaikowsky's fourth symphony and Raff's symphony "Im Walde." The soloist will be Mr. Vladiimir de Pachmann, the distinguished pianist, who will play Chopin's F minor concerto.

Clipping from Spy Worcester, Mass

Date 2

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch's singing at the Boston Symphony concert Saturday evening delighted the [illegible] overflowing audience. Next Saturday evening the soloist, Vladimir de Pachman, will be heard in Chopin's F minor concerto.

[96]

Boston Daily Traveller
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1891.

MUSIC.

Symphony Concert—Debut of Mrs. Nikisch.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, and Some French Music.

The programme of the sixteenth symphony concert, with Mrs. Arthur Nikisch soloist, was:

Weber.....Overture, "Der Freischuetz"
Mozart {a. Romanza, "Voi che sapete." b. Aria, "Non so piu cosa son."} From "The Marriage of Figaro."
Benjamin Godard {a. "Nikia's Dream." b. "In the Harem mock."} From "Symphonie Orientale," Op. 84
Songs—
a. Bizet.....Pastorale
b. Schumann.....Provencalisches Lied
c. Brahms.....Vergebliches Staendchen
Beethoven.....Symphony in A, No. 7

It is not too much to say that Mrs. Nikisch dominated this concert. Did the jammed aisles represent a desire to hear the Seventh symphony, the "Freischütz" melodies, or even the new pieces of the Frenchman, Godard? No, the crowd came to satisfy their curiosity, to see as well as hear the wife of the most conspicuous man in music in the United States. Mrs. Nikisch in her pretty gown was as fair a vision as the bare platform of Music Hall ever frames, and it was with a piquaint and charming air that she composed herself for her first selection. Of her singing we can but repeat in effect our comments on her Cambridge performance some weeks ago. Her voice is a sympathetic mezzo soprano of fair size; in the use of it faults appear—the attack is not always true, that is, the tone is not hit squarely, and because of a too frequent use of open tones the timbre of the voice is more of one tint than it need be. But Mrs. Nikisch is more interpreter than vocalist; one need only look into her face as she sings to read the meaning of the words. She is ardent, sympathetic, emotional, and bubbling over with music. The familiar Mozart tunes were sung with much sentiment, the distinction which Cherubini makes between his love for a lowly maid and a lady of high degree being aptly marked by the singer; but it was in the songs Mrs. Nikisch charmed most. After the group was finished and the singer had answered some four recalls, flower-laden and radiant she confronted her spouse, and for this occasion, superior, her mute appeal to be permitted to sing another song was answered favorably (there is not a conductor on earth who could have done differently under the circumstances), and a charming song by Goldmark resulted. The piano accompaniments were played by Mr. Nikisch, whose ability in this direction is remarkable.

The two movements from Godard's "Symphonie Orientale" are charming bits, having the grace of manner and method which belongs to the modern French school. Gracious, too, is the coloring. How much these Frenchmen make of rhythm! The performance of the seventh Symphony and of the overture presented many beautiful examples of finished orchestral playing. At the next concert De Pachmann will play Chopin's F minor concerto; the orchestral selections will be Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet," and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding."

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
Vol. LXXXIX, No. 48.
TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1891.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The fifth of the season's concerts by the Kneisel string quartet, at Union Hall last evening, took on a special interest by reason of the assistance of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch as soloist, and the usual large attendance was increased to the utmost limit of the auditorium on this occasion.

Mr. Arthur Foote's new quartet for piano and strings had its first hearing in this programme and its several movements showed the composer at his best, their tuneful themes and skilful development giving still further evidence of his value as a representative American musician.

The adagio was particularly admired, and the brilliant final allegro gave a finish to the composition that commanded a hearty commendation from all who heard it. The composer took the piano part, and was superbly supported by Mr. Kneisel and his associates. At the close, Mr. Foote was honored with repeated recalls, and he is to be congratulated upon having made a thoroughly pleasing addition to the chamber music repertoire of the season.

The other instrumental numbers were the "Andante," from Rubinstein's quartet in C minor, No. 2; the "Menuet," No. 2, by Boccherini, and Beethoven's Quartet in E flat, op. 74; in all of which Mr. Kneisel and his fellow-musicians gave the keenest pleasure.

Mrs. Nikisch chose for her numbers Chopin's "Lithauisches Lied," Schumann's "Die Rose," Jensen's "Staendchen," Liszt's "Jugendglueck," Jensen's "Am Manzanares" and Brahms' "Liebestied," all of which were sung to piano accompaniments played by Mr. Nikisch. This artist fully confirmed the good impression formed of her value as a singer of songs at her appearance on Saturday night last, and all of her numbers were received with spontaneous applause which recalled her after each appearance. The songs by Jansen and that by Brahms were especially pleasing, and the accompaniments played by Mr. Nikisch made not a little of the pleasure attending the singer's numbers.

Boston Post
TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 17, 1891

MUSIC.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The fifth concert of the Kneisel Quartette series was given at Union Hall last evening. The Quartette was assisted by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, soprano, and Mr. Arthur Foote, pianist. The programme was as follows:

Quartette for piano and strings, in C major, op. 23 (MS.). (First time.).....Arthur Foote
[Songs with piano—
Lithauisches Lied.....(a) Chopin
Die Rose.....(b) Schumann
Staendchen.....(c) Jensen
Andante, from string Quartet, C minor, No. 2.....Rubenstein
Minuet, in A, No. 2.....Boccherini
[Songs with piano—
Tugendglueck.....(a) Liszt
Am Manzanares.....(c) Jensen
Liebeslied.....(c) Brahms
Quartette in E flat major, op. 74.....Beethoven

Mr. Foote's quartette was played last evening for the first time. It is a melodious, interesting, genial and thoroughly musical work. The themes of the first movement, an allegro comodo, are well contrasted, and the developments are natural and devoid of padding. The whole movement is fresh and spontaneous, and the impassioned close is full of strength. In the second, an adagio, Mr. Foote departs from the rules of the school, and we find, instead of strict polyphonic treatment, the aria and accompaniment; nor is this departure to be deplored, for the melody is genuine, and the refined taste of the composer shuns that which, without care, might easily be trivial. It is an eminently musical and flowing movement. The scherzo has not so much to say that is new, but it is interesting in rhythm and ingenious in construction. The last movement is more conventional, and much of it is, in fact, commonplace; but this is, unfortunately, the case with the finales of men of greater talent; for how seldom is a fourth movement found which gives excuse for its traditional and enforced existence. Yet the close of the finale is well written, and it will always provoke applause. Mr. Foote was fortunate in the first performance of his work. It was played by his associates with the care and exquisite finish which distinguish the playing of these admirable artists, and Mr. Foote is to be congratulated upon his work and its performance. He was recalled after the finale.

And nothing but words of praise can be written concerning the performance of the other quartette numbers. The closing number has been given at a former concert of this quartette and the playing of it needs no empty words of eulogy; but it is impossible to refrain from speaking of the most musical rendering of the Rubenstein andante and the dainty minuet of Boccherini with its flavor of melancholy. It is to be wished that the name of Boccherini were often met with in such concerts, for he is one of the great masters of chamber music. Mrs. Nikisch was very heartily applauded by the audience, which filled completely Union Hall. If the voice of the people is the voice of God, Mrs. Nikisch has every mark of divine approbation. Whether this applause was given for her singing or for her personality is a doubtful question. If she is to be judged by the rules laid down by all teachers of song and all masters of the art, her work of last evening can not be praised. When she sang in Cambridge, it was said in the Post that she was a delightful contrast to many German singers, for she did not force her tones and she was not guilty of false intonation. Last evening, however, she wandered at times from the pitch, and her attack was often slovenly. Instead of striking her upper notes firmly, she struck under them and climbed with her voice until she secured them—a most amateurish trick. Nor are the physical efforts by which she succeeds in producing tones, even in her medium register, pleasant to look upon. Her voice is naturally agreeable, and it is a pity that it has not been subjected to a sterner and wiser discipline. Mr. Nikisch played charmingly the accompaniments to her songs, so charmingly that the ear listened with more delight to the pianoforte than to the singer.

The next concert of the series will be given Monday, March 9. PHILIP HALE.

Boston Daily Globe.
TUESDAY, FEB. 17.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. Arthur Foote's New Work—Mme. Nikisch's Singing.

Last evening Union Hall was filled with a most appreciative audience. The entertainment opened with a quartet for piano and strings in G major. The composer, Mr. Arthur Foote, presided at the piano and its introduction to a Boston audience was highly flattering to the author—who was repeatedly applauded.

This most acceptable feature was followed by another of equal interest in the person of Mme. Nikisch, who came before the audience leaning on the arm of her husband, who later accompanied her on the piano. She rendered selections from Chopin, Schumann and Jensen with rare grace, and it was evident at the finish she had many friends in the audience.

The next number proved to be an andante for string quartet, C minor, No. 2, by Rubinstein, and a minuet in A, No. 2, by Boccherini, two selections of special softness which the Kneisel quartet rendered most acceptably. Mme. Nikisch once more appeared and sang three selections from Liszt, Jensen and Brahms. These numbers were better adapted for a display of the executive qualities of her voice, and Mr. Nikisch attracted much attention by the charming quality of his touch in rendering the several accompaniments. This most acceptable programme was closed with Beethoven's quartet in E flat major, op. 74.

The next of the Kneisel concerts will be given Monday, March 9.

Oritic, Washington, D. C ate 2-16

The [illegible] Orchestra.

The fourth concert of the series by this noble orchestra will take place on Thursday evening, February 26. Besides the attraction of the most charming programme that Mr. Nikisch can select, the occasion is to be made still further noteworthy by the appearance of Vladimir de Pachmann, the distinguished pianiste, who enjoys the highest distinction in this country and whose genius is also recognized in the leading European capitals, is to make his first appearance here on this occasion. The sale of seats begins to-day

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 17, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Kneisel Quartette's Concert Last Night.

The fifth concert of the season by the Kneisel Quartette, in Union Hall last evening, was a very long one, especially as there were six long songs, and in other respects the programme was so inconsiderately arranged that even the great Beethoven quartette in E flat major, op. 74, with which the concert ended, could but have been somewhat drearily heard by all present. The work itself, however, is noble beyond praise, is rich with glow, yet deeply tender and no less characteristic in design than colossally grand.

The concert opened with Arthur Foote's quartette for pianoforte and strings in C major. A masterpiece in which the purest style, the finest taste and the most available scholarship of the sterling musician is this quartette; it fairly seems to preach of art's immortal beauty. Everything is omitted in it that is not convertible to some useful end, and all that the composer has to say is no less thoughtfully said than warmly felt. The songs of the concert were by Chopin, Schumann, Jansen, Liszt and Brahms, and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch was the singer. Again the singer's faults were chiefly vocal faults, and the singer looked the sentiment of her songs with so much charm that although the ever to be desired refinement and culture of the true artist were absent, and there was much singing out of tune also, yet the singer was in the heartiest manner again applauded and recalled, whereas, for once, if any encore was deserved, the able accompanist seemed the more entitled to it. The playing by the Kneisel Quartette of the Foote, Rubinstein, Boccherini and Beethoven selections was all that could have been wished. C. L. CAPEN.

The Register.
NEW HAVEN EVENING R
TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 17.

Hyperion Theater - - Nikisch
MONDAY EVE'G, FEB. 23, at 8.
LAST CONCERT by the
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.
Soloist—Mme. FANNIE BLOOMFIELD ZEISLER
The brilliant Young Pianiste,
(Her first appearance in this city.)
The programme includes—Overture "Jubel" (Weber); Concerto for Pianoforte in F minor (Chopin); Waldweben, from "Siegfried" (Wagner); and the EROICA SYMPHONY (Beethoven).
Tickets at M. Steinert & Sons, 777 Chap[illegible]
f15 1su6d C. A. ELLIS, Mana[illegible]

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give the last of the series of concerts at the Hyperion next Monday night. A large number of tickets have already been sold, but a number of good seats can be obtained at Steinert & Sons. Miss Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, a brilliant young pianist, will be the soloist of the occasion. The program includes overture "Jubel," concerto for pianoforte in F minor, Waldweben, from "Siegfried," and the Eroica symphony, Beethoven.

Music Hall, Fall River.

CONCERT,

—BY—

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.
WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF
Mrs. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Soprano.
Mr. EMIL MULLENHAUER, Accompanist.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 17TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in E flat major, op. 74.
Allegro.—Adagio non troppo.—Presto.—Allegretto.

SONGS WITH PIANO.
C. K. ROGERS. "OH, MY GARDEN."
M. R. LANG. "MEG MERRILES."
MEYER-HELMUND. "DAILY QUESTION."
MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

SVENDSEN. a) ROMANZA.
SARASATE. b) SPANISH DANCE.
MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

SCHUBERT. VARIATIONS. (By request.)

SONGS WITH PIANO.
LASSEN. VORSATZ.
FRANZ. IM MAI.
DELIBES. BONJOUR.
MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

SERVAIS. FANTASIE for VIOLONCELLO.
MR. ANTON HEKKING.

RUBINSTEIN. ANDANTE, from String Quartet, C minor, No. 2.
BOCCHERINI. MINUET, in A, No. 2.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering, from the Warerooms of N. Arnzen & Son.

Clipping from Call, Philadelphia, PA.
Date 2-17

Next Boston Symphony Concert.

The next Boston Symphony Concert under the direction of Mr. Nikisch, will take place at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, February 25. The orchestra's selections include Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," the andantino and scherzo from Schaikowsky's fourth symphony and Raff's symphony "Im Walde." The soloist will be Mr. Vladiimir de Pachmann, the distinguished pianist, who will play Chopin's F minor concerto.

PUBLIC LEDGER, Philadelphia, Pa
Date 2-17

Herr Xavier Scharwenka, composer and pianist, is to make his local début next Monday evening in the Academy of Music. Gustav Hille, violinist; Miss Maud Morgan, harper, and the Philomena Ladies' Quartet will assist in the concert, which is to be given under the auspices of the Exchange for Woman's Work. Herr Scharwenka came to this country from Europe bearing a very enviable reputation as an artist, and his work in New York has met with general favor. His programme on Monday evening will comprise three Chopin numbers, two of his own compositions and a Liszt polonaise.

The next Boston symphony concert in the Academy of [illegible] day evening of next week, when Vladimir de Pachmann, a pianist who made a fine impression here last season, will be the soloist. The programme is to be as follows: Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz; concerto for piano, F Minor (Op. 21), Chopin, Pachman; Andantino and Scherzo, from Symphony No. 4, F minor, Tschaikowsky; Symphony, "Im Walde," Raff.

Clipping from Spy, Worcester, Mass
Date 2

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch's singing at the Boston Symphony concert Saturday evening delighted the [illegible] overflowing audience. Next Saturday evening the soloist, Vladimir de Pachman, will be heard in Chopin's F minor concerto.

[96]

Daily Traveller
FEBRUARY 17, 1891.

IN THE MUSICAL WORLD.

Kneisel Quartet Concert — Recital at Mason & Hamlin's Rooms.

The fifth Kneisel Quartet concert this season was given last night in Union Hall. The programme began with a new piano quartet by Arthur Foote, in C major, op. 23. Other instrumental numbers were the slow movement from Rubenstein's C minor quartet, a minuet in A by Broccherini, and Beethoven's E-flat major quartet, op. 74. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch assisted at this concert, singing six songs to the delightful piano accompaniment of her husband. In a small hall the defects of Mrs. Nikisch's singing are more marked than in a place where "distance lends enchantment," etc. Mrs. Nikisch pleased her audience, and we have nothing to retract concerning her sincere and ardent musical spirit which gives her singing a fervor and glow which go far to atone, but do not atone, for her inelegant vocalization.

Last summer was Mr. Foote's most fruitful period, for it gave us the admirable orchestral piece on "Francesca da Rimini" and the quartet played last night. "The strongest piece of music by an American since Prof. Paine's 'Spring' symphony," was the verdict on it expressed to the writer by a capable musician—not a critic. Certainly the allegro comodo and the adagio bear out this testimony. The first movement is an earnest piece of writing, clear in expression, developed with a modicum of scholasticism and a maximum of warmth, amiable in spirit, and spontaneous throughout. The ease with which the parts move, the happy distribution of melody and accompaniment are some of the technical points to be remarked about this music. The expressive quality of the adagio is strong, and the writing shows as much force, tempered by imagination, as in the preceding movement. Interest in the last two movements is not maintained in the same degree, though both are well written. The new quartet, given with the composer at the piano, had a fine performance. How happy Boston composers are in the means at hand for the interpretation of their works. The playing of the purely quartet number was in the best manner of the Kneisel group; the adagio of the E-flat Beethoven being one of the heavenly quarter hours in one's lifetime.

POST, Washington, D. C.
Date 2-16

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth concert of this magnificent musical organization will take place on Thursday evening, February 26, at Lincoln Music Hall. This announcement will greatly interest our music lovers who have found that these sterling concerts occur none too often for their enjoyment of what is highest and best in music.

The programme shows the catholic taste of Mr. Nikisch, who does not reject that which the later composers bring forth, while holding fast to the works of the fathers. Especial interest attaches to this concert from the high reputation of the soloist who has been secured for the occasion, M. Vladimir De Pachmann, the distinguished pianist, who appears in this city for the first time. His fame is now established on both continents, and it has been universally recognized in musical circles that he has succeeded in giving a new meaning to Chopin's works.

The opening overture, "Prometheus," is by Goldmark, one of the most brilliant and scholarly of the writers of the present day, whose works are equally esteemed on the concert stage. Another modern orchestral work is by the prolific Russian, Tschaikowsky, being the andantine and scherzo from his Symphony, No. 4. Nothing more acceptable and elevating could have been selected for the close of the concert than the noble "Eroica" symphony, by Beethoven, one of the classics of all music. Mr. De Pachmann will play with the orchestra Mozart's D minor concerto, and later will interpret selections from Chopin. The previous concerts by the Boston Orchestra have packed Lincoln Music Hall to overflowing, and as Mr. Nikisch has offered a notable list of attractions, with so eminent a soloist, there is no doubt that this concert will be one of the most popular of the series. The sale of tickets begins this morning at O. E. Ellis & Co.'s.

DAILY HERALD
WEDNESDAY,
FEBRUARY 18, 1891
FALL RIVER, MA

The Kneisel Quartet's Concert.

On the second appearance of the Kneisel quartet in this city, the members found a very large and fashionable audience to welcome them. For such work as theirs there can be nothing but praise. Their selections throughout, rendered with exquisite finish and marvelous precision, received full recognition. Mr. Kneisel as a soloist gave two numbers, the "Spanish Dance" perhaps best displaying his perfect technique and shading and the excellent qualities of his instrument. Mr. Hekking, the celloist, played a "Fantasie" which by many was considered the gem of the evening. The appearance of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch was awaited with some curiosity as she is the wife of the man who is the presiding deity of the musical world of Boston. Mrs. Nikisch, while not a great and faultless singer, gave her numbers with such distinct enunciation, excellent phrasing and perfect control of her voice together with a charming delivery, that one does not wonder at the immediate popularity she has attained by her very first appearance in this country. Mr. Mollenhauer, her accompanist, always remembered that he was accompanist and by his refinement and sympathy with the singer's numbers added greatly to the effect of their rendering. The company is the best that ever appeared in Fall River and the thanks of the people who had the pleasure of hearing the members last evening are due the gentlemen through whose efforts their services were secured.

Evening Daily News.
FALL RIVER, Mass.
WEDNESDAY, FEB. 18.

Kneisel Quartette Concert.

A large audience attended the Kneisel Quartette concert in Music Hall, last evening, and were highly pleased by the remarkable playing of this unrivaled string combination. While the programme comprised a number of severe classical selections, the oneness with which they were rendered by the artists could but gain the attention and praise of even those who don't pretend to understand the intricacies of such music.

Schubert's "Variations" and Rubenstein's "Andante in C minor" were heartily applauded. Two of the most pleasing numbers were Sarasate's "Spanish Dance," for violin, which was superbly played by Mr. Kneisel, and Servais' 'cello "Fantasie," which was played in a manner that showed the wonderful technique of Mr. Hekking. He dashed at the 'cello in a style that suggested that he hadn't forgotten the hotel clerk who forgot to save him a room last evening; never did a 'cello get such a shaking. A recall was acknowledged by a bow.

Some of the audience were led to believe by the fierce criticism given Mrs. Nikisch in a Boston paper recently, that she was anything but an artist. She certainly sang finely here last night, and deservedly won a recall by her brilliant rendering of Delibes' "Bonjour." Her massive voice completely filled the hall and was of pleasing quality withal. The selections were not those that please our audiences, but they were nevertheless well sung. Perhaps the Boston critic had longer ears that were capable of keenly catching on to the imperfections that others could not detect.

It was pleasing to see such a large audience, and the artists were pleased with their reception.

Clipping No.
Clipping from Commercial Advertiser New York N.Y.
Date 2/14

—The fourth and last concert to be given in New York this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, occurs at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening of next week. The program is as follows: 1, Overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini; 2, D Minor Concerto, Mozart; 3, "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," Wagner; 4, Symphony in D Minor, No. 2, Brahms. Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann will be the soloist.

CONCERTS TO COME.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Miss Ans der Ohe's Piano Recitals.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth concert at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, February 25, when the programme will comprise Berlioz' overture "Benvenuto Cellini," Chopin's Concerto for piano in F minor, op. 21; Tschaikowsky's symphony, No. 4, in F minor (two movements), and Liszt's symphony, No. 3, "Im Walde." The soloist will be Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann, the Russian pianist and Chopin virtuoso.

[97]

Boston Post
FRIDAY MORNING, FEB. 20, 1891

MUSIC.

THE CAMBRIDGE CONCERT.

The sixth of the series of concerts given this season at the Sanders Theatre by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Nikisch took place last evening. The orchestra was assisted by Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Anacreon" ..... Cherubini
Concerto for Pianoforte in C minor ..... Saint-Saëns
Air from Suite in D major ..... Bach
Symphony in D major, No. 2 ..... Brahms

This was a very interesting concert. The programme was varied and well arranged, and the performance of it was excellent. It is always a pleasure to hear the music of Cherubini, for though it may be austere, it is always nobly conceived and masterly expressed. The air from the Bach suite was warmly applauded, and Mr. Kneisel was greeted with special favor. The great symphony of Brahms brought the concert to a close.

Mrs. Zeisler played the concerto of Saint-Saënslin C minor, opus 44. It is not so original or interesting a work as the famous one in G minor, and when it was played by the composer in Paris in 1875 it did not meet with the approbation of the critics. It is true that the pianoforte is treated in a peculiar and effective manner, and that Saint-Saëns departs from the traditions; but the themes themselves remind one of motives invented by others. For example, the chief theme of the first movement is not unlike the initial phrase of Meyerbeer's "Struensée" overture. The developments are ingenious, and there are many passages of real beauty; but the work is not spontaneous, and it leaves no marked impression upon the hearer. Therefore it seems strange that Mrs. Zeisler has spent so much time and labor upon a thankless task. It must be remembered, however, that she is a resurrectionist. Last season she exhumed the Litolff concerto in E flat, and dissected in Music Hall the dead body, more ghastly on account of the meretricious ornaments which were found within the winding sheet.

She is a brilliant player, of highly nervous temperament. Her touch is sympathetic, her bravura is dazzling. The great difficulties of the concerto were played with ease akin to recklessness. With the growth of her technique she has fallen into mannerisms which were not apparent last season, and which will soon become disagreeable; for it seemed last evening, once or twice, as though she courted the attention of the audience and invited the hearers to watch unnecessary movements of her arms and hands. She is too fine a player to resort to such means, which will detract from the artistic worth of her performances. She was most warmly and deservedly applauded.

The next concert will be given Thursday evening, March 19. PHILIP HALE.

pping from Critic Washington D.C.
te 2/16

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth concert of the series by this noble orchestra will take place on Thursday evening, February 26. Besides the attraction of the most charming programme that Mr. Nikisch can select, the occasion is to be made still further noteworthy by the appearance of Vladimir de Pachmann, the distinguished pianiste, who enjoys the highest distinction in this country and whose genius is also recognized in the leading European capitals, is to make his first appearance here on this occasion. The sale of seats begins to-day at J. F. Ellis & Co.'s.

pping from New Haven Co.
te 2-15

"...at is more than I would d..." replied the lieutenant.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The last [redacted] series given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be held at the Hyperion on February 25. The following program, undoubtedly the best of the season, will be rendered: Overture, Jubel, Weber; concerto for pianoforte in F minor, Chopin; Waldweben from Siegfried, Wagner; symphony, No. 3 (Eroica) Beethoven.

A special feature of this concert will be the piano solos of Mme. Fannie Bloomfield Zeister. Tickets are now on sale at Steinert's.

The Beacon.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 21, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The positive announcement of the expected début of Mrs. Nikisch as a Symphony singer drew a great crowd to last Saturday night's concert. The fashionables who often leave their seats vacant were almost all present and the number of "standees" was only limited by the space allowed for them. There was also very great applause, culminating after her second appearance in an encore, which was accepted, alike in opposition to the principle of these concerts and to good judgment. Whether this applause should be construed as expressive of fashion or favor, matters little, as the same audience complimented in the same way the bad singing of Mr. Reichmann a few weeks before. Mrs. Nikisch made a less satisfactory impression upon hearers of sound judgment than that which she made in the Sanders Theatre concert and illustrated signally that there is much difference in art between disposition and accomplishment. There was evidence enough of musicianly spirit and the desire to reach the ends which perception recognized; but the means employed were often ill chosen and ill applied. The natural quality of Mrs. Nikisch's voice is pleasant, and occasionally limpid and beautiful, when it is allowed natural freedom; but it is generally produced with so much effort and pressure, that this native quality is obscured and spoiled in an obstructed and unskilful delivery. In like manner, she goes astray when she undertakes music which requires sincerity of style, genuine feeling and symmetrical art. Her first choice for the evening fell upon the lovely and significant songs assigned in the "Marriage of Figaro" to the youth Cherubino—"Voi che sapete" and "Non so più che cosa son." To these she gave a manner which, if she had been in stage costume, might have suited some piquant page, but was out of keeping with the bashful, dreamy lad of Mozart, and her delivery was similarly artificial. In the three songs by Bizet, Schumann and Brahms which she subsequently gave, these crudities and falsities of style were less obvious and deleterious, and she was especially good in the last, which was the "Vergeblisches Ständchen." Her personality and her disposition are so distinctly sympathetic that she will undoubtedly be a favorite; but Boston has singers who are her superiors both for voice and art, when these are to be tested severely. The new music of the evening consisted in two movements from Godard's "Oriental" symphony, which it would be more nearly correct to call a suite. The slow one is called "Nikia's Dream" and the lighter "In a Hammock," the latter being the more fascinating, although not better in composition. Both are good examples of the modern French school—delicate in fancy, rich in color and sufficiently solid in texture, the perfection of taste in the treatment of clever and fresh ideas. The overture, "Der Freischütz," and parts of the symphony, Beethoven's seventh, showed Mr. Nikisch in his most theatrical and fantastic attitude. The tempi were altered without warrant or scruple and also without effect; a more inefficient reading of the overture or a more trifling rendering of the first movement of the symphony we have never heard, and we are at a loss to comprehend them unless it be that Mr. Nikisch wants to play everything as if it were a set of Hungarian dances. To make such changes in the character and color of standard music is to be little better than merely erratic if a man knows better; and no man who does not know better should have such a position as the Boston directorship. The orchestra were faithful and exact through all the evening, which commends their obedience all the more because the best of them must have hated to do what their conductor dictated. Mrs. Nikisch's lieder had from Mr. Nikisch a pianoforte accompaniment so exquisite that it must have counted for more than the audience realized in the pleasure those numbers gave. Tonight Mr. De Pachmann will play Chopin's F-minor concerto, and the orchestral numbers will be Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The fifth concert, given on Monday evening in Union Hall, began with a manuscript piano quartette by Mr. Arthur Foote, the composer, taking the piano part. This is a truly beautiful work; affluent in melody, sufficient in formality, chaste in ornament, sympathetic in apportionment, and strong in development, it was heard with unreserved delight and accepted as its author's best contribution to the department of chamber music. It is compact—its four movements falling easily within a half-hour's space—and no time has been wasted upon unimportant details or the display of mere virtuosity. It requires good art and constant care in its players. And the four instruments are kept engaged almost constantly, the piano occasionally being silent for a little to allow for some expressive statement by the strings, but seeking no individual prominence for itself by way of compensation. The opening allegro comodo flows easily, as its designation implies, but reaches high gayety and warmth of color ere it ends; the adagio is broad and deep with frequent but not excessive modulation; the scherzo expresses its humor rather in blunt odd changes of rhythm than in outright mirthfulness, and has a sturdy, quaint insistence which reminds one of some traits in Mr. Chadwick's work; the final allegro is vigorous and enthusiastic, but nowhere pushes on into a presto, so that its spirit remains dignified to the end. It was charmingly played, and Mr. Foote, who had had to bow after each movement, was twice recalled at the close. The other large work was Beethoven's E-flat major quartette, opus 74, and midway of the evening were played with muted strings and dainty softness a Rubinstein andante and a Boccherini minuet. Mr. Nikisch sang in two groups these songs,—Chopin, Lithauisches Lied; Schumann, Die Rose; Jensen, Ständchen; Liszt, Jugendglück; Jensen, Am Manzanares; Brahms, Liebeslied. The faults of her vocal method, with its rough upward scoopings and its vacillations of intonation, were again apparent; but she was so much in earnest that the audience accepted her singing and recalled her handsomely, but asked for no encore. Mr. Nikisch accompanied her exquisitely. The programme contained a note about the Beethoven quartette which was said to be "resolved" from a special translation out of the German, and was as absurd a piece of bathos as often gets into print. It began with the astounding statements that "the proud brilliant objectivity almost given up, only clear, plastic, formal treatment allies it with op. 59;" and then went on to say that "in op. 74 the master had turned within himself, a psychological picture with peculiarly idiosyncratic su...jectivity marked by progressive develop...," and so continued for half a page.

Boston Daily Traveller
TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1891.

IN THE MUSICAL WORLD.

Kneisel Quartet Concert — Recital at Mason & Hamlin's Rooms.

The fifth Kneisel Quartet concert this season was given last night in Union Hall. The programme began with a new piano quartet by Arthur Foote, in C major, op. 23. Other instrumental numbers were the slow movement from Rubenstein's C minor quartet, a minuet in A by Broccherini, and Beethoven's E-flat major quartet, op. 74. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch assisted at this concert, singing six songs to the delightful piano accompaniment of her husband. In a small hall the defects of Mrs. Nikisch's singing are more marked than in a place where "distance lends enchantment," etc. Mrs. Nikisch pleased her audience, and we have nothing to retract concerning her sincere and ardent musical spirit which gives her singing a fervor and glow which go far to atone, but do not atone, for her inelegant vocalization.

Last summer was Mr. Foote's most fruitful period, for it gave us the admirable orchestral piece on "Francesca da Rimini" and the quartet played last night. "The strongest piece of music by an American since Prof. Paine's 'Spring' symphony," was the verdict on it expressed to the writer by a capable musician—not a critic. Certainly the allegro comodo and the adagio bear out this testimony. The first movement is an earnest piece of writing, clear in expression, developed with a modicum of scholasticism and a maximum of warmth, amiable in spirit, and spontaneous throughout. The ease with which the parts move, the happy distribution of melody and accompaniment are some of the technical points to be remarked about this music. The expressive quality of the adagio is strong, and the writing shows as much force, tempered by imagination, as in the preceding movement. Interest in the last two movements is not maintained in the same degree, though both are well written. The new quartet, given with the composer at the piano, had a fine performance. How happy Boston composers are in the means at hand for the interpretation of their works. The playing of the purely quartet number was in the best manner of the Kneisel group; the adagio of the E-flat Beethoven being one of the heavenly quarter hours in one's lifetime.

POST, Washington, D. C.
Date 2-16

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth concert of this magnificent musical organization will take place on Thursday evening, February 26, at Lincoln Music Hall. This announcement will greatly interest our music lovers who have found that these sterling concerts occur none too often for their enjoyment of what is highest and best in music.

The programme shows the catholic taste of Mr. Nikisch, who does not reject that which the later composers bring forth, while holding fast to the works of the fathers. Especial interest attaches to this concert from the high reputation of the soloist who has been secured for the occasion, M. Vladimir De Pachmann, the distinguished pianist, who appears in this city for the first time. His fame is now established on both continents, and it has been universally recognized in musical circles that he has succeeded in giving a new meaning to Chopin's works.

The opening overture, "Prometheus," is by Goldmark, one of the most brilliant and scholarly of the writers of the present day, whose works are equally esteemed on the concert stage. Another modern orchestral work is by the prolific Russian, Tschoikowsky, being the andantine and scherzo from his Symphony, No. 4. Nothing more acceptable and elevating could have been selected for the close of the concert than the noble "Eroica" symphony, by Beethoven, one of the classics of all music. Mr. De Pachmann will play with the orchestra Mozart's D minor concerto, and later will interpret selections from Chopin. The previous concerts by the Boston Orchestra have packed Lincoln Music Hall to overflowing, and as Mr. Nikisch has offered a notable list of attractions, with so eminent a soloist, there is no doubt that this concert will be one of the most popular of the series. The sale of tickets begins this morning at J. F. Ellis & Co.'s.

DAILY HERALD
-WEDNESDAY,
FEBRUARY 18, 1891
FALL RIVER, MA

The Kneisel Quartet's Concert.

On the second appearance of the Kneisel quartet in this city, the members found a very large and fashionable audience to welcome them. For such work as theirs there can be nothing but praise. Their selections throughout, rendered with exquisite finish and marvelous precision, received full recognition. Mr. Kneisel as a soloist gave two numbers, the "Spanish Dance" perhaps best displaying his perfect technique and shading and the excellent qualities of his instrument. Mr. Hekking, the celloist, played a "Fantasie" which by many was considered the gem of the evening. The appearance of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch was awaited with some curiosity as she is the wife of the man who is the presiding deity of the musical world of Boston. Mrs. Nikisch, while not a great and faultless singer, gave her numbers with such distinct enunciation, excellent phrasing and perfect control of her voice together with a charming delivery, that one does not wonder at the immediate popularity she has attained by her very first appearance in this country. Mr. Mollenhauer, her accompanist, always remembered that he was accompanist and by his refinement and sympathy with the singer's numbers added greatly to the effect of their rendering. The company is the best that ever appeared in Fall River and the thanks of the people who had the pleasure of hearing the members last evening are due the gentlemen through whose efforts their services were secured.

Daily Evening News.
FALL RIVER, Mass.
WEDNESDAY, FEB. 18.

Kneisel Quartette Concert.

A large audience attended the Kneisel Quartette concert in Music Hall, last evening, and were highly pleased by the remarkable playing of this unrivaled string combination. While the programme comprised a number of severe classical selections, the oneness with which they were rendered by the artists could but gain the attention and praise of even those who don't pretend to understand the intricacies of such music.

Schubert's "Variations" and Rubenstein's "Andante in C minor" were heartily applauded. Two of the most pleasing numbers were Sarasate's "Spanish Dance," for violin, which was superbly played by Mr. Kneisel, and Servais' 'cello "Fantasie," which was played in a manner that showed the wonderful technique of Mr. Hekking. He dashed at the 'cello in a style that suggested that he hadn't forgotten the hotel clerk who forgot to save him a room last evening; never did a 'cello get such a shaking. A recall was acknowledged by a bow.

Some of the audience were led to believe by the fierce criticism given Mrs. Nikisch in a Boston paper recently, that she was anything but an artist. She certainly sang finely here last night, and deservedly won a recall by her brilliant rendering of Delibes' "Bonjour." Her massive voice completely filled the hall and was of pleasing quality withal. The selections were not those that please our audiences, but they were nevertheless well sung. Perhaps the Boston critic had longer ears that were capable of keenly catching on to the imperfections that others could not detect.

It was pleasing to see such a large audience, and the artists were pleased with their reception.

Clipping No.
Clipping from Commercial Advertiser
New York N Y
Date 2/11

—The fourth and last concert to be given in New York this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, occurs at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening of next week. The program is as follows: 1, Overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini; 2, D Minor Concerto, Mozart; 3, "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," Wagner; 4, Symphony in D Minor, No. 2, Brahms. Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann will be the soloist.

Clipping from
Date

CONCERTS TO COME.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Miss Aus der Ohe's Piano Recitals.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth concert at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, February 25, when the programme will comprise Berlioz' overture "Benvenuto Cellini," Chopin's Concerto for piano in F minor, op. 21; Tschaikowsky's symphony, No. 4, in F minor (two movements), and Raff's symphony, No. 3, "Im Walde." The soloist will be Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann, the great Russian pianist and Chopin virtuoso.

Boston Post
FRIDAY MORNING, FEB. 20, 1891

MUSIC.

THE CAMBRIDGE CONCERT.

The sixth of the series of concerts given this season at the Sanders Theatre by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Nikisch took place last evening. The orchestra was assisted by Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Anacreon" ..... Cherubini
Concerto for Pianoforte in C minor ..... Saint-Saëns
Air from Suite in D major ..... Bach
Symphony in D major, No. 2 ..... Brahms

This was a very interesting concert. The programme was varied and well arranged, and the performance of it was excellent. It is always a pleasure to hear the music of Cherubini, for though it may be austere, it is always nobly conceived and masterly expressed. The air from the Bach suite was warmly applauded, and Mr. Kneisel was greeted with special favor. The great symphony of Brahms brought the concert to a close.

Mrs. Zeisler played the concerto of Saint-Saënslin C minor, opus 44. It is not so original or interesting a work as the famous one in G minor, and when it was played by the composer in Paris in 1875 it did not meet with the approbation of the critics. It is true that the pianoforte is treated in a peculiar and effective manner, and that Saint-Saëns departs from the traditions; but the themes themselves remind one of motives invented by others. For example, the chief theme of the first movement is not unlike the initial phrase of Meyerbeer's "Struensée" overture. The developments are ingenious, and there are many passages of real beauty; but the work is not spontaneous, and it leaves no marked impression upon the hearer. Therefore it seems strange that Mrs. Zeisler has spent so much time and labor upon a thankless task. It must be remembered, however, that she is a resurrectionist. Last season she exhumed the Litolff concerto in E flat, and dissected in Music Hall the dead body, more ghastly on account of the meretricious ornaments which were found within the winding sheet.

She is a brilliant player, of highly nervous temperament. Her touch is sympathetic, her bravura is dazzling. The great difficulties of the concerto were played with ease akin to recklessness. With the growth of her technique she has fallen into mannerisms which were not apparent last season, and which will soon become disagreeable; for it seemed last evening, once or twice, as though she courted the attention of the audience and invited the hearers to watch unnecessary movements of her arms and hands. She is too fine a player to resort to such means, which will detract from the artistic worth of her performances. She was most warmly and deservedly applauded.

The next concert will be given Thursday evening, March 19. PHILIP HALE.

pping from Ellis & Co.
te 2-16

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth concert of the series by this noble orchestra will take place on Thursday evening, February 26. Besides the attraction of the most charming programme that Mr. Nikisch can select, the occasion is to be made still further noteworthy by the appearance of Vladimir de Pachmann, the distinguished pianiste, who enjoys the highest distinction in this country and whose genius is also recognized in the leading European capitals, is to make his first appearance here on this occasion. The sale of seats begins to-day at J. F. Ellis & Co.'s.

pping from
te

"What is more than I would do?" replied the lieutenant.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The last [illegible] of the series given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be held at the Hyperion on February 23. The following program, undoubtedly the best of the season, will be rendered: Overture, Jubel, Weber; concerto for pianoforte in F minor, Chopin; Waldweben from Siegfried, Wagner; symphony, No. 3 (Eroica) Beethoven.

A special feature of this concert will be the piano solos of Mme. Fannie Bloomfield Zeister. Tickets are now on sale at Steinert's.

The Beacon.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 21, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The positive announcement of the expected début of Mrs. Nikisch as a Symphony singer drew a great crowd to last Saturday night's concert. The fashionables who often leave their seats vacant were almost all present and the number of "standees" was only limited by the space allowed for them. There was also very great applause, culminating after her second appearance in an encore, which was accepted, alike in opposition to the principle of these concerts and to good judgment. Whether this applause should be construed as expressive of fashion or favor, matters little, as the same audience complimented in the same way the bad singing of Mr. Reichmann a few weeks before. Mrs. Nikisch made a less satisfactory impression upon hearers of sound judgment than that which she made in the Sanders Theatre concert and illustrated signally that there is much difference in art between disposition and accomplishment. There was evidence enough of musicianly spirit and the desire to reach the ends which perception recognized; but the means employed were often ill chosen and ill applied. The natural quality of Mrs. Nikisch's voice is pleasant, and occasionally limpid and beautiful, when it is allowed natural freedom; but it is generally produced with so much effort and pressure, that this native quality is obscured and spoiled in an obstructed and unskilful delivery. In like manner, she goes astray when she undertakes music which requires sincerity of style, genuine feeling and symmetrical art. Her first choice for the evening fell upon the lovely and significant songs assigned in the "Marriage of Figaro" to the youth Cherubino—"Voi che sapete" and "Non so più che cosa son." To these she gave a manner which, if she had been in stage costume, might have suited some piquant page, but was out of keeping with the bashful, dreamy lad of Mozart, and her delivery was similarly artificial. In the three songs by Bizet, Schumann and Brahms which she subsequently gave, these crudities and falsities of style were less obvious and deleterious, and she was especially good in the last, which was the "Vergeblisches Ständchen." Her personality and her disposition are so distinctly sympathetic that she will undoubtedly be a favorite; but Boston has singers who are her superiors both for voice and art, when these are to be tested severely. The new music of the evening consisted in two movements from Godard's "Oriental" symphony, which it would be more nearly correct to call a suite. The slow one is called "Nikia's Dream" and the lighter "In a Hammock," the latter being the more fascinating, although not better in composition. Both are good examples of the modern French school—delicate in fancy, rich in color and sufficiently solid in texture, the perfection of taste in the treatment of clever and fresh ideas. The overture, "Der Freischütz," and parts of the symphony, Beethoven's seventh, showed Mr. Nikisch in his most theatrical and fantastic attitude. The tempi were altered without warrant or scruple and also without effect; a more inefficient reading of the overture or a more trifling rendering of the first movement of the symphony we have never heard, and we are at a loss to comprehend them unless it be that Mr. Nikisch wants to play everything as if it were a set of Hungarian dances. To make such changes in the character and color of standard music is to be little better than merely erratic if a man knows better; and no man who does not know better should have such a position as the Boston directorship. The orchestra were faithful and exact through all the evening, which commends their obedience all the more because the best of them must have hated to do what their conductor dictated. Mrs. Nikisch's lieder had from Mr. Nikisch a pianoforte accompaniment so exquisite that it must have counted for more than the audience realized in the pleasure those numbers gave. Tonight Mr. De Pachmann will play Chopin's F-minor concerto, and the orchestral numbers will be Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The fifth concert, given on Monday evening in Union Hall, began with a manuscript piano quartette by Mr. Arthur Foote, the composer, taking the piano part. This is a truly beautiful work; affluent in melody, sufficient in formality, chaste in ornament, sympathetic in apportionment, and strong in development, it was heard with unreserved delight and accepted as its author's best contribution to the department of chamber music. It is compact—its four movements falling easily within a half-hour's space—and no time has been wasted upon unimportant details or the display of mere virtuosity. It requires good art and constant care in its players. And the four instruments are kept engaged almost constantly, the piano occasionally being silent for a little to allow for some expressive statement by the strings, but seeking no individual prominence for itself by way of compensation. The opening allegro comodo flows easily, as its designation implies, but reaches high gayety and warmth of color ere it ends; the adagio is broad and deep with frequent but not excessive modulation; the scherzo expresses its humor rather in blunt odd changes of rhythm than in outright mirthfulness, and has a sturdy, quaint insistence which reminds one of some traits in Mr. Chadwick's work; the final allegro is vigorous and enthusiastic, but nowhere pushes on into a presto, so that its style remains dignified to the end. It was charmingly played, and Mr. Foote, who had had to bow after each movement, was twice recalled at the close. The other large work was Beethoven's E-flat major quartette, opus 74, and midway of the evening were played with muted strings and dainty softness a Rubinstein andante and a Boccherini minuet. Mr. Nikisch sang in two groups these songs,—Chopin, Lithauisches Lied; Schumann, Die Rose; Jensen, Ständchen; Liszt, Jugendglück; Jensen, Am Manzanares; Brahms, Liebeslied. The faults of her vocal method, with its rough upward scoopings and its vacillations of intonation, were again apparent; but she was so much in earnest that the audience accepted her singing and recalled her handsomely, but asked for no encore. Mr. Nikisch accompanied her exquisitely. The programme contained a note about the Beethoven quartette which was said to be "resolved" from a special translation out of the German, and was as absurd a piece of bathos as often gets into print. It began with the astounding statements that "the proud brilliant objectivity almost given up, only clear, plastic, formal treatment allies it with op. 59;" and then went on to say that "in op. 74 the master had turned within himself, a psychological picture with peculiarly idiosyncratic subjectivity marked by progressive develop[illegible]," and so continued for half a page.

[97]

BLANK PAGE

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

... Season of 1890-91. ...

Leave Boston Monday, Feb. 23, at 1.00 P.M., Providence Depot.
Arrive New Haven Monday, 6. P.M.
NEW HAVEN HOTEL.
Concert at Hyperion Theatre, 8.00 P.M.
Leave New Haven after Concert. Sleeping Cars at Depot.
Arrive in New York Tuesday, Feb. 24.
GRAND CENTRAL HOTEL, 673 Broadway
Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 12 o'clock noon.
Concert at Chickering Hall, 8.00 P.M.
Leave New York Wednesday, Feb. 25, at 11.30 A. M., via Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.
Arrive Philadelphia 1.45 P.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 00 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia Thursday, Feb. 26, at 10 A.M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 24th and Chestnut Streets.
Arrive Washington 2 P.M.
WILLARD'S HOTEL.
Concert at Lincoln Hall, 8.00 P.M.
Leave Washington, Baltimore & Ohio Depot, Friday, Feb. 27, 2 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore 3 P.M.
CARROLTON HOUSE.
Concert at Concordia Hall, 8 00 P.M.
Leave Baltimore directly after concert.
Arrive New York Saturday, Feb. 28, at 7.00 A.M.
Leave New York, Grand Central Depot, Saturday, Feb. 28, 10 A.M.
Arrive Boston 4.30 P.M., Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

Members of the Orchestra not playing in New Haven will leave for New York Monday, Feb. 23, via Fall River line. Train leaves Park Square Depot at 6.00 P.M.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

SATURDAY, February 21, 1891.

Hyperion Theatre, - New Haven,

Monday Evening, Feb. 23, at 8.

PROGRAMME

4

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

* * * * *

But Benjamin Godard's "Symphony Orientale," two numbers of which were played at the Symphony concert Saturday evening, can not be accused of vulgarity or cheap effects. The composition, however, is not a symphony; it is a set of descriptive pieces, five in number, each one of which illustrates a poem. The first of the numbers played, "Nikia's Dream," is a musical setting of words of Godard. It is an adagio with peculiar, haunting, if somewhat searched out melody, with a languorous accompaniment. The musical contents themselves are not so noticeable as the brilliant and variegated covering in which they are wrapped. The music is more suggestive than direct, and the refined subtlety will always prevent the instantaneous popularity of the work. The second, "In the Hammock," is a musical portrayal of the reveries of the indolent "Sara, la baigneuse," of Victor Hugo. It is, in rhythm, like a barcarolle, and the melody is well defined and charming. The effects of color gained by apparently simple means are wonderful, and the whole piece is an admirable exhibition of French skill in instrumentation. Each instrument is so cunningly treated, its possible effects are so appreciated, its limitations are so carefully respected. These two numbers were heard here for the first time, and they were exceedingly well played by the orchestra.

* * * * *

The other orchestral numbers were Weber's "Der Freischütz" overture, and Beethoven's seventh symphony. The performance of these familiar compositions was marked by singular affectations in the reading of Mr. Nikisch. The introduction was taken so slowly that the horns were unable to sing with effect, and the movement was without pulse and was sluggish. The Allegro was disfigured with meaningless ritardandos and vain efforts to produce unusual effects. In the delivery of the peroration Mr. Nikisch was evidently guided in a measure by the suggestions of Richard Wagner, but he went far beyond his instructions, and in striving to produce an overwheming effect he fell to the earth; for nothing could have been more feeble and jejune than the finale of the overture as played last Saturday.

* * * * *

Another peculiarity of Mr. Nikisch's musical nature was observed in his reading of the Seventh Symphony, and that is his wish to constantly try experiments. Last year he gave a reading of this symphony which was novel and provocative of criticism. For example, in the allegretto, in the modulating passage from the episode in A major to C major, and then to A minor, he made a long spun-out and unwarranted ritard which was more a complete change of tempo than a ritard. This year he does nothing of the kind, but he makes up for this omission by freely seasoning Beethoven's music with Nikischian condiments of all kinds. The most flagrant of his breaches of good faith was the manner in which he read the first twenty or thirty measures of the first vivace, which, under his stick became a pleasant and somewhat melancholy pastorale, although this was almost equalled by the eccentricities seen in the treatment of the horn organpoint in the trio of the scherzo. It may be said in defense of Mr. Nikisch's behavior that old things have passed away and new interpretations are demanded. Surely no one will protest if such new interpretations enhance the beauty of the work. But when the rhythm is killed, when the manifest intention of a composer is flouted, when the mannerisms of one period are grafted upon the sturdy strength of another period, the time to sit by in acquiescence and thankfulness is past, The Seventh Symphony of Beethoven is one thing; a Liszt Hungarian Rhapsodie is another. Mr. Nikisch makes hardly any distinction between the two. Whether he wanders in Eastern or Western fields he breathes one air, the air of Hungary.

* * * * *

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch sang last week for the first time in Boston, and she was applauded vociferously before and after each group of songs. Her selections were Cherubini's canzona and aria from "La Nozze di Figaro," Bizet's "Pastorale," Schumann's "Provencalisches Lied," and Brahms' "Vergebliches Staendchen." She is a mezzo-soprano. Her voice is of good, though not extended compass. Her upper and lower tones are weak, and the quality of her medium register is agreeable and sympathetic. But she has either been badly taught or she has received absolutely no instruction. Her tone-production is faulty, and her attack of high notes is radically wrong, for she constantly strikes below the wished for note and slides upwards to it. She indulges herself in a reckless and unmusical use of the portamento, and in many of the details of her art she has not sufficient skill to carry out her intentions, however honorable they may be. In a word, her singing is crude.

* * * * *

Although her phrasing is carefully studied, it is often directly opposed to the expressed intentions of the composer, as in the songs by Mozart, where she showed a lack of dramatic instinct. These songs were written for an Italian text, and they are in the Italian style. Waiving the question whether they should be sung without ornamentation (and for an interesting discussion of the proper singing of a Mozart aria the reader is referred to the scholarly essays upon this subject to be found in Stéphen De La Madelaine's "Etudes pratiques" vol. 2, chap. 2, and Heinrich Dorn's "Streifzüge im Gebiete der Tonkunst" chapter 1), and paying attention only to the expression of the character of Cherubino, Mrs. Nikisch's failure in portraying this character was complete. The Page was not a coquettish soubrette, he was a handsome boy, with just awakened passions, who was in love with everything feminine which crossed his path, chambermaid or countess, sincere for the moment, and fickle. The passion in each of these wonderful songs was but poorly expressed; the mild emotions of the singer flagged when they should have glowed with intenser fire and vice-versa. The charming music written by Bizet to the old fashioned words of Regnard suffered, as sung by her, for the lightness of Bizet was turned to heaviness, and her treatment of the ornaments which embellish the final measures of each verse was amateurish in the extreme. She was more successful in the songs by Schumann and Brahms, the latter of which was sung with genuine expression.

* * * * *

At the Kneisel Quartet concert, given Monday evening at Union Hall, a quartet for pianoforte and strings (MS.) by Mr. Arthur Foote was heard for the first time. The composer played the pianoforte part. It is an excellent piece of writing, fresh, spontaneous, skilfully put together; only in the fourth and last movement is the music somewhat conventional. The themes of the first movement, an allegro comodo, are interesting, and they lend themselves to logical and natural developments. The second movement is not in strict form, but the beauty of the aria and the subsequent handling of it are a sufficient excuse for any departure from rules. The scherzo is piquant, especially in rhythm. The quartet is most pleasant music, and passages show a genuine passion and a mastery of expressing thought which have sometimes been wanting in the works of this composer. The performance was in every respect worthy of the composition, and it was played with the greatest care and with evident appreciation. The different movements were loudly applauded, and at the end the composer was recalled,

* * * * *

The other quartet numbers were the "sphaerenmusik" from Rubinstein's Second Quartet, Boccherini's Menuet, No. 2, and Beethoven's Quartet in E flat, op. 74. They were played with the purity of tone, perfection of technique and highly developed artistic sense which characterize the performances of this unequalled Quartet.

* * * * *

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch sang songs by Liszt, Chopin, Schumann, Jensen and Brahms. She was heartily applauded, though in addition to the faults in technique spoken of above, her intonation was at times false. The accompaniments were played delightfully by Mr. Nikisch.

* * * * *

Society people seem never to tire of talking of Mrs. Nikisch. The most remarkable thing of all is that here in Boston, which is nothing if not exacting, it is acknowledged that in the trying position of being introduced into a strange city as the wife of a most conspicuous man, she has as yet made no single mistake.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 22.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concerts.

At the seventeenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night, Music Hall was completely filled, despite the miserable and discouraging weather. The performances began with Tschaikowsky's Overture-Fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," a work that has been heard at these concerts before. A further acquaintance brings out many new beauties; but much of the music is vague in meaning and dry in effect. The treatment of the themes is always interesting, and especially of the graceful and sensuous second subject, which, we presume, is intended to typify Juliet. The orchestration throughout is very fine, and the musicianship of the overture is of a high order; but, after all, it is doubtful if the composer has here given anything of permanent value to the world. It is unquestionably original, but nevertheless is, in its general color and effect, so much like the bulk of the serious music of the modern school, that it does not seem to say anything new. It was played with splendid emphasis and richness of color, but despite its manifest power, it leaves the hearer cold. The concert ended with a delightful reading and performance of Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" Symphony, a work that steadily grows in interest the more it is heard The soloist was M. Vladimar de Pachmann, who played Chopin's concerto in F minor. He was received with great fervor, but he no sooner appeared than his familiar eccentricities began, and the now well-known comedy with all its little gestures, its face play and its direct appeals to the audience was again repeated. This, however, did not prevent the artist from giving a marvellously fine performance of the concerto, on the whole, one of the finest performances of it to which we have ever listened. The finger-play throughout was of the most exquisite in precision, brilliancy, delicacy and clearness, and the fluency of the whole effort was little short of wonderful. Never was a piano made to sing with more charm than M. de Pachmann made it sing in the adagio. It would be superfluous to dwell on the perfect technique of the artist at this late date; and it would be as idle to state that his interpretation of the concerto was poetical and refined to the last degree. All that marred complete enjoyment of the effort was the by-play of the player, with its grimaces, its sentimental shrugging of the shoulders, its animated conversations during the tuttis with the assistant who turned the pages of the piano music, and its "monkeying" generally. But the playing was not the less masterly in the best sense of the word, and none the less fascinating in the hearing. There were thunders of applause at its close, and the enthusiasm reached a height that we have rarely heard equalled in Music Hall. M. de Pachmann, after a second overwhelming recall, responded with Liszt's transcription of the quartet from "Rigoletto," which was given with an amazing brilliancy and delicacy in its quieter phases, and with thrilling force in its more stormy moments, the difficulties with which the music bristles being overcome without any apparent effort. After this there was another frenzy of applause. The encore fiend broke loose and the staid and highly respectable symphony audience proceeded to turn the concert into a piano recital. M. de Pachmann was nothing loth to gratify it, and played a Chopin waltz with a delicacy, grace and sentiment that excited another storm of plaudits and another demand for more, when the artist responded with a Moschelles Etude. There would, doubtless have been still another encore, but M. de Pachmann shook his head, looked at his watch, and signified that it could not be. Three encores at a Symphony concert where it has been the admirable rule to deny even one, is an innovation that it is to be hoped may not be accepted as a precedent. The playing of the artist was as deserved as it was overwhelming; but the eternal fitness of things is always to be considered, and the encore fiend should be peremptorily "sat upon" at a symphony concert. The next concert is to take place March 7th, when the programme is to be: Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin"; Symphony No. 3, in D, by August Klughardt (first time); two movements from a 'cello concerto by Reinecke (first time); and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. Mr. Leo Schultz will be the soloist.

[99]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

 Season of 1890-91. ***

Leave Boston Monday, Feb. 23, at 1.00 P.M., Providence Depot.
Arrive New Haven Monday, 6. P.M.
NEW HAVEN HOTEL.
Concert at Hyperion Theatre, 8.00 P.M.
Leave New Haven after Concert. Sleeping Cars at Depot.
Arrive in New York Tuesday, Feb. 24.
GRAND CENTRAL HOTEL, 673 Broadway
Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, 12 o'clock noon.
Concert at Chickering Hall, 8.00 P.M.
Leave New York Wednesday, Feb. 25, at 11.30 A. M., via Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.
Arrive Philadelphia 1.45 P.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8 00 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia Thursday, Feb. 26, at 10 A.M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 24th and Chestnut Streets.
Arrive Washington 2 P.M.
WILLARD'S HOTEL.
Concert at Lincoln Hall, 8.00 P.M.
Leave Washington, Baltimore & Ohio Depot, Friday, Feb. 27, 2 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore 3 P.M.
CARROLTON HOUSE.
Concert at Concordia Hall, 8 00 P.M.
Leave Baltimore directly after concert.
Arrive New York Saturday, Feb. 28, at 7.00 A.M.
Leave New York, Grand Central Depot, Saturday, Feb. 28, 10 A.M.
Arrive Boston 4.30 P.M., Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

Members of the Orchestra not playing in New Haven will leave for New York Monday, Feb. 23, via Fall River line. Train leaves Park Square Depot at 6.00 P.M.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

SATURDAY, February 21, 1891.

Hyperion Theatre, - New Haven,

Monday Evening, Feb. 23, at 8.

PROGRAMME

4

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

* * * * *

But Benjamin Godard's "Symphony Orientale," two numbers of which were played at the Symphony concert Saturday evening, can not be accused of vulgarity or cheap effects. The composition, however, is not a symphony; it is a set of descriptive pieces, five in number, each one of which illustrates a poem. The first of the numbers played, "Nikia's Dream," is a musical setting of words of Godard. It is an adagio with peculiar, haunting, if somewhat searched out melody, with a languorous accompaniment. The musical contents themselves are not so noticeable as the brilliant and variegated covering in which they are wrapped. The music is more suggestive than direct, and the refined subtlety will always prevent the instantaneous popularity of the work. The second, "In the Hammock," is a musical portrayal of the reveries of the indolent "Sara, la baigneuse," of Victor Hugo. It is, in rhythm, like a barcarolle, and the melody is well defined and charming. The effects of color gained by apparently simple means are wonderful, and the whole piece is an admirable exhibition of French skill in instrumentation. Each instrument is so cunningly treated, its possible effects are so appreciated, its limitations are so carefully respected. These two numbers were heard here for the first time, and they were exceedingly well played by the orchestra.

* * * * *

The other orchestral numbers were Weber's "Der Freischütz" overture, and Beethoven's seventh symphony. The performance of these familiar compositions was marked by singular affectations in the reading of Mr. Nikisch. The introduction was taken so slowly that the horns were unable to sing with effect, and the movement was without pulse and was sluggish. The Allegro was disfigured with meaningless ritardandos and vain efforts to produce unusual effects. In the delivery of the peroration Mr. Nikisch was evidently guided in a measure by the suggestions of Richard Wagner, but he went far beyond his instructions, and in striving to produce an overwheming effect he fell to the earth; for nothing could have been more feeble and jejune than the finale of the overture as played last Saturday.

* * * * *

Another peculiarity of Mr. Nikisch's musical nature was observed in his reading of the Seventh Symphony, and that is his wish to constantly try experiments. Last year he gave a reading of this symphony which was novel and provocative of criticism. For example, in the allegretto, in the modulating passage from the episode in A major to C major, and then to A minor, he made a long spun-out and unwarranted ritard which was more a complete change of tempo than a ritard. This year he does nothing of the kind, but he makes up for this omission by freely seasoning Beethoven's music with Nikischian condiments of all kinds. The most flagrant of his breaches of good faith was the manner in which he read the first twenty or thirty measures of the first vivace, which, under his stick became a pleasant and somewhat melancholy pastorale, although this was almost equalled by the eccentricities seen in the treatment of the horn organpoint in the trio of the scherzo. It may be said in defense of Mr. Nikisch's behavior that old things have passed away and new interpretations are demanded. Surely no one will protest if such new interpretations enhance the beauty of the work. But when the rhythm is killed, when the manifest intention of a composer is flouted, when the mannerisms of one period are grafted upon the sturdy strength of another period, the time to sit by in acquiescence and thankfulness is past. The Seventh Symphony of Beethoven is one thing; a Liszt Hungarian Rhapsodie is another. Mr. Nikisch makes hardly any distinction between the two. Whether he wanders in Eastern or Western fields he breathes one air, the air of Hungary.

* * * * *

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch sang last week for the first time in Boston, and she was applauded vociferously before and after each group of songs. Her selections were Cherubini's canzona and aria from "La Nozze di Figaro," Bizet's "Pastorale," Schumann's "Provencalisches Lied," and Brahms' "Vergebliches Staendchen." She is a mezzo-soprano. Her voice is of good, though not extended compass. Her upper and lower tones are weak, and the quality of her medium register is agreeable and sympathetic. But she has either been badly taught or she has received absolutely no instruction. Her tone-production is faulty, and her attack of high notes is radically wrong, for she constantly strikes below the wished for note and slides upwards to it. She indulges herself in a reckless and unmusical use of the portamento, and in many of the details of her art she has not sufficient skill to carry out her intentions, however honorable they may be. In a word, her singing is crude.

* * * * *

Although her phrasing is carefully studied, it is often directly opposed to the expressed intentions of the composer, as in the songs by Mozart, where she showed a lack of dramatic instinct. These songs were written for an Italian text, and they are in the Italian style. Waiving the question whether they should be sung without ornamentation (and for an interesting discussion of the proper singing of a Mozart aria the reader is referred to the scholarly essays upon this subject to be found in Stéphen De La Madelaine's "Etudes pratiques" vol. 2, chap. 2, and Heinrich Dorn's "Streifzüge im Gebiete der Tonkunst" chapter 1), and paying attention only to the expression of the character of Cherubino, Mrs. Nikisch's failure in portraying this character was complete. The Page was not a coquettish soubrette, he was a handsome boy, with just awakened passions, who was in love with everything feminine which crossed his path, chambermaid or countess, sincere for the moment, and fickle. The passion in each of these wonderful songs was but poorly expressed; the mild emotions of the singer flagged when they should have glowed with intenser fire and vice-versa. The charming music written by Bizet to the old fashioned words of Regnard suffered, as sung by her, for the lightness of Bizet was turned to heaviness, and her treatment of the ornaments which embellish the final measures of each verse was amateurish in the extreme. She was more successful in the songs by Schumann and Brahms, the latter of which was sung with genuine expression.

* * * * *

At the Kneisel Quartet concert, given Monday evening at Union Hall, a quartet for pianoforte and strings (MS.) by Mr. Arthur Foote was heard for the first time. The composer played the pianoforte part. It is an exceilent piece of writing, fresh, spontaneous, skilfully put together; only in the fourth and last movement is the music somewhat conventional. The themes of the first movement, an allegro comodo, are interesting, and they lend themselves to logical and natural developments. The second movement is not in strict form, but the beauty of the aria and the subsequent handling of it are a sufficient excuse for any departure from rules. The scherzo is piquant, especially in rhythm. The quartet is most pleasant music, and passages show a genuine passion and a mastery of expressing thought which have sometimes been wanting in the works of this composer. The performance was in every respect worthy of the composition, and it was played with the greatest care and with evident appreciation. The different movements were loudly applauded, and at the end the composer was recalled.

* * * * *

The other quartet numbers were the "sphaerenmusik" from Rubinstein's Second Quartet, Boccherini's Menuet, No. 2, and Beethoven's Quartet in E flat, op. 74. They were played with the purity of tone, perfection of technique and highly developed artistic sense which characterize the performances of this unequalled Quartet.

* * * * *

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch sang songs by Liszt, Chopin, Schumann, Jensen and Brahms. She was heartily applauded, though in addition to the faults in technique spoken of above, her intonation was at times false. The accompaniments were played delightfully by Mr. Nikisch.

* * * * *

Society people seem never to tire of talking of Mrs. Nikisch. The most remarkable thing of all is that here in Boston, which is nothing if not exacting, it is acknowledged that in the trying position of being introduced into a strange city as the wife of a most conspicuous man, she has as yet made no single mistake.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 22.
HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concerts.

At the seventeenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night, Music Hall was completely filled, despite the miserable and discouraging weather. The performances began with Tschaikowsky's Overture-Fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," a work that has been heard at these concerts before. A further acquaintance brings out many new beauties; but much of the music is vague in meaning and dry in effect. The treatment of the themes is always interesting, and especially of the graceful and sensuous second subject, which, we presume, is intended to typify Juliet. The orchestration throughout is very fine, and the musicianship of the overture is of a high order; but, after all, it is doubtful if the composer has here given anything of permanent value to the world. It is unquestionably original, but nevertheless is, in its general color and effect, so much like the bulk of the serious music of the modern school, that it does not seem to say anything new. It was played with splendid emphasis and richness of color, but despite its manifest power, it leaves the hearer cold. The concert ended with a delightful reading and performance of Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" Symphony, a work that steadily grows in interest the more it is heard. The soloist was M. Vladimar de Pachmann, who played Chopin's concerto in F minor. He was received with great fervor, but he no sooner appeared than his familiar eccentricties began, and the now well-known comedy with all its little gestures, its face play and its direct appeals to the audience was again repeated. This, however, did not prevent the artist from giving a marvellously fine performance of the concerto, on the whole, one of the finest performances of it to which we have ever listened. The finger-play throughout was of the most exquisite in precision, brilliancy, delicacy and clearness, and the fluency of the whole effort was little short of wonderful. Never was a piano made to sing with more charm than M. de Pachmann made it sing in the adagio. It would be superfluous to dwell on the perfect technique of the artist at this late date; and it would be as idle to state that his interpretation of the concerto was poetical and refined to the last degree. All that marred complete enjoyment of the effort was the by-play of the player, with its grimaces, its sentimental shrugging of the shoulders, its animated conversations during the tuttis with the assistant who turned the pages of the piano music, and its "monkeying" generally. But the playing was not the less masterly in the best sense of the word, and none the less fascinating in the hearing. There were thunders of applause at its close, and the enthusiasm reached a height that we have rarely heard equalled in Music Hall. M. de Pachmann, after a second overwhelming recall, responded with Liszt's transcription of the quartet from "Rigoletto," which was given with an amazing brilliancy and delicacy in its quieter phases, and with thrilling force in its more stormy moments, the difficulties with which the music bristles being overcome without any apparent effort. After this there was another frenzy of applause. The encore fiend broke loose and the staid and highly respectable symphony audience proceeded to turn the concert into a piano recital. M. de Pachmann was nothing loth to gratify it, and played a Chopin waltz with a delicacy, grace and sentiment that excited another storm of plaudits and another demand for more, when the artist responded with a Moschelles Etude. There would, doubtless have been still another encore, but M. de Pachmann shook his head, looked at his watch, and signified that it could not be. Three encores at a Symphony concert where it has been the admirable rule to deny even one, is an innovation that it is to be hoped may not be accepted as a precedent. The playing was well worth the hearing and the triumph of the artist was as deserved as it was overwhelming; but the eternal fitness of things is always to be considered, and the encore fiend should be peremptorily "sat upon" at a symphony concert. The next concert is to take place March 7th, when the programme is to be: Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin"; Symphony No. 3, in D, by August Klughardt (first time); two movements from a 'cello concerto by Reinecke (first time); and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. Mr. Leo Schultz will be the soloist.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 23, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert—Vladimir De Pachmann as Soloist.

The Pachmann piano recital of Saturday night, also contained two excellent orchestral works, and one (the Chopin concerto) which was semi-orchestral; spite of the fact that the entire concert was Pachmannized, one may venture to say a word or two about the orchestra and its work.

"All the world loves a lover," says the proverb, and composers have emphasized this fact by setting a pair of them to music on every available occasion; "Romeo and Juliet" has been the theme of Feydeau, Zingarelli, Vaccri, Bellini, Gounod, and Berlioz, in opera and symphony since 1793, and now the great Russian, Tschaikowsky, serves up the same subject in large overture form. The work has been before spoken of in these columns, but it grows decidedly on repeated hearing, and new beauties revealed themselves in the magnificent performance of Saturday night. The overture gives no such fervor of passion as is found in Berlioz's "Balcony scene" (the very best movement the Frenchman ever created) but allows the contentions of the Montagues and Capulets to come most prominently into the foreground. And this suited well the fiery mood of our impetuous conductor, who launched forth cymbals and kettledrums in a perfect tornado of combat, until at times one could cry with Mercutio "A plague o' both the houses." But the longing and the elegiac character found expression also, and the long-drawn organ points with which Tschaikowsky has studded the work were effective and properly balanced in their execution. The improvement in the department of the woodwind was noticeable both in this work and in the splendid performance of Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" suite, miscalled a symphony, which ended the concert. We all know how thorough the flutes and oboes have been during the past two years, but last Saturday the clarinettes and the bassoons were their equals in excellence. Such crisp and clear work as was present in the second, third and fourth movements of the Goldmark work must needs have especial mention, and the performance was altogether a memorable one. The fourth movement, "In the Garden," is the gem of the entire composition, and spite of its saccharine, melodic effects, reminds of Wagnerian erotics. The climaxes of passion were finely brought out by Mr. Nikisch's reading, and the return of the chief theme as an episode in the finale, picturing the lovers apart amid the revelry of the wedding feast, the wild saturnalia of festivity, the dainty imitations of the third movement, the church bell sounding its monotone in the wedding march, the brilliant oboe variation, the work of the violins against pizzicato cellos and basses in the variations, these and many other points might be cited to prove that Mr. Nikisch and his men may be proud of the performance.

But between the two works above described there came the psychological problem known as Vladimir de Pachmann. He jumped on the conductor's stand and bowed and grimaced to everybody; he shook hands with Mr. Nikisch as pugilists do before a prize fight, and even the gentleman who turned the leaves of the music for him received a similar attention; he beat the time, with his right hand, to the audience, while playing with his left; in short he acted like a mountebank, and played like a genius. To the musician who has any pride in his calling this man must be a sore trial; either there are some grains of true gold in his inmost nature, under all these affectations, or he is a living proof of the statement made by some philosophers, that music is the lowest of the arts. No great poet, painter or sculptor would become such a bundle of conceits and eccentricities. Following out the train of thought, however, the question arises—does Pachmann give the length and depth and breadth of Chopin? Is Chopin himself representative of the truest art of music?

There is but little doubt that the emotional is so entirely present in Chopin's works that they need a corrective in the shape of the works of more intellectual composers. A person might play Beethoven or Bach for a lifetime and be mentally strengthened by the process; but the pianist who devoted his entire energy to the study of Chopin would find himself enervated by his diet of musical absinthe, and would probably become a Pachmann. As to Pachmann's giving all the phases of Chopin, this may also be doubted. The first movement of the F minor concerto was not so well played as I have heard it, and just here a degree of intellectuality and manliness come into play. But words cannot describe the delicacy, the sweetness, the fairy-like beauty, with which the artist gave the adagio of this work; here was the true rubato of Chopin, and the conceptions of a D'Albert or a Rosenthal in this school, were as a Cyclops to a nymph, a goose to a butterfly. The final rondo was not less remarkable and was a delicious freedom utterly defying description.

Recall followed recall, and as the audience soon became aware that the artist was quite ready to grant encores, and that there was no strong hand, as in by-gone years, to stop the cheap practice, there followed a piano recital without parallel in the annals of these concerts. First the pianist gave Liszt's "Rigoletto Fantasie," which was about as suitable to such a programme as Thalberg's "Home, Sweet Home" would have been; then, after a very little gentle urging, came a Chopin waltz, and after the audience had intimated that they would like more, a Moscheles study was given. After this the pianist declined further encores and the orchestra was again allowed to appear. With all due allowance for the pianist's abnormally developed bump of self-esteem, and with full recognition of his remarkable genius in his chosen genre, we ought never to allow these concerts to lose their orchestral character; Boston owes more to its musical advancement to the Symphony Orchestra than it ever could to a hundred DePachmanns.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Post
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 23, 1891

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The seventeenth Symphony concert, which took place Saturday evening at Music Hall, might justly be described as a pianoforte recital given by Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann with the kind assistance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was the loadstone which drew the many who lined the walls of Music Hall. He was applauded to the echo as soon as he appeared upon the stage. He was cheered after each movement of the Chopin Concerto in F minor. And at the end the great audience was wildly enthusiastic. It was the wish, or rather the demand, of the hearers that he should play again; so the excellent rule which has prevailed was broken for the third time this season, and upon this occasion it was broken thrice. For after the superb performance of the Rigoletto Fantasie, tumult was at its height; a Chopin waltz was no more effectual in appeasing the clamor than the empty tub which seamen fling out to the pursuing whale. It was only after he had given a remarkable exhibition of his prowess by playing a Moscheles study that he was allowed to depart in peace. Nor was it Mr. de Pachmann who was greedy. It was the Symphony audience, and the members of the orchestra joined actively in the demonstration. Music Hall has seldom witnessed such a sight.

Nor was this frenetic enthusiasm uncalled for and to be regretted. Weighing well the value of words, remembering that they are "wise men's counters," it is not too much to say that the playing of Mr. de Pachmann can only be described as wonderful; and one is tempted to add, "and yet again wonderful, and after that out of all whooping." It was a rare and complete triumph of true, legitimate pianoforte playing. Here was a man who has been dubbed by the admirers of the athletic school as Monsieur de Pianissimo; he was in Music Hall with an orchestra at his back, and yet, such is the "carrying" quality of his tone, every note of a melodic phrase, the most delicate run, the gossamer-like arabesque—these were distinct and beautiful even in the remotest corner. But it is not necessary, it would be almost an impertinence, to attempt an analysis of his playing. The language which should fitly describe it, would seem fulsome and absurd. The cold, austere phrases of the admiring pedagogue cannot find here a place. Prismatic words, sonorous and carefully balanced sentences are of no avail. Nothing can equal de Pachmann's performance of Chopin's adagio but the music of the adagio itself. One might say that it was eminently poetic; but it was eminently musical, and music is the final answer to the problems suggested by poetry. One might say that the rhythmic feeling in the rondo was remarkable, but supreme rhythm is not felt, it naturally exists; for who is conscious of the movement of the earth or who stops to measure it and approve? Will words describe the haunting charm of De Pachmann's melody or the crystalline sparkle of his bravura? This man of rubatos was always with the orchestra. This man of musical as well as personal mannerisms dealt frankly with Chopin face to face. He has been called the incarnation of effeminacy. Was there any lack of virility in the Rigoletto Fantaisie?

An astonishing individual, this Mr. de Pachmann, as player and man. He wears apparently his heart upon his sleeve, and yet at times he eyes curiously his audience, as though wondering at their toleration or approval at his antics. For, unfortunately, even the presence of that august body, a symphony audience, has no chastening effect upon his mad spirits. He is a man of emotions; are they real, or feigned, or a mixture? Is he intoxicated with his power over the pianoforte and women? Or has he eaten of the insane root? Who can tell? Last Saturday he tripped gaily across the stage; he was, in fact, hilarious; and the hilarity became contagious. Our symphony concerts are, as a rule, conducted with decorum, as a religious rite. The proper enjoyment of them demands a preparation of meditation, if not of absolute purification. But De Pachmann, who breaks all precedents, was the master of the house, and pleasure brightened the faces of his guests. He carries his mannerisms with him; they go with his playing. Though they may be disagreeable, though they may be offensive, they can easily be pardoned; for he is more than a pianist of great talent, he is a pianist of genius. And in the display of genius, the observance of conventionalities is a secondary matter. And after all, could he act otherwise and be his natural self?

The orchestra, under Mr. Nikisch, played a most sympathetic accompaniment, and the two orchestral numbers of the programme were exceedingly well played. The first was Tschaikowsky's Overture-Fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," which was heard last season for the first time. A second hearing confirms the opinion expressed last year in the POST that it is a remarkable work, of great dramatic power, containing a melody of surpassing breadth and intense passion. Objection has been made to it on the ground that love is treated as though it were an accidental feature of the tragedy. It is hard to see how this objection can be raised by any one who has heard the throbbing song of rapture called the "Juliet" motive. But without discussing this point, there are surely other elements in the play, and important ones. Strifes, quarrels, duels without end, and from the very beginning. The clash of swords is heard constantly; it is "the immortal passado! the puncto reverso! the hay!" The brilliant Maginn coldly declared in his essay on Romeo that Shakspere did not draw him as a lover but as the type of an unfortunate man, a Murad the unlucky; one, "who, with the best views and fairest intentions, is perpetually so unfortunate as to fail in every aspiration, and while exerting himself to the utmost in their behalf, to involve all whom he holds dearest in misery and ruin." And Maginn presents Bottom, the weaver, as a contrast. Each one can find what he pleases in the tragedy and in the music, for neither was written with a purpose or to make converts.

The "Rustic Wedding" of Goldmark, pleasant music, in which graceful expression takes the place of profound thought, brought this most interesting concert to a close.

There will be no concert this week. The programme of the concert which will be given Saturday evening, March 7, includes Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin." Klughardt's Third symphony in D major (first time), and Beethoven's overture to "Egmont." Mr. Leo Schulz will play two movements from Reinecke's concerto for violincello.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.
TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.
SUNDAY, FEB. 22, 1891.

MUSICAL SOUNDS.

Symphony Rehearsal and Pachmann Recital Combined.

All conventionalities disappear when Vladimir de Pachmann appears. Even the traditions of a symphony concert vanish in his smiling presence. Innovations come unchallenged by the director. The symphony rehearsal on Friday was made a Pachmann recital as well.

Chopin's concerto in F minor, No. 2, was the work assigned for performance by Pachmann on the programme. While not so familiar as the poet-composer's other concerto, this is still a noble work. The Russian pianist had the score before him, but seldom found it necessary to glance at the pages. It seems impossible for this extremely emotional gentleman to play in public without looking for sympathy and appreciation in some face near at hand. As the concerto went on he beamed now on the accompanist, now on some auditor in the front row of seats.

With so impetuous and "individual" an artist at the piano, the orchestral accompaniment could hardly fail to tax Mr. Nikisch's alertness, even though by comparison, the musicians' share in the performance is so slight. Pachmann seemed to feel the limitations of the occasion now and then. But in the beautiful, limited "runs" of the adagio and rondo he was himself, emphatically and himself at his best.

A storm of applause recalled him, when the performance had ended, and when, after shaking hands with Mr. Nikisch and three or four members of the enthusiastic orchestra, he retired from the scene, he responded to the recall with a solo—Chopin, of course. The cheering was redoubled at the close. Again and yet again the artist responded with a dainty and most delicately given offering. It was in truth a series of triumphs for Pachmann, who can seldom have appeared before a larger throng.

Tschaikovsky's melodious overture fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," opened the programme, and Goldmark's lovely symphony, "The Rustic Wedding," brought it to a close. It was all a charming entertainment.

The orchestra is to be away this week on its journeyings. On its return, March 6, a symphony in D major, by August Klughardt, is to have its first hearing in Boston. Mr. Leo Schulz will perform two movements from Reinecke's concerto for violoncello, which is new here. Wagner's "Lohengrin" prelude and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture are also to be given.

Symphony goers are well aware of the great crush and scramble for seats at the Friday rehearsals, but Fred R. Comee, assistant manager of the Symphony orchestra, gives the best illustration of a woman's anxiety to get a good seat.

So anxious was she that she clambered upstairs at a gait which, assisted by the crush, caused her to shed some fine plumage in the shape of an overskirt.

"Here, madame," exclaimed Mr. Comee, in coaxing tones, as he held aloft the overskirt.

"Keep it for me," was the reply, and she sped on her journey to secure a seat.

SUNDAY HERALD.
BOSTON, FEBRUARY 22, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Vladimir de Pachmann.

The appearance of Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann at last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, made a most notable event in the season's series, and the pianist assumed a prominence in the programme which was as unexpected as it was enjoyable.

He was announced to play with the orchestra the concerto by Chopin No. 2 in F minor, op. 27, and his appearance was the signal for a welcoming round of applause, in which the musicians gave their full share, the audience fairly surpassing the record in their demonstrations of delight. The artist evidently appreciated the attention shown him, and was all gracious as he took his seat at the piano, greeting his patrons of the evening in his own inimitable way, and compelling the abandonment of all reserve on the part of his waiting listeners by his comical action in rearranging the score, which had been placed upon the rack top side down.

His playing in the concerto called out ovations from the audience at each pause such as are seldom heard in a Boston concert hall, and after the final movement the pianist was recalled with so much enthusiasm that the rules concerning encores were completely ignored by the artist and audience, the former appearing quite as delighted to respond to the applause as the latter was to have him do so. First the glorious arrangement of the "Rigoletto" themes by Liszt was played, then an etude by Moscheles, and finally a brilliant waltz by Chopin.

In the concerto the player took the same liberties with accepted readings as he has in his recital programmes, but his masterly interpretation, based upon his own idea of the composition, possessed a charm that fully justified the audience in its extravagant demonstration of enjoyment. It is useless to take exceptions to such a successful performance. It certainly revealed beauties which other performers have failed to give prominence to, and, as a whole, the reading had characteristics which were as enjoyable as those of the same performers playing in his own concerts. Such faultless piano work from a purely technical standpoint has not been heard in a generation, and the demonstrations of delight were but natural after such a performance.

If any difference of opinion existed as to the measure of success attending the reading of the concerto, there were evidently none as to the pianist's merits as a solo player in the encore numbers, and Mr. de Pachmann can safely number the Symphony concert patrons among his stanchest admirers in the future. The "Rigoletto" fantasie was a marvel of tuneful beauty as played by De Pachmann, and the custom of excluding such compositions from symphony programmes was most happily ignored on this occasion.

The evening's programme was introduced by a very satisfactory performance of the somewhat incomprehensible "Overture-fantaisie," by Tschaikowski, called by the composer "Romeo and Juliet," with "After Shakespeare" as the only key to its meaning. Following the concerto as a final number, Mr. Nikisch gave a very brilliant interpretation of Goldmark's tuneful "Rustic Wedding" symphony, in which the variations of the first movement displayed the virtuosity of the orchestra to splendid advantage.

The orchestra makes its occasional tour during the coming week, and for the evening of March 7 the programme will be Wagner's prelude, "Lohengrin"; August Klughardt's symphony 3, in D major, (first time); two movements from Reinecke's concerto for violoncello (first time); Beethoven's overture, "Egmont," the soloist being Mr. Leo Schulz.

Boston Journal.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 23, 1891.
MORNING EDITION.

The Symphony Concert.

De Pachmann was the soloist at the last Symphony concert, and at both the Friday afternoon rehearsal and the Saturday evening concert he was master of the situation. The austerities of these concerts were put in the background; traditions went to the winds, and for once Conductor Nikisch was seen to smile. What a pity we could not have such an awakening oftener during these concerts! There was an enormous crowd present at both performances. From the first moment of the entrance of the distinguished soloist the audience was put in good humor and all dignity passed away. He shook hands with the conductor before beginning, then put himself en rapport with his hearers by his usual bows and smiles, and the performance of Chopin's concerto in F minor began. There was that same magnetism, that ease in conquering all technical difficulties that is characteristic of all his playing. He was rapturously applauded after each movement and recalled amidst great enthusiasm. As he stepped to the piano after being recalled, indicating his intention of playing an encore number, despite the Symphony traditions, the delight of the audience knew no bounds, and he appeared as pleased as the audience. Possibly he was pleased to think that he was beyond the direction of the conductor in this respect. And so he was. The piano was in its position, and Mr. Nikisch could only sit back and allow the performance to go on. This was repeated three times Saturday evening, after which matters resumed their normal condition. It is evident that he has a large hold on the musical public. His renditions were magnificent, and his audience was entirely in sympathy with him.

For the orchestra there was an overture-fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," by Tschaikowsky, and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," in which the orchestra played with care and disarmed all criticism. The latter number was an appropriate following of the playing of De Pachmann. There is no concert this week, and at the concert given in New York Tuesday night, the closing one of the series there, De Pachmann is to be the soloist.

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, FEB. 22, 1891.

THE FIFTH KNEISEL CONCERT.

The fifth in the series of chamber concerts by the Kneisel quartette was given in Union hall last Monday evening, and attended as usual by an audience that well filled the hall. Mr. Arthur Foote, pianist, and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, soprano, were the assisting artists. The programme was: Quartette for piano and strings, op. 23 (ms.) by Arthur Foote, played for the first time; andante from quartette in C minor, No. 2, Rubinstein; minuet in A, No. 2, Boccherini; quartette in E flat, op. 74, Beethoven; songs by Chopin, Schumann, Jansen, Liszt and Brahms.

Of the playing of Mr. Kneisel and his associates it need only be said that they proved themselves one and all the same admirable artists that we have so often admired and praised and from whom the highest artistic enjoyment and instruction are expected as a matter of course.

Mr. Foote's quartette is a manly piece of writing. It is a profound and noble work, the subjects being splendidly conceived, thoroughly musical and ably developed. The andante by Rubinstein and minuet by Boccherini were given out with exquisite refinement, grace and finish. Mrs. Nikisch was cordially received, and her efforts were rewarded by generous applause, but she again failed to illustrate the remotest possibility of her being anything like a great singer. Her method is so significantly amateurish and inartistic that it would render any engagement with either the Boston Symphony orchestra or Kneisel quartette very doubtful were she any other than the wife of our æsthetic conductor, who so charmingly played her accompaniments.

The Beethoven quartette was given with much breadth and finish and formed a fitting finale to the concert.

---

[100]

THE COMMONWEALTH.

ESTABLISHED IN 1862.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1891.

The sweet presence of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch dominated the sixteenth Symphony concert. For her Boston début, the wife of the conductor of the orchestra chose from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro" the two tenor Cherubino songs, known by their Italian titles as "Voi che sapete" and "Non so più cosa son," and a group of songs by Bizet, Schumann and Brahms. Mrs. Nikisch is ardent and earnest by nature; in her singing these qualities are conspicuous. Her training as a vocalist has left her with certain faults which the enthusiasm of her manner magnifies; among these an imperfect attack, a sliding up to the tone, is most regretable. Her voice is a pleasant one, having the range and quality of a mezzo soprano. In the songs which were sung to the very beautiful piano accompaniment of Mr. Nikisch, the charm of the singer was most potent. The instrumental novelty at this concert was by Benjamin Godard; namely, two movements from his "Symphonie Orientale," which is not a symphony at all, but a string of five character pieces, named in compliment to as many countries. The titles of the two Mr. Nikisch chose are: "Nikea's Dream" (Persia); "In the Hammock" (Greece). Godard's art is delicate and charming. No Frenchman likes to be bound to the strict instrumental forms; counterpoint and vivacity do not in his opinion harmonize; so when one takes up a Gallic symphony it is usually found to be a chain of pretty, tasteful instrumental pictures. The standard selections at this concert were the "Freischutz" overture and Beethoven's seventh symphony.

At the Kneisel concert of the 16th, a new and manuscript piano quartet by Arthur Foote had a first performance, with the composer assisting as pianist. The warmth and spirit of Mr. Foote's compositions are most noticeable; he holds on to his scholarly style, but his ideas are more fluent, as is their musical speech. This quartet has a remarkably strong first movement, an adagio of real beauty. The other movements are interesting. The performance of the quartet was greeted with great applause. Beethoven's E flat string quartet, with its wondrous adagio, and two slighter movements of Rubinstein and Boccherini, completed the instrumental numbers played at this concert. In addition to what we have recorded, Mrs. Nikisch sang.

Boston Daily Traveller

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1891.

Seventeenth Symphony Concert—Vladimir De Pachmann, Soloist—Local Announcements.

De Pachmann dominated the concert of last Saturday; his promised appearance was the reason of the very large sale of admission tickets, and curiosity in the man more than interest in his playing kept the audience continually on the alert from the moment he made his appearance on the stage until the last note of his third encore piece had been played; in fact, a stranger in Music Hall would have thought from the strange attitudes of a portion of the audience that there were no seats in the second balcony. Admitting that in the abstract De Pachmann's piano playing is beautiful—and certainly the man played his part of the F minor concerto of Chopin as delicately and artistically as it has ever been done here—we object seriously to his mannerisms, which have now become so notorious that people go to see him act, more than to hear him play. Is it a healthy sign? After the concerto was finished the applause was long continued, and the pianist returned three times to the stand before it occurred to him that all amusements in Boston are supposed to terminate at 9.45 and Mr. Nikisch and his men had a Goldmark symphony yet to perform.

The "Rustic Wedding" was the important orchestral work at this concert, and its performance was exquisite in its coloring and expressiveness. Tschaikowsky's gorgeous "Romeo and Juliet" overture fastasie began the concert. A second hearing of the work confirms first impression as to its being one of the best instrumental compositions of a dramatic nature the period has produced. The orchestra is away this week. At the concert of March 7 this programme will be performed: Wagner, prelude, "Logengrin"; August Klughardt, Symphony No. 3, in D major, first time; Reinecke, two movements from concerto for violoncello, first time; Beethoven, overture, "Egmont." Soloist, Mr. Leo Schulz.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
Vol. LXXXIX, No. 56.

WEDNESDAY, FEB. 25, 1891.

ITS CROWNING SUCCESS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Makes a Great Hit in New York.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Feb. 24, 1891. The Boston Symphony orchestra, Arthur Nikisch conductor, won the crowning success of its season here this evening, at the fourth and last of its series of concerts at Chickering Hall.

It is safe to say that no greater financial success has been known to attend a similar event here in 20 years than that at tonight's concert, for all the seats were sold out early this morning, and standing room could not be had to accommodate patrons.

The orchestra has never played better than it did this evening, and Mr. Nikisch and his men were applauded to the echo.

The best evidence of the strength of the orchestra in New York is given in the announcement made by the circulars to this evening's audience, to the effect that, in place of the four concerts given this season, six will be given next season, and this in the face of the almost unlimited number of orchestral concerts to be given here by New York orchestras next season.

De Pachmann was the soloist to-night, and created the same furor as he did at the concerts last week, being compelled to add two encore numbers to still [illegible] It is given out that he will remain for two miscellaneous recitals

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The seventeenth concert of the season, Saturday evening, Feb. 21, was a singular occasion. It consisted of three numbers:

Tschaikowsky.Overture-Fantasie: "Romeo and Juliet."
Chopin.....Op. 21. Concerto for piano, No. 2, in F minor.
Goldmark.....Op. 26. Symphony: "Rustic Wedding."
Soloist: Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann.

The singularity of the concert was that the middle number, the piano virtuoso element, like Aaron's rod, devoured the rest. De Pachmann's wonderful performance of the Chopin F-minor Concerto (the first that Chopin wrote although it counts second in the order of publication) wrought the crowded audience up to a pitch of enthusiasm which would not be contented without a series of solos in response to encores; a thing thus far prohibited by rule and custom in the Symphony concerts. Pachmann was all himself in his fantastic ways, his smiles, grimaces, amiable appeals for sympathy, frequent remarks and ejaculations addressed during the most exquisite moments of performance to the person who turned the leaves for him. To many who were listening for the first time, as well as to some relentless censores morum who had heard him repeatedly, these childish ways of the man took off attention from the musical, artistic side of him, or at least disturbed and spoiled the pure enjoyment of it. We are more than ever convinced that there is no affectation in it; that it is all natural, frank and simple; that it is the irrepressible, involuntary, almost unconscious acting out of his peculiar nature; that he so intensely, dearly loves his Chopin and the music which he plays so con amore, as to crave sympathy and feel unhappy unless all enjoy it with him. Take this for the secret of his strange behavior and for a condition to be accepted, and you will surely find an artist in him and a musical interpreter of an exceptionally high fine quality.

The F-minor Concerto is an old favorite in Boston. It was first played in the Harvard concerts in March, 1870, by Anna Mehlig; again by Leonhard, Sumner, and finally by Madeline Schiller in 1877. The other Concerto (in E minor) was much earlier and more often played. By whom since we cannot remember. Did Boston ever listen to a performance of the piano part which approached in exquisite finish and delicacy, in sympathetic truth to the composer, in beauty, in vitality of touch, in reproduction of the spirit of the work, this rendering by Pachmann? Evidently he was unaccustomed to so large a hall, for in the beginning of the first movement (Allegro) we had to listen with the closest attention to hear all distinctly; he seemed to care more for quality than quantity of tone; more to bring out the fine, poetic singing quality of the Chickering Grand than to fill the great space with a loud sound. But all ears were soon captivated. He kept the movement strictly, always even with the orchestra. (The orchestration, to be sure, was rather outside the peculiar sphere of Chopin's genius, and is often thin and ineffective.) The Adagio (Larghetto Chopin called it), that exquisite dream of love, composed, according to Chopin's own confession, while he was under the spell of a first passion, was played with inimitable grace and delicacy and feeling. The gossamer fioriture seemed outlined by fairy fingers; it was like a dream, a magical realization of the impossible. Such piano-playing, such interpretation, one cannot afford to lose on account of a few personal mannerisms wholly outside of the music. The concluding Rondo, full of charming ideas, as where the horn phrase seems to summon up the fairy spirits, ravished the listening sense and soul still more. And hence the uncontainable applause. Could it be helped? Perhaps the excitable, sympathy-craving Russian was all too ready to respond; and perhaps Conductor Nikisch was too amiable in yielding. But he did return to the piano amid shouts of joy and give a wonderful performance of Liszt's flowery and difficult transcription of (or fantasia on) the quartet in "Rigoletto"—perhaps the best piece that Verdi ever composed. Now this was not classical; on the contrary, a very incongruous element to introduce into a Symphony Concert. But not so seemed to think the audience in its unthinking pleasure and enthusiasm; and the obliging artist must needs come back twice again and volunteer a waltz by Chopin and an étude by Moscheles, both rendered to a charm.

We could not feel that the rest of the programme was of a degree of excellence or interest to suffer badly from this phenomenal episode. The fantastic overture of the other Russian with a longer name did not seem to us to vindicate the title "Romeo and Juliet." Indeed, beginning in a dirge-like strain, it seemed throughout a vain endeavor to shake off the close and chilling atmosphere and odor of the tomb. If the lovers were in that music at all, it could be only as they lay in death in the vault of the Capulets. The composition may be closely woven, the instrumentation ingeniously rich, it may contain beauties discernible by careful study; but the thing as a whole seemed most monotonous and dreary and depressing; perhaps the word "modern" would express it all. That there is much finesse in the composition, and that it was admirably executed, we will not attempt to deny; but that it was edifying?—that it was more grateful to hear than Tschaikowsky to pronounce, this deponent sayeth not. Really some of the most elaborate and most ingenious and original of the most modern music seems like a musical apotheosis of ugliness, per se, as if beauty were "used up," grown too conventional and common for the use of high-strung modern genius!

It is more than probable that the Goldmark Symphony might bring a suit against the encore fiend. Its prettiness and sweetness doubtless did seem tamer and samer after that prolonged excitement. The first of its five scenes, the Wedding March (moderato molto) has not much to say, and is a long time saying it; and the string of far-fetched variations, by which it seeks to prolong its life, sounds heterogeneous and soon becomes fatiguing. The Bridal Song (Allegretto) has a graceful simplicity. The Serenade (Allegretto moderato scherzando) has some friendly fun in it, with pleasant duet passages of flutes, oboes, clarinets, &c. The Andante, "In the Garden," has the tender, dreamy, mutually confiding character claimed for it in the score, and is the most beautiful movement of the symphony. The concluding Dance (Allegro molto), with a theme related to the opening march, is brisk and strongly marked; but the tired and sleepy sense was past such rousing; many were leaving the hall; and this "Rustic Wedding" symphony, with all its cleverness [illegible] prettiness, was on the whole rather [illegible] the beginning of the pr[illegible] more effect.

[illegible] the orchestra will be engaged in [illegible] ordinary work. The next concert will be on Saturday, March 7, and will give us Wagner's Prelude (Vorspiel) to "Lohengrin;" a symphony in D (No. 3) by an entirely new name to us, August Klughardt; two movements from a Concerto for the violoncello by Reinecke (save us from one of his interminable cadenzas!), to be played by Mr. Leo Schulz; and, to make accounts even, Beethoven's short, but glorious, "Egmont" overture.

J. S. D.

BRATTLE HALL, CAMBRIDGE.

:::1891.:::

MONDAY EVENING, MARCH 2.

TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 31. TUESDAY EVENING, APRIL 21.

THREE CONCERTS,

BY THE

KNEISEL QUARTET.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.

ASSISTING ARTISTS:

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH,
MME. HELEN HOPEKIRK,
MR. ERNST PERABO,
MR. ARTHUR FOOTE.

Tickets, with reserved seats for the series of three Concerts, $3.00. The sale of Season Tickets opens at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, Thursday morning, February 26th.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT.

Philadelphia, Thursday, Feb. 26, 1891.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An audience that was too numerous for the seating capacity of the Academy of Music braved last evening's rather severe storm to attend the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's current series. The concert, in large measure, justified the fine attendance. There were no novelties. The splendid "Benvenuto Pellini" overture of Berlioz was given in a manner that would have delighted even that exacting master of orchestral art at the beginning. The other orchestral numbers were the andantino and scherzo from Tschaikowsky's fourth (F minor) symphony and Raff's "Im Walde" (3d) Symphony, and these were preceded by Chopin's F minor (op. 21) piano concerto. Two light, bright pieces, well contrasted with themselves and with the other numbers on the list, would have made the concert more enjoyable, but the execution of the programme as it was could scarcely have been excelled by any orchestra in existence. No terms need be multiplied in emphasizing this fact. To be sure, Mr. Nikisch's reading of the "Im Walde" symphony dims no recollections of the playing that has made it so delightfully familiar, and even lacked much of the peculiar jocund, out-of-doorish spirit with which Mr. Thomas made parts of it glow; but, in view of such superb playing of Mr. Nikisch's men, the reflection almost savors of the hypercritical.

The Chopin number was omitted from the enumeration of orchestral attractions presented, partly because Chopin's ineffective orchestral scoring makes the music for the solo instrument rather an unimportant accompaniment than a setting, and partly because the arbitrary and fanciful way in which the soloist, Vladimir Pachmann, made changes in his time, prevented the orchestra from doing anything more than just about keeping the run of him. Mr. Pachmann was in one of his whimsical moods, and though it showed less in his outward personal behavior than on previous occasions, it very materially affected his reading, which was decidedly eccentric. He disregarded the fashion set by Bülow, and followed by all piano virtuosi of any note in recent years, of discarding the notes in performances of this kind, and used the piano score throughout, an assistant turning the leaves for him. The best that can be said of his performance is that he now and then revealed his exquisite powers in it, and this was particularly the case in portions of the largetto and in the closing (allegro vivace) movement. And even in these moments of art that was entrancing he would make some gesticulation or grimace that would rudely dispel the charm. He was recalled with great enthusiasm, however, and played Mendelssohn's "Rondo Capriciosо" in a way that made it a mixture of exaggerated phrasing and wonderful technical execution. If these unseemly exhibitions of grotesque personal manner are deliberately interjected, whether as a result of egotism or crankiness, they are unpardonable. If, however, they are the ineradicable infirmities of genius, to which we are told madness is akin, then they are pathetic, for they pain the world of [illegible] who is certain [illegible]

THE CAMBRIDGE-TRIBUNE

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1891.

The Kneisel Quartet.

We would call the attention of our readers to the notice in our advertising columns of three concerts to be given by the Kneisel Quartet in Brattle hall. Mr. Kneisel has arranged a very beautiful programme of Beethoven music for the first concert on Monday evening next, with Mr. Ernst Perabo as soloist. These concerts, in connection with the distinguished artists announced, are only possible through the noble generosity and enterprise of Mr. Henry L. Higginson, and the music-loving public of Cambridge will undoubtedly take advantage of this rare opportunity by filling Brattle hall to repletion.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, February 26, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert

The programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth concert, given at the Academy of Music last evening, was made up of strictly modern music, from the almost academic "Forest" symphony of Raff through Tschaikowsky's fanciful andantino from his Fruinor symphony; Berlioz's audacious and inspiriting overture to his only opera, "Benvenuto Cellini;" and, in addition, Chopin's Fruinor concerto for piano, played by M. De Pachmann, who, with all his mannerisms, is unquestionably the best interpreter of Chopin now before the public. It is not in classic forms of musical expression that Chopin is heard to great advantage, yet this concerto has many passages of rare beauty which render it deserving of the study of artists and the attention of the public. The work of the orchestra throughout was well-nigh perfection, and sometimes—as in the Tschaikowsky scherzo—absolutely inimitable and beyond compare.

[101]

THE COMMONWEALTH.

ESTABLISHED IN 1862.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1891.

The sweet presence of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch dominated the sixteenth Symphony concert. For her Boston début, the wife of the conductor of the orchestra chose from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro" the two tenor Cherubino songs, known by their Italian titles as "Voi che sapete" and "Non so piu cosa son," and a group of songs by Bizet, Schumann and Brahms. Mrs. Nikisch is ardent and earnest by nature; in her singing these qualities are conspicuous. Her training as a vocalist has left her with certain faults which the enthusiasm of her manner magnifies; among these an imperfect attack, a sliding up to the tone, is most regretable. Her voice is a pleasant one, having the range and quality of a mezzo soprano. In the songs which were sung to the very beautiful piano accompaniment of Mr. Nikisch, the charm of the singer was most potent. The instrumental novelty at this concert was by Benjamin Godard; namely, two movements from his "Symphonie Orientale," which is not a symphony at all, but a string of five character pieces, named in compliment to as many countries. The titles of the two Mr. Nikisch chose are: "Nikea's Dream" (Persia): "In the Hammock" (Greece). Godard's art is delicate and charming. No Frenchman likes to be bound to the strict instrumental forms; counterpoint and vivacity do not in his opinion harmonize; so when one takes up a Gallic symphony it is usually found to be a chain of pretty, tasteful instrumental pictures. The standard selections at this concert were the "Freischutz" overture and Beethoven's seventh symphony.

At the Kneisel concert of the 16th, a new and manuscript piano quartet by Arthur Foote had a first performance, with the composer assisting as pianist. The warmth and spirit of Mr. Foote's compositions are most noticeable; he holds on to his scholarly style, but his ideas are more fluent, as is their musical speech. This quartet has a remarkably strong first movement, an adagio of real beauty. The other movements are interesting. The performance of the quartet was greeted with great applause. Beethoven's E flat string quartet, with its wondrous adagio, and two slighter movements of Rubinstein and Boccherini, completed the instrumental numbers played at this concert. In addition to what we have recorded, Mrs. Nikisch sang.

Boston Daily Traveller

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1891.

Seventeenth Symphony Concert—Vladimir De Pachmann, Soloist—Local Announcements.

De Pachmann dominated the concert of last Saturday; his promised appearance was the reason of the very large sale of admission tickets, and curiosity in the man more than interest in his playing kept the audience continually on the alert from the moment he made his appearance on the stage until the last note of his third encore piece had been played; in fact, a stranger in Music Hall would have thought from the strange attitudes of a portion of the audience that there were no seats in the second balcony. Admitting that in the abstract De Pachmann's piano playing is beautiful—and certainly the man played his part of the F minor concerto of Chopin as delicately and artistically as it has ever been done here—we object seriously to his mannerisms, which have now become so notorious that people go to see him act, more than to hear him play. Is it a healthy sign? After the concerto was finished the applause was long continued and the pianist returned three times to the piano before it occurred to him that all amusements in Boston are supposed to terminate at 9.45 and Mr. Nikisch and his men had a Goldmark symphony yet to perform.

The "Rustic Wedding" was the important orchestral work at this concert, and its performance was exquisite in its coloring and expressiveness. Tschaikowsky's gorgeous "Romeo and Juliet" overture fantasie began the concert. A second hearing of the work confirms first impression as to its being one of the best instrumental compositions of a dramatic nature the period has produced. The orchestra is away this week. At the concert of March 7 this programme will be performed: Wagner, prelude, "Logengrin"; August Klughardt, Symphony No. 3, in D major, first time; Reinecke, two movements from concerto for violoncello, first time; Beethoven, overture, "Egmont." Soloist, Mr. Leo Schulz.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
Vol. LXXXIX, No. 56.

WEDNESDAY, FEB. 25, 1891.

ITS CROWNING SUCCESS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Makes a Great Hit in New York.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Feb. 24, 1891. The Boston Symphony orchestra, Arthur Nikisch conductor, won the crowning success of its season here this evening, at the fourth and last of its series of concerts at Chickering Hall.

It is safe to say that no greater financial success has been known to attend a similar event here in 20 years than that at tonight's concert, for all the seats were sold out early this morning, and standing room could not be had to accommodate patrons.

The orchestra has never played better than it did this evening, and Mr. Nikisch and his men were applauded to the echo.

The best evidence of the strength of the orchestra in New York is given in the announcement made by the circulars to this evening's audience, to the effect that, in place of the four concerts given this season, six will be given next season, and this in the face of the almost unlimited number of orchestral concerts to be given here by New York organizations next season.

Valdimir de Pachmann was the soloist tonight, and he created the same furor as he did at the Boston concerts last week, being compelled to add two encore numbers to still the audience. It is given out that he will return to Boston for two miscellaneous recitals late in March.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The seventeenth concert of the season, Saturday evening, Feb. 21, was a singular occasion. It consisted of three numbers:

Tschaikowsky. Overture-Fantasie: "Romeo and Juliet."
Chopin.....Op. 21. Concerto for piano, No. 2, in F minor.
Goldmark.....Op. 26. Symphony: "Rustic Wedding."
Soloist: Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann.

The singularity of the concert was that the middle number, the piano virtuoso element, like Aaron's rod, devoured the rest. De Pachmann's wonderful performance of the Chopin F-minor Concerto (the first that Chopin wrote although it counts second in the order of publication) wrought the crowded audience up to a pitch of enthusiasm which would not be contented without a series of solos in response to encores, a thing thus far prohibited by rule and custom in the Symphony concerts. Pachmann was all himself in his fantastic ways, his smiles, grimaces, amiable appeals for sympathy, frequent remarks and ejaculations addressed during the most exquisite moments of performance to the person who turned the leaves for him. To many who were listening for the first time, as well as to some relentless censores morum who had heard him repeatedly, these childish ways of the man took off attention from the musical, artistic side of him, or at least disturbed and spoiled the pure enjoyment of it. We are more than ever convinced that there is no affectation in it; that it is all natural, frank and simple; that it is the irrepressible, involuntary, almost unconscious acting out of his peculiar nature; that he so intensely, dearly loves his Chopin and the music which he plays so con amore, as to crave sympathy and feel unhappy unless all enjoy it with him. Take this for the secret of his strange behavior and for a condition to be accepted, and you will surely find an artist in him and a musical interpreter of an exceptionally high fine quality.

The F-minor Concerto is an old favorite in Boston. It was first played in the Harvard concerts in March, 1870, by Anna Mehlig; again by Leonhard, Sumner, and finally by Madeline Schiller in 1877. The other Concerto (in E minor) was much earlier and more often played. By whom since we cannot remember. Did Boston ever listen to a performance of the piano part which approached in exquisite finish and delicacy, in sympathetic truth to the composer, in beauty, in vitality of touch, in reproduction of the spirit of the work, this rendering by Pachmann? Evidently he was unaccustomed to so large a hall, for in the beginning of the first movement (Allegro) we had to listen with the closest attention to hear all distinctly; he seemed to care more for quality than quantity of tone; more to bring out the fine, poetic singing quality of the Chickering Grand than to fill the great space with a loud sound. But all ears were soon captivated. He kept the movement strictly, always even with the orchestra. (The orchestration, to be sure, was rather outside the peculiar sphere of Chopin's genius, and is often thin and ineffective.) The Adagio (Larghetto Chopin called it), that exquisite dream of love, composed, according to Chopin's own confession, while he was under the spell of a first passion, was played with inimitable grace and delicacy and feeling. The gossamer fioriture seemed outlined by fairy fingers; it was like a dream, a magical realization of the impossible. Such piano-playing, such interpretation, one cannot afford to lose on account of a few personal mannerisms wholly outside of the music. The concluding Rondo, full of charming ideas, as where the horn phrase seems to summon up the fairy spirits, ravished the listening sense and soul still more. And hence the uncontainable applause. Could it be helped? Perhaps the excitable, sympathy-craving Russian was all too ready to respond; and perhaps Conductor Nikisch was too amiable in yielding. But he did return to the piano amid shouts of joy and give a wonderful performance of Liszt's flowery and difficult transcription of (or fantasia on) the quartet in "Rigoletto"—perhaps the best piece that Verdi ever composed. Now this was not classical; on the contrary, a very incongruous element to introduce into a Symphony Concert. But not so seemed to think the audience in its unthinking pleasure and enthusiasm; and the obliging artist must needs come back twice again and volunteer a waltz by Chopin and an étude by Moscheles, both rendered to a charm.

We could not feel that the rest of the programme was of a degree of excellence or interest to suffer badly from this phenomenal episode. The fantastic overture of the other Russian with a longer name did not seem to us to vindicate the title "Romeo and Juliet." Indeed, beginning in a dirge-like strain, it seemed throughout a vain endeavor to shake off the close and chilling atmosphere and odor of the tomb. If the lovers were in that music at all, it could be only as they lay in death in the vault of the Capulets. The composition may be closely woven, the instrumentation ingeniously rich, it may contain beauties discernible by careful study; but the thing as a whole seemed most monotonous and dreary and depressing; perhaps the word "modern" would express it all. That there is much finesse in the composition, and that it was admirably executed, we will not attempt to deny; but that it was edifying?—that it was more grateful to hear than Tschaikowsky to pronounce, this deponent sayeth not. Really some of the most elaborate and most ingenious and original of the most modern music seems like a musical apotheosis of ugliness, per se, as if beauty were "used up," grown too conventional and common for the use of high-strung modern genius!

It is more than probable that the Goldmark Symphony might bring a suit against the encore fiend. Its prettiness and sweetness doubtless did seem tamer and samer after that prolonged excitement. The first of its five scenes, the Wedding March (moderato molto) has not much to say, and is a long time saying it; and the string of far-fetched variations, by which it seeks to prolong its life, sounds heterogeneous and soon becomes fatiguing. The Bridal Song (Allegretto) has a graceful simplicity. The Serenade (Allegretto moderato scherzando) has some friendly fun in it, with pleasant duet passages of flutes, oboes, clarinets, &c. The Andante, "In the Garden," has the tender, dreamy, mutually confiding character claimed for it in the score, and is the most beautiful movement of the symphony. The concluding Dance (Allegro molto), with a theme related to the opening march, is brisk and strongly marked; but the tired and sleepy sense was past such rousing; many were leaving the hall; and this "Rustic Wedding" symphony, with all its cleverness and all its prettiness, was on the whole rather tame and tedious. At the beginning of the programme it might have produced more effect.

This week the orchestra will be engaged in missionary work. The next concert will be on Saturday, March 7, and will give us Wagner's Prelude (Vorspiel) to "Lohengrin;" a symphony in D (No. 3) by an entirely new name to us, August Klughardt; two movements from a Concerto for the violoncello by Reinecke (save us from one of his interminable cadenzas!), to be played by Mr. Leo Schulz; and, to make accounts even, Beethoven's short, but glorious, "Egmont" overture.

J. S. D.

BRATTLE HALL, CAMBRIDGE.

:::1891:::

MONDAY EVENING, MARCH 2.

TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 31. TUESDAY EVENING, APRIL 21.

THREE CONCERTS,

BY THE

KNEISEL QUARTET.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.

ASSISTING ARTISTS:

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH,
MME. HELEN HOPEKIRK,
MR. ERNST PERABO,
MR. ARTHUR FOOTE.

A few well reserved seats for the series of three Concerts, $3.00. The sale of Season Tickets opens at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, Thursday morning, February 26th.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT.

Philadelphia, Thursday, Feb. 26, 1891.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An audience that was too numerous for the seating capacity of the Academy of Music braved last evening's rather severe storm to attend the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's current series. The concert, in large measure, justified the fine attendance. There were no novelties. The splendid "Benvenuto Pellini" overture of Berlioz was given in a manner that would have delighted even that exacting master of orchestral art at the beginning. The other orchestral numbers were the andantino and scherzo from Tschaikowsky's fourth (F minor) symphony and Raff's "Im Walde" (3d) Symphony, and these were preceded by Chopin's F minor (op. 21) piano concerto. Two light, bright pieces, well contrasted with themselves and with the other numbers on the list, would have made the concert more enjoyable, but the execution of the programme as it was could scarcely have been excelled by any orchestra in existence. No terms need be multiplied in emphasizing this fact. To be sure, Mr. Nikisch's reading of the "Im Walde" symphony dims no recollections of the playing that has made it so delightfully familiar, and even lacked much of the peculiar jocund, out-of-doorish spirit with which Mr. Thomas made parts of it glow; but, in view of such superb playing of Mr. Nikisch's men, the reflection almost savors of the hypercritical.

The Chopin number was omitted from the enumeration of orchestral attractions presented, partly because Chopin's ineffective orchestral scoring makes the music for the solo instrument rather an unimportant accompaniment than a setting, and partly because the arbitrary and fanciful way in which the soloist, Vladimir Pachmann, made changes in his time, prevented the orchestra from doing anything more than just about keeping the run of him. Mr. Pachmann was in one of his whimsical moods, and though it showed less in his outward personal behavior than on previous occasions, it very materially affected his reading, which was decidedly eccentric. He disregarded the fashion set by Bülow, and followed by all piano virtuosi of any note in recent years, of discarding the notes in performances of this kind, and used the piano score throughout, an assistant turning the leaves for him. The best that can be said of his performance is that he now and then revealed his exquisite powers in it, and this was particularly the case in portions of the largetto and in the closing (allegro vivace) movement. And even in these moments of art that was entrancing he would make some gesticulation or grimace that would rudely dispel the charm. He was recalled with great enthusiasm, however, and played Mendelssohn's "Rondo Capricioso" in a way that made it a mixture of exaggerated phrasing and wonderful technical execution. If these unseemly exhibitions of grotesque personal manner are deliberately interjected, whether as a result of egotism or crankiness, they are unpardonable. If, however, they are the ineradicable infirmities of genius, to which we are told madness is akin, then they are pathetic, for they ruin the work of a great artist, who is, within certain limits, incomparable.

THE CAMBRIDGE-TRIBUNE

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1891.

The Kneisel Quartet.

We would call the attention of our readers to the notice in our advertising columns of three concerts to be given by the Kneisel Quartet in Brattle hall. Mr. Kneisel has arranged a very beautiful programme of Beethoven music for the first concert on Monday evening next, with Mr. Ernst Perabo as soloist. These concerts, in connection with the distinguished artists announced, are only possible through the noble generosity and enterprise of Mr. Henry L. Higginson, and the music-loving public of Cambridge will undoubtedly take advantage of this rare opportunity by filling Brattle hall to repletion.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, February 26, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert

The programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth concert, given at the Academy of Music last evening, was made up of strictly modern music, from the almost academic "Forest" symphony of Raff through Tschaikowsky's fanciful andantino from his Fruinor symphony; Berlioz's audacious and inspiriting overture to his only opera, "Benvenuto Cellini;" and, in addition, Chopin's Fruinor concerto for piano, played by M. De Pachmann, who, with all his mannerisms, is unquestionably the best interpreter of Chopin now before the public. It is not in classic forms of musical expression that Chopin is heard to great advantage, yet this concerto has many passages of rare beauty which render it deserving of the study of artists and the attention of the public. The work of the orchestra throughout was well-nigh perfection, and sometimes—as in the Tschaikowsky scherzo—absolutely inimitable and beyond compare.

[101]

FIRST CONCERT.

Monday Evening, March 2d, at 8.

KNEISEL QUARTET

and

Mr. ERNST PERABO.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN.	QUARTET, E flat.
BEETHOVEN.	ANDANTE and PRESTO from the Kreutzer Sonata.
BEETHOVEN.	TRIO, B flat major.

...abstract De Pachmann's piano playing is beautiful—and certainly the man played his part of the F minor concerto of Chopin as delicately and artistically as it has ever been done here—we object seriously to his mannerisms, which have now become so notorious that people go to see him act, more than to hear him play. Is it a healthy sign? After the concerto was finished the applause was long continued and the pianist returned three times to the piano before it occurred to him that all amusements in Boston are supposed to terminate at 9.45 and Mr. Nikisch and his men had a Goldmark symphony yet to perform.

'The "Rustic Wedding" was the important orchestral work at this concert, and its performance was exquisite in its coloring and expressiveness. Tschaikowsky's gorgeous "Romeo and Juliet" overture fantasie began the concert. A second hearing of the work confirms first impression as to its being one of the best instrumental compositions of a dramatic nature the period has produced. The orchestra is away this week. At the concert of March 7 this programme will be performed: Wagner, prelude, "Logengrin"; August Klughardt, Symphony No. 3, in D major, first time; Reinecke, two movements from concerto for violoncello, first time; Beethoven, overture, "Egmont." Soloist, Mr. Leo Schulz.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
Vol. LXXXIX, No. 56.

WEDNESDAY, FEB. 25, 1891.

ITS CROWNING SUCCESS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Makes a Great Hit in New York.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Feb. 24, 1891. The Boston symphony orchestra, Arthur Nikisch conductor, won the crowning success of its season here this evening, at the fourth and last of its series of concerts at Chickering Hall.

It is safe to say that no greater financial ... has been known to attend a similar ... in certainly 20 years than that at tonight's ... not all the seats were sold out early ... and standing room could not be ... to accommodate patrons.

... orchestra never played better than ... and Mr. Nikisch and his ... were applauded to the echo.

... best evidence of the strength of the ... here in New York is given in the ... made by the circulars to this ... announcement, to the effect that, in place ... four concerts given on the season, six will ... next season, and this in the face of ... increased number of orchestral ... to be given here by New York or...

---

was like a dream. A magical realization of the impossible. Such piano-playing, such interpretation, one cannot afford to lose on account of a few personal mannerisms wholly outside of the music. The concluding Rondo, full of charming ideas, as where the horn phrase seems to summon up the fairy spirits, ravished the listening sense and soul still more. And hence the uncontainable applause. Could it be helped? Perhaps the excitable, sympathy-craving Russian was all too ready to respond; and perhaps Conductor Nikisch was too amiable in yielding. But he did return to the piano amid shouts of joy and give a wonderful performance of Liszt's flowery and difficult transcription of (or fantasia on) the quartet in "Rigoletto"—perhaps the best piece that Verdi ever composed. Now this was not classical; on the contrary, a very incongruous element to introduce into a Symphony Concert. But not so seemed to think the audience in its unthinking pleasure and enthusiasm; and the obliging artist must needs come back twice again and volunteer a waltz by Chopin and an étude by Moscheles, both rendered to a charm.

We could not feel that the rest of the programme was of a degree of excellence or interest to suffer badly from this phenomenal episode. The fantastic overture of the other Russian with a longer name did not seem to us to vindicate the title "Romeo and Juliet." Indeed, beginning in a dirge-like strain, it seemed throughout a vain endeavor to shake off the close and chilling atmosphere and odor of the tomb. If the lovers were in that music at all, it could be only as they lay in death in the vault of the Capulets. The composition may be closely woven, the instrumentation ingeniously rich, it may contain beauties discernible by careful study; but the thing as a whole seemed most monotonous and dreary and depressing; perhaps the word "modern" would express it all. That there is much finesse in the composition, and that it was admirably executed, we will not attempt to deny; but that it was edifying?—that it was more grateful to hear than Tschaikowsky to pronounce, this deponent sayeth not. Really some of the most elaborate and most ingenious and original of the most modern music seems like a musical apotheosis of ugliness, per se, as if beauty were "used up," grown too conventional and common for the use of high-strung modern genius!

It is more than probable that the Goldmark Symphony might bring a suit against the encore fiend. Its prettiness and sweetness doubtless did seem tamer and samer after that prolonged excitement. The first of its five scenes, the Wedding March (moderato molto) has not much to say, and is a long time saying it; and the string of far-fetched variations, by which it seeks to prolong its life, sounds heterogeneous and soon becomes fatiguing. The Bridal Song (Allegretto) has a graceful simplicity. The Serenade (Allegretto moderato scherzando) has some friendly fun in it, with pleasant duet passages of flutes, oboes, clarinets, &c. The Andante, "In the Garden," has the tender ...

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT.

Philadelphia, Thursday, Feb. 26, 1891.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An audience that was too numerous for the seating capacity of the Academy of Music braved last evening's rather severe storm to attend the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's current series. The concert, in large measure, justified the fine attendance. There were no novelties. The splendid "Benvenuto Pellini" overture of Berlioz was given in a manner that would have delighted even that exacting master of orchestral art at the beginning. The other orchestral numbers were the andantino and scherzo from Tschaikowsky's fourth (F minor) symphony and Raff's "Im Walde" (3d) Symphony, and these were preceded by Chopin's F minor (op. 21) piano concerto. Two light, bright pieces, well contrasted with themselves and with the other numbers on the list, would have made the concert more enjoyable, but the execution of the programme as it was could scarcely have been excelled by any orchestra in existence. No terms need be multiplied in emphasizing this fact. To be sure, Mr. Nikisch's reading of the "Im Walde" symphony dims no recollections of the playing that has made it so delightfully familiar, and even lacked much of the peculiar jocund, out-of-doorish spirit with which Mr. Thomas made parts of it glow; but, in view of such superb playing of Mr. Nikisch's men, the reflection almost savors of the hypercritical.

The Chopin number was omitted from the enumeration of orchestral attractions presented, partly because Chopin's ineffective orchestral scoring makes the music for the solo instrument rather an unimportant accompaniment than a setting, and partly because the arbitrary and fanciful way in which the soloist, Vladimir Pachmann, made changes in his time, prevented the orchestra from doing anything more than just about keeping the run of him. Mr. Pachmann was in one of his whimsical moods, and though it showed less in his outward personal behavior than on previous occasions, it very materially affected his reading, which was decidedly eccentric. He disregarded the fashion set by Bülow, and followed by all piano virtuosi of any note in recent years, of discarding the notes in performances of this kind, and used the piano score throughout, an assistant turning the leaves for him. The best that can be said of his performance is that he now and then revealed his exquisite powers in it, and this was particularly the case in portions of the largetto and in the closing (allegro vivace) movement. And even in these moments of art that was entrancing he would make some gesticulation or grimace that would rudely dispel the charm. He was recalled with great enthusiasm, however, and played Mendelssohn's "Rondo Capricioso" in a way that made it a mixture of exaggerated phrasing and wonderful technical execution. If these ... exhibitions of grotesque personal ... manner are deliberately interjected, whether ... as a result of egotism or crankiness, ... are unpardonable. If, however, they are ... the ineradicable infirmities of genius ...

THE CAMBRIDGE TRIBUNE

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1891.

The Kneisel Quartet.

We would call the attention of our readers to the notice in our advertising columns of three concerts to be given by the Kneisel Quartet in Brattle hall. Mr. Kneisel has arranged a very beautiful programme of Beethoven music for the first concert on Monday evening next, with Mr. Ernst Perabo as soloist. These concerts, in connection with the distinguished artists announced, are only possible through the noble generosity and enterprise of Mr. Henry L. Higginson, and the music-loving public of Cambridge will undoubtedly take advantage of this rare opportunity by filling Brattle hall to repletion.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, February 26, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth concert, given at the Academy of Music last evening, was made up of strictly modern music, from the almost academic "Forest" symphony of Raff through Tschaikowsky's fanciful andantino from his Fruinor symphony; Berlioz's audacious and inspiriting overture to his only opera, "Benvenuto Cellini;" and, in addition, Chopin's Fruinor concerto for piano, played by M. De Pachmann, who, with all his mannerisms, is unquestionably the best interpreter of Chopin now before the public. It is not in classic forms of musical expression that Chopin is heard to great advantage, yet this concerto has many passages of rare beauty which render it deserving of the study of artists and the attention of the public. The work of the orchestra throughout was well-nigh perfection, and sometimes—as in the Tschaikowsky scherzo—absolutely inimitable and beyond compare.

---

[101]

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1891.

Wladimir de Pachmann Plays with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth and last of the four concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra give here this season took place in Chickering Hall last evening in the presence of an audience that filled the house to the doors, and was marked by even more than the customary applause with which the work of Herr Nikisch and his men is always welcomed. It is pleasant to record that the financial as well as the artistic success of these concerts has been such as to warrant a series of six next winter.

Last night's concert again demonstrated very plainly that in some respects the Boston Orchestra has attained a perfection beyond that of our best organizations. Nothing more beautifully finished than the playing of the Brahms D minor symphony, or of the "Siegfried" "Waldweben" music has not been heard here.

Upon the other hand, the programme as a whole was inferior in composition to those of our local conductors. It was rather an aggravation than otherwise to find half the evening devoted to music so utterly tedious and archaic as Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture and Mozart's D minor concerto, both of which works were played so admirably as to make one wish with heart and soul that something else had been given in their place. To give such music in the few concerts allotted to New York by Herr Nikisch is a deplorable waste of splendid material.

The selection of the Mozart concerto was all the more surprising, considering that the soloist was Herr Pachmann, the Chopin player par excellence, who made all that could be made of the concerto, but who ought to have been heard with this orchestra in one of Chopin's concertos, if in anything. After the stilted cadenzas of Mozart, improved upon by Hummel, the audience found so much food for real enthusiasm in the hackneyed but lovely Mendelssohn "Rondo Capriccioso," which Herr Pachmann played in response to prolonged demands for more, that the pianist had to sit down again and play the Henselt study, "Si oiseau j'etais," which was beautifully given, notwithstanding an awkward lapse of memory, which no expertness of modulation could cover up.

The "Waldweben" music from "Siegfried" gave New York a taste of what this orchestra can do with this most exacting of Wagner's pages. As most of this forest music, depicting the rustle of the leaves and the song of the birds, used as a background for some of the most splendid of the "Siegfried" themes, is written for the strings, in which department this orchestra is pre-eminent, it is not surprising that the whole number, lasting more than twenty minutes, had to be repeated.

Brahms' interesting if not very deep D minor symphony was also splendidly played, the quaint scherzo finding especial favor with the audience. At the close of the concert Herr Nikisch was recalled with a heartiness which plainly attested the firm place he has won with the best class of New York's concert goers.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1891.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Appreciation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been steadily growing in New-York for five years, seems to be developing into a veritable cult. The last concert of the organization at Chickering Hall was an extraordinary affair, so far as the recognition of the work done by Mr. Nikisch and his men was concerned, but a still more extraordinary and, indeed, incomprehensible affair so far as the enjoyment of the clownish antics of M. de Pachmann was concerned. That the playing of the superb band under its inspiring leader should be appreciated at its full value by a New-York audience is not at all to be wondered at; New-Yorkers know good music when they hear it, because they have been trained in appreciation by Mr. Thomas and his confreres, and they cherish no petty prejudices against visitors who reach their ideals of excellence in this department. They have a good deal of amiability, too, and love relaxation, which, perhaps, goes as far as anything can to explain the circumstance that M. de Pachmann excites only amused laughter and a new round of applause when he throws kisses to the pianoforte on which he has played, and by a series of eloquent gestures informs the audience that to the instrument and not to himself is due the credit for his brilliant performances. It is all affectation and unworthy of an artist, of course, but so long as the public can be humbugged into the belief that it is but the eccentricity of genius that species of charlatanry will be practised by M. de Pachmann, and applause will follow it for no other purpose than to see what he will do next. The pity of it is that it spoils the enjoyment of the judicious when he plays so beautifully as he did last night in Mozart's D minor concerto, and so dazzlingly as he did in Mendelssohn's "Rondo Capriccioso" and an Etude by Chopin, with which he varied his circus performance after the concerto. And it robs Mr. Nikisch's concert of the dignity which its lofty artistic merit invested it with. The orchestra's numbers last night were Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture, the "Waldweben," from Wagner's "Siegfried" (read in a style that sounds rather tame in New-York), and Brahms's D minor symphony.

Next season the orchestra will give six concerts, the increased number being due to the fact that it will take the place in Brooklyn's musical life vacated by the Philharmonic Society. Seats for the series may be reserved on and after to-day at Schuberth's music store in Union Square.

The New-York Times.

NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEB. 25, 1891.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The fourth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall last evening was undoubtedly a disappointment to the judicious in the audience, though it seemed to tickle the ears of those groundlings who go wherever the crowd goes, and are prepared to applaud anything new, from a Nibelung pianist to a balloon ascension. Two elements conspired to make last night's concert disappointing. One of these was the presence as soloist of Vladimir de Pachmann, the piano player, and the other was the misconception by the conductor of one of Wagner's loveliest creations. That Mr. Nikisch should descend from the lofty level of his artistic dignity to lend his countenance to the acrobatic humbuggery of Pachmann was as little to be expected as that he should have missed the spirit of the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried." Yet he did both these things. Perhaps under the combination of circumstances well known to the elect it was impossible for him to escape Pachmann, but he ought to know his Wagner better.

The medium which Pachmann selected for a further exhibition of his stupendous vanity and lack of real artistic feeling was Mozart's beautiful piano concerto in D minor. That Pachmann remodeled its melodic ideas to suit his own purposes goes without saying. It is pretty generally understood now that he does this with all music that falls under his ruthless hands. Mozart's beautiful cantilena was transformed by him into declamatory recitative, and the smooth legato with which the glorious boy was in the habit of playing his own running passages was broken and marred by the introduction of unjustifiable sforzandi and sudden diminuendi, wholly foreign to a true Mozartian style.

Every student of musical history knows that Mozart followed out the idea of Emmanuel Bach that the highest achievement on the piano was the production of a lovely cantabile, and that in aiming at this effect he clung tenaciously to a true piano style. But Pachmann phrased the concerto in a spasmodic, rhapsodical style which would have made the composer stand aghast. And to all this was added an endless variety of those simian antics with which this pretentious pianist seeks to divert the attention of an audience from the music to himself. How well he succeeded in his antimusical efforts may be judged from the fact that he received a double encore. The first recall induced him to play Mendelssohn's "Rondo Capriccioso," in which he continued his distribution of explosives; and on a second recall he played Henselt's "Si oiseau j'etais," which it would do him some good to hear gush and sparkle from the magic fingers of Moritz Rosenthal.

Mr. Nikisch's reading of the "Waldweben" suffered from a lack of vitality, and this arose from a surprisingly slow tempo which militated against the value of the accentuation. The shading of the performance was good, but the leisurely pace widened the intervals between the nuances and disrobed the entire composition of its normal vesture of sylvan airiness and youthful buoyancy. Moreover, the voices of the clarinet and oboe, which have so much that is eloquently suggestive to say in this scene, were deficient in sweetness and refinement. We have often praised the Boston orchestra at the expense of local organizations, but none of our resident conductors would have failed to give a more notable rendering of this number.

The other two compositions on the programme were Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture, with which it began, and Brahms's second symphony, with which it closed. It was a genuine pleasure to hear once again the strong, sonorous, dramatic writing of the old martinet of the Conservatoire, and in this number the gentlemen of Boston fully sustained their high and well-merited reputation. Their performance of it was an epitome of all that is admirable in ensemble playing, and Mr. Nikisch's reading was masterly. Similar praise is due the treatment of the Brahms symphony, but it must be confessed that for the hearer to put himself thoroughly en rapport with this work is an arduous task. It does not woo the auditor to self-forgetfulness, and it never warms the fibres of one's heart as the same composer's C minor symphony and B flat piano concerto do. The announcement was published last night that the Boston Symphony Orchestra would give six concerts here next season. Of a truth, this town is in a way to be overwhelmed with orchestral riches next season.

Philadelphia Inquirer

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1891.

A PACHMANN NIGHT.

The Academy of Music Crowded at the Boston Symphony Concert.

It is probable that the audience at the Academy of Music last evening was greater than any which ever before gathered to hear a symphony concert in that building. It was a Pachmann night, and this may in some measure account for the extraordinary attendance.

Mr. Pachmann is a queer mixture of charlatan and artist. He is a magnificent performer, but his mannerisms—not to use a harsher word—are in exceeding bad taste, and it is to be regretted that his audiences are not dignified enough to pass them by unnoticed, in which case they might not be thrust upon them. He played the familiar Chopin concerto in F minor, a beautiful work, requiring great delicacy and precision to bring out its full merits. The pianist was fully competent. He has a marvelous technique, but plays with apparently no effort. His touch is delicate but every note is clear. It was a rare piece of work and was fully appreciated.

The orchestra played nothing novel but the numbers were excellent. Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," a beautiful prelude to an opera that was a failure at first, but which has risen in public estimation with every subsequent production. Raff's symphony, "Im Walde," is a favorite with every orchestral organization of any proportions and is deservedly popular for the wealth of musical beauty and wide scope of its themes. Tschaikowski's No. 4 Symphony in F minor is an interesting work full of unexpected musical conceits and vivacious throughout. The two numbers given last night were familiar and enjoyable. The concert was notable from the fact that there were but four numbers on the programme, but there was ample variety in the various movements of these numbers.

The Evening Post.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1891.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. de Pachmann.

If the fourth and last of the concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall this season was of rather unusual proportions as to programme, and if the auditorium, before the performance came to a close, grew somewhat too warm for comfort, the two results are to be ascribed to no dispiriting causes.

The entertainment, in the first place, overstepped its intended limits through the public's determination to hear Wagner's "Waldweben" twice, and to have M. de Pachmann play three times instead of suffering him to retire after the Mozart concerto set down for him on the housebill.

As to the heat, it was the natural consequence of the crowded condition of Chickering Hall, a state of affairs made clear to the first callers at the box office by a placard proclaiming that every seat had been sold. The audience, in fact, occupied not only the seats, but every inch of standing room.

The programme opened with Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture, which was followed by Mozart's concerto for piano and orchestra, in D minor; by the Waldweben," from "Siegfried," arranged for performance in the concert room, and by Brahms's symphony No. 2, in D minor.

None of these works were unfamiliar to local music lovers—the pianoforte concerto, however, not having been heard of late, at any rate—but at least two of them, the concerto and "Waldweben," took on all the charm of novelty through what may be fairly termed an ideal interpretation.

The question as to the possibility of a revival of interest in Mozart's music would be disposed of with brief discussion if such renderings of his compositions as the one furnished last night by both soloist and orchestra could be enjoyed.

In the elegant simplicity of Mr. de Pachmann's reading, in the crystalline purity and perfect equality of the tones produced, and in the extreme delicacy of the pianist's minute execution, the archaism of the work was never once thought of, and the spectator dwelt upon the pellucid loveliness of the writing and upon the beauty of its exposition with the same fascination that besets a connaisseur gazing upon some ancient miniature or gem.

The applause that followed this number was attended, as usual, by unending recalls, and Mr. de Pachmann was not allowed to depart until he had added two more pieces to his task: Mendelssohn's "Rondo Capriccioso," in which the fairy lightness of the virtuoso's execution again had felicitous expression, and Henselt's "Si oiseau j'etais."

Quite as potent in its influence was the band's rendering of "Waldweber." Hitherto, at the Metropolitan nor in the concert room, has this exquisite tone poem had as precise, as finished, and withal as eloquent a presentation.

Faultless as a specimen of mechanical perfection, the absolute accuracy of the performance in no way impaired its flexibility, and to those, at least, that knew the composer's theme, it is safe to affirm that in the variety of the orcoestra's dainty tone-color and the exquisite gradations of light to shade, the lack of scenic effect, and of the human voice was never missed. When the audience recalled Mr. Nikisch at the end of the number, the conductor rightly judged that its device was to hear the music anew, and it was at once repeated.

The concert reached a conclusion with Brahms' Symphony No. 2, the most melodious of the master's larger achievements. Late as it was, the masterly interpretation of the work compelled attention and admiration. The pretty third movement, opening with the quintet of oboes, clarionets, and bassoons, to a pizzicato accompaniment of the 'cellos, producing the wonted impression of delight by its playful grace and the finish of its rendering. Mr. Nikisch was enteusiastically recalled when the symphony was ended.

The season that culminated in last evening's concert having turned out, artistically and financially, the most successful the orchestra has had in New York, announcement was made in yesterday's programme that next fall and winter six entertainments instead of four will be given.

They will be held at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evenings, Nov. 3 and Dec. 8, 1891, and Jan. 12, Feb. 9, March 16, and April 26, 1892.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, FEBRUARY 26, 1891.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Successful Symphony Concert, With De Pachmann as Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a more than usually successful concert at the Academy of Music last evening. It opened with a very effective performance of Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, which was as fine an example of ensemble playing as the orchestra has ever given in Philadelphia. Both here and in the symphony Mr. Nikisch conducted with a spirit and power, and the musicians played with a life and fervor that they had not exhibited before this season. The symphony, Raff's lovely "Im Walde," was exquisitely played, with true poetic appreciation and great refinement and at the same time with warmth of color and richness of effect. Mr. Nikisch has not often given us work more satisfying.

The delicate execution of the orchestra was also exhibited in the scherzo from the Tschaikowsky symphony and in the Chopin F minor concerto, in which De Pachmann was the soloist. The characteristics of this unusual pianist, his minute style and great technical dexterity, are already known. He played the concerto much as he played other Chopin music last season, with an insistance upon his own personality that is not entirely agreeable and with not the deepest intellectual effect, but with a peculiar art that is not to be gainsaid. He was warmly applauded and responded with one of the "novelettes" of Schumann.

The audience was very large and the only fault to be found with the concert was that it began and ended twenty minutes after time.

The Times

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1891.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Valdimar De Pachmann.

The excellent programme given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at the Academy of Music, drew one of the largest audiences of the season. Many people were unable to obtain seats.

The overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," by Berlioz, was finely played. The beauties of the work would naturally call forth what Berlioz considered the "exaggerated applause," that was given it on the first presentation of the opera in Paris in 1838. Benvenuto Cellini's bold and daring spirit is shown in the very opening, and the feeling associated with this, crops out several times under a new guise, this motive and the Cardinal's air being repeated several times, the Cardinal's motive holding its own to the last. The coloring of the orchestra, as handled by the composer of this work, is always refreshing, and his works should more often have a place on our concert programmes.

Valdimar de Pachmann played the concerto in F miner, op. 21, by Chopin. His reputation as a player of Chopin's works was already established before the concert of last evening, but if there were any in the audience on this occasion who doubted his powers as a pianist, they must have been fully satisfied before he was half through with this concerto that his reputation was well earned. The Maestoso was enjoyable, but the Larghetto that follows was even more so. The delicate passages that enshroud the beautiful melodies of the second movement seemed to float from the piano. Such a poetic player one seldom hears. The Allegro Vivace was clean-cut and showed how completely under control were the difficulties of the movement. After the last movement the player was twice recalled, the second time responding with a beautiful selection for a piano alone.

Two movements of Ischaikowsky's Symphony, No. 4, in F. Minor, were charmingly played, the Scherzo being perhaps, the more enjoyable. The predominating pizzicato effects of the strings give a freshness to this movement seldom heard. Raff's beautiful Symphony, No. 3, "I'm Walde" closed the programme. This is conceded to be one of the best works of this Swiss-German composer. The first part "In the Daytime" (Allegro) beautifully portrays the feelings of a lover of nature in the forest. The second part "Twilight," opening with its mysterious harmonies for the strings, contains some curious effects. The muted strings toward the close being one of the most charming bits of musical realism of which one could scarcely conceive. The Scherzo immediately following was thoroughly enjoyable, and the last part, "Night in the Forest," showed the full power and beauty of the orchestra.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Great House at the Academy of Music Last Night.

Despite the driving rain-storm, the Academy of Music was crowded last night as it rarely is, except on very great occasions, the attraction being the fourth in Mr. Nikisch's current season of symphony concerts. All the seats in the auditorium and most of the room which the aisles afford were occupied with more or less damp but agreeably expectant people, and when the dapper little conductor, looking as usual like a work of art, stepped upon the stage twenty minutes late, but apparently quite dry, he faced a larger audience than he had ever before contronted in Philadelphia. It is remarkable, or it would be remarkable if they were less meritorious, or if less efficient missionary work had preceded them, how popular these Boston Symphony Concerts have become in this city. Each time the attendance is larger than the last. The third concert drew a great house, and it was supposed that the debut of Mrs. Nikisch was accountable for the increase. Vladimir de Pachmann, a great artist, but not well enough known here to have much drawing power, and who played here before to very poor "business," was the soloist last night, and the audience was the largest yet. The secret of it, of course, is that the public has grown to appreciate the extraordinary excellence of Mr. Nikisch's orchestra, and the further fact that it comes here in its entirety. There is no thinning out to save expense. The orchestra goes on the road in its full force of eighty-three members, and that is a policy of liberality which people like. Last night's programme, though less interesting than that of the concert before, which was one of ideal attractiveness, was as rendered decidedly enjoyable. The symphony was Raff's "In the Woods," which is not much more than programme music of a superior sort—the same sort as Beethoven's Sixth Symphony—and which has the fault, usual with Raff's compositions, of diffuseness. But it has many beauties, too, and when played as it was last night, with such charm of execution and such sympathetic responsiveness, it can always be heard with pleasure. Another notable feature was the playing of the andantino and scherzo from Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor. This is music of an intensely modern kind, the slow movement infused with the spirit of Slavonic melancholy and the scherzo animated by a gayety which yet seems haunted with foreboding. It was brilliantly rendered and evidently pleased the audience greatly. Mr. De Pachmann, the soloist, was heard in Chopin's little-known Concerto in F minor, a somewhat thin and uninteresting work, of which he gave a most brilliant and beautiful interpretation. De Pachmann's pianoforte playing is quite unique. No one possesses the secret of the pearly legato which he produces or of that wonderful pianissimo which seems to be silence made audible. He displayed some of his habitual eccentricity, but the audience was quite ready to overlook it in view of the pleasure which he furnished—a pleasure which was very great.

[102]

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1891.

Wladimir de Pachmann Plays with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth and last of the four concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra give here this season took place in Chickering Hall last evening in the presence of an audience that filled the house to the doors, and was marked by even more than the customary applause with which the work of Herr Nikisch and his men is always welcomed. It is pleasant to record that the financial as well as the artistic success of these concerts has been such as to warrant a series of six next winter.

Last night's concert again demonstrated very plainly that in some respects the Boston Orchestra has attained a perfection beyond that of our best organizations. Nothing more beautifully finished than the playing of the Brahms D minor symphony, or of the "Siegfried"-"Waldweben" music has not been heard here.

Upon the other hand, the programme as a whole was inferior in composition to those of our local conductors. It was rather an aggravation than otherwise to find half the evening devoted to music so utterly tedious and archaic as Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture and Mozart's D minor concerto, both of which works were played so admirably as to make one wish with heart and soul that something else had been given in their place. To give such music in the few concerts allotted to New York by Herr Nikisch is a deplorable waste of splendid material.

The selection of the Mozart concerto was all the more surprising, considering that the soloist was Herr Pachmann, the Chopin player par excellence, who made all that could be made of the concerto, but who ought to have been heard with this orchestra in one of Chopin's concertos, if in anything. After the stilted cadenzas of Mozart, improved upon by Hummel, the audience found so much food for real enthusiasm in the hackneyed but lovely Mendelssohn "Rondo Capriccioso," which Herr Pachmann played in response to prolonged demands for more, that the pianist had to sit down again and play the Henselt study, "Si oiseau j'etais," which was beautifully given, notwithstanding an awkward lapse of memory, which no expertness of modulation could cover up.

The "Waldweben" music from "Siegfried" gave New York a taste of what this orchestra can do with this most exacting of Wagner's pages. As most of this forest music, depicting the rustle of the leaves and the song of the birds, used as a background for some of the most splendid of the "Siegfried" themes, is written for the strings, in which department this orchestra is pre-eminent, it is not surprising that the whole number, lasting more than twenty minutes, had to be repeated.

Brahms' interesting if not very deep D minor symphony was also splendidly played, the quaint scherzo finding especial favor with the audience. At the close of the concert Herr Nikisch was recalled with a heartiness which plainly attested the firm place he has won with the best class of New York's concert goers.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1891.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Appreciation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been steadily growing in New-York for five years, seems to be developing into a veritable cult. The last concert of the organization at Chickering Hall was an extraordinary affair, so far as the recognition of the work done by Mr. Nikisch and his men was concerned, but a still more extraordinary and, indeed, incomprehensible affair so far as the enjoyment of the clownish antics of M. de Pachmann was concerned. That the playing of the superb band under its inspiring leader should be appreciated at its full value by a New-York audience is not at all to be wondered at; New-Yorkers know good music when they hear it, because they have been trained in appreciation by Mr. Thomas and his confreres, and they cherish no petty prejudices against visitors who reach their ideals of excellence in this department. They have a good deal of amiability, too, and love relaxation, which, perhaps, goes as far as anything can to explain the circumstance that M. de Pachmann excites only amused laughter and a new round of applause when he throws kisses to the pianoforte on which he has played, and by a series of eloquent gestures informs the audience that to the instrument and not to himself is due the credit for his brilliant performances. It is all affectation and unworthy of an artist, of course, but so long as the public can be humbugged into the belief that it is but the eccentricity of genius that species of charlatanry will be practised by M. de Pachmann, and applause will follow it for no other purpose than to see what he will do next. The pity of it is that it spoils the enjoyment of the judicious when he plays so beautifully as he did last night in Mozart's D minor concerto, and so dazzlingly as he did in Mendelssohn's "Rondo Capriccioso" and an Etude by Chopin, with which he varied his circus performance after the concerto. And it robs Mr. Nikisch's concert of the dignity which its lofty artistic merit invested it with. The orchestra's numbers last night were Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture, the "Waldweben," from Wagner's "Siegfried" (read in a style that sounds rather tame in New-York), and Brahms's D minor symphony.

Next season the orchestra will give six concerts, the increased number being due to the fact that it will take the place in Brooklyn's musical life vacated by the Philharmonic Society. Seats for the series may be reserved on and after to-day at Schuberth's music store in Union Square.

The New-York Times.

NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEB. 25, 1891.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The fourth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall last evening was undoubtedly a disappointment to the judicious in the audience, though it seemed to tickle the ears of those groundlings who go wherever the crowd goes, and are prepared to applaud anything new, from a Nibelung pianist to a balloon ascension. Two elements conspired to make last night's concert disappointing. One of these was the presence as soloist of Vladimir de Pachmann, the piano player, and the other was the misconception by the conductor of one of Wagner's loveliest creations. That Mr. Nikisch should descend from the lofty level of his artistic dignity to lend his countenance to the acrobatic humbuggery of Pachmann was as little to be expected as that he should have missed the spirit of the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried." Yet he did both these things. Perhaps under the combination of circumstances well known to the elect it was impossible for him to escape Pachmann, but he ought to know his Wagner better.

The medium which Pachmann selected for a further exhibition of his stupendous vanity and lack of real artistic feeling was Mozart's beautiful piano concerto in D minor. That Pachmann remodeled its melodic ideas to suit his own purposes goes without saying. It is pretty generally understood now that he does this with all music that falls under his ruthless hands. Mozart's beautiful cantilena was transformed by him into declamatory recitative, and the smooth legato with which the glorious boy was in the habit of playing his own running passages was broken and marred by the introduction of unjustifiable sforzandi and sudden diminuendi, wholly foreign to a true Mozartian style.

Every student of musical history knows that Mozart followed out the idea of Emmanuel Bach that the highest achievement on the piano was the production of a lovely cantabile, and that in aiming at this effect he clung tenaciously to a true piano style. But Pachmann phrased the concerto in a spasmodic, rhapsodical style which would have made the composer stand aghast. And to all this was added an endless variety of those simian antics with which this pretentious pianist seeks to divert the attention of an audience from the music to himself. How well he succeeded in his anti-musical efforts may be judged from the fact that he received a double encore. The first recall induced him to play Mendelssohn's "Rondo Capriccioso," in which he continued his distribution of explosives; and on a second recall he played Henselt's "Si oiseau j'etais," which it would do him some good to hear gush and sparkle from the magic fingers of Moritz Rosenthal.

Mr. Nikisch's reading of the "Waldweben" suffered from a lack of vitality, and this arose from a surprisingly slow tempo which militated against the value of the accentuation. The shading of the performance was good, but the leisurely pace widened the intervals between the nuances and disrobed the entire composition of its normal vesture of sylvan airiness and youthful buoyancy. Moreover, the voices of the clarinet and oboe, which have so much that is eloquently suggestive to say in this scene, were deficient in sweetness and refinement. We have often praised the Boston orchestra at the expense of local organizations, but none of our resident conductors would have failed to give a more notable rendering of this number.

The other two compositions on the programme were Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture, with which it began, and Brahms's second symphony, with which it closed. It was a genuine pleasure to hear once again the strong, sonorous, dramatic writing of the old martinet of the Conservatoire, and in this number the gentlemen of Boston fully sustained their high and well-merited reputation. Their performance of it was an epitome of all that is admirable in ensemble playing, and Mr. Nikisch's reading was masterly. Similar praise is due the treatment of the Brahms symphony, but it must be confessed that for the hearer to put himself thoroughly en rapport with this work is an arduous task. It does not woo the auditor to self-forgetfulness, and it never warms the fibres of one's heart as the same composer's C minor symphony and B flat piano concerto do. The announcement was published last night that the Boston Symphony Orchestra would give six concerts here next season. Of a truth, this town is in a way to be overwhelmed with orchestral riches next season.

The Sun.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1891.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. de Pachman.

If the fourth and last of the concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall this season was of rather unusual proportions as to programme, and if the auditorium, before the performance came to a close, grew somewhat too warm for comfort, the two results are to be ascribed to no dispiriting causes.

The entertainment, in the first place, overstepped its intended limits through the public's determination to hear Wagner's "Waldweben" twice, and to have M. de Pachmann play three times instead of suffering him to retire after the Mozart concerto set down for him on the housebill.

As to the heat, it was the natural consequence of the crowded condition of Chickering Hall, a state of affairs made clear to the first callers at the box office by a placard proclaiming that every seat had been sold. The audience, in fact, occupied not only the seats, but every inch of standing room.

The programme opened with Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture, which was followed by Mozart's concerto for piano and orchestra, in D minor; by the Waldweben," from "Siegfried," arranged for performance in the concert room, and by Brahms's symphony No. 2, in D minor.

None of these works were unfamiliar to local music lovers—the pianoforte concerto, however, not having been heard of late, at any rate—but at least two of them, the concerto and "Waldweben," took on all the charm of novelty through what may be fairly termed an ideal interpretation.

The question as to the possibility of a revival of interest in Mozart's music would be disposed of with brief discussion if such renderings of his compositions as the one furnished last night by both soloist and orchestra could be enjoyed.

In the elegant simplicity of Mr. de Pachmann's reading, in the crystalline purity and perfect equality of the tones produced, and in the extreme delicacy of the pianist's minute execution, the archaism of the work was never once thought of, and the spectator dwelt upon the pellucid loveliness of the writing and upon the beauty of its exposition with the same fascination that besets a connaisseur gazing upon some ancient miniature or gem.

The applause that followed this number was attended, as usual, by unending recalls, and Mr. de Pachmann was not allowed to depart until he had added two more pieces to his task: Mendelssohn's "Rondo Capriccioso," in which the fairy lightness of the virtuoso's execution again had felicitous expression, and Henselt's "Si oiseau j'etais."

Quite as potent in its influence was the band's rendering of "Waldweber." Hitherto, at the Metropolitan nor in the concert room, has this exquisite tone poem had as precise, as finished, and withal as eloquent a presentation.

Faultless as a specimen of mechanical perfection, the absolute accuracy of the performance in no way impaired its flexibility, and to those, at least, that knew the composer's theme, it is safe to affirm that in the variety of the orcestra's dainty tone-color and the exquisite gradations of light to shade, the lack of scenic effect, and of the human voice was never missed. When the audience recalled Mr. Nikisch at the end of the number, the conductor rightly judged that its device was to hear the music anew, and it was at once repeated.

The concert reached a conclusion with Brahms' Symphony No. 2, the most melodious of the master's larger achievements. Late as it was, the masterly interpretation of the work compelled attention and admiration. The pretty third movement, opening with the quintet of oboes, clarionets, and bassoons, to a pizzicato accompaniment of the 'cellos, producing the wonted impression of delight by its playful grace and the finish of its rendering. Mr. Nikisch was enthusiastically recalled when the symphony was ended.

The season that culminated in last evening's concert having turned out, artistically and financially, the most successful the orchestra has had in New York, announcement was made in yesterday's programme that next fall and winter six entertainments instead of four will be given.

They will be held at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evenings, Nov. 3 and Dec. 8, 1891, and Jan. 12, Feb. 9, March 15, and April 26, 1892.

The Press

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1891.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Valdimar De Pachmann.

The excellent programme given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at the Academy of Music, drew one of the largest audiences of the season. Many people were unable to obtain seats.

The overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," by Berlioz, was finely played. The beauties of the work would naturally call forth what Berlioz considered the "exaggerated applause," that was given it on the first presentation of the opera in Paris in 1836. Benvenuto Cellini's bold and daring spirit is shown in the very opening, and the feeling associated with this, drops out several times under a new guise, this motive and the Cardinal's air being repeated several times, the Cardinal's motive holding its own to the last. The coloring of the orchestra, as handled by the composer of this work, is always refreshing, and his works should more often have a place on our concert programmes.

Valdimar de Pachmann played the concerto in F minor, op. 21, by Chopin. His reputation as a player of Chopin's works was already established before the concert or last evening, but if there were any in the audience on this occasion who doubted his powers as a pianist, they must have been fully satisfied before he was half through with this concerto that his reputation was well earned. The Maestoso was enjoyable, but the Larghetto that follows was even more so. The delicate passages that enshroud the beautiful melodies of the second movement seemed to float from the piano. Such a poetic player one seldom hears. The Allegro Vivace was clean-cut and showed how completely under control were the difficulties of the movement. After the last movement the player was twice recalled, the second time responding with a beautiful selection for a piano alone.

Two movements of Ischaikowsky's Symphony, No. 4, in F. Minor, were charmingly played, the Scherzo being perhaps, the more enjoyable. The predominating pizzicato effects of the strings give a freshness to this movement seldom heard. Raff's beautiful Symphony, No. 3, "I'm Walde" closed the programme. This is conceded to be one of the best works of this Swiss-German composer. The first part "In the Daytime" (Allegro) beautifully portrays the feelings of a lover of nature in the forest. The second part "Twilight," opening with its mysterious harmonies for the strings, contains some curious effects. The muted strings toward the close being one of the most charming bits of musical realism of which one could scarcely conceive. The Scherzo immediately following was thoroughly enjoyable, and the last part, "Night in the Forest," showed the full power and beauty of the orchestra.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Great House at the Academy of Music Last Night.

Despite the driving rain-storm, the Academy of Music was crowded last night as it rarely is, except on very great occasions, the attraction being the fourth in Mr. Nikisch's current season of symphony concerts. All the seats in the auditorium and most of the room which the aisles afford were occupied with more or less damp but agreeably expectant people, and when the dapper little conductor, looking as usual like a work of art, stepped upon the stage twenty minutes late, but apparently quite dry, he faced a larger audience than he had ever before contronted in Philadelphia. It is remarkable, or it would be remarkable if they were less meritorious, or if less efficient missionary work had preceded them, how popular these Boston Symphony Concerts have become in this city. Each time the attendance is larger than the last. The third concert drew a great house, and it was supposed that the debut of Mrs. Nikisch was accountable for the increase. Vladimir de Pachmann, a great artist, but not well enough known here to have much drawing power, and who played here before to very poor "business," was the soloist last night, and the audience was the largest yet. The secret of it, of course, is that the public has grown to appreciate the extraordinary excellence of Mr. Nikisch's orchestra, and the further fact that it comes here in its entirety. There is no thinning out to save expense. The orchestra goes on the road in its full force of eighty-three members, and that is a policy of liberality which people like. Last night's programme, though less interesting than that of the concert before, which was one of ideal attractiveness, was as rendered decidedly enjoyable. The symphony was Raff's "In the Woods," which is not much more than programme music of a superior sort—the same sort as Beethoven's Sixth Symphony—and which has the fault, usual with Raff's compositions, of diffuseness. But it has many beauties, too, and when played as it was last night, with such charm of execution and such sympathetic responsiveness, it can always be heard with pleasure. Another notable feature was the playing of the andantino and scherzo from Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor. This is music of an intensely modern kind, the slow movement infused with the spirit of Slavonic melancholy and the scherzo animated by a gayety which yet seems haunted with foreboding. It was brilliantly rendered and evidently pleased the audience greatly. Mr. De Pachmann, the soloist, was heard in Chopin's little-known Concerto in F minor, a somewhat thin and uninteresting work, of which he gave a most brilliant and beautiful interpretation. De Pachmann's pianoforte playing is quite unique. No one possesses the secret of the pearly legato which he produces or of that wonderful pianissimo which seems to be silence made audible. He displayed some of his habitual eccentricity, but the audience was quite ready to overlook it in view of the pleasure which he furnished—a pleasure which was very great.

Philadelphia Inquirer

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1891.

A PACHMANN NIGHT.

The Academy of Music Crowded at the Boston Symphony Concert.

It is probable that the audience at the Academy of Music last evening was greater than any which ever before gathered to hear a symphony concert in that building. It was a Pachmann night, and this may in some measure account for the extraordinary attendance.

Mr. Pachmann is a queer mixture of charlatan and artist. He is a magnificent performer, but his mannerisms—not to use a harsher word—are in exceeding bad taste, and it is to be regretted that his audiences are not dignified enough to pass them by unnoticed, in which case they might not be thrust upon them. He played the familiar Chopin concerto in F minor, a beautiful work, requiring great delicacy and precision to bring out its full merits. The pianist was fully competent. He has a marvelous technique, but plays with apparently no effort. His touch is delicate but every note is clear. It was a rare piece of work and was fully appreciated.

The orchestra played nothing novel but the numbers were excellent. Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," a beautiful prelude to an opera that was a failure at first, but which has risen in public estimation with every subsequent production. Raff's symphony, "Im Walde," is a favorite with every orchestral organization of any proportions and is deservedly popular for the wealth of musical beauty and wide scope of its themes. Tschaikowski's No. 4 Symphony in F minor is an interesting work full of unexpected musical conceits and vivacious throughout. The two numbers given last night were familiar and enjoyable. The concert was notable from the fact that there were but four numbers on the programme, but there was ample variety in the various movements of these numbers.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, FEBRUARY 26, 1891.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Successful Symphony Concert, With De Pachmann as Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a more than usually successful concert at the Academy of Music last evening. It opened with a very effective performance of Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, which was as fine an example of ensemble playing as the orchestra has ever given in Philadelphia. Both here and in the symphony Mr. Nikisch conducted with a spirit and power, and the musicians played with a life and fervor that they had not exhibited before this season. The symphony, Raff's lovely "Im Walde," was exquisitely played, with true poetic appreciation and great refinement and at the same time with warmth of color and richness of effect. Mr. Nikisch has not often given us work more satisfying.

The delicate execution of the orchestra was also exhibited in the scherzo from the Tschaikowsky symphony and in the Chopin F minor concerto, in which De Pachmann was the soloist. The characteristics of this unusual pianist, his minute style and great technical dexterity, are already known. He played the concerto much as he played other Chopin music last season, with an insistance upon his own personality that is not entirely agreeable and with not the deepest intellectual effect, but with a peculiar art that is not to be gainsaid. He was warmly applauded and responded with one of the "novelettes" of Schumann.

The audience was very large and the only fault to be found with the concert was that it began and ended twenty minutes after time.

[102]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 28, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

If the Symphony concerts maintain one feature of their present course they are likely to descend to the plane of "operatic festivals" and to imperil the sympathy and support of many persons who have expected programmes so well ordered that they would lose no part of them because of unreasonable length or ill-advised encores. Under the first and second conductors of the orchestra encores were prohibited, the only concession which we recall being after the first quite surprising performance by Mr. Gericke's violinists of the now famous largo from Handel's "Xerxes." The present season finds that wise prohibition practically broken down, there having been already three deviations from it, for two of which there was no proper justification. Mr. Reichmann was encored after singing inexcusably ill both in intonation and taste, on account of some German faddism; Mrs. Nikisch was led to give an encore, from reasons which must have been chiefly personal; and at the last concert Mr. De Pachmann, who appears at times almost as much of an eccentricity as a musician, was encouraged to add three morceaux in answer to as many recalls after his performance of the Chopin F minor concerto. It is time that this relaxation of a good rule should be considered seriously; the concerts are likely to lose their own dignity and the respect of the public; and many patrons who cannot remain until ten o'clock are being deprived of the right for which they have paid of hearing the last number or the last movement of the programme. If previsions may be trusted, there will be in New York next season at least two orchestras, full in numbers, and composed of fine material, one at least of which will be directed by an experienced and eminent foreign conductor. The Boston orchestra has unquestionably lost caste a little with the more exacting critics of New York within two years; and if it is to maintain its prestige and power there and in the other cities where the new bands will surely compete with it, a change for the better must be wrought in some parts of its playing, in its programmes and in its system. But, to speak in a happier and less strict vein, if ever the old principle might be waived, it was at this concert, when to an expected sensuous pleasure was added an unanticipated æsthetic satisfaction. Mr. De Pachmann's playing was, as has been implied, the sensation, but no less the delight, of the evening. No pianist since Gottschalk has brought such constant and consummate beauty of tone from the piano as he; and no one since Thalberg has surpassed all difficulties and solved all perplexities of the keyboard with such perfect lightness, such airy ease and such apparent indifference; and of both those earlier players it must be remembered that they used chiefly their own music, which was adapted exactly to their personal taste, feeling and technique. Mr. De Pachmann came before his audience with something in his manner which seemed to say, "Now prepare yourselves for that you wot not of," and after a little world of salutations and graces addressed himself to his work. And how amazingly he did it! With the full orchestra to accompany him and the vast hall stretching beyond him, not a note was lost of the most delicate ornamentation, not a rubato phrase which did not drop its rhythmic accent just upon the beat, not a robuster bar which had not steady strength. There was not a vagary in theme or expression, no fantasy substituted for feeling, no dilettanteism or virtuosity in place of art, no superficiality instead of insight, no personal intrusion before the author and his music. It was a true triumph, won splendidly in spite of petty peculiarities of demeanor and against the prejudice which had perhaps accounted him as a player to please and displease by turns and especially to win over sentimental women in some little room where his affectation—or his ingenuousness?—and his running commentaries and confidences might most impress. His recall was inevitable and irresistible, and the band upon the stage were no less surprised and charmed than the audience. Returning, he played Liszt's "Rigoletto" fantasia, perhaps to prove that Chopin was not his only author, and on two other recalls he gave a Chopin waltz and a Moscheles study—all exquisitely. The listeners appeared insatiable and he seemed no less delighted to play again and again; but at last he pulled out his watch and held it up as a significant hint that the hour was late and there was yet other music to be heard. The concert began with Tschaikowsky's deeply poetical and dramatic "Romeo and Juliet" fantasia, which it was a pity so many of the audience should have lost by tardiness. If a really short overture could always have the first place, it would be an advantage. The concert ended at an unusually late hour with Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding." This was both well directed and well played throughout, and the concerto was beautifully followed and sustained.

There will be no concert this week, and the next succeeding programme stands thus: the prelude to "Lohengrin"; a symphony, new here, by August Klughardt; two movements from Reinecke's violoncello concerto, also new, to be played by Mr. Schulz; and the overture to "Egmont."

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 22, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY.

Words are inadequate to describe the proceedings that attended the appearance of Vladimir De Pachmann, at the Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon. To say that he captured audience, conductor and orchestra, is to say very little. De Pachmann was the concert, and the concert was De Pachmann At three o'clock he appeared on the platform, the personification of radiant good-nature, and was welcomed with a burst of applause that evidently thrilled every nerve in his excitable body. His first act, after acknowledging this reception, was to grasp Mr. Nikisch by the hand in a manner demonstrating the most affectionate regard. His next was to flick the dust from the piano keys with his cambric handkerchief, accompanying this act with a wave of both hands, and a glance at the audience, which created a ripple of laughter throughout the hall, and—yes, it is true, he was the first soloist who has caused a smile to illuminate the face of the serious, self-contained condu tor of the Symphony concerts.

Having at last settled himself, Mr. De Pachmann divided his attentions between the music of Chopin's F minor concerto, that lay on the rack before him, and the gentleman who was to turn the leaves. His evident intention to play from notes was ominously suggestive. What did it signify? Unfamiliarity with the work and a lame performance in consequence? At least it aroused the hope that he would be for once obliged to pay strict attention to his work in hand, and to forego the pleasure of interpolating any of his bewitching "asides" during the course of the concerto. The outcome of it all was this: the concerto was played in the most exquisite style imaginable. It is true that he occasionally dallied affectedly with the slow movement; and his touch also was at times too light for Music Hall; but these were the only objections that could be raised. The three movements were taken in the most perfect tempo, and the themes were simply. but yet expressively sung, while the bravura passages were thrown off with a touch crystalline in quality, and with a freedom that betrayed absolute ignorance of all difficulties. The best of it was the entire absence of any "pulling and hauling" with the orchestra, and of any silly indulging in unnecessary rubatos. The rhythms were delightfully maintained, and no one ever came in more exactly "pat" on the beat through those long piano passages than did he. The unexpected generally happens. Mr. De Pachmann has not done himself much credit at his recent recitals; yet this performance was the finest he has given of any of the large works of Chopin. And, did the eccentric pianist forego his "asides?" Not in the least. When he was not too busy with his work he was either smiling at the audience, whispering to his assistant, or indicating the tempo to the conductor.

At the close of the concerto, he was greeted with a storm of applause. Upon a second recall, he danced gayly toward the piano, and seating himself, played Schumann's novellette in E major with great brilliancy. After a modest delay in the ante-room, the continued applause brought him once more on the platform; and to the astonishment of everybody, in lawless defiance of the "no encore" rule, he yet again took his seat, and gave his indescribable performance of Henselt's "If I Were a Bird." By this time anarchy reigned in audience, and orchestra as well. Mr. Nikisch leaned back in his chair evidently resigned to anythingelse that might happen. After a longer interval, the incorrigible pianist again entered, advanced to the conductor's stand, mounted it, and responded to the unabated applause, with a magnificent bow, and a shake of the head. On his way off the stage, he paused to greet one of the first violinists, who apparently suggested that he should play once more. A moment's hesitation, a deprecatory shrug, and our own De Pachmann hastily seated himself for the third time, and gave Chopin's waltz in A flat, opus 42, in a manner, which, for beauty of tone, brilliancy, and rapidity of tempo, was wholly extraordinary. By this time, the common sense of the audience began to assert itself, and the topical song-like recalls came to an end.

The concert commenced with Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet." This splendid work, which was performed last year, is perhaps the finest from the pen of its composer that has been heard in Boston. Its themes are strong and highly expressive, their treatment being original to a degree, while the orchestration is of the richest description, drawing upon nearly all the resources of the full modern orchestra. The performance was one of great dramatic intensity, proving Mr. Nikisch's thorough mastery of the score.

The symphony was Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," a work that has now become well-known here. Its cheerful, spontaneous melodiousness, attractive and picturesque orchestration, its general air of charming simplicity, which nevertheless conceals the art of a master, all combine to prevent its growing wearisome through successive hearings. Mr. Nikisch's reading was perfectly in accord with its spirit, and the playing of the orchestra was equally sympathetic.

T. P. CURRIER.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1891

The first number of the program of last Saturday's Symphony concert was the Tschaikowsky "Overture-Fantasie, Romeo and Juliet," which, given last season under the direction of Mr. Nikisch, was the cause of much shedding of ink. The subject has been for years a favorite with musicians, as the catalogues show, and the lists are incomplete. Operas, with librettos treating of the sad story of the lovers of Verona, have been written by Benda, Schwanberg, Marescalschi, von Rumling, Farinelli, Dalayrac, Steibelt, Zingarelli, Guglielmi, Vaccai, Bellini, Marchetti, Gounod, and the Marquis d'Ivry. Then there is the dramatic symphony of Berlioz, and overtures by Ilinski, Svendsen, Raff and Macfarren. As the young actor wishes to disclose to the world his conception of Hamlet, so the young musician dreams of setting to music the parting embraces upon the balcony, and kisses which whetted the envy of Romeo's rival, Death. And tradition, which rules in all things, decreed, until lately, that the words "Romeo and Juliet" should, so far as music is concerned, be synonymous with a long duet of saccharine sweetness. No wonder, then, that this overture of Tschaikowsky is a stumbling block to many, who forget that quarrels are as important an element of Shakespere's tragedy as the interchange of lovers' thoughts. Moreover, it is in no sense of the word, program music. Its motives are not labelled by the composer, and, if one is called the strife-motive, another the Juliet-theme, it is without the authority of Tschaikowsky. He simply gives his piece a name, the hearer can find what he pleases. When it was played last season it was spoken of at length in the HOME JOURNAL, and a second hearing only confirms the impression then formed. It is, indeed, a remarkable work in conception and treatment; strong in rhythm and dramatic contrasts; and the love motive, if you choose to so name it, is of superb breadth and intense passion. It is to be wished that the other overtures of the composer might be given: "Francesca da Rimini," "Manfred," Hamlet," and "The Tempest."

* * * * *

The other orchestral number was Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony, a pleasing work, ingeniously written, with all the elements of popularity. The Goldmark of this symphony is not the composer of the "Sakuntala" of "The Queen of Sheba"; only in the fourth variation of the first movement are we conscious of his peculiar "orientalism" half Hebraic, half Hungarian. The symphony, as well as the "Romeo and Juliet" overture, was exceedingly well played and keenly relished by the great audience.

* * * * *

But it was de Pachmann's evening. It seemed as though the audience was there simply for him; that the orchestra had been drilled in years past that it might now accompany him; that the conductor had been brought all the way from a German town that he might sit upon the stage and hear de Pachmann play. For such is the individuality of this little man that he monopolized the attention, and the staid concert goer who selects his symphony seat in the same spirit as he would choose a pew in a church actually forgot that he was at a symphony concert, and he applauded until he grew unpleasantly red in the face. This applause, which was rather wild enthusiasm, was genuine; that is to say, it was not premeditated, it did not serve as a forced expression of personal approbation of the character of the performer, it was no public recognition of charming social qualities of the pianist—it was given because the hearer could not restrain himself. He liked the performance, and he wanted to hear that man again. And he heard him four times in all.

* * * * *

Mr. de Pachmann first played the concerto of Chopin in F minor. It is impossible to describe in words his playing to one who was not present. Suffice it to say that it was wonderful in every respect. The pianoforte was treated kindly as an instrument—or rather as a human being. He did not attack it with a frown, compressed lips and strained muscles; he did not smite it. He sat down by it and coaxed it and listened to its song. And the hearer, even he who sat at a great distance, heard the song and rejoiced. Could anything be more musical and poetical than his performance of the adagio? Equally remarkable was the brilliancy of the rondo.

* * * * *

The concerto was followed by the familiar "Rigoletto" fantasy. There was no lack of strength where strength was required, and de Pachmann's bravura was dazzling. Then came a Chopin waltz in F, and after that a study by Moscheles. And then de Pachmann consulted his watch, shook his head and shrugged his shoulders, and left the stage. The symphony of Goldmark was played, but the hearer was still listening to de Pachmann, and the words of Mercury were harsh after the songs of Apollo.

* * * * *

It is not to be denied that Mr. de Pachmann's personal behavior was not free from eccentricities. He was, to say the least, exuberant in his recognition of applause. During the orchestral interludes he chatted affably upon topics of the day with the gentleman who turned the leaves of the pianoforte copy, He shook hands with the director, and, in fact with every one within his reach, and only the remote position of the drummer saved him from an embrace. But are these freaks of his, affectations? Would not de Pachmann be affected, were he to act with the decorum of inferior performers? Were he to act as other men, he would not be de Pachmann. We must take him as he is, and we should be thankful that he exists, for such geniuses are rare. He, as well as Scharwenka, has taught us that even in a hall as large as Music Hall pounding is not necessary to the transmission of sound. He has taught us that the pianoforte, even with an orchestra, can be a musical instrument. He has shown us that there is another and more musical school of pianoforte playing than that in which such human pile-drivers as D'Albert et al sit in the chairs of instruction. And we can forgive his harmless personal eccentricities. Besides he is not of our nation, and he has probably not been taught that the exhibition of emotions is a thing to be ashamed of, and that feelings of any nature are to be sternly repressed.

PHILIP HALE.

WASHINGTON, FEBRUARY 27, 1891.

DE PACHMANN A GENIUS

The Phenomenal Little Pianist Makes His Salaams to Washington.

TOUCH OF MARVELOUS DELICACY

Brilliant Audience of Music-lovers at the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert—A Great Programme by the Greatest of Bands—De Pachmann's Mannerisms.

Another immense audience defied Gen. Greely, the Weather Bureau, and the weather, and deified De Pachmann, Nikisch, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the occasion of the fourth concert of that extravagantly worshipped organization at Lincoln Music Hall last evening. The weather, indeed, was not a factor in the case at all, as every seat in the house had been engaged before any one, presumably, could know what particular degree of vileness the weather would attain.

The audience was of the usual distinction characteristic of the Symphony concerts, and the Presidential and Cabinet families and a good working, or at least listening, majority of the people most prominent in Capitoline society were present in the boxes, chairs, and circles.

Every programme of the Symphony players, by some subtle sorcery, seems a little better than the last. Certainly last night's was no exception. The Goldmark overture, "Prometheus," a work of oriental vividness of coloring and boldly contrasted themes and movements, is one wherein the composer of the "Queen of Sheba" has valiantly dared comparisons with Liszt and even Beethoven himself, and emerged very creditably from the ordeal.

A motive of pastoral and idyllic simplicity and sweetness alternates with passages full of dramatic energy, in strophe and antistrophe of suffering and passion, till the fine and eloquent finale. Not a note or shade of the thought and sentiment of the author throughout this noble ensample of the modern school but found from Mr. Nikisch's band a noble and worthy interpretation.

The eagerly anticipated event of the evening was the appearance of Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann, the piano virtuoso, whose fame has so favorably preceded him. There need be no hesitation in saying that in every particular Mr. de Pachmann exceeded the wildest expectations. In the first place he is a great and inspired artist, with a command of the technique of his profession little short of marvellous, and a fire of inspiration in every movement of his work that entitles him to the rank of genius. The lovely Mozart Concerto for piano in D minor, with orchestral accompaniment, since it felt the touch of its immortal composer, probably never received a rendition of more poetic beauty. The allegro and rondo were charmingly done, but it was in the nearly superhuman melody of the romanza that the gifted little artist completely won the hearts of his audience. His touch is a miracle of delicacy, smoothness and finish. The trite comparison of a string of pearls would be sacrilege to describe the rounded perfection of his notes in even the most rapid passages, and the velvety smoothness of his tone over the sinewy and steel-like strength of his fingering must be heard to be understood.

The report of De Pachmann's engaging stage mannerisms has gone before him, but they, too, must be seen to be appreciated. For whole-souled and enthusiastic abandon in the enjoyment of his work he is a sort of jolly little Muscovite Blind Tom. He bends over the keyboard in a very ecstacy of caressing and cajolement. He waves his hand in wide and airy curves of benediction over the spirits of sound he has summoned from the dusky caverns of the instrument. He makes large and profound salaams, for so small a man, from the dizzy apex of the piano stool to the shade of Chopin and the manes of Mozart. After a brilliant run he looks around in smiling and confidential inquiry at the orchestra or audience as though to ask if there was any perceptible aggregation of flies on that particular bit of fioriture. Or, again, he leans back and gazes into the upper boxes with an air of good-natured defiance, as who should say, "Beat that if you can." Then he leans forward and daintily pecks a little quivering drop of melody from the flower-heart of silence, and jumps up and trots off in a comical little canter, composed mostly of still queerer little semi-circular bows, amid the wild applause of both house and musicians.

After the De Pachmann furore had a trifle subsided the orchestra was heard in the Tschaikowsky andantino and scherzo, from Symphony 4, in F minor, a work of brilliant and venturesome originality, as successfully consummated as daringly conceived. The latter number, scored nearly throughout in pizzicato effects, is a veritable musical tour de force of itself sufficient to have made the fame of its composer. At its conclusion the pianist was again heard in a suite of Chopin numbers, a berceuse, two etudes, and the valse, op. 42, given so delicately and deliciously that the funny little dog trot and circular salaams were called into requisition again and again, till the favorite little performer was compelled to mount Mr. Nikisch's throne of state, the better to acknowledge his ovation, and at last profane all the precedents of the Symphony cultus with an actual encore.

The concert closed with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, which, in response to a numerously-signed request, was substituted for the Eroica. It is only necessary to say of this immortal masterpiece that it was given with all the reverent and perfect art by virtue of which Mr. Nikisch and his noble orchestra have won the position they so proudly hold in the affections of the people. It was a fitting and impressive close to what, in reality the long and [illegible] the brightest of the Symphony [illegible]

[163]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 28, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

If the Symphony concerts maintain one feature of their present course they are likely to descend to the plane of "operatic festivals" and to imperil the sympathy and support of many persons who have expected programmes so well ordered that they would lose no part of them because of unreasonable length or ill-advised encores. Under the first and second conductors of the orchestra encores were prohibited, the only concession which we recall being after the first quite surprising performance by Mr. Gericke's violinists of the now famous largo from Handel's "Xerxes." The present season finds that wise prohibition practically broken down, there having been already three deviations from it, for two of which there was no proper justification. Mr. Reichmann was encored after singing inexcusably ill both in intonation and taste, on account of some German faddism; Mrs. Nikisch was led to give an encore, from reasons which must have been chiefly personal; and at the last concert Mr. De Pachmann, who appears at times almost as much of an eccentricity as a musician, was encouraged to add three morceaux in answer to as many recalls after his performance of the Chopin F minor concerto. It is time that this relaxation of a good rule should be considered seriously; the concerts are likely to lose their own dignity and the respect of the public; and many patrons who cannot remain until ten o'clock are being deprived of the right for which they have paid of hearing the last number or the last movement of the programme. If previsions may be trusted, there will be in New York next season at least two orchestras, full in numbers, and composed of fine material, one at least of which will be directed by an experienced and eminent foreign conductor. The Boston orchestra has unquestionably lost caste a little with the more exacting critics of New York within two years; and if it is to maintain its prestige and power there and in the other cities where the new bands will surely compete with it, a change for the better must be wrought in some parts of its playing, in its programmes and in its system. But, to speak in a happier and less strict vein, if ever the old principle might be waived, it was at this concert, when to an expected sensuous pleasure was added an unanticipated æsthetic satisfaction. Mr. De Pachmann's playing was, as has been implied, the sensation, but no less the delight, of the evening. No pianist since Gottschalk has brought such constant and consummate beauty of tone from the piano as he; and no one since Thalberg has surpassed all difficulties and solved all perplexities of the keyboard with such perfect lightness, such airy ease and such apparent indifference; and of both those earlier players it must be remembered that they used chiefly their own music, which was adapted exactly to their personal taste, feeling and technique. Mr. De Pachmann came before his audience with something in his manner which seemed to say, "Now prepare yourselves for that you wot not of," and after a little world of salutations and graces addressed himself to his work. And how amazingly he did it! With the full orchestra to accompany him and the vast hall stretching beyond him, not a note was lost of the most delicate ornamentation, not a rubato phrase which did not drop its rhythmic accent just upon the beat, not a robuster bar which had not steady strength. There was not a vagary in theme or expression, no fantasy substituted for feeling, no dilettanteism or virtuosity in place of art, no superficiality instead of insight, no personal intrusion before the author and his music. It was a true triumph, won splendidly in spite of petty peculiarities of demeanor and against the prejudice which had perhaps accounted him as a player to please and displease by turns and especially to win over sentimental women in some little room where his affectation—or his ingenuousness?—and his running commentaries and confidences might most impress. His recall was inevitable and irresistible, and the band upon the stage were no less surprised and charmed than the audience. Returning, he played Liszt's "Rigoletto" fantasia, perhaps to prove that Chopin was not his only author, and on two other recalls he gave a Chopin waltz and a Moscheles study—all exquisitely. The listeners appeared insatiable and he seemed no less delighted to play again and again; but at last he pulled out his watch and held it up as a significant hint that the hour was late and there was yet other music to be heard. The concert began with Tschaikowsky's deeply poetical and dramatic "Romeo and Juliet" fantasia, which it was a pity so many of the audience should have lost by tardiness. If a really short overture could always have the first place, it would be an advantage. The concert ended at an unusually late hour with Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding." This was both well directed and well played throughout, and the concerto was beautifully followed and sustained.

There will be no concert this week, and the next succeeding programme stands thus: the prelude to "Lohengrin"; a symphony, new here, by August Klughardt; two movements from Reinecke's violoncello concerto, also new, to be played by Mr. Schulz; and the overture to "Egmont."

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 22, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY.

Words are inadequate to describe the proceedings that attended the appearance of Vladimir De Pachmann, at the Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon. To say that he captured audience, conductor and orchestra, is to say very little. De Pachmann was the concert, and the concert was De Pachmann At three o'clock he appeared on the platform, the personification of radiant goodnature, and was welcomed with a burst of applause that evidently thrilled every nerve in his excitable body. His first act, after acknowledging this reception, was to grasp Mr. Nikisch by the hand in a manner demonstrating the most affectionate regard. His next was to flick the dust from the piano keys with his cambric handkerchief, accompanying this act with a wave of both hands, and a glance at the audience, which created a ripple of laughter throughout the hall, and—yes, it is true, he was the first soloist who has caused a smile to illuminate the face of the serious, self-contained condu tor of the Symphony concerts.

Having at last settled himself, Mr. De Pachmann divided his attentions between the music of Chopin's F minor concerto, that lay on the rack before him, and the gentleman who was to turn the leaves. His evident intention to play from notes was ominously suggestive. What did it signify? Unfamiliarity with the work and a lame performance in consequence? At least it aroused the hope that he would be for once obliged to pay strict attention to his work in hand, and to forego the pleasure of interpolating any of his bewitching "asides" during the course of the concerto. The outcome of it all was this: the concerto was played in the most exquisite style imaginable. It is true that he occasionally dallied affectedly with the slow movement; and his touch also was at times too light for Music Hall; but these were the only objections that could be raised. The three movements were taken in the most perfect tempo, and the themes were simply, but yet expressively sung, while the bravura passages were thrown off with a touch crystalline in quality, and with a freedom that betrayed absolute ignorance of all difficulties. The best of it was the entire absence of any "pulling and hauling" with the orchestra, and of any silly indulging in unnecessary rubatos. The rhythms were delightfully maintained, and no one ever came in more exactly "pat" on the beat through those long piano passages than did he. The unexpected generally happens. Mr. De Pachmann has not done himself much credit at his recent recitals; yet this performance was the finest he has given of any of the large works of Chopin. And, did the eccentric pianist forego his "asides?" Not in the least. When he was not too busy with his work he was either smiling at the audience, whispering to his assistant, or indicating the tempo to the conductor.

At the close of the concerto, he was greeted with a storm of applause. Upon a second recall, he danced gayly toward the piano, and seating himself, played Schumann's novellette in E major with great brilliancy. After a modest delay in the ante-room, the continued applause brought him once more on the platform; and to the astonishment of everybody, in lawless defiance of the ino encore" rule, he yet again took his seat, and gave his indescribable performance of Henselt's "If I Were a Bird." By this time anarchy reigned in audience, and orchestra as well. Mr. Nikisch leaned back in his chair evidently resigned to anythingelse that might happen. After a longer interval, the incorrigible pianist again entered, advanced to the conductor's stand, mounted it, and responded to the unabated applause, with a magnificent bow, and a shake of the head. On his way off the stage, he paused to greet one of the first violinists, who apparently suggested that he should play once more. A moment's hesitation, a deprecatory shrug, and our own De Pachmann hastily seated himself for the third time, and gave Chopin's w.ltz in A flat, opus 42, in a manner, which, for beauty of tone, brilliancy, and rapidity of tempo, was wholly extraordinary. By this time, the common sense of the audience began to assert itself, and the topical song-like recalls came to an end.

The concert commenced with Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet." This splendid work, which was performed last year, is perhaps the finest from the pen of its composer that has been heard in Boston. Its themes are strong and highly expressive, their treatment being original to a degree, while the orchestration is of the richest description, drawing upon nearly all the resources of the full modern orchestra. The performance was one of great dramatic intensity, proving Mr. Nikisch's thorough mastery of the score.

The symphony was Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," a work that has now become well-known here. Its cheerful, spontaneous melodiousness, attractive and picturesque orchestration, its general air of charming simplicity, which nevertheless conceals the art of a master, all combine to prevent its growing wearisome through successive hearings. Mr. Nikisch's reading was perfectly in accord with its spirit, and the playing of the orchestra was equally sympathetic.

T. P. CURRIER.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1891

The first number of the program of last Saturday's Symphony concert was the Tschaikowsky "Overture-Fantasie, Romeo and Juliet," which, given last season under the direction of Mr. Nikisch, was the cause of much shedding of ink. The subject has been for years a favorite with musicians, as the catalogues show, and the lists are incomplete. Operas, with librettos treating of the sad story of the lovers of Verona, have been written by Benda, Schwanberg, Marescalschi, von Rumling, Farinelli, Dalayrac, Steibelt, Zingarelli, Guglielmi, Vaccai, Bellini, Marchetti, Gounod, and the Marquis d'Ivry. Then there is the dramatic symphony of Berlioz, and overtures by Ilinski, Svendsen, Raff and Macfarren. As the young actor wishes to disclose to the world his conception of Hamlet, so the young musician dreams of setting to music the parting embraces upon the balcony, and kisses which whetted the envy of Romeo's rival, Death. And tradition, which rules in all things, decreed, until lately, that the words "Romeo and Juliet" should, so far as music is concerned, be synonymous with a long duet of saccharine sweetness. No wonder, then, that this overture of Tschaikowsky is a stumbling block to many, who forget that quarrels are as important an element of Shakespere's tragedy as the interchange of lovers' thoughts. Moreover, it is in no sense of the word, program music. Its motives are not labelled by the composer, and, if one is called the strife-motive, another the Juliet-theme, it is without the authority of Tschaikowsky. He simply gives his piece a name, the hearer can find what he pleases. When it was played last season it was spoken of at length in the HOME JOURNAL, and a second hearing only confirms the impression then formed. It is, indeed, a remarkable work in conception and treatment; strong in rhythm and dramatic contrasts; and the love motive, if you choose to so name it, is of superb breadth and intense passion. It is to be wished that the other overtures of the composer might be given: "Francesca da Rimini," "Manfred," Hamlet," and "The Tempest."

* * * * *

The other orchestral number was Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony, a pleasing work, ingeniously written, with all the elements of popularity. The Goldmark of this symphony is not the composer of the "Sakuntala" of "The Queen of Sheba"; only in the fourth variation of the first movement are we conscious of his peculiar "orientalism" half Hebraic, half Hungarian. The symphony, as well as the "Romeo and Juliet" overture, was exceedingly well played and keenly relished by the great audience.

* * * * *

But it was de Pachmann's evening. It seemed as though the audience was there simply for him; that the orchestra had been drilled in years past that it might now accompany him; that the conductor had been brought all the way from a German town that he might sit upon the stage and hear de Pachmann play. For such is the individuality of this little man that he monopolized the attention, and the staid concert goer who selects his symphony seat in the same spirit as he would choose a pew in a church actually forgot that he was at a symphony concert, and he applauded until he grew unpleasantly red in the face. This applause, which was rather wild enthusiasm, was genuine; that is to say, it was not premeditated, it did not serve as a forced expression of personal approbation of the character of the performer, it was no public recognition of charming social qualities of the pianist—it was given because the hearer could not restrain himself. He liked the performance, and he wanted to hear that man again. And he heard him four times in all.

* * * * *

Mr. de Pachmann first played the concerto of Chopin in F minor. It is impossible to describe in words his playing to one who was not present. Suffice it to say that it was wonderful in every respect. The pianoforte was treated kindly as an instrument—or rather as a human being. He did not attack it with a frown, compressed lips and strained muscles; he did not smite it. He sat down by it and coaxed it and listened to its song. And the hearer, even he who sat at a great distance, heard the song and rejoiced. Could anything be more musical and poetical than his performance of the adagio? Equally remarkable was the brilliancy of the rondo.

* * * * *

The concerto was followed by the familiar "Rigoletto" fantasy. There was no lack of strength where strength was required, and de Pachmann's bravura was dazzling. Then came a Chopin waltz in F, and after that a study by Moscheles. And then de Pachmann consulted his watch, shook his head and shrugged his shoulders, and left the stage. The symphony of Goldmark was played, but the hearer was still listening to de Pachmann, and the words of Mercury were harsh after the songs of Apollo.

* * * * *

It is not to be denied that Mr. de Pachmann's personal behavior was not free from eccentricities. He was, to say the least, exuberant in his recognition of applause. During the orchestral interludes he chatted affably upon topics of the day with the gentleman who turned the leaves of the pianoforte copy, He shook hands with the director, and, in fact with every one within his reach, and only the remote position of the drummer saved him from an embrace. But are these freaks of his, affectations? Would not de Pachmann be affected, were he to act with the decorum of inferior performers? Were he to act as other men, he would not be de Pachmann. We must take him as he is, and we should be thankful that he exists, for such geniuses are rare. He, as well as Scharwenka, has taught us that even in a hall as large as Music Hall pounding is not necessary to the transmission of sound. He has taught us that the pianoforte, even with an orchestra, can be a musical instrument. He has shown us that there is another and more musical school of pianoforte playing than that in which such human pile-drivers as D'Albert et al sit in the chairs of instruction. And we can forgive his harmless personal eccentricities. Besides he is not of our nation, and he has probably not been taught that the exhibition of emotions is a thing to be ashamed of, and that feelings of any nature are to be sternly repressed.

PHILIP HALE.

The Washington Post

WASHINGTON, FEBRUARY 27, 1891.

DE PACHMANN A GENIUS

The Phenomenal Little Pianist Makes His Salaams to Washington.

TOUCH OF MARVELOUS DELICACY

Brilliant Audience of Music-lovers at the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert—A Great Programme by the Greatest of Bands—De Pachmann's Mannerisms.

Another immense audience defied Gen. Greely, the Weather Bureau, and the weather, and deified De Pachmann, Nikisch, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the occasion of the fourth concert of that extravagantly worshipped organization at Lincoln Music Hall last evening. The weather, indeed, was not a factor in the case at all, as every seat in the house had been engaged before any one, presumably, could know what particular degree of vileness the weather would attain.

The audience was of the usual distinction characteristic of the Symphony concerts, and the Presidential and Cabinet families and a good working, or at least listening, majority of the people most prominent in Capitoline society were present in the boxes, chairs, and circles.

Every programme of the Symphony players, by some subtle sorcery, seems a little better than the last. Certainly last night's was no exception. The Goldmark overture, "Prometheus," a work of oriental vividness of coloring and boldly contrasted themes and movements, is one wherein the composer of the "Queen of Sheba" has valiantly dared comparisons with Liszt and even Beethoven himself, and emerged very creditably from the ordeal.

A motive of pastoral and idyllic simplicity and sweetness alternates with passages full of dramatic energy, in strophe and antistrophe of suffering and passion, till the fine and eloquent finale. Not a note or shade of the thought and sentiment of the author throughout this noble ensample of the modern school but found from Mr. Nikisch's band a noble and worthy interpretation.

The eagerly anticipated event of the evening was the appearance of Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann, the piano virtuoso, whose fame has so favorably preceded him. There need be no hesitation in saying that in every particular Mr. de Pachmann exceeded the wildest expectations. In the first place he is a great and inspired artist, with a command of the techique of his profession little short of marvellous, and a fire of inspiration in every movement of his work that entitles him to the rank of genius. The lovely Mozart Concerto for piano in D minor, with orchestral accompaniment, since it felt the touch of its immortal composer, probably never received a rendition of more poetic beauty. The allegro and rondo were charmingly done, but it was in the nearly superhuman melody of the romanze that the gifted little artist completely won the hearts of his audience. His touch is a miracle of delicacy, smoothness and finish. The trite comparison of a string of pearls would be sacrilege to describe the rounded perfection of his notes in even the most rapid passages, and the velvety smoothness of his tone over the sinewy and steel-like strength of his fingering must be heard to be understood.

The report of De Pachmann's engaging stage mannerisms has gone before him, but they, too, must be seen to be appreciated. For whole-souled and enthusiastic abandon in the enjoyment of his work he is a sort of jolly little Muscovite Blind Tom. He bends over the keyboard in a very ecstacy of caressing and cajolement. He waves his hand in wide and airy curves of benediction over the spirits of sound he has summoned from the dusky caverns of the instrument. He makes large and profound salaams, for so small a man, from the dizzy apex of the piano stool to the shade of Chopin and the manes of Mozart. After a brilliant run he looks around in smiling and confidential inquiry at the orchestra or audience as though to ask if there was any perceptible aggregation of flies on that particular bit of fioriture. Or, again, he leans back and gazes into the upper boxes with an air of good-natured defiance, as who should say, "Beat that if you can." Then he leans forward and daintily pecks a little quivering drop of melody from the flower-heart of silence, and jumps up and trots off in a comical little canter, composed mostly of still queerer little semi-circular bows, amid the wild applause of both house and musicians.

After the De Pachmann furore had a trifle subsided the orchestra was heard in the Tschaikowsky andantino and scherzo, from Symphony 4, in F minor, a work of brilliant and venturesome originality, as successfully consummated as daringly conceived. The latter number, scored nearly throughout in pizzicato effects, is a veritable musical tour de force of itself sufficient to have made the fame of its composer. At its conclusion the pianist was again heard in a suite of Chopin numbers, a berceuse, two etudes, and the valse, op. 42, given so delicately and deliciously that the funny little dog trot and circular salaams were called into requisition again and again, till the favorite little performer was compelled to mount Mr. Nikisch's throne of state, the better to acknowledge his ovation, and at last profane all the precedents of the Symphony cultus with an actual encore.

The concert closed with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, which, in response to a numerously-signed request, was substituted for the Eroica. It is only necessary to say of this immortal masterpiece that it was given with all the reverent and perfect art by virtue of which Mr. Nikisch and his noble orchestra have won the position they so proudly hold in the affections of the people. It was a fitting and impressive close to what, in reality the longest, seemed by far the briefest of the Symphony concerts.

...HERALD.
...TON, MARCH 1, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Triumphal Tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra of the week just ended marks the highest point in both artistic and financial success that has been reached in the 11 years' existence of this organization, a fact which can but gratify all who take pride in Boston's musical enterprises: for, despite the fact that but one solitary citizen of Boston assumes all the responsibility of maintaining this great body of musicians, its existence has come to be claimed by the public as a sort of credit to the city at large.

Only those who have followed year by year the development of the present popularity of this Boston orchestra in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington can realize fully the amount of capital and labor represented in the present successful position occupied by the organization in other cities, but all Bostonians must be gratified with the success it has attained. A very pleasing feature of the series of concerts given in New York has been the eminently friendly spirit shown toward Mr. Nikisch and his band by the musical critics of that city, and the aid given the Boston orchestra by these gentlemen has been an important factor in bringing about the present favorable attitude on the part of the public toward the organization in all the cities included in these occasional tours.

The Kneisel quartet will give three concerts of chamber music in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, on the evenings of March 2 and 31 and April 21. For solo artists, Mmes. Arthur Nikisch and Helen Hopekirk and Messrs. Ernst Perabo and Arthur Foote are named. On next Monday night a quartet, a trio and two movements from the Kreutzer sonata, all by Beethoven, will be played. Mr. Perabo will be the pianist.

...-ven, Conn.

Date 2/26

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The last of the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in this city for the season, was given in the Hyperion last evening to a very large and musical audience. The concert was one of the best in the course and the orchestra, under the leadership of Arthur Nikisch, was met with the high approval it merited. The program embraced selections from Wagner, Chopin, Weber, and the Ervica Symphony of Beethoven. The first appearance in this city of Mme. Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, the distinguished pianiste, was eminently propitious. Her performance was warmly greeted and received hearty approval at each number. In technique and also in expression she impresses the listener with the idea of the author and her interpretations were very fitting.

Clipping from Palladium
New Haven Conn.
Date 2-24

SUPERB PIANO PLAYING.

The Final of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's ...

The last ... this season of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given last night. The work of the orchestra was as finished as usual, but the best feature of the evening was the marvelous playing of Miss Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, which was remarkable not so much for its force, although it did not lack brilliancy, but for the wonderful delicacy of her touch. It was crisp as silk and yet soft as velvet; her fingers seemed to flit over the keys in gentle playfulness, or to touch them in tender caress. Her trills were the soft rippling of water and her runs the sighing of the winds or the whisper of the night air. It is safe to say that no pianist ever gave here such an exquisite and faultless interpretation of Chopin or made such a thorough conquest of her hearers. She was recalled six times.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 1.

The Kneisel Quartet will give three concerts in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, on the evenings of March 2 and 31 and April 21. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mad. Helen Hopekirk, Mr. Ernst Perabo and Mr. Arthur Foote will assist.

— Mr. de Pachmann was so excited by his triumph at the Symphony concert last Saturday night, that on adjourning to the Tavern Club, he began to play some more, and his playing so excited his hosts that they kept him at the piano until 3 o'clock in the morning.

Call, Philadelphia, PA.
Date 2-28

...ening.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Magnificent Playing Heard at the Academy Last Night.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night at the Academy of Music, attracted an immense audience. The program, though not containing any absolute novelty, was interesting chiefly from the fact that it served to revive Berlioz's but seldom heard Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," and that it presented an opportunity to hear Mr. De Pachmann in a Chopin Concerto.

The absolute technical perfection of the Boston organization is so well known here that it is almost useless to refer to it, but in last evening's program the remarkable pizzicato in the Scherzo of Tschaikowsky's Symphony deserves more than passing commendation. It was a performance that cannot be excelled or even equaled by any orchestra in the world.

Raff's third Symphony "Im Walde," which concluded the concert, was excellently given by the orchestra, though exceptions may be taken to Mr. Nikisch's reading of some parts of this well-known work. Mr. De Pachmann, who is essentially a Chopin player, was heard in the F minor Concerto. His best performance was that of the Larghetto, which he played with extreme delicacy and expression. He should, however, rid himself of those peculiarities which at times make him a laughing-stock of the audience.

Press, New York City.
Date 2-25

...to American audiences.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night in Chickering Hall, was a notable one, even in the brilliant series which this able organization has given during the winter. It was notable both for the excellence of the performance and for the interest and variety of the programme, though the same mistake was made in the latter as has been made in previous programmes of placing a long symphony at the end of the evening. In treating this performance the duty of the critic becomes that of the eulogist. Especially is this true in the case of the masterly handling of Brahms' great symphony in D major, and it is to be regretted that many of the audience left before it was finished.

The interest of the audience naturally centered in the performance of Mozart's concerto in D minor, in which Mr. Vladimer de Pachmann figured as soloist. It was a remarkable performance, marked by the utmost delicacy of expression and technical finish on the part of Mr. Pachmann. The performance, however, it may be remarked, was by no means improved by the absurd eccentricities of manner of the eminent pianist.

Two enthusiastic encores were demanded, which were cheerfully given and thoroughly enjoyed by the audience, no one enjoying them more evidently than did Mr. Pachmann himself.

Cherubini's overture to Anacreon was the first number on the programme, and its beautiful measures received full justice. The third number was the well known Waldweben from Wagner's "Siegfried," which was specially interesting as affording an opportunity of comparing Mr. Nikisch's work with that of Mr. Seidl. We would not say that Mr. Nikisch's performance excelled those that we are accustomed to hear at the Metropolitan Opera House. It would be difficult, indeed, for any orchestra to do that. But the quality of the strings in Mr. Nikisch's orchestra was unquestionably better than that of Mr. Seidl's, and the effect of this wonderful tone picture was appreciably enhanced thereby. It is significant to note that, in spite of the talk at present of the wane of Wagner's popularity, this number was rapturously encored—a reception which few of the numbers even in the Boston Symphony concerts have been accorded. The programme closed with the Brahms symphony already referred to.

The New York Recorder.

Published at 24-34 New Chambers Street, New York, daily, excepting Sunday, by the RECORDER CO.

Saturday, February 28, 1891.

THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra—Walter Damrosch—Announcements.

It has not been a remarkable week musically. Unmistakable symptoms of fatigue, coupled with the advent of Lent, have forced even the most ardent zealot of the cause to relax a trifle in his frantic chase after tone. The most important events of the past eight days have been the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the first performance this season of Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

The former affair took place at Chickering Hall last Tuesday evening. The programme was calculated to satisfy the cravings of the adherents of both the old and the new, for with Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture and Brahm's D major symphony as initial and closing numbers, surely few could cavil. The other two numbers were Mozart's beautiful D minor piano concerto and Wagner's "Waldweben." The piano part of the concerto was taken by Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann of Chopin fame.

He played it with ease and finish, and to frantic encores responded with Mendelssohn's well-worn "Rondo Capriccioso" and Heuselt's étude, "Would I Were a Bird." Mr. Pachmann would be a greater artist if he were less a mountebank, but then the public seemed to like it, even when he topsy-turvied accents in the Mozart and Mendelssohn numbers. Arthur Nikisch conducted with his usual force and ... His reading of the "Waldweben" was ... to tempo, and might call for ... A concert reading and ... The orchestra is a capital ...

Call, New York City.
Date ...

The fourth and last concert to be given in New York this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, will take place at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening of next week. The programme is as follows: 1. Overture. "Anacreon," Cherubini: 2. D minor concerto, Mozart; 3. Waldweben, from "Siegfried," Wagner; 4. Symphony in D minor, No. 2, Brahms. Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann will be the soloist.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra and De Pachmann.

THE fourth and last of the Boston Symphony Society concerts brought together an audience at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening, that exhausted the supply of the box office and filled all available standing room. The programme, judging from its reception, was the most enjoyable to the patrons that the society has given during the season. It opened with Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture, which Mr. Nikisch and his admirable orchestra gave with wonderful delicacy and precision; almost too much of the former, for it was only at the close of the overture that the instruments were released from the uniform pianissimos that had prevailed. The effect was striking, but partook too much of the sensational element to be healthy.

The overture was followed by Mozart's pianoforte Concerto in D minor, performed by the popular pianist, Valdimir de Pachmann. The genial little virtuoso was in a most happy musical mood, and played divinely. His good humor transferred itself to the audience, and, as usual, Pachmann took them into his confidence and pointed out, in his expressive way, the noteworthy portions of the work in a manner that gave them a liberal education as to its beauties. The performance was one of exquisite perfection. Pachmann's phrasing and tonal expression is something wonderful, and the elegance and finish imparted to every phrase of the music was beyond everything that we have heard from this gifted pianist, who conquers quite as much by his intellectual ability as by his technical and pianistic skill. The concerto has hardly been heard here, and it came almost in the light of a novelty. There is nothing astonishing about the work, even the cadenzas, by Hummel, are not at all difficult, according to modern standards, but it is precisely that charming simplicity of Mozart that calls for an interpreter who can make the instrument sing in the happiest of sympathetic interpretations. The "Romanze" was particularly well done, and called forth subdued bravos from all over the house. After several enthusiastic recalls Pachmann was prevailed upon to give an encore, for which he chose the ever popular "Rondo Copriccioso" of Mendelssohn, which he gave with such lightness and airy precision that the applause was even greater than before. The attendants had begun to remove the piano when Pachmann was compelled to again yield to the popular demand, and borrowing a chair from one of the members of the orchestra, played, in a masterly way, Henselt's "Si oiseau j'etais." The furore now subsided and the concert was allowed to proceed with Wagner's "Waldweben" scene from Siegfried, of which Mr. Nikisch gave the best interpretation that has been heard here at all. It was unanimously redemanded by the delighted hearers. The concert concluded with Brahms' Symphony No. 2, in D Major.

Arthur Foote's New Work at the Kneisel Concert.

At the fifth Kneisel Concert the standard selection was Beethoven's Quartet in E-flat, op. 74 (which Theodor Helm declares an introspective psychological evolution of tearful life and peace) more familiarly known as the Harp Quartet. The vocalist was Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, with two groups of German songs, from Chopin, Schumann, Jensen, Liszt, Brahms, the best being Jensen's Am Manzanares. She sings with much physical expression, dresses well, has a winning stage manner, is slight and pretty, uses what Mr. Dwight happily calls a defective scooping portamento, and sends out some beautiful and soft notes; but she runs frequently into disagreeable and forced tones, and did not rouse the audience to much enthusiasm. Her director husband played the accompaniments excellently.

Between her two groups of songs the Quartet gave two exquisite numbers: the Minuet in A, No. 2, from one of Boccherini's ninety-one string quartets; and Rubinstein's Andante, from string quartet in C-minor, No. 2. The diminuendo in both selections was remarkable for its even finish.

Interest centered in a new quartet by Arthur Foote, dedicated to Prof. J. K. Paine, who was present to enjoy it. It is in C-major, and written for piano and strings. As yet it is in manuscript, and is numbered op. 23. As I have said before of Foote's productions, there is no need to despair of our musical future with such Mendelssohnian composers among us. If any hearers present had been as unacquainted with Beethoven's Quartet as nearly all were with Mr. Foote's, and there had been no programs, it is doubtful if such hearers would have known which of the two quartets they should assign to the tone-master. There are judges who profess ability to recognize an author by his style; yet when Roberts Brothers published their No Name Series ten or fifteen years ago, the familiar novelists were unrecognized, and the unknown one won the praise. The Arena Magazine now asks for guesses over certain anonymous articles, by well-known writers, but the guesses are commonly astray. Who conjectured that Ignatius Donnelly was the author of Cæsar's Column? When we read about the internal evidence of certain passages in Shakespeare, as proving themselves his or not his, we may well doubt the accuracy of such judgments. Like all great men, Shakespeare was variable. Even Homer nods. Men are not always pitched for the same strain. For instance, Leigh Hunt avers that these beautiful lines from The Tempest cannot be genuine:

> The fringéd curtains of thine eye advance,
> And say what thou seest yond;

yet to me these always seem specially Shakespearean, and in accordance with physiological facts such as our great poet ever noted. To come back to music, Mr. Foote's quartet has in it the everlasting life-elements. As this was its first public performance, it is but fair to quote the authorized analysis of the work, adding only this, that the ascending passages in the Scherzo are peculiarly beautiful, that the closing Allegro might almost be indicated as alla marcia, and that the composer was heartily applauded and more than once recalled.

The Allegro comodo opens with the first theme by the strings, an accompaniment in short arpeggios being given to the pianoforte. After this has been pretty fully stated, it is interrupted by a brief episode, which enters on the first violin (in A-minor), and which leads back to another concise return of the theme. To this succeeds the second theme, in G-major, also by the strings, at the end of which, with a full cadence in G-major, begins the working-out section. This is quite extended, and is about equally derived from the two themes, and the episode referred to. The first and second themes then return in the orthodox manner, and with a short coda the movement ends.

The Adagio, in A-flat-major, opens with an extended Cantabile theme upon the strings, with accompaniment by the pianoforte; after an episode, in which a short theme is taken alternately by the strings and pianoforte, remaining unchanged in character, but constantly modulating, a second theme appears in F-minor. This closes in C minor, and is followed by a sort of long coda, in E-flat-major, by the strings alone. At the end of this (in E-flat-minor) the main theme of the movement is treated in imitation by the different instruments; this finally ending with a little recitative passage by the violin, which leads to the return of the first theme in A-flat-major: the cello now accompanying pizzicato, and the piano with richer figuration than before. The movement is ended by the coda (before was given to the strings alone), the pianoforte being added this time.

The Scherzo, in G-minor, is chiefly characterized by irregular rhythms, groups of five, seven and eight bars being intermingled in a way that would hardly be recognized at first hearing. The Trio, in E-flat-major, is more flowing in character, the melody being almost entirely taken by the strings.

The Finale begins in C-minor, but ends, naturally, in C-major. It is in the form of the first movement of a sonata, and calls for no especial mention, so far as technical points are concerned.

Clipping from
News, Baltimore Md.
Date 2-28

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Vladimir ... de Pachmann ... Delightful Piano Playing.

The pianist, de Pachmann, was the feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert last night at the Concordia. His appearance was awaited by the audience on tiptoe of expectation and when he did come they kept him before the instrument full forty minutes. Vladimir de Pachmann is a short, compactly built man, with black hair and beard, the latter rather closely cut, and bright eyes. In a crowd even he would attract attention by the brilliancy of his gaze and his enthusiastic vivacity. At the piano these characteristics are intensified a hundred fold. His manner is as peculiar as the reputation that preceded him made it appear, but he plays magnificently. Chopin was probably never before played in Baltimore as de Pachmann gave the concerto in F minor last night. The very moment the little man sat down at the piano his command of the instrument was evident. The most difficult execution was given with complete absence of all appearance of effort. His scale passages, the movements in thirds and his double trills were as trifles to him, but he was proud of his abilities and when, after the brilliant notes had rippled away under his fingers like the flowing of a brook turned to exquisite music, he sat erect and surveyed the astonished, admiring audience with an air of calm superiority. But he was gracious withal and generously responded to several encores with bits of performance as full of beauty as the concerto. De Pachmann's actions have been called affectations, but they rather seem to be natural outbursts of an enthusiastic, artistic soul. He acts as if he loves the piano, as if without the instrument he would be nothing, but with it he is everything. He is a smiling, obliging artist of marvelous skill and he is a success.

The orchestral part of the programme comprised Berlioz's overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," the accompaniments (exquisitely done, too) to the pianist's concerto, the andantino and scherzo from Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4 in F minor, and Raff's symphony No. 3 "In Walde." The Berlioz number was short, but full of beauty. After it came de Pachmann and then the Tschaikowsky piece, but much of the charm in the latter was lost upon the audience, who were still in wonder over the performance of the pianist. By the time the Raff symphony began they had sufficiently recovered to appreciate the masterly work of the orchestra, which terminated grandly with the third part, picturing the wild huntsmen in the depths of the forest. The rush of Wotan and his comrades through the leafy light and shade is richly painted and their departure in the distance is as graceful as their coming is rudely grand. Mr. Nikisch's careful training was everywhere displayed.

[104]

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, MAROH 1, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Triumphal Tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra of the week just ended marks the highest point in both artistic and financial success that has been reached in the 11 years' existence of this organization, a fact which can but gratify all who take pride in Boston's musical enterprises; for, despite the fact that but one solitary citizen of Boston assumes all the responsibility of maintaining this great body of musicians, its existence has come to be claimed by the public as a sort of credit to the city at large.

Only those who have followed year by year the development of the present popularity of this Boston orchestra in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington can realize fully the amount of capital and labor represented in the present successful position occupied by the organization in other cities, but all Bostonians must be gratified with the success it has attained. A very pleasing feature of the series of concerts given in New York has been the eminently friendly spirit shown toward Mr. Nikisch and his band by the musical critics of that city, and the aid given the Boston orchestra by these gentlemen has been an important factor in bringing about the present favorable attitude on the part of the public toward the organization in all the cities included in these occasional tours.

The Kneisel quartet will give three concerts of chamber music in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, on the evenings of March 2 and 31 and April 21. For solo artists, Mmes. Arthur Nikisch and Helen Hopekirk and Messrs. Ernst Perabo and Arthur Foote are named. On next Monday night a quartet, a trio and two movements from the Kreutzer sonata, all by Beethoven, will be played. Mr. Perabo will be the pianist.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 1.

The Kneisel Quartet will give three concerts in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, on the evenings of March 2 and 31 and April 21. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mad. Helen Hopekirk, Mr. Ernst Perabo and Mr. Arthur Foote will assist.

— Mr. de Pachmann was so excited by his triumph at the Symphony concert last Saturday night, that on adjourning to the Tavern Club, he began to play some more, and his playing so excited his hosts that they kept him at the piano until 3 o'clock in the morning.

Press, New York City.

Date 2-25

[illegible] to American audiences.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night in Chickering Hall, was a notable one, even in the brilliant series which this able organization has given during the winter. It was notable both for the excellence of the performance and for the interest and variety of the programme, though the same mistake was made in the latter as has been made in previous programmes of placing a long symphony at the end of the evening. In treating this performance the duty of the critic becomes that of the eulogist. Especially is this true in the case of the masterly handling of Brahms' great symphony in D major, and it is to be regretted that many of the audience left before it was finished.

The interest of the audience naturally centered in the performance of Mozart's concerto in D minor, in which Mr. Vladimer de Pachmann figured as soloist. It was a remarkable performance, marked by the utmost delicacy of expression and technical finish on the part of Mr. Pachmann. The performance, however, it may be remarked, was by no means improved by the absurd eccentricities of manner of the eminent pianist.

Two enthusiastic encores were demanded, which were cheerfully given and thoroughly enjoyed by the audience, no one enjoying them more evidently than did Mr. Pachmann himself.

Cherubini's overture to Anacreon was the first number on the programme, and its beautiful measures received full justice. The third number was the well known Waldweben from Wagner's "Siegfried," which was specially interesting as affording an opportunity of comparing Mr. Nikisch's work with that of Mr. Seidl. We would not say that Mr. Nikisch's performance excelled those that we are accustomed to hear at the Metropolitan Opera House. It would be difficult, indeed, for any orchestra to do that. But the quality of the strings in Mr. Nikisch's orchestra was unquestionably better than that of Mr. Seidl's, and the effect of this wonderful tone picture was appreciably enhanced thereby. It is significant to note that, in spite of the talk at present of the wane of Wagner's popularity, this number was rapturously encored—a reception which few of the numbers even in the Boston Symphony concerts have been accorded. The programme closed with the Brahms symphony already referred to.

[illegible], New York City.

Date [illegible]

The fourth and last concert to be given in New York this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, will take place at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening of next week. The programme is as follows: 1. Overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini; 2. D minor concerto, Mozart; 3. Waldweben, from "Siegfried," Wagner; 4. Symphony in D minor, No. 2, Brahms. Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann will be the soloist.

News, New Haven, Conn.

Date 2/26

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The last of the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in this city for the season, was given in the Hyperion last evening to a very large and musical audience. The concert was one of the best in the course and the orchestra, under the leadership of Arthur Nikisch, was met with the high approval it merited. The program embraced selections from Wagner, Chopin, Weber, and the Ervica Symphony of Beethoven. The first appearance in this city of Mme. Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, the distinguished pianiste, was eminently propitious. Her performance was warmly greeted and received hearty approval at each number. In technique and also in expression she impresses the listener with the idea of the author and her interpretations were very fitting.

Clipping from Palladium New Haven Conn.

Date 2-24

SUPERB PIANO PLAYING.

The Final of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concerts.

The last concert this season of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given last night. The work of the orchestra was as finished as usual, but the best feature of the evening was the marvelous playing of Miss Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, which was remarkable not so much for its force, although it did not lack brilliancy, but for the wonderful delicacy of her touch. It was crisp as silk and yet soft as velvet; her fingers seemed to flit over the keys in gentle playfulness, or to touch them in tender caress. Her trills were the soft rippling of water and her runs the sighing of the winds or the whisper of the night air. It is safe to say that no pianist ever gave here such an exquisite and faultless interpretation of Chopin or made such a thorough conquest of her hearers. She was recalled six times.

[illegible], Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 2-28

[illegible] evening.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Magnificent Playing Heard at the Academy Last Night.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night at the Academy of Music, attracted an immense audience. The program, though not containing any absolute novelty, was interesting chiefly from the fact that it served to revive Berlioz's but seldom heard Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," and that it presented an opportunity to hear Mr. De Pachmann in a Chopin Concerto.

The absolute technical perfection of the Boston organization is so well known here that it is almost useless to refer to it, but in last evening's program the remarkable pizzicato in the Scherzo of Tschaikowsky's Symphony deserves more than passing commendation. It was a performance that cannot be excelled or even equaled by any orchestra in the world.

Raff's third Symphony "Im Walde," which concluded the concert, was excellently given by the orchestra, though exceptions may be taken to Mr. Nikisch's reading of some parts of this well-known work. Mr. De Pachmann, who is essentially a Chopin player, was heard in the F minor Concerto, His best performance was that of the Larghetto, which he played with extreme delicacy and expression. He should, however, rid himself of those peculiarities which at times make him a laughing-stock of the audience.

The New York Recorder.

Published at 24-34 New Chambers Street, New York, daily, excepting Sunday, by the RECORDER CO.

Saturday, February 28, 1891.

THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra—Walter Damrosch—Announcements.

It has not been a remarkable week musically. Unmistakable symptoms of fatigue, coupled with the advent of Lent, have forced even the most ardent zealot of the cause to relax a trifle in his frantic chase after tone. The most important events of the past eight days have been the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the first performance this season of Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

The former affair took place at Chickering Hall last Tuesday evening. The programme was calculated to satisfy the cravings of the adherents of both the old and the new, for with Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture and Brahm's D major symphony as initial and closing numbers, surely few could cavil. The other two numbers were Mozart's beautiful D minor piano concerto and Wagner's "Waldweben." The piano part of the concerto was taken by Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann of Chopin fame.

He played it with ease and finish, and to frantic encores responded with Mendelssohn's well-worn "Rondo Capriccioso" and Heuselt's étude, "Would I Were a Bird." Mr. Pachmann would be a greater artist if he were less a mountebank, but then the public seemed to like it, even when he topsy-turvied accents in the Mozart and Mendelssohn numbers. Arthur Nikisch conducted with his usual force and fire. His reading of the "Waldweben" was extremely slow as to tempo, and might call for comment but that it is a concert reading and not an operatic one. The orchestra is a capital one and deserves all the success it achieved.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra and De Pachmann.

THE fourth and last of the Boston Symphony Society concerts brought together an audience at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening, that exhausted the supply of the box office and filled all available standing room. The programme, judging from its reception, was the most enjoyable to the patrons that the society has given during the season. It opened with Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture, which Mr. Nikisch and his admirable orchestra gave with wonderful delicacy and precision; almost too much of the former, for it was only at the close of the overture that the instruments were released from the uniform pianissimos that had prevailed. The effect was striking, but partook too much of the sensational element to be healthy.

The overture was followed by Mozart's pianoforte Concerto in D minor, performed by the popular pianist, Valdimir de Pachmann. The genial little virtuoso was in a most happy musical mood, and played divinely. His good humor transferred itself to the audience, and, as usual, Pachmann took them into his confidence and pointed out, in his expressive way, the noteworthy portions of the work in a manner that gave them a liberal education as to its beauties. The performance was one of exquisite perfection. Pachmann's phrasing and tonal expression is something wonderful, and the elegance and finish imparted to every phrase of the music was beyond everything that we have heard from this gifted pianist, who conquers quite as much by his intellectual ability as by his technical and pianistic skill. The concerto has hardly been heard here, and it came almost in the light of a novelty. There is nothing astonishing about the work, even the cadenzas, by Hummel, are not at all difficult, according to modern standards, but it is precisely that charming simplicity of Mozart that calls for an interpreter who can make the instrument sing in the happiest of sympathetic interpretations. The "Romanze" was particularly well done, and called forth subdued bravos from all over the house. After several enthusiastic recalls Pachmann was prevailed upon to give an encore, for which he chose the ever popular "Rondo Copriccioso" of Mendelssohn, which he gave with such lightness and airy precision that the applause was even greater than before. The attendants had begun to remove the piano when Pachmann was compelled to again yield to the popular demand, and borrowing a chair from one of the members of the orchestra, played, in a masterly way, Henselt's "Si oiseau j'etais." The furore now subsided and the concert was allowed to proceed with Wagner's "Waldweben" scene from Siegfried, of which Mr. Nikisch gave the best interpretation that has been heard here at all. It was unanimously redemanded by the delighted hearers. The concert concluded with Brahms' Symphony No. 2, in D Major.

Arthur Foote's New Work at the Kneisel Concert.

At the fifth Kneisel Concert the standard selection was Beethoven's Quartet in E-flat, op. 74 (which Theodor Helm declares an introspective psychological evolution of tearful life and peace) more familiarly known as the Harp Quartet. The vocalist was Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, with two groups of German songs, from Chopin, Schumann, Jensen, Liszt, Brahms, the best being Jensen's Am Manzanares. She sings with much physical expression, dresses well, has a winning stage manner, is slight and pretty, uses what Mr. Dwight happily calls a defective scooping portamento, and sends out some beautiful and soft notes; but she runs frequently into disagreeable and forced tones, and did not rouse the audience to much enthusiasm. Her director husband played the accompaniments excellently.

Between her two groups of songs the Quartet gave two exquisite numbers: the Minuet in A, No. 2, from one of Boccherini's ninety-one string quartets; and Rubinstein's Andante, from string quartet in C-minor, No. 2. The diminuendo in both selections was remarkable for its even finish.

Interest centered in a new quartet by Arthur Foote, dedicated to Prof. J. K. Paine, who was present to enjoy it. It is in C-major, and written for piano and strings. As yet it is in manuscript, and is numbered op. 23. As I have said before of Foote's productions, there is no need to despair of our musical future with such Mendelssohnian composers among us. If any hearers present had been as unacquainted with Beethoven's Quartet as nearly all were with Mr. Foote's, and there had been no programs, it is doubtful if such hearers would have known which of the two quartets they should assign to the tone-master. There are judges who profess ability to recognize an author by his style; yet when Roberts Brothers published their No Name Series ten or fifteen years ago, the familiar novelists were unrecognized, and the unknown one won the praise. The Arena Magazine now asks for guesses over certain anonymous articles, by well-known writers, but the guesses are commonly astray. Who conjectured that Ignatius Donnelly was the author of Cæsar's Column? When we read about the internal evidence of certain passages in Shakespeare, as proving themselves his or not his, we may well doubt the accuracy of such judgments. Like all great men, Shakespeare was variable. Even Homer nods. Men are not always pitched for the same strain. For instance, Leigh Hunt avers that these beautiful lines from The Tempest cannot be genuine:

> The fringéd curtains of thine eye advance,
> And say what thou seest yond;

yet to me these always seem specially Shakespearean, and in accordance with physiological facts such as our great poet ever noted. To come back to music, Mr. Foote's quartet has in it the everlasting life-elements. As this was its first public performance, it is but fair to quote the authorized analysis of the work, adding only this, that the ascending passages in the Scherzo are peculiarly beautiful, that the closing Allegro might almost be indicated as alla marcia, and that the composer was heartily applauded and more than once recalled.

The Allegro comodo opens with the first theme by the strings, an accompaniment in short arpeggios being given to the pianoforte. After this has been pretty fully stated, it is interrupted by a brief episode, which enters on the first violin (in A-minor), and which leads back to another concise return of the theme. To this succeeds the second theme, in G-major, also by the strings, at the end of which, with a full cadence in G-major, begins the working-out section. This is quite extended, and is about equally derived from the two themes, and the episode referred to. The first and second themes then return in the orthodox manner, and with a short coda the movement ends.

The Adagio, in A-flat-major, opens with an extended Cantabile theme upon the strings, with accompaniment by the pianoforte; after an episode, in which a short theme is taken alternately by the strings and pianoforte, remaining unchanged in character, but constantly modulating, a second theme appears in F-minor. This closes in C minor, and is followed by a sort of long coda, in E-flat-major, by the strings alone. At the end of this (in E-flat-minor) the main theme of the movement is treated in imitation by the different instruments; this finally ending with a little recitative passage by the violin, which leads to the return of the first theme in A flat-major: the cello now accompanying pizzicato, and the piano with richer figuration than before. The movement is ended by the coda (before was given to the strings alone), the pianoforte being added this time.

The Scherzo, in G-minor, is chiefly characterized by irregular rhythms, groups of five, seven and eight bars being intermingled in a way that would hardly be recognized at first hearing. The Trio, in E-flat-major, is more flowing in character, the melody being almost entirely taken by the strings.

The Finale begins in C-minor, but ends, naturally, in C-major. It is in the form of the first movement of a sonata, and calls for no especial mention, so far as technical points are concerned.

Clipping from News, Baltimore Md.

Date 2-28

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Vladimir de Pachmann's Wonderful Piano Playing.

The pianist, de Pachmann, was the feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert last night at the Concordia. His appearance was awaited by the audience on tiptoe of expectation and when he did come they kept him before the instrument full forty minutes. Vladimir de Pachmann is a short, compactly built man, with black hair and beard, the latter rather closely cut, and bright eyes. In a crowd even he would attract attention by the brilliancy of his gaze and his enthusiastic vivacity. At the piano these characteristics are intensified a hundred fold. His manner is as peculiar as the reputation that preceded him made it appear, but he plays magnificently. Chopin was probably never before played in Baltimore as de Pachmann gave the concerto in F minor last night. The very moment the little man sat down at the piano his command of the instrument was evident. The most difficult execution was given with complete absence of all appearance of effort. His scale passages, the movements in thirds and his double trills were as trifles to him, but he was proud of his abilities and when, after the brilliant notes had rippled away under his fingers like the flowing of a brook turned to exquisite music, he sat erect and surveyed the astonished, admiring audience with an air of calm superiority. But he was gracious withal and generously responded to several encores with bits of performance as full of beauty as the concerto. De Pachmann's actions have been called affectations, but they rather seem to be natural outbursts of an enthusiastic, artistic soul. He acts as if he loves the piano, as if without the instrument he would be nothing, but with it he is everything. He is a smiling, obliging artist of marvelous skill and he is a success.

The orchestral part of the programme comprised Berlioz's overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," the accompaniments (exquisitely done, too) to the pianist's concerto, the andantino and scherzo from Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4 in F minor, and Raff's symphony No. 3 "In Walde." The Berlioz number was short, but full of beauty. After it came de Pachmann and then the Tschaikowsky piece, but much of the charm in the latter was lost upon the audience, who were still in wonder over the performance of the pianist. By the time the Raff symphony began they had sufficiently recovered to appreciate the masterly work of the orchestra, which terminated grandly with the third part, picturing the wild huntsmen in the depths of the forest. The rush of Wotan and his comrades through the leafy light and shade is richly painted and their departure in the distance is as graceful as their coming is rudely grand. Mr. Nikisch's careful training was everywhere displayed.

[104]

BRATTLE HALL, CAMBRIDGE.

:::1891.:::

MONDAY EVENING, MARCH 2.

TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 31. TUESDAY EVENING, APRIL 21.

THREE CONCERTS,

BY THE

KNEISEL QUARTET.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.

OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.

ASSISTING ARTISTS:

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH,

MME. HELEN HOPEKIRK,

MR. ERNST PERABO,

MR. ARTHUR FOOTE.

Tickets, with reserved seats for the series of three Concerts, $3.00.

The sale of Season Tickets opens at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, Thursday morning, February 26th.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Hyperion Theatre, - New Haven,

Monday Evening, Feb. 23, at 8.

PROGRAMME

4

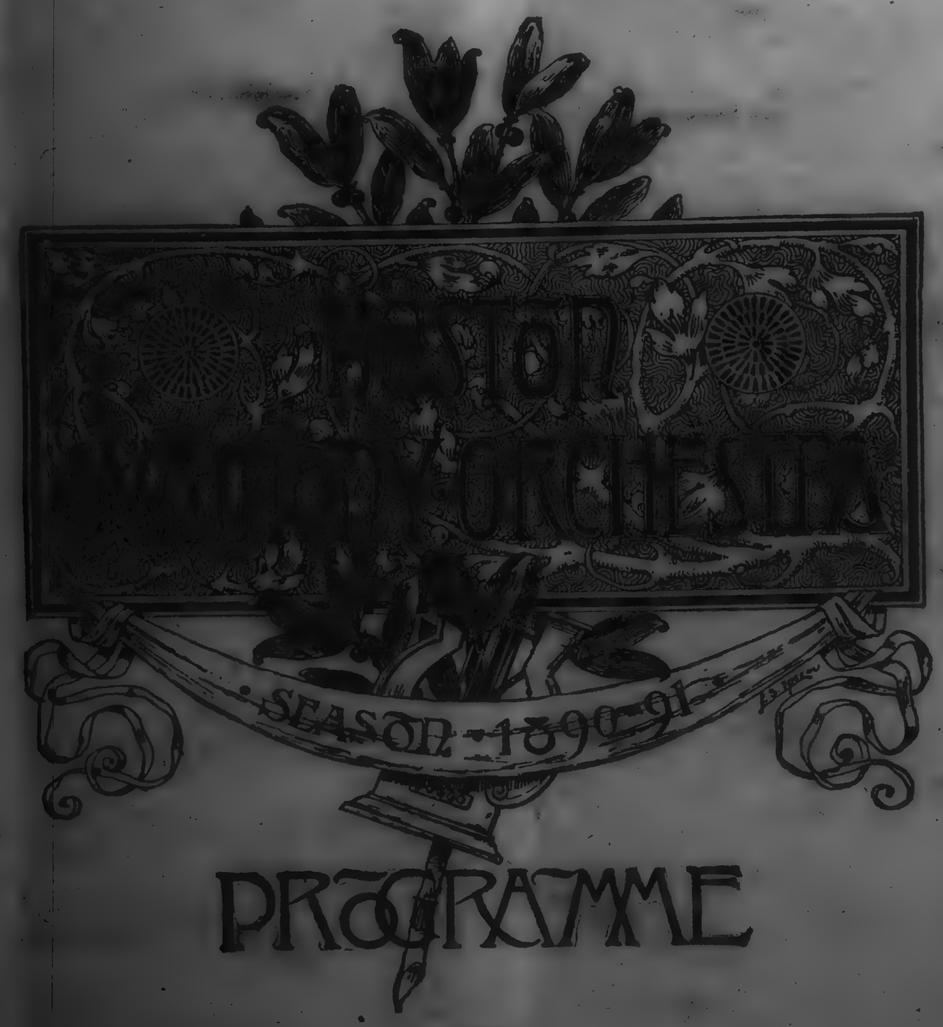
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Chickering Hall, - - New York,

Tuesday Evening, Feb. 24, at 8.



PROGRAMME

4

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

F. A. SCHWAB, Acting Manager of New York Concerts.

Academy of Music, - Philadelphia.

Wednesday Evening, Feb. 25, at 8.

PROGRAMME

4

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager

BRATTLE HALL, CAMBRIDGE.

:::1891.:::

MONDAY EVENING, MARCH 2.

TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 31. TUESDAY EVENING, APRIL 21.

THREE CONCERTS,

BY THE

KNEISEL QUARTET.

FRAN. KNEISEL, 1st Violin. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. ALWIN SCHROEDER, 'Cello.

ASSISTING ARTISTS:

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH,
MME. HELEN HOPEKIRK,
MR. ERNST PERABO,
MR. ARTHUR FOOTE.

Tickets, with reserved seats for the series of three Concerts, $5.00. The sale of Season Tickets opens at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, Thursday morning, January 29th.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Chickering Hall, - - New York,

Tuesday Evening, Feb. 24, at 8.

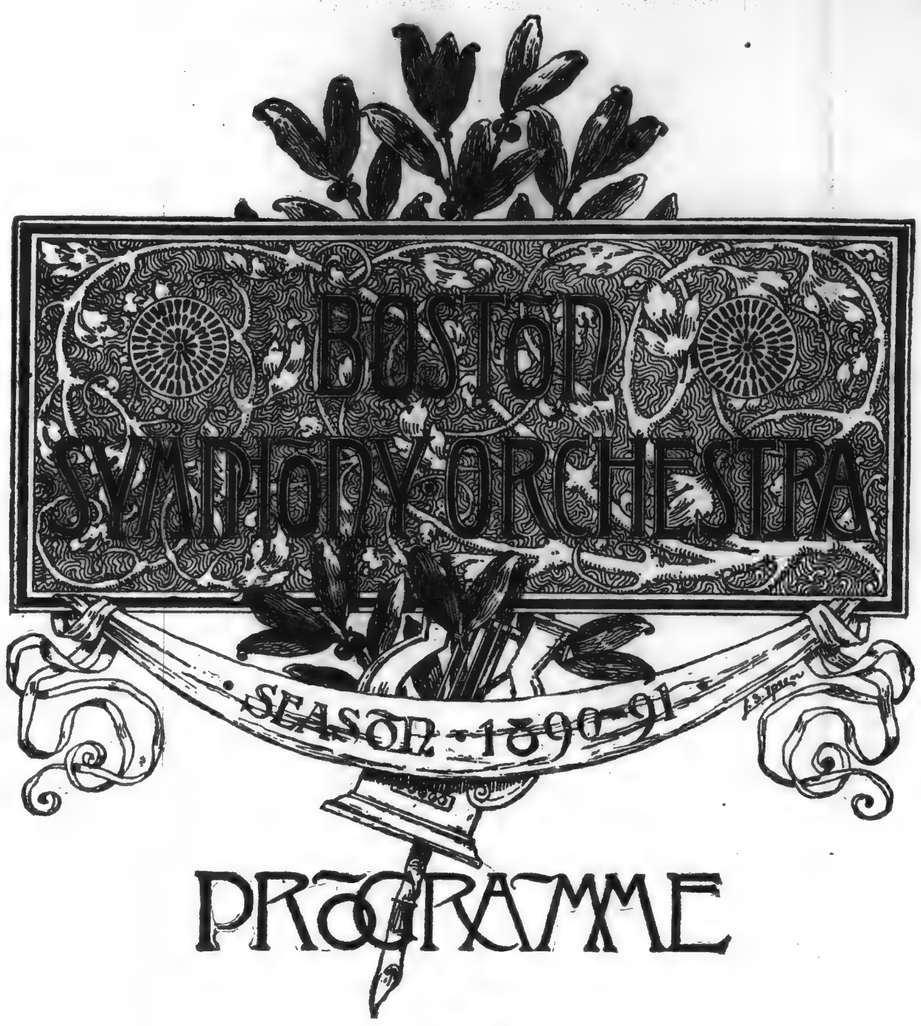
PROGRAMME

4

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.
F. A. SCHWAB, Acting Manager of New York Concerts.

Hyperion Theatre, - New Haven,

Monday Evening, Feb. 23, at 8.



PROGRAMME

4

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Academy of Music, - Philadelphia.

Wednesday Evening, Feb. 25, at 8.

PROGRAMME

4

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager

FIRST CONCERT.

Monday Evening, March 2d, at 8.

KNEISEL QUARTET

and

Mr. ERNST PERABO.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN.	QUARTET, E flat.
BEETHOVEN.	ANDANTE and PRESTO from the Kreutzer Sonata.
BEETHOVEN.	TRIO, B flat major.

Hyperion Theatre, - New Haven,

Monday Evening, Feb. 23, at 8.

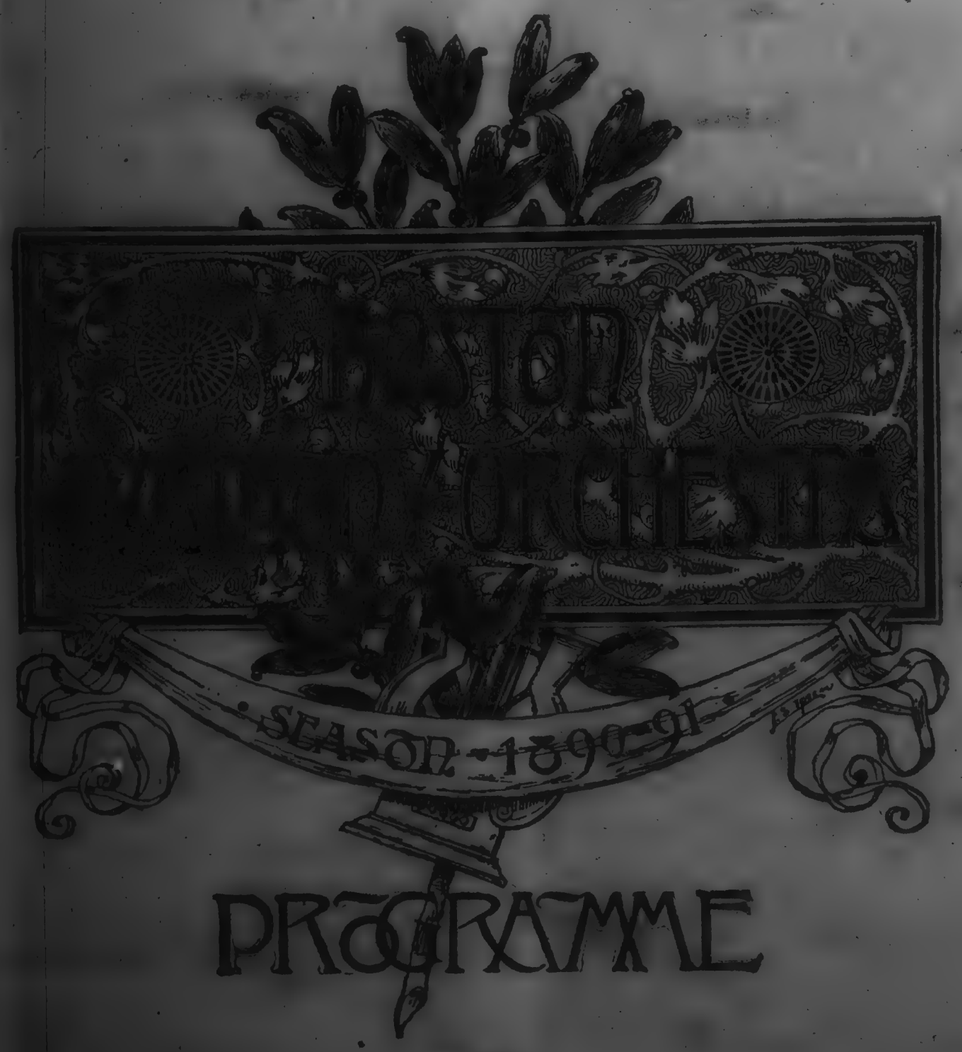
PROGRAMME

4

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Chickering Hall, - - New York,

Tuesday Evening, Feb. 24, at 8.



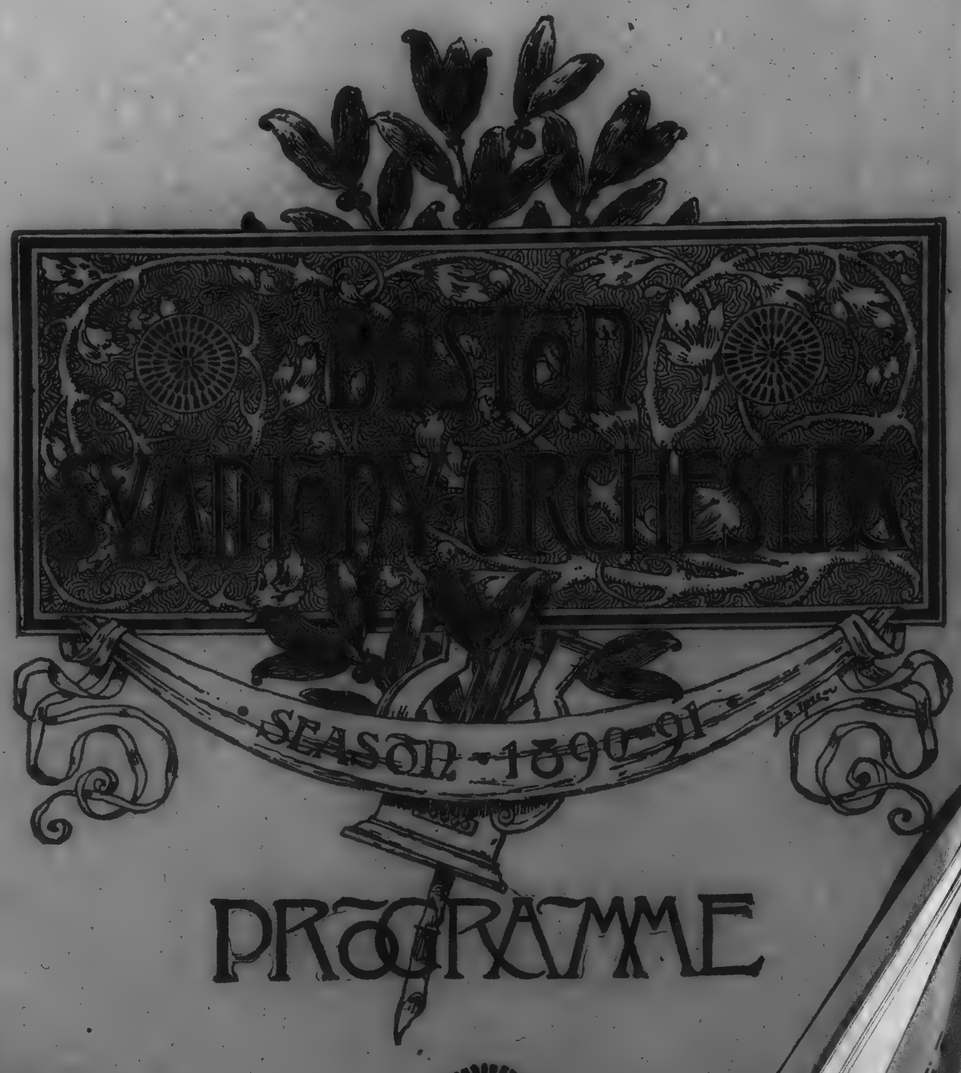
PROGRAMME

4

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.
F. A. SCHWAB, Acting Manager of New York Concerts.

Academy of Music, - Philadelphia.

Wednesday Evening, Feb. 25, at 8.



PROGRAMME

4

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Mana

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Lincoln Music Hall, - Washington.

Thursday Evening, Feb. 26, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1890-91

PROGRAMME

4

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Concordia Opera House, Baltimore,

Friday Evening, Feb. 27, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1890-91

PROGRAMME

3

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager

Infantry Hall, - - - - Providence,

Wednesday Evening, March 4, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1890-91

PROGRAMME

5

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Boston Daily Traveller

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 4, 1891.

MUSIC NOTES.

Observations on the Seaboard Trip of the Symphony Orchestra.—Local Concert Items.

The February trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra among the coast cities was of greater pecuniary advantage to the organization than any similar series of concerts in its history. While New York is being rent with the prospectuses of permanent orchestras to be established, and rumors concerning the change in the conductor of the old Philharmonic Society, the only positive announcement with fixed dates, etc., of orchestral concerts for 1891-92, is that of the Boston orchestra. Six, instead of four, concerts will be given, and there is already a long list of subscribers booked. The orchestra gives a set of concerts in March in Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore, and late in April starts on its annual trip West, for which extraordinary preparations are being made in the cities fortunate enough to secure a concert.

In New York Mr. Nikisch repeated the "Waldweben," in response to a demonstration. The Herald intended to be complimentary in referring to the concert when it said, "Nothing more beautifully finished than the playing of the Brahms D minor symphony, or of the 'Siegfried'-'Waldweben' music has not been heard here," but it wasn't.

The state of things in Philadelphia is attested by the North American in these words:

Despite the driving rain-storm, the Academy of Music was crowded as it rarely is, except on very great occasions, the attraction being the fourth in Mr. Nikisch's current season of symphony concerts. All the seats in the auditorium and most of the room which the a sles afford were occupied with more or less damp but agreeably expectant people, and when the dapper little conductor, looking as usual like a work of art, stepped upon the stage 20 minutes late, but apparently quite dry, he faced a larger audience than he had ever before confronted in Philadelphia. It is remarkable, or it would be remarkable if they were less meritorious, or if less efficient missionary work had preceded them, how popular these Boston Symphony Concerts have become in this city. Each time the attendance is larger than the last. The secret of it, of course, is that the public has grown to appreciate the extraordinary excellence of Mr. Nickisch's orchestra, and the further fact that it comes here in its entirety. There is no thinning out to save expense. The orchestra goes on the road in its full force of 83 members, and that is a policy of liberality which people like.

The next Kneisel Quartet concert last of the series, comes on Monday evening, March 9. The soloists will be Mrs. Julia Wyman, contralto, and Mme. Helen Hopekirk, pianist. The programme will include a new MS. piano and violin sonata by Mme. Hopekirk.

At the Symphony concert of March 13 a new suite for strings and four horns, by Arthur Whiting, will be played.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, MARCH 5, 1891.

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Goldmark's Only Symphony and Wagner's Music.

At the fifth concert of the present Infantry Hall series of the Boston Smyphony Orchestra, there was an audience eminent in point of size as well as quality, larger, indeed, than any symphony audience hitherto. This programme was played:

Goldmark. Symphony (Rustic Wedding), op. 26
Wedding March, with variations—Moderato molto.
Bridal Song—Allegretto.
Serenade—Allegretto moderato scherzando.
In the Garden—Andante.
Dance—Finale. Allegro molto.
Saint-Saens. " Rondo Cappriccioso for Violin
Wagner. " Waldweben from "Seigfried"
Bach. " Air from Suite in D
Wagner. " Overture, "Die Meistersinger"

This symphony of Goldmark's has been slightly scorned by certain of the ultra-esthetic in music, but it has been much played in Europe, and more than any other work, gave Goldmark, the poor young Jew whom Rubinstein took under his inspiring care, his later reputation. He was also a pupil of Jansa, the distinguished violin virtuoso, and there is an impression widely extant that if his studies had not been interrupted, the world would have had from him something strangely great. "The Rustic Wedding" is a peculiar composition. Everywhere remarkable ingenuity is displayed. And a curious thing about the work, and one which makes it truer to its particular theme, is the admixture of sorrow and weeping. Gayness and nuptial songs and splendid courtiers seem to be set over against simple country folk, friends with long, long thoughts about the future of the young ones dear to them, and the irreressible sobs of near and loving kinsfolk. It is very interesting at points. Perhaps the andante of the garden scene is the most beautiful, though the bridal song is bright, and the dance drifts into a conservatory, tete-a-tete suggestiveness that is delightful. Mr. Nikisch's men gave it in such a manner as to lucidly discover its quaint artifices and symbolisms, gave the moderato molto and allegro molto with eloquent delicacy.

The two Wagner numbers were the real victories of the orchestra last night. Waldweben is the title of a little of the music from the second scene of Act II. of "Seigfried," together with a motive from "Die Walkure," and another (solo violin) from "Der Rheingold." It represents the sounds of the forest, as Seigfreid heard them, and was played with sylvan mysterious grace and dainty shading.

In the prelude of "Die Meistersinger" is epitomized the action of the piece itself, which presents the melodies of the solid old master singers first one by one, then in jealous encounter, and finally in peaceful harmony, thus satirizing the quaint old bards and their dissensions. Words are poor things with which to tell the beauties that the orchestra extracted from this music of Wagner's. So finely and entirely were the romanticism and comedy of the prelude interpreted that the last number was accepted as the most enjoyable of a very enjoyable programme.

Mr. T. Adamouski, violin, was the soloist. He played the Saint-Saens rondo full as it is of picturesque and elusive detail, and contrapuntal points, with an admirable, almost marvellous, facility and freedom. Long applause followed him, but no encore was vouchsafed, as the concert was delayed in the beginning. The orchestra was accorded an extra amount of applause, for it performed with unwonted fire and warmth.

At the sixth and last concert, Tuesday evening, April 7, Mme. Antoine Mielke will be the soloist.

[106]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Lincoln Music Hall, - Washington.

Thursday Evening, Feb. 26, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1890-91

PROGRAMME

4

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Concordia Opera House, Baltimore,

Friday Evening, Feb. 27, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1890-91

PROGRAMME

3

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager

Infantry Hall, - - - - Providence,

Wednesday Evening, March 4, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1890-91

PROGRAMME

5

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Boston Daily Traveller

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 4, 1891.

MUSIC NOTES.

Observations on the Seaboard Trip of the Symphony Orchestra.—Local Concert Items.

The February trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra among the coast cities was of greater pecuniary advantage to the organization than any similar series of concerts in its history. While New York is being rent with the prospectuses of permanent orchestras to be established, and rumors concerning the change in the conductor of the old Philharmonic Society, the only positive announcement with fixed dates, etc., of orchestral concerts for 1891-92, is that of the Boston orchestra. Six, instead of four, concerts will be given, and there is already a long list of subscribers booked. The orchestra gives a set of concerts in March in Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore, and late in April starts on its annual trip West, for which extraordinary preparations are being made in the cities fortunate enough to secure a concert.

In New York Mr. Nikisch repeated the "Waldweben," in response to a demonstration. The Herald intended to be complimentary in referring to the concert when it said, "Nothing more beautifully finished than the playing of the Brahms D minor symphony, or of the 'Siegfried'-'Waldweben' music has not been heard here," but it wasn't.

The state of things in Philadelphia is attested by the North American in these words:

Despite the driving rain-storm, the Academy of Music was crowded as it rarely is, except on very great occasions, the attraction being the fourth in Mr. Nikisch's current season of symphony concerts. All the seats in the auditorium and most of the room which the aisles afford were occupied with more or less damp but agreeably expectant people, and when the dapper little conductor, looking as usual like a work of art, stepped upon the stage 20 minutes late, but apparently quite dry, he faced a larger audience than he had ever before confronted in Philadelphia. It is remarkable, or it would be remarkable if they were less meritorious, or if less efficient missionary work had preceded them, how popular these Boston Symphony Concerts have become in this city. Each time the attendance is larger than the last. The secret of it, of course, is that the public has grown to appreciate the extraordinary excellence of Mr. Nickisch's orchestra, and the further fact that it comes here in its entirety. There is no thinning out to save expense. The orchestra goes on the road in its full force of 83 members, and that is a policy of liberality which people like.

The next Kneisel Quartet concert last of the series, comes on Monday evening, March 9. The soloists will be Mrs. Julia Wyman, contralto, and Mme. Helen Hopekirk, pianist. The programme will include a new MS. piano and violin sonata by Mme. Hopekirk.

At the Symphony concert of March 13 a new suite for strings and four horns, by Arthur Whiting, will be played.

[106]

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, MARCH 5, 1891.

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Goldmark's Only Symphony and Wagner's Music.

At the fifth concert of the present Infantry Hall series of the Boston Smyphony Orchestra, there was an audience eminent in point of size as well as quality, larger, indeed, than any symphony audience hitherto. This programme was played:

Goldmark. Symphony (Rustic Wedding), op. 26
Wedding March, with variations—Moderato molto.
Bridal Song—Allegretto.
Serenade—Allegretto moderato scherzando.
In the Garden—Andante.
Dance—Finale. Allegro molto.
Saint-Saens. . . Rondo Cappriccioso for Violin
Wagner. . . . Waldweben from "Seigfried"
Bach. . . . . Air from Suite in D
Wagner. . . . Overture, "Die Meistersinger"

This symphony of Goldmark's has been slightly scorned by certain of the ultra-esthetic in music, but it has been much played in Europe, and more than any other work, gave Goldmark, the poor young Jew whom Rubinstein took under his inspiring care, his later reputation. He was also a pupil of Jansa, the distinguished violin virtuoso, and there is an impression widely extant that if his studies had not been interrupted, the world would have had from him something strangely great. "The Rustic Wedding" is a peculiar composition. Everywhere remarkable ingenuity is displayed. And a curious thing about the work, and one which makes it truer to its particular theme, is the admixture of sorrow and weeping. Gayness and nuptial songs and splendid courtiers seem to be set over against simple country folk, friends with long, long thoughts about the future of the young ones dear to them, and the irreressible sobs of near and loving kinsfolk. It is very interesting at points. Perhaps the andante of the garden scene is the most beautiful, though the bridal song is bright, and the dance drifts into a conservatory, tete-a-tete suggestiveness that is delightful. Mr. Nikisch's men gave it in such a manner as to lucidly discover its quaint artifices and symbolisms, gave the moderato molto and allegro molto with eloquent delicacy.

The two Wagner numbers were the real victories of the orchestra last night. Waldweben is the title of a little of the music from the second scene of Act II. of "Seigfried," together with a motive from "Die Walkure," and another (solo violin) from "Der Rheingold." It represents the sounds of the forest, as Seigfreid heard them, and was played with sylvan mysterious grace and dainty shading.

In the prelude of "Die Meistersinger" is epitomized the action of the piece itself, which presents the melodies of the solid old master singers first one by one, then in jealous encounter, and finally in peaceful harmony, thus satirizing the quaint old bards and their dissensions. Words are poor things with which to tell the beauties that the orchestra extracted from this music of Wagner's. So finely and entirely were the romanticism and comedy of the prelude interpreted that the last number was accepted as the most enjoyable of a very enjoyable programme.

Mr. T. Adamouski, violin, was the soloist. He played the Saint-Saens rondo full as it is of picturesque and elusive detail, and contrapuntal points, with an admirable, almost marvellous, facility and freedom. Long applause followed him, but no encore was vouchsafed, as the concert was delayed in the beginning. The orchestra was accorded an extra amount of applause, for it performed with unwonted fire and warmth.

At the sixth and last concert, Tuesday evening, April 7, Mme. Antoine Mielke will be the soloist.

...AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
...URDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1891.

VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN.

The Soloist a Delight to Lovers of the Exquisite in Music.

...tled enthusiasm is the shortest way to ...Vladimir de Pachmann. He is a living ...odiment of the love of music and musical ... It so dominates him that all care for ...appearances is utterly lost with him or ...upon him. Technique, with all its myriad ...forms of difficulty, he conquered long ago. ...w, all his thought is of the sublime ...spirations which the great masters ...e given to the world. He takes ...n up by intuition, and presents them, ...ways feeling absolutely sure of his art. He ...ves true approbation, and a large audience ...es him to his utmost. But he does not ...ject his artistic conceptions to any popu... vote, or even to any artistic tribunal. ...hen he takes in the audience, he merely ...es to ask them, "Are you with me?" ...and they are always, both the musical and ...musical. To the musical he is a su... delight, and the unmusical hear ...m gladly. His playing is a revelation. ...e makes many motions, but every one of ...them has a meaning, which he is impelled by ...his artistic nature to express. He says him... that to be quiet in music is to be affected, ...ar and a hypocrite. He who does not feel ...ould never play. Money would not pay ...im to listen to such a player. He is called ...he great Chopin player, but he claims the ...same rank as to every other master. ...He says he prays God humbly and daily that ...the name of Liszt, the greatest of all players, ...may never be forgotten. The mention of ...Rubinstein also enthused him. He says, in ...fact, that he worships all true art and all ...true artists.

His playing last evening of the Chopin F ...minor concerto was one of the triumphs to ...be looked for once in a lifetime. Of course, ...the enthusiasm was beyond bound. He took ...it impersonally, as a matter of course. He ...responded with the Chopin valse in D flat, ...and without rising from the piano played the ...encore, "If I were a Bird," because, he said, ...he knew he would be obliged to play it, and ...he wanted to save time. The audience ...still persisted in calling for more, and he gave ...the Chopin study in double thirds.

In every possible way this third concert ...was an immense success. A fine program, a ...superb orchestra, a grand leader, an unri... soloist, and a large audience to inspire ...them all, the verdict was: Come again, and ...whenever you come, welcome! Hoch! hoch! ...hoch! Herren Nikisch and Pachmann!

EVENING BULLETIN.
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
THURSDAY, MARCH 5, 1891.

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Goldmark's Only Symphony and Wagner's Music.

...At the fifth concert of the present In...fantry Hall series of the Boston Smyphony ...Orchestra, there was an audience emi...nent in point of size as well as quality, ...never, indeed, than any symphony audi... ...hitherto. This programme was ...ranged:

...Goldmark. Symphony (Rustic Wedding), op. 26
...Wedding March, with variations—Moderato molto.
...Bridal Song—Allegretto.
...Serenade—Allegretto moderato scherzando.
...In the Garden—Andante.
...Dance—Finale. Allegro molto.
...Saint-Saens. Rondo Cappriccioso for Violin.
...Wagner. Waldweben from "Seigfried."
...Bach. Air from Suite in D.
...Wagner. Overture, "Die Meistersinger."

...This symphony of Goldmark's has been ...slightly scorned by certain of the ultra-...critic in music, but it has been much ...played in Europe, and more than any ...other work, gave Goldmark, the poor ...young Jew whom Rubinstein took under ...his inspiring care, his later reputation. ...He was also a pupil of Jansa, the dis...tinguished violin virtuoso, and there is ...an impression widely extant that if his ...studies had not been interrupted, the ...world would have had from him some...thing strangely great. "The Rustic Wed... ...is a peculiar composition. Every... ...remarkable ingenuity is displayed. ...And a curious thing about the work, and ...one which makes it truer to its particular ...theme, is the admixture of sorrow and ...gayety. Gayness and nuptial songs and ...merriment courtiers seem to be set over ...against simple country folk, friends with ...long thoughts about the future of ...young ones dear to them, and the ...irresistible sobs of near and loving kins... ...It is very interesting at points. ...Perhaps the andante of the garden scene ...is the most beautiful, though the bridal ...part is bright, and the dance drifts into ...conservatory, tete-a-tete suggestiveness ...is delightful. Mr. Nikisch's men ...played it in such a manner as to lucidly ...uncover its quaint artifices and symboli... ...gave the moderato molto and allegro ...finale with eloquent delicacy.

...The two Wagner numbers were the real ...glories of the orchestra last night. ...Waldweben is the title of a little of the ...music from the second scene of Act II. of ...Seigfried," together with a motive from ..."Walkure," and another (solo violin) ..."Der Rheingold." It represents the ...sounds of the forest, as Seigfreid heard ...them, and was played with sylvan mys... ...grace and dainty shading.

...In the prelude of "Die Meistersinger" ...Wagner introduced the action of the piece itself, ...and presents the melodies of the solid ...master singers first one by one, then ...in jealous encounter, and finally in ...general harmony, thus satirizing the ...old bards and their dissensions. ...These are poor things with which to tell ...of the beauties that the orchestra extracted ...from this music of Wagner's. So finely ...and entirely were the romanticism and ...humor of the prelude interpreted that ...the number was accepted as the most ...delightful of a very enjoyable programme. ...Mr. Adamowski, violin, was the so... ...He played the Saint-Saens rondo, ...full of picturesque and elusive de... ...and contrapuntal points, with an ad... ...almost marvellous, facility and ...warmth. Long applause followed him, ...and an encore was vouchsafed, as the con... ...followed in the beginning. The ...audience accorded an extra amount ...of praise for it performed with un... ...fire and warmth.

...The sixth and last concert, Tues... ...evening, April 7, Mme. Antoine Mielke ...will be the soloist.

The Providence Journal
THURSDAY, MARCH 5, 1891.

WAGNER AND GOLDMARK.

Fifth Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Night.

A storm again greeted the Boston Symphony orchestra last night on the occasion of its fifth concert in Providence this season, but that disagreeable fact did not prevent the attendance of an audience that filled Infantry hall as it is seldom filled for a concert. The unoccupied seats were few and far between. The orchestra was late in getting to the hall, and it was half an hour late when the baton of Mr. Nikisch drew attention to the opening number. The program was:

Goldmark .....
....Symphony ("Rustic Wedding") op. 26.
Wedding March, with variations—Moderato molto.
Bridal Song—Allegretto.
Serenade — Allegretto moderato scherzando.
In the Garden—Andante.
Dance—Finale. Allegro molto.
Saint-Saens....Rondo Cappriccioso for Violin.
Wagner.....Waldweben from "Seigfried."
Bach.....Air from Suite in D.
Wagner.....Overture, "Die Meistersinger."

This is a distinctively popular program—perhaps as popular as is often met with made up from music the pure classical character of which is not open to discussion. The same apparent desire to meet a demand for bright, popular music has been noticeable in the two preceeding symphony concerts, and it has aroused in some minds the philistinistic hope that the splendid orchestra may on some future occasion find itself giving a Strauss waltz to an enraptured Providence audience.

The performance of the beautiful and bewitching Goldmark symphony was the most enjoyable feature of the concert last night, while the peculiar Wagnerian fragment, Waldweben, was the most notable. To us down here on Narragansett bay, who take our music with a somewhat less serious intent and do not essay to make a cult of it, it was a new phase of Wagner; a dreamy, tender, weird quality which we know well enough existed in his works but which we had not been made familiar with in the concerted form.

The finished and elegant performance of Saint-Saens's "Rondo Cappriccioso" for the violin by Mr. P. Adamowski, was a delicate and delicious treat. His execution has seldom been excelled on the Infantry hall platform, and only equaled once this season—by his associate in the ranks of the orchestra, Mr. Franz Kneisel.

The next, and last, concert is to be on the evening of April 7.

The Beacon.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAR. 7, 1891.

The Symphony concerts will be resumed tonight, when Mr. Leo Schulz will be the soloist and introduce to Boston two movements from a concerto by Reinecke for his instrument, the violoncello. The orchestral assignments are the overtures to "Lohengrin" and "Egmont" and a symphony, new here, by August Klughardt, who was born about forty-five years ago in Köthen, and has held various positions as a teacher and kapellmeister in Posen, Lübeck and Weimar, being at a late date in Neustrelitz.

The Symphony Orchestra is on the road down from dignity. An encore of the "Siegfried" wood music was granted facilely at the last New York concert.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The Kneisel Quartette will give in Union Hall, on Monday evening next, the last of this season's series of contests. A programme of special interest has been prepared which will hold back many of the Four Hundred even from the fascinations of Bernhardt. It will include a manuscript sonata for violin and piano, written by Mme. Helen Hopekirk, who will play it with Mr. Kneisel; the andante from Tschaikowsky's D-major quartette; the scherzo from Cherubini's E-flat-major quartette, and Haydn's "Kaiser" quartette in C-major. There will also be some vocal music, the artist being Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, who has chosen an arioso by Delibes and several manuscript songs left by the late Mr. Otto Dresel. There are but a few unsold seats and application may be made for them at Music Hall now.

Boston Post
SATURDAY MORNING, MARCH 7, 1891

The programme of the symphony concert which will be given this evening at Music Hall is as follows: Prelude, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Symphony, D major, No. 3, Klughardt (first time); two movements from Concerto for 'cello, Reinecke (first time); overture, "Egmont," Beethoven. Mr. Leo Schulz will be the soloist.

.....

The sixth and last of the Kneisel Quartette concerts takes place Monday evening, March 9. The club will be assisted by Mrs. Walter C. Wyman and Mrs. Helen Hopekirk. The programme is as follows: Sonato for piano and violin by Mrs. Hopekirk (first time); andante from Tschaikowsky's Quartette in D major, and Scherzo from Cherubini's Quartette in E flat major, and Haydn's Kaiser Quartette in C major, op. 77. Mrs. Wyman will sing a selection from the songs of Delibes and four songs by Otto Dressel, three of which are in MS. She sings these latter by request.

.....

The seventh Cambridge concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Sanders Theatre, March 19. The programme ... Overture, "Prometheus." Gold... ...movement from the concerto for ... in four "Seigfried." ... Mr.

Boston Transcript
SATURDAY, MARCH 7, 1891.

For the concert by the Symphony Orchestra in the Music Hall next Saturday night the programme is as follows: Prelude to "Othello," Kong; concerto for pianoforte, op. 17, Paderewski, first time here, Mrs. Julia Rivé-King; suite for strings and horns, op. 8, Arthur Whiting, first time here; Rakoczy March, Liszt.

The Kneisel Quartet will bring its series of chamber concerts to a close, at Union Hall, next Monday. This is the programme: Sonata, pianoforte and violin, Mrs. Hopekirk; Arioso, Delibes; Andante from quartet D major, Tschaikowsky; Scherzo from quartet E-flat major, Cherubini; Songs with Pianoforte, Otto Dresel; Kaiser Quartet, Haydn. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman will be the singer, and Mrs. Helen Hopekirk the pianist.

SUNDAY HERALD.
BOSTON, MARCH 8, 1891.

The Symphony Concert: Soloist Mr. Leo Schulz.

"Ship Ahoy" Still in Popular Favor—Some Notable Benefit Concerts—Another Operatic Matinee—Mme. Fursch-Madi's Reappearance—"Parsifal" to Be Heard—News and Gossip.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch gave the patrons of the Symphony concerts a fine programme last evening, and the performance of the several works announced was in keeping with their meritorious characteristics.

Mr. Leo Schulz, 'cello player, was the soloist, and he brought forward the romance and allegro movements from Reinecke's concerto in D minor, op. 82, as his contribution to the season's novelties. The composition is a peculiarly pleasing one, and affords so good a player as Mr. Schulz am le opportunities to display his virtuosity. He gave a thoroughly charming interpretation of the romance, his full rich tone and admirable expression suiting the characteristics of the movement most happily. His technical skill met all the difficulties of the allegro movement with grace and ease, and he made his mastery of the 'cello most prominent in this movement. The player gained a hearty recognition of his value as a soloist, as well as of his good taste in the selection of his contribution to the programme.

A most notable novelty in the list of symphonic works played this season was also included in the evening's performances, this being August Klughardt's symphony in D major, op. 37. The composer's name is unfamiliar to American audiences, although some of his chamber music compositions have had a place upon programmes this side of the water. A native of Dessau, he is on record as the composer of three operas, three symphonies and an oratorio, as well as several contributions to the chamber music of the day, his principal occupation being he duties of Hof-Kappellmeister in his native place. The symphony is a welcome addition to the repertoire of the season, and its characteristics are such that the work of the analytical reviewer is unnecessary to the hearer. It is a singularly clear and straightforward work, full of melodious ideas, rich in its embellishments, and constantly interesting. The composer is a master of the art of contrasting tone colors, and his use of the modern orchestra is that of the conservative writers of the ante-Wagner period. The opening allegro is bright and tuneful from the first statement of its leading themes, and in the working out of these subjects there is a strong resemblance to the ever-varying combinations of the Bach style, but this is never carried to an imitative degree. The largo movement is a gem in this class of writings, and its melodious ideas are admirably worked out with a constant and fascinating variety of orchestral combinations. The third movement, moderato allegro, is full of interesting musical thoughts cleverly expressed, and the final allegro brings the work to a most enjoyable finale, the well contrasted use of the different departments of the band giving an especially effective finale to the symphony. Mr. Nikisch's performance of the work gave all its beauties striking prominence, and gained a very enthusiastic recognition of the merits of the symphony from the audience.

The evening's programme was introduced by a masterly performance of the "Lohengrin" prelude, and concluded with an equally satisfying reading of the "Egmont" overture.

Next Saturday evening the soloist will be Mme. Julia Rive King, pianist, and the programme will include Arnold Krug's symphonic prologue to Shakespeare's "Othello"; Paderewski's concerto for piano and orchestra, in A minor, op. 17 (for the first time in the United States); Arthur Whiting's suite for strings and four horns, in G minor, op. 8 (its first performance), and Liszt's "Rakoczy March."

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.
SUNDAY, MARCH 8, 1891.

A New Klughardt Symphony in Music Hall.

Closing Weeks of the Successful Run of "Ship Ahoy."

A Round of Unusually Interesting Concert Programmes.

August Klughardt's symphony No. 3, in D major, was the novelty offered Friday afternoon's rehearsal audience by Director Nikisch. This composer's name has not before appeared on a Boston symphony programme, and he may certainly be credited with having made a pleasant impression for a first appearance. The symphony is distinctly a lively and melodious work. Very seldom has a symphony been heard here containing so much of what might be termed mirthful melody. The melody of the principal subject is prominent throughout the four movements in ever changing and fanciful combinations. At times it is so brisk and gay that a jolly, old-fashioned dance is suggested; especially is this true of the final allegro. The scherzo is brilliantly scored for the full orchestra, but the other movements are marked by a surprising absence of brass. Deliciously contrasted effects of the strings and wood are gained in the third movement, which is, perhaps, the most notable of the four. There is a deal of originality shown in treatment and development of the symphony's many and strongly marked subjects, and if the writing is not a work of pronounced scholastic merit it is always entertaining.

Mr. Leo Schulz was the soloist, and very cordially was he received at both the afternoon and evening concerts. The favorable impression made by his playing last season was decidedly strengthened, and the young violoncelloist has every reason for believing himself an established favorite with Boston symphony patrons. He played two movements from Reinecke's concerto in D minor, op. 82, a work not before heard here. It is a most enjoyable composition, and Mr. Schulz' artistic interpretation received merited recognition. Wagner's "Lohengrin" prelude began the concert, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture brought it to an end. Both were superbly played.

The programme for this week's concert is as follows:

Symphonic prologue to Shakespeare's Othello ..... Arnold Krug
Concerto for piano and orchestra, in A minor, op. 17 ..... Paderewski
Suite for strings and four horns, in G minor, op. 8 ..... Arthur Whiting
Rakoczy march ..... Liszt

Mrs. Julia Rive-King will be the soloist.

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 8, 1891.

THE SYMPHONIES.

EIGHTEENTH CONCERT.

The works performed at Music hall last evening were:

Wagner ..... Prelude, "Lohengrin"
August Klughardt, Synphony No. 3, in D major, Op. 37
Allegro. Largo. Moderato; Allegro. Allegro. (First time in United States.)
Reinecke Two Movements from Concerto for Violoncello, in D minor, Op. 82.
Romance. Allegro moderato. (First time in Boston.)
Beethoven ..... Overture, "Egmont"
Soloist, Mr. Leo Schultz.

The programme must have easily won the appreciation of the least musical auditor present, yet without offending the most fastidious for nearly all the music performed was exceptionally melodious, and no less melodious than artistically well made.

The Symphony by Klughardt is by no means a profound and elaborate work, and contains many an ear-catching and tuneful air, simply harmonized and so unpretentious withal that the symphonic character of the work might somewhat reasonally be impeached; yet the orchestration is well made, and in the last movement, as in other parts of the work, the composer proves himself to be an able contrapuntist.

Mr. Schulz played the two movements from the Reinecke Concerto in a charmingly refined and masterly manner.

The orchestra's performance of the Wagner Prelude was by no means creditable, and the interpretation of the work was anything but effective.

The symphony was delightfully played, as was also the Beethoven Overture to Egmont.

THE LAST KNEISEL CONCERT.

The last of this season's series of concerts by the Kneisel quartette will be given in Union hall Monday evening. The programme is one of special interest and excellence. It includes a manuscript sonata for violin and piano, by Mme. Helen Hopekirk, who will play it with Mr. Kneisel; the andante from Tschaikowsky's D-major quartette; the scherzo from Cherubini's E-flat-major quartette and Haydn's "Kaiser" quartette in C-major. There will be vocal music also, by Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, who has chosen an arioso by Delibes and several manuscript songs left by the late Mr. Otto Dresel. But few seats are left and these should be applied for at Music hall.

...Mrs. Hopekirk presented ... with a lovely diamond stuff... performance of his orchestra at ... the other day in New York.

...That the Symphony orchestra ... preciated as it deserves in New York ... made pretty conclusively manifest by the ... fact that between Wednesday and Saturday ... of last week $2500 worth of tickets were ... subscribed for, for the six performances ... next winter, beginning in November, and ... is safely predicted that by May 1 not ... possible seat will be left.

[107]

Baltimore American
AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1891.

VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN.

The Soloist a Delight to Lovers of the Exquisite in Music.

Bottled enthusiasm is the shortest way to spell Vladimir de Pachmann. He is a living embodiment of the love of music and musical art. It so dominates him that all care for mere appearances is utterly lost with him or upon him. Technique, with all its myriad forms of difficulty, he conquered long ago. Now, all his thought is of the sublime inspirations which the great masters have given to the world. He takes them up by intuition, and presents them, always feeling absolutely sure of his art. He loves true approbation, and a large audience excites him to his utmost. But he does not subject his artistic conceptions to any popular vote, or even to any artistic tribunal. When he takes in the audience, he merely desires to ask them, "Are you with me?" And they are always, both the musical and unmusical. To the musical he is a supreme delight, and the unmusical hear him gladly. His playing is a revelation. He makes many motions, but every one of them has a meaning, which he is impelled by his artistic nature to express. He says himself that to be quiet in music is to be affected, a liar and a hypocrite. He who does not feel should never play. Money would not pay him to listen to such a player. He is called the great Chopin player, but he claims the same rank as to every other master. He says he prays God humbly and daily that the name of Liszt, the greatest of all players, may never be forgotten. The mention of Rubinstein also enthused him. He says, in fact, that he worships all true art and all true artists.

His playing last evening of the Chopin F minor concerto was one of the triumphs to be looked for once in a lifetime. Of course, the enthusiasm was beyond bound. He took it impersonally, as a matter of course. He responded with the Chopin valse in D flat, and without rising from the piano played the Henselt "If I were a Bird," because, he said, he knew he would be obliged to play it, and he wanted to save time. The audience still persisted in calling for more, and he gave the Chopin study in double thirds.

In every possible way this third concert was an immense success. A fine program, a superb orchestra, a grand leader, an unrivaled soloist, and a large audience to inspire them all, the verdict was: Come again, and whenever you come, welcome! Hoch! hoch! hoch! Herren Nikisch and Pachmann!

EVENING BULLETIN.
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
THURSDAY, MARCH 5, 1891.

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Goldmark's Only Symphony and Wagner's Music.

At the fifth concert of the present Infantry Hall series of the Boston Smyphony Orchestra, there was an audience eminent in point of size as well as quality, larger, indeed, than any symphony audience hitherto. This programme was played:

Goldmark. Symphony (Rustic Wedding), op. 26
Wedding March, with variations—Moderato molto.
Bridal Song—Allegretto.
Serenade—Allegretto moderato scherzando.
In the Garden—Andante.
Dance—Finale. Allegro molto.
Saint-Saens. . . Rondo Cappriccioso for Violin
Wagner. . . . . Waldweben from "Seigfried"
Bach. . . . . Air from Suite in D
Wagner. . . . Overture, "Die Meistersinger"

This symphony of Goldmark's has been slightly scorned by certain of the ultra-esthetic in music, but it has been much played in Europe, and more than any other work, gave Goldmark, the poor young Jew whom Rubinstein took under his inspiring care, his later reputation. He was also a pupil of Jansa, the distinguished violin virtuoso, and there is an impression widely extant that if his studies had not been interrupted, the world would have had from him something strangely great. "The Rustic Wedding" is a peculiar composition. Everywhere remarkable ingenuity is displayed. And a curious thing about the work, and one which makes it truer to its particular theme, is the admixture of sorrow and weeping. Gayness and nuptial songs and splendid courtiers seem to be set over against simple country folk, friends with long, long thoughts about the future of the young ones dear to them, and the irrepressible sobs of near and loving kinsfolk. It is very interesting at points. Perhaps the andante of the garden scene is the most beautiful, though the bridal song is bright, and the dance drifts into a conservatory, tete-a-tete suggestiveness that is delightful. Mr. Nikisch's men gave it in such a manner as to lucidly discover its quaint artifices and symbolisms, gave the moderato molto and allegro molto with eloquent delicacy.

The two Wagner numbers were the real victories of the orchestra last night. Waldweben is the title of a little of the music from the second scene of Act II. of "Seigfried," together with a motive from "Die Walkure," and another (solo violin) from "Der Rheingold." It represents the sounds of the forest, as Seigfreid heard them, and was played with sylvan mysterious grace and dainty shading.

In the prelude of "Die Meistersinger" is epitomized the action of the piece itself, which presents the melodies of the solid old master singers first one by one, then in jealous encounter, and finally in peaceful harmony, thus satirizing the quaint old bards and their dissensions. Words are poor things with which to tell the beauties that the orchestra extracted from this music of Wagner's. So finely and entirely were the romanticism and comedy of the prelude interpreted that the last number was accepted as the most enjoyable of a very enjoyable programme.

Mr. T. Adamowski, violin, was the soloist. He played the Saint-Saens rondo, full as it is of picturesque and elusive detail, and contrapuntal points, with an admirable, almost marvellous, facility and freedom. Long applause followed him, but no encore was vouchsafed, as the concert was delayed in the beginning. The orchestra was accorded an extra amount of applause, for it performed with unwonted fire and warmth.

At the sixth and last concert, Tuesday evening, April 7, Mme. Antoine Mielke will be the soloist.

The Telegram.
PROVIDENCE.
THURSDAY, MARCH 5, 1891.

WAGNER AND GOLDMARK.

Fifth Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Night.

A storm again greeted the Boston Symphony orchestra last night on the occasion of its fifth concert in Providence this season, but that disagreeable fact did not prevent the attendance of an audience that filled Infantry hall as it is seldom filled for a concert. The unoccupied seats were few and far between. The orchestra was late in getting to the hall, and it was half an hour late when the baton of Mr. Nikisch drew attention to the opening number. The program was:

Goldmark .....
....Symphony ("Rustic Wedding") op. 26.
Wedding March, with variations—Moderato molto.
Bridal Song—Allegretto.
Serenade — Allegretto moderato scherzando.
In the Garden—Andante.
Dance—Finale. Allegro molto.
Saint-Saens....Rondo Cappriccioso for Violin.
Wagner.....Waldweben from "Seigfried."
Bach.....Air from Suite in D.
Wagner.....Overture, "Die Meistersinger."

This is a distinctively popular program—perhaps as popular as is often met with made up from music the pure classical character of which is not open to discussion. The same apparent desire to meet a demand for bright, popular music has been noticeable in the two preceeding symphony concerts, and it has aroused in some minds the Philistinistic hope that the splendid orchestra may on some future occasion find itself giving a Strauss waltz to an enraptured Providence audience.

The performance of the beautiful and bewitching Goldmark symphony was the most enjoyable feature of the concert last night, while the peculiar Wagnerian fragment, Waldweben, was the most notable. To us down here on Narragansett bay, who take our music with a somewhat less serious intent and do not essay to make a cult of it, it was a new phase of Wagner; a dreamy, tender, weird quality which we know well enough existed in his works but which we had not been made familiar with in the concerted form.

The finished and elegant performance of Saint-Saens's "Rondo Cappriccioso" for the violin by Mr. T. Adamowski, was a delicate and delicious treat. His execution has seldom been excelled on the Infantry hall platform, and only equaled once this season—by his associate in the ranks of the orchestra, Mr. Franz Kneisel.

The next, and last, concert is to be on the evening of April 7.

The Beacon.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAR. 7, 1891.

The Symphony concerts will be resumed tonight, when Mr. Leo Schulz will be the soloist and introduce to Boston two movements from a concerto by Reinecke for his instrument, the violoncello. The orchestral assignments are the overtures to "Lohengrin" and "Egmont" and a symphony, new here, by August Klughardt, who was born about forty-five years ago in Köthen, and has held various positions as a teacher and kapellmeister in Posen, Lübeck and Weimar, being at a late date in Neustrelitz.

The Symphony Orchestra is on the road down from dignity. An encore of the "Siegfried" wood music was granted facilely at the last New York concert.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The Kneisel Quartette will give in Union Hall, on Monday evening next, the last of this season's series of contests. A programme of special interest has been prepared which will hold back many of the Four Hundred even from the fascinations of Bernhardt. It will include a manuscript sonata for violin and piano, written by Mme. Helen Hopekirk, who will play it with Mr. Kneisel; the andante from Tschaikowsky's D-major quartette; the scherzo from Cherubini's E-flat-major quartette, and Haydn's "Kaiser" quartette in C-major. There will also be some vocal music, the artist being Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, who has chosen an arioso by Delibes and several manuscript songs left by the late Mr. Otto Dresel. There are but a few unsold seats and application may be made for them at Music Hall now.

Boston Post
SATURDAY MORNING, MARCH 7, 1891

The programme of the symphony concert which will be given this evening at Music Hall is as follows: Prelude, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Symphony, D major, No. 3, Klughardt (first time); two movements from Concerto for 'cello, Reinecke (first time); overture, "Egmont," Beethoven. Mr. Leo Schulz will be the soloist.

.....

The sixth and last of the Kneisel Quartette concerts takes place Monday evening, March 9. The club will be assisted by Mrs. Walter C. Wyman and Mrs. Helen Hopekirk. The programme is as follows: Sonato for piano and violin by Mrs. Hopekirk (first time); andante from Tschaikowsky's Quartette in D major, and Scherzo from Cherubini's Quartette in E flat major, and Haydn's Kaiser Quartette in C major, op. 77. Mrs. Wyman will sing a selection from the songs of Delibes and four songs by Otto Dressel, three of which are in MS. She sings these latter by request.

.....

The seventh Cambridge concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Sanders Theatre, March 19. The programme is as follows: Overture, "Prometheus," Goldmark; first movement from the concerto for 'cello, Brahms; Waldweben from "Siegfried," Wagner; symphony, "Im Walde," Raff. Mr. [illegible] will be soloist.

Boston Transcript
SATURDAY, MARCH 7, 1891.

For the concert by the Symphony Orchestra in the Music Hall next Saturday night the programme is as follows: Prelude to "Othello," Kong; concerto for pianoforte, op. 17, Paderewski, first time here, Mrs. Julia Rivé-King; suite for strings and horns, op. 8, Arthur Whiting, first time here; Rakoczy March, Liszt.

The Kneisel Quartet will bring its series of chamber concerts to a close, at Union Hall, next Monday. This is the programme: Sonata, pianoforte and violin, Mrs. Hopekirk; Arioso, Delibes; Andante from quartet D major, Tschaikowsky; Scherzo from quartet E-flat major, Cherubini; Songs with Pianoforte, Otto Dresel; Kaiser Quartet, Haydn. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman will be the singer, and Mrs. Helen Hopekirk the pianist.

SUNDAY HERALD.
BOSTON, MARCH 8, 1891.

The Symphony Concert: Soloist Mr. Leo Schulz.

"Ship Ahoy" Still in Popular Favor—Some Notable Benefit Concerts—Another Operatic Matinee—Mme. Fursch-Madi's Reappearance—"Parsifal" to Be Heard—News and Gossip.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch gave the patrons of the Symphony concerts a fine programme last evening, and the performance of the several works announced was in keeping with their meritorious characteristics.

Mr. Leo Schulz, 'cello player, was the soloist, and he brought forward the romance and allegro movements from Reinecke's concerto in D minor, op. 82, as his contribution to the season's novelties. The composition is a peculiarly pleasing one, and affords so good a player as Mr. Schulz am le opportunities to display his virtuosity. He gave a thoroughly charming interpretation of the romance, his full rich tone and admirable expression suiting the characteristics of the movement most happily. His technical skill met all the difficulties of the allegro movement with grace and ease, and he made his mastery of the 'cello most prominent in this movement. The player gained a hearty recognition of his value as a soloist, as well as of his good taste in the selection of his contribution to the programme.

A most notable novelty in the list of symphonic works played this season was also included in the evening's performances, this being August Klughardt's symphony in D major, op. 37. The composer's name is unfamiliar to American audiences, although some of his chamber music compositions have had a place upon programmes th s side of the water. A native of Dessau, he is on record as the composer of three op eras, three symphonies and an oratorio, as well as sev eral contributions to the chamber music of the day, his principal occupation being he duties of Hof-Kappellmeister in his native place. The symphony is a welcome addition to the repertoire of the season, and its characteristics are such that the work of the analytical reviewer is unnecessary to the hearer. It is a singularly clear and straightforward work, full of melodious ideas, rich in its embellishmen s, and constantly interes ing. The composer is a master of the art of contrasting tone colors, and his use of the modern orchestra is that of the conservative writers of the ante-Wagner period. The opening allegro is bright and tuneful from the first statement of its leading themes, and in the working out of these subjects there is a strong resemblance to the ever-varying combinations of the Bach style, but this is never carried to an imitative degree. The largo movement is a gem in this class of writings, and its melodious ideas are admirably worked out with a constant and fascinating variety of orchestral combinations. The third movement, mo erato allegro, is full of interesti g musical thoughts cleverly expressed, and the final allegro brings the work to a most enjoyable finale, the well contrasted use of the different departments of the band giving an especially effective finale to the symphony. Mr. Nikisch's perf rmance of the work gave all its beauties striking prominence, and gained a very enthusiastic recognition of the merits of the symph ny from the audience.

The evening's programme was introduced by a m sterly performance of the "Lohengrin" prelude, and concluded with an equally satisfying reading of the "Egmont" overture.

Next Saturday evening the s loist will be Mme. Julia R ve Kin , pianist, and the programme will include Arnold Krug's symphonic prologue to Shakespeare's "Othello"; Paderewski's concerto for piano and orchestra, in A minor, op. 17 (for the first time in the United State); Art ur Whiting's suite or strin s and four horns, in G minor, op. 8 (its first performance), and Liszt's "Rakoczy March."

Boston Sunday Globe
TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.
SUNDAY, MARCH 8, 1891.

A New Klughardt Symphony in Music Hall.

Closing Weeks of the Successful Run of "Ship Ahoy."

A Round of Unusually Interesting Concert Programmes.

August Klughardt's symphony No. 3, in D major, was the novelty offered Friday afternoon's rehearsal audience by Director Nikisch. This composer's name has not before appeared on a Boston symphony programme, and he may certainly be credited with having made a pleasant impression for a first appearance. The symphony is distinctly a lively and melodious work. Very seldom has a symphony been heard here containing so much of what might be termed mirthful melody. The melody of the principal subject is prominent throughout the four movements in ever changing and fanciful combinations. At times it is so brisk and gay that a jolly, old-fashioned dance is suggested; especially is this true of the final allegro. The scherzo is brilliantly scored for the full orchestra, but the other movements are marked by a surprising absence of brass. Deliciously contrasted effects of the strings and wood are gained in the third movement, which is, perhaps, the most notable of the four. There is a deal of originality shown in treatment and development of the symphony's many and strongly marked subjects, and if the writing is not a work of pronounced scholastic merit it is always entertaining.

Mr. Leo Schulz was the soloist, and very cordially was he received at both the afternoon and evening concerts. The favorable impression made by his playing last season was decidedly strengthened, and the young violoncelloist has every reason for believing himself an established favorite with Boston symphony patrons. He played two movements from Reinecke's concerto in D minor, op. 82, a work not before heard here. It is a most enjoyable composition, and Mr. Schulz' artistic interpretation received merited recognition. Wagner's "Lohengrin" prelude began the concert, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture brought it to an end. Both were superbly played.

The programme for this week's concert is as follows:

Symphonic prologue to Shakespeare's Othello ..... Arnold Krug
Concerto for piano and orchestra, in A minor, op. 17 ..... Paderewski
Suite for strings and four horns, in G minor, op. 8 ..... Arthur Whiting
Rakoczy march ..... Liszt

Mrs. Julia Rive-King will be the soloist.

...ic Nikisch adds [illegible] ...ments as one of the best of con... musicians, that of chess player... game he is a great devotee.

—Mrs. Havemeyer presente... with a lovely diamond scarf pin after the performance of his orchestra at ... music the other day in New York.

—That the Symphony orchestra is appreciated as it deserves in New York is made pretty conclusively manifest by the fact that between Wednesday and Saturday of last week $2500 worth of tickets were subscribed for, for the six performances next winter, beginning in November, and it is safely predicted that by May 1 not a possible seat will be left.

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 8, 1891.

THE SYMPHONIES.

EIGHTEENTH CONCERT.

The works performed at Music hall last evening were:

Wagner..... ....Prelude, "Lohengrin"
August Klughardt, Synphony No.3, in D major, Op. 37
Allegro. Largo. Moderato; Allegro. Allegro.
(First time in United States.)
Reinecke Two Movements from Concerto for Violoncello, in D minor, Op. 82.
Romance. Allegro moderato.
(First time in Boston.)
Beethoven,..... Overture, "Egmont"
Soloist, Mr. Leo Schultz.

The programme must have easily won the appreciation of the least musical auditor present, yet without offending the most fastidious for nearly all the music performed was exceptionally melodious, and no less melodious than artistically well made.

The Symphony by Klughardt is by no means a profound and elaborate work, and contains many an ear-catching and tuneful air, simply harmonized and so unpretentious withal that the symphonic character of the work might somewhat reasonably be impeached; yet the orchestration is well made, and in the last movement, as in other parts of the work, the composer proves himself to be an able contrapuntist.

Mr. Schulz played the two movements from the Reinecke Concerto in a charmingly refined and masterly manner.

The orchestra's performance of the Wagner Prelude was by no means creditable, and the interpretation of the work was anything but effective.

The symphony was delightfully played, as was also the Beethoven Overture to Egmont.

THE LAST KNEISEL CONCERT.

The last of this season's series of concerts by the Kneisel quartette will be given in Union hall Monday evening. The programme is one of special interest and excellence. It includes a manuscript sonata for violin and piano, by Mme. Helen Hopekirk, who will play it with Mr. Kneisel; the andante from Tschaikowsky's D-major quartette; the scherzo from Cherubini's E-flat-major quartette and Haydn's "Kaiser" quartette in C-major. There will be vocal music also, by Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, who has chosen an arioso by Delibes and several manuscript songs left by the late Mr. Otto Dresel. But few seats are left and these should be applied for at Music hall.

[107]

FESTIVAL BULLETIN

A Journal devoted to the Interests of the

LOUISVILLE MAY MUSIC FESTIVAL

Vol. I. LOUISVILLE, KY., MARCH 2, 1891. No. 2.

The • Commercial • Club,

LOUISVILLE, KY.

MEMBERSHIP 1,325.

ORGANIZATION FOR 1890-91

PRESIDENT:
FRANK N. HARTWELL.

FIRST VICE-PRESIDENT:
OWEN GATHRIGHT, JR.

SECOND VICE-PRESIDENT:
FRANK VON BORRIES.

DIRECTORS:

JOHN S. MORRIS, ANGUS R. ALLMOND,
PEYTON N. CLARKE, ALVAH L. TERRY,
T. J. BATMAN, GEO. BRADEN,
ROLAND WHITNEY, E. J. McDERMOTT,
TRACY UNDERHILL, A. H. ROBINSON.

SECRETARY:
LUCIEN M. ADKINS.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY:
THOS. P. CRAIG.

TREASURER:
J. M. BORNTRAEGER.

DIRECTOR OF CHORUS:
C. H. SHACKLETON.

Organized to promote the material interests of Louisville and the State. Offices, N. W. Cor. Fourth and Main streets, in the largest building of its character south of the Ohio river, and constructed by the young men of Louisville.

SIGNORINA CLEMENTINA DEVERE.

In according to Signorina DeVere those same characteristics which gave Gerster such pre-eminence as a queen of song, the press of New York has done her only simple justice. With all of Gerster's marvelous execution, she has a voice of the same mellow and flute-like beauty, together with an added strength.

Whether upon the concert or operatic stage, she is equally at home, and always the possessor of such womanly attraction and magic vocal skill as makes every listener an immediate and willing captive. She is fair and pale, has lustrous, large, dark eyes, and a thoughtful expression, and in figure is very well proportioned. She is quite young, and was born in Paris, her father being a French lawyer and her mother an English lady. She studied singing at the Conservatory of Music in Florence, Italy, and also with Albertine Baucarde, and then made her debut in "The Huguenots" at the Pagliano Theater in that city. She also sang there in "La Somnambula," and then appeared in Milan, Naples, San Carlo, Rome and afterward returned to Paris, where she studied further with Gounod and then sang in "Faust." Later she studied "Hamlet" with Thomas, and sang for Verdi. Subsequently she went on a professional tour to South America, and then appeared at Madrid and Barcelona; she achieved a pronounced success at the Worcester Festival of 1880, and at the festival of the Handel and Haydn Society, Boston, May, 1890, and was the bright particular star of the Cincinnati Festival of 1890. Miss DeVere is to be the prima donna of the Buffalo Festival, and is also to sing an important engagement at Pittsburgh.

DEVERE AND THE "STABAT MATER.'

Miss DeVere has but recently sung in the "Stabat Mater" in Boston, and the following from the pen of the very clever musical writer of the Living Church, and referring more particularly to the composition, must be of interest. After treating of a grand symphony concert by Nikisch, there follows: In the same hall, the next evening, the Handel and Haydn Society sang the grand "Stabat Mater," by Dvorak, assisted by the "Smyphony" orchestra, and under the direction of the veteran Carl Zerrahn. The soloists were, Clementina DeVere, Emily Winant, Emil Fischer, all of New York, and William J. Winch, of Boston. The composition in all its exuberance of deep religious emotion—for it is full of tears and implorations—and its strange, solemn beauty of construction suffered something from the very magnitude of the choral body, with a mistaken hastening of the tempos, which are "largo" or "andante" for the most part, while the choral numbers often are so subtly written that they, in passages, lie almost out of reach of adequate delivery; yet, all in all, the conclusion was irresistible that this "Stabat Mater" must supersede all others and banish, in good time, the irreverent and voluptuous setting of Rossini.

CORADI COLLIERE, TRAPPIST MONK.

In the memorable production of "Elijah" in Louisville twenty-two years ago by the Mendelssohn Society, the part of Elijah was sung by Coradi Colliere, who now lies in the lonely burying-ground of the Trappist Monks at the Abbey of Gethsemane. Colliere had a magnificent voice, and was particularly fitted in personal appearance to present the character of Elijah. He was tall and patriarchal, his hair and beard being long and white, and he was very bald. Colliere had been upon the operatic stage, and was considered a wonderful artist, but he was of a deeply religious temperament and soon wearied of the footlights. He sang afterward in concert with great success, but finally settled down in Louisville as a teacher of the voice. He was a pillar in the musical life of this city, and brought many pupils here to study under the shadow of his genius. Some great domestic sorrow drove him from the world, and he became Father Joseph of that solemn brotherhood in the Trappist Abbey. Father Joseph finally became guest master at the monastery and then the people he had known "in the world" caught occasional glimpses of him in his voluntary religious exile. It is only a few years ago that he died, and a simple cross marks his resting-place.

—Miss Gertrude Edmands, the Boston contralto, says the New York Musical Courier, sang at three concerts, and no vocalist ever sang herself into the hearts of her listeners more quickly and completely than did this young lady. Her voice is pure and rich, without a flaw, not immense in volume, but exquisitely beautiful in intonation and tonal expression. She phrases beautifully. Miss Edmands is to sing at the Kentucky May Festival.

GEO. G. FETTER PRINTING CO., LOUISVILLE

[108]

HOW THEY DO IT IN BOSTON.

MUSIC HALL, BOSTON, MASS., Friday, Feb. 20, 1891.

MY DEAR FRIEND SHACKLETON: Thinking that a brief account of the incidents connected with our regular Friday afternoon public rehearsal today might be of interest to you, I venture to describe a scene, the counterpart of which has not been shown anywhere else in this country or in the world. As you are already aware every seat in our Music Hall, seating 2,400, was sold for the season at our annual auction sale last September, both for the twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals and the twenty-four Saturday evening concerts, each series separate in itself. But on Friday afternoon we throw open our second balcony—first come, first served—to the purchasers of the twenty-five cent admission tickets, which have been most appropriately nicknamed "rush tickets." Of these we sell about 1,000, and as there are only 460 seats in our second balcony, with about 150 seats on the steps alongside the stage, this leaves about 400 people who are obliged to stand. This morning it is snowing hard, but we are quite independent of the weather as our limit of "rush tickets" was sold two days ago, and we have been turning people away ever since with absolutely nothing to sell. As a matter of fact, even if we wished to sell more tickets, we could not, as the Inspector of Buildings limits our sale, and a violation of their orders might lose us our license. It is now 11 o'clock, and there are actually four ladies out in the corridor sitting on the floor at the entrance to the hall, waiting until the doors open at half past one, so as to be the first in the rush for the free seats in the upper balcony. Between now and half past one the crowd will keep increasing until the doors open, when a pushing, swaying, eager, but all the time good-natured mob of five or six hundred, mostly ladies, elbow their way past the lightning door-keeper, some throwing their tickets at him, and away they tear up the stairs, until in less than five minutes all the seats are filled, and these musical enthusiasts have a full hour in which to get their breath, rearrange their tousled attire and read the analytical programs which are such a commendable feature of these concerts. A few moments before half past two the members of the orchestra file slowly to their places, and directly the slight figure of Conductor Nikisch is seen approaching from the stage entrance; there is the usual greeting of applause, a cursory but comprehensive glance of the conductor about him, he steps to his platform, a hush falls upon the audience of over 3,000 and the concert begins. This scene is repeated every Friday afternoon. Last week when Mrs. Nikisch was the soloist, we sold out our limit of "rush tickets" on the previous Wednesday, and, having an excellent opportunity to get a record, instructions were given to the ticket-seller to keep an accurate list of those turned away. From Wednesday at 3 p. m. until 2:30 on Friday afternoon, when the concert began, we turned away 1,400 disappointed patrons. The enclosed clipping from the New York Sun of January 18, will show you that it is not only in Boston that we score a great success, but elsewhere as well. Once a month we omit our usual weekly concerts, and make a trip, including New Haven, Conn., New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. On our January trip to these cities we sold every seat in the house in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington before we opened the doors, a record never before achieved by any other similar organization in this country. In fact our concerts in these cities have become as much a part of the musical season as here in Boston, and if we are accorded the same flattering attendance at our concerts during the coming Festival as we have had in Louisville in the past, we hope to add her name to our list.

Yours sincerely,
FRED R. COMEE,
Assistant Manager B. S. O.

The following is the Sun extract referred to:

"The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra appear to be as prosperous outside of Boston as in the parent city. Tuesday evening's performance in Chickering Hall brought together the largest audience that ever attended any of the band's entertainments in New York. In Philadelphia on Wednesday 4,000 auditors, 1,000 of whom had bought standing-room tickets, crowded the Academy of Music, and in Washington on Thursday the limit of admissions authorized by the Inspector of Buildings was reached."

THEY ARE REALLY GOING.

The impression may prevail to some extent that the cry, "The seats are going" is not based on fact, but is raised merely to increase the sale of seats. Those who come each day now to mark off seats can testify, however, to its truth. There are but 125 seats left now in the parquette, and as some people do not care to sit anywhere else, it might be respectfully suggested to them that if they wish to sit there during the May Music Festival, it would be well for them to make haste and secure a choice out of the seats that remain. There is not a bad seat in the parquette, though of course some are just a little more desirable than others.

KENTUCKY'S MAY MUSIC FESTIVAL.

KENTUCKY is to have in May a finer Music Festival than has yet been given south of the Ohio river, and one that will compare most favorably with any that have been presented in the musical centres of the East. The date of the event has been set for May 12th to 16th inclusive, the first performance to be on Tuesday night, continuing Wednesday afternoon, Wednesday night and Thursday, Friday and Saturday nights.

The principal feature will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Herr Nikisch, late of Berlin, and a veritable wizard of the baton, consisting of seventy performers, among which are a number of instrumental soloists of great note. This orchestra has a world-wide reputation, and the music-loving people of the State have greeted with delight the announcement of its engagement for Louisville.

The leading soprano will be Signorina Clementina De Vere, of Paris, and not Miss Eames, the American singer as was first announced. The idea was to secure one of the two, and Miss De Vere's manager has at last been able to change her Pittsburgh dates so that she can sing here in May. Under

M. A. HUSTON, Sec. THEODORE HARRIS, Pres.
Louisville Insurance Company,
251 FIFTH STREET, LOUISVILLE, KY.
Fire, + Tornado + and + Cargo + Insurance.
YOUR BUSINESS SOLICITED.

J. J. FISCHER, President. EDMUND RAPP, Cashier.
GERMAN INSURANCE BANK,
North Side Market, bet. 2d and 3d.
CAPITAL AND SURPLUS, - - $500,000.00.
BANK OF DEPOSIT.
DIRECTORS.
J. J. FISCHER, W. H. EDINGER, NICK FINZER, H. WELLENVOSS, J. HAXTHAUSEN, CHAS. WINKLER, E W. HERMAN.
COLLECTIONS AND EXCHANGE.
The above Bank solicits deposits, pays interest on time deposits, buys and sells exchange on all principal cities in the United States, makes collections in any part of the country, and issues exchange payable at sight in the principal cities of Germany, Switzerland, France, and in any part of Europe.

Telephone 1519-2.
JAMES C. McFERRAN,
FIRE INSURANCE,
Personal attention given to all Business. 606 COMMERCE.

NATIONAL LIBRARY CO., SUCCESSORS TO R. S. AYERS, 625 Fourth Avenue, Louisville, Ky.
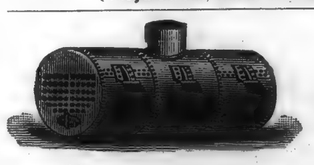
DEALERS IN
Sheet Music and Music Books, Etc.
Send for a Catalogue of our Ten Cent Music, containing All the Late and Popular Pieces of the Day.

WORLD-RENOWNED KNABE PIANOS ESTABLISHED 1851. VOSE
PIANO TUNING.
LOW PRICES FOR CASH OR ON TIME.
EMIL WULSCHNER
632 FOURTH AVENUE,
LOUISVILLE, KY.
C. RIEGGER, Manager.
PALACE ORGANS WULSCHNER
FINEST IN THE WORLD. HAVE NO SUPERIOR.

DENHARD'S, 225, 227, 229 W. MARKET ST.
DO YOU WANT TO FURNISH AN OFFICE? Do you want to Furnish a House or any part of an Office or House? If so, do not begin doing it until you have looked through our stock of Carpets, Furniture and House Furnishings. Our price and elegant display is what takes to the buying public. Don't fail to visit us.
DENHARD'S, 225, 227, 229 W. MARKET ST.

Business Education
THOROUGH INSTRUCTION IN BOOK-KEEPING, SHORT-HAND, TYPE-WRITING, PENMANSHIP, TELEGRAPHY, ETC., ETC., AT THE BRYANT & STRATTON BUSINESS COLLEGE SOUTH-WEST CORNER THIRD AND JEFFERSON STREETS, LOUISVILLE, KY. CATALOGUE FREE.

TRY ST. BERNARD COAL.
And we feel sure you will like it. You can save 50 cents per load in using it instead of Pittsburgh or Jellico, and many think it just as good. It holds fire longer, makes no cinders, and makes as hot fire. We also sell Anthracite Coal, Lump and Crushed Coke, as well as Pittsburgh and all other kinds of coal. We would be pleased to have your orders.
Office: 346 W. Main St., near Fourth. Telephone 932—Ring 2 & 1783—Ring 2
ST. BERNARD COAL COMPANY,
YARDS: Kentucky St., bet. 13th & 14th. Floyd Street, North of Washington.
S. H. NEWBOLD, Manager.



JOHN MITCHELL,
STEAM BOILER MANUFACTURER,
313, 315 & 317 ELEVENTH STREET,
Telephone 725, Ring 2. LOUISVILLE, KY.

BALLARD'S OBELISK FLOUR
ALWAYS RELIABLE.
Main Street Brewery,
SENN & ACKERMAN,
1710 to 1720 West Main Street,
LOUISVILLE, KY.

this arrangement Miss Eames has signed a contract abroad and will not come to America until later. Miss De Vere will form a most interesting attraction. She is a lovely woman, and is regarded as by far the finest singer on American shores. An interesting sketch of her appears on the first page of this number. There will be five other vocal soloists, all of whom have won laurels before the footlights.

Another soprano is Frau Nikisch, the wife of the director, a distinguished vocalist with a European reputation, and whose singing, when she made her American debut recently in New York, and sang afterward in Boston and Philadelphia, received the most enthusiastic praise of the Eastern critics and of musical circles. There is still another soprano to be engaged, whose name will be given as soon as possible. It is guaranteed that this singer shall be an artist of the first class.

The contralto will be Miss Gertrude Edmands, of Boston, recognized as the leading contralto of the East.

The remaining two singers represent the masculine elements of the soloists, and both are notable figures in the music of to-day. One is Mr. Whitney Mockridge, late of Chicago, and now of New York, a tenor whose voice and methods have been pronounced exquisite and perfect. The other is Mr. William Ludwig, of London, the famous basso.

But this is not all. Two grand musical works, Mendelssohn's Oratorio of "Elijah" and Dvorak's "Stabat Mater," are to be produced on a more magnificent scale than ever before attempted in this section.

There will be a chorus of 250 voices, selected from the best singers in Louisville and vicinity, and this organization is now under rehearsal, with Mr. C. H. Shackleton, of the Musical Club, as its director. The event will be a great musical treat, and the price has been made even lower than is consistent with the programme to be offered. Season tickets will be sold from now until April 1st, at ten dollars ($10) each, and after that date single seats will be sold at $2.50 for each performance. It will thus be seen that it is an advantage to purchase season tickets now, first, because they are cheaper, and second, because better seats can be had.

Reduced railroad and steamboat fares from all points.

MAKE A NOTE OF THIS.

Season tickets now sell at ten dollars each. On April 1st they will be advanced to fifteen dollars each. Secure seats now while desirable ones are to be had and before the price is advanced. Why not have the best seats at the cheapest rate? The office for the sale of seats is at the Commercial Club in the Commerce Building. Write to the Secretary for full information about the festival.

Digby Bell and his wife are now with the McCaull Opera Company.

FROM THE STATE PRESS.

[Park City Times.]

The May Musical Festival to be held at Louisville under the auspices of the Commercial Club of that city will be a magnet that will draw hundreds and thousands of visitors to the Falls City this spring. The Commercial Club of that city has proven of great benefit to the business element, but we know of no other similar organization in the State that has accomplished very much, in fact, the most of them have died out.

***

[Hopkinsville New Era.]

Mr. Fall Taylor, of Louisville, is in town, looking after the interests of the Kentucky May Music Festival, which will be given in that city May 12-16th, inclusive, under the auspices of the Louisville Commercial Club. This will be the grand musical event of the year, and the citizens of this section should do all in their power to render it a success, as most of our people will attend it.

WHERE WE GOT OUR DO RE MI.

An interesting feature of a recent church service in the East was the ascription, after the sermon, by the vested choir. It was adapted and arranged by Mr. Dan Dore Ezechiels, a graduate of the institution known as the "King's Twenty-two Pupils," in the Hague, Holland, and a favored pupil of the eminent Dutch composer, Marinus, from the famous Latin hymn to St. John written in 770 by Paul, deacon of the Church of Aquilla. The old hymn, or chant, played an important role in musical history. The words were as follows:

Ut queant laxis,
Resonare fibris,
Mira gestorum,
Famuli tuorum,
Salve polluti,
Labii reatum,
Sancte Johannes.

And it so happened that in the air of the chant the first syllable of each line but the last fell upon the successive tones of the scale, C, D, E, etc. After it had been sung for over four centuries, the monk Guido Aretinus dawned upon the musical horizon (if the narrow limits of the art in those days could warrant the term) and invented the modern system of notation by means of a staff, with lines and spaces indicating the pitch, using the syllables from the old chant to designate the notes. The "ut" was changed to "do" for convenience and euphony, and a seventh syllable "si" (derived from initials of the last line, S and I.), was introduced in the seventeenth century, and thus the system has stood ever since. Our school boys and girls to-day owe their do, re, mi, fa, sol, la, si, do, to this chant more than 1,100 years old.

—It may be interesting to know that there are fifteen different nationalities represented in the Boston Symphony orchestra, as follows: America, England, Germany, France, Italy, Russia, Hungary, Poland, Austria, Bohemia, Croatia, Roumania, Sweden, Holland and Canada.

Capital, $300,000. Surplus, $80,000.

Farmers' & Drovers' Bank of Louisville

Pays Interest on Savings deposits and time Certificates. Solicits your account.

R. S. VEECH, PRESIDENT. J. W. NICHOLS, CASHIER.

J. H. LINDENBERGER, President. JNO. J. HARBISON, Vice-President.
WM. R. JOHNSON, Cashier. F. H. JOHNSON, Ass't Cashier.

MERCHANTS' NATIONAL BANK,

Capital, $500,000 LOUISVILLE, KY. Surplus and Profits, $200,130

GENERAL BANKING BUSINESS.

Solicits the accounts of MERCHANTS, MANUFACTURERS and INDIVIDUALS.

DANIEL QUILP, Sole Proprietor and Manager JAS. B. CAMP, Business Manager.

AMPHITHEATRE AUDITORIUM,

4th AND HILL STREETS,

ONLY FOR GREAT ATTRACTIONS.

Next attraction "THE SOUDAN," week March 30, 1891.

WEAVER'S BUSINESS COLLEGE,

N. E. Cor. Fourth and Market Streets, Louisville, Ky.

ENTRANCE ON FOURTH ST.

BEN C. WEAVER, President. L. COMINGOR, Secretary.
CLARENCE M. GORDON, Principal of Shorthand Department.

Book keeping Commercial Arithmetic, Penmanship, Shorthand, Typewriting, etc.

NOTICE.

The largest net dividends ever declared by any Building and Loan Association are the twelve per cent. dividends of the National Building and Loan Association of Louisville. Because this Association deducts nothing from payments on stock for expenses, and its dividends are all net gain to the members, and are declared upon the entire amount paid in on stock, while other companies deduct from eight to ten cents per share each month for expenses, or to make up dividends, and would have to declare from 15 to 20 per cent. dividends upon the remainder to make good these reductions. For these reasons the cash surrender value of stock in "The National" is always greater than in any other company, and will mature from one to three years sooner than in any company which deducts an expense fund from capital stock.

Call at the office or write for particulars. Address C. M. Phillips, General Manager, Commercial Building, Louisville, Ky.

Directors: John H. Leathers, John L. Dunlap, John B. Pirtle, C. M. Phillips, Harry Weissinger, H. V. Loving, J. M. Cabell, A. G. Langham, John B. Castleman, George M. Davie, John S. Morris, George B. Eastin, William C. Kendrick, Paul Jones, Stephen E. Jones. 1t.

HE DIDN'T PLAY "SECOND FIDDLE."

In a neighboring town, very near Louisville, indeed, the leader of the fashionable set had issued invitations to a reception which she proposed giving to a distinguished visitor. Some days after the invitations were out, which were of course confined to her particular circle, she reflected, somewhat sadly, that, while in this charmed circle there was an abundance of grace, beauty and wealth, there was rather a lack of "special talent;" indeed, in the whole set neither readers, nor singers, nor players upon sweet instruments, of more than ordinary ability, were to be found, and so she was haunted by the uncomfortable thought that the lion might find the evening dull. She therefore determined upon providing a special attraction. The village did not have much to draw from; but one thing it did possess, a musical genius. Not on our lady's list, of course, for he was shiny as to his coat and frayed as to his cuffs. How to secure his services was the problem, for it was well known that, though he was desperately poor, he had the impudence to be proud, and the lady felt instinctively that the worst thing she could do would be to offer him money. So she decided to have recourse to tact. Having arrayed herself in her most becoming gown, and assumed her most gracious manner, she proceeded to the young man's lodgings.

"I am fortunate, indeed, my dear Mr. ——, to find you in. I have come to ask a favor of you—a very, very great favor."

"Will madam be seated?"

"I have invited a few friends to spend Tuesday evening with me; you may have heard."

"I haf heard."

"Only a few. It is to be very informal. I did not send you an invitation, for I feared you would not accept, and that would have hurt me very much. I felt that if I called in person and begged you—yes, begged you—that you would not refuse—that you could not be so unkind."

"Madam flatters me."

"And you—you will bring your violin? But how absurd to ask: No one would be so cruel as to divorce you from your violin, your much-loved violin."

"Yes, I luf my fiolin"

"And you will come early, oh, very early? I wish you to meet Mr. ——, like yourself, an enthusiastic lover of music, and a violinist of note. Ah, you will find him a kindred spirit, I am sure."

"Madam is more than kind, but I have met Mr. ——. I do not luf to meet him any more. And madam will please exguse me, but I nefer play ze second fiddle."

[108]

The Festival Bulletin.

Issued semi-monthly under the auspices of the Press Committee of the Louisville Commercial Club, and edited by the Club's Secretary. Office, Room No. 1005, The Commerce Building, Louisville, Ky. For advertising rates, address John L. Moore, Business Manager.

LOUISVILLE, KY., MARCH 2, 1891.

THE first number of the FESTIVAL BULLETIN has been very pleasantly received by the public, and some people have been so kind as to compliment its appearance and general character. The publishers promise to sustain whatever good reputation they have achieved for the paper, by keeping it absolutely clean, and making it as bright and readable as they can.

The promoters of the May Music Festival are not insensible to the fact that their management will receive more or less criticism. It is one of the essential characteristics of humanity in general to be critical, and indeed much good oftentimes comes from fault-finding. That which is petty and unjust must always recoil upon its authors, and that which proceeds from wisdom will no doubt bring about reformations that ought to be. "The proof of the pudding is in the eating," and that is the sentiment of the Commercial Club's workers in the May Music Festival scheme. One thing is certain, and that is, we are to have a magnificent musical treat, which will not only give an impetus to the artistic ele ments in our make-up, but will prove an important factor in advancing our material interests. Give us your hand and help us to do the best that can be done.

ONE of the most gratifying features of the State capital discussion is the fairness and cordiality with which Louisville's merits are considered in connection with the capital by the press and the people in all parts of the State. Warmly seconding Louisville's claims as the site for the capital, Kentuckians throughout the State are conceding Louisville's easy accessibility, its healthfulness, its metropolitan conveniences for the dispatch of public business, its ample hotel accommodations, and superior general fitness as a capital city. Verily, there is no war, or jealousy even, between the "city folk" and the "country folk," but all realize that the advertisement and prestige of the State would be promoted by having the capital at Louisville, and all Kentuckians' interests thereby best advanced.

DURING the last session of the legislature a charter was obtained for the Polytechnic Auditorium. The charter is a very liberal one and furnishes a broad field to work in.

The incorporators comprise some of the most prominent and public spirited of our citizens, who will lend their energies and talents to make it a success. It is understood that there will soon be a meeting of the incorporators for the election of officers and appointments of the necessary committees to take charge of the details of the work. Would it not be a good idea for those interested in the Polytechnic Auditorium to get to work with a view to celebrating the Centennial of Kentucky's admission into the Union, which occurs June 1, 1892, by making this enterprise a monument commemorative of that event? If this is to be done, no time is to be lost. It is a big undertaking, but that is not to be considered as unfavorable to the project, for this is an age of big undertakings as well as big successes. It deserves to succeed.

LOUISVILLE does not "claim" the capital. It is simply responding to the invitation of the Constitutional Convention to present its claims. But while Louisville is modestly asking the capital, and giving reasons why it believes it should be located here, our friends and the friends of progress throughout the State are demanding that Louisville be made the capital. They realize that the matter should be settled, and settled right.

IT IS announced that Mrs. Jeannette M. Thurber, of the National Conservatory Association has undertaken the organization of a new orchestral society to be located in New York on a permanent financial basis, for the weekly delivery of instructive rehearsals and concerts. Mr. Schwab, the enterprising concert manager, it is stated, is charged with the selection of the new director from among the European celebrities. Mrs. Thurber's characteristic energy and perseverance are this time engaged in the right direction, and already assure the success of the enterprise. This will be in effect a second proprietary orchestral society, like the famous Boston Symphony, only its office will be confined to New York.

A CORRESPONDENT at Franklin, Ky., writes: "There are one hundred reasons why Louisville should be the capital of Kentucky to one reason why it should not be. And if you people of Louisville will properly present your many meritorious claims, the popular sentiment of the whole State will run so strongly in your favor that the Constitutional Convention or the voters of the State at the polls will vote Louisville the capital." The sentiment of the State is running the same way.

THE COMMERCIAL CLUB.

The Louisville Commercial Club is an alliance of business and professional men, having a membership of 1,325 members, and devoted to ad vancing the city's interests.

Now is the time to mark off Festival seats. The good ones are going.

WM. TILLMAN, Cashier. CHAS. MERIWETHER, Ass't Cashier.

FALLS CITY BANK,

LOUISVILLE, KY.,

CAPITAL AND SURPLUS, - $676,101.60.

Transacts • a • General • Banking • Business.

Accounts of Merchants, Manufacturers and Bankers Solicited.

DEPARTMENT FOR SAVINGS. INTEREST ALLOWED ON SAVINGS DEPOSITS.

DIRECTORS:

JOHN T. MOORE, Prest. P. MEGUIAR. DENIS LONG, Vice-Prest.
CHARLES H. PETTET. J. W. E. BAYLY. H. C. WARREN. W. S. WYMOND

KAUFMAN, STRAUS & CO.,

523—525 FOURTH AVENUE,

THE LARGEST IMPORTING RETAILERS OF

DRY GOODS

IN THE SOUTH-WEST.

WRITE FOR SAMPLES.

A GREAT REPERTOIRE.

The following repertoire of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been compiled from a number of programmes of concerts played in Boston during the last two years. It is not a complete list, as it does not contain concertos or vocal numbers. But it is a remarkable showing, and for variety and excellence probably can not be surpassed by any orchestra in the world.

The object of publishing this list is to let the patrons of the Festival see the collection from which the orchestral numbers will be selected. The committee will take up the question of programmes in a few days, and it is willing to receive suggestions from subscribers. Their aim will be to please as many tastes as possible, having always in view the maintenance of a high standard of excellence in the music to be performed:

SYMPHONIES.

Beethoven.—No. 1 in C major, No. 2 in D major, No. 3 in E flat (heroic), No. 4 in B flat, No. 5 in C minor, No. 6 (Pastorale), No. 7 in A, No. 8 in F.

Mozart.—E flat (Koechel No. 543), G. minor (Koechel No. 550), C major (Jupiter).

Haydn.—D major (No. 2 B. & H.), G (No. 13 B. & H.), C major (The Bear).

Schubert.—C major No. 9, B minor No. 8 (unfinished).

Schumann.—B flat No. 1 (Spring), C major No. 2, E flat (Rhenish), D minor No. 4.

Mendelssohn.—Scotch Symphony. Op. 90, m A, Italian Symphony.

Brahms.—No. 1 C minor, No. 2 C major, No. 3 F, No. 4 E minor.

Raff.—No 1 ("To the Fatherland")—"Im Walde."

Berlioz.—Symphonie Fantastique—Harold in Italy.

Dvorak.—No. 1 in D.

Saint Saens.—No. 3 in C minor.

Goldmark.—Rustic Wedding.

Tschaikowsky.—No. 4 in F.

Volkman.—No. 1 in D minor, No. 2 in B flat.

Godard.—Symphonie Orientale.

Gade.—No. 1 in C minor, No. 4 in B flat.

Rubinstein.—No. 2 in C (Ocean).

Borodin.—No. 1 in E flat.

Cowen.—No. 3 in C minor (Scandinavian).

Villiers Stanford.—Irish Symphony.

Lalo.—Spanish Symphony.

G. W. Chadwick.—No. 2.

OVERTURES.

Beethoven.—Coriolanus, Egmont, Leonore No. 3, Dedication of the House.

Wagner.—Tannhauser, Flying Dutchman, Faust.

Schubert.—Overture in E minor.

Weber.—Oberon, Freischutz, Euryanthe

Cherubini—Anacreon, Water Carrier.

Schumann.—Genoveva, Overture, Scherzo and Finale Op. 32.

Meyerbeer.—Struensee.

Berlioz.—Benvenuto Cellini.

Brahms—Academic—Tragic.

Mendelssohn.—Fingal's Cave, Calm Sea, Melusina, Midsummer Night's Dream.

Gluck.—Iphigenia in Aulis.

Goldmark.—Prometheus Bound, Sakuntala, Spring, Penthesilea.

Gade.—Ossian.

Tschaikowsky.—Romeo and Juliet.

Reinecke.—Manfred.

Massenet.—Phedre.

Sterndale-Bennett.—Naiads.

Volkman.—Richard III., Festival in F.

Thomas.—Mignon.

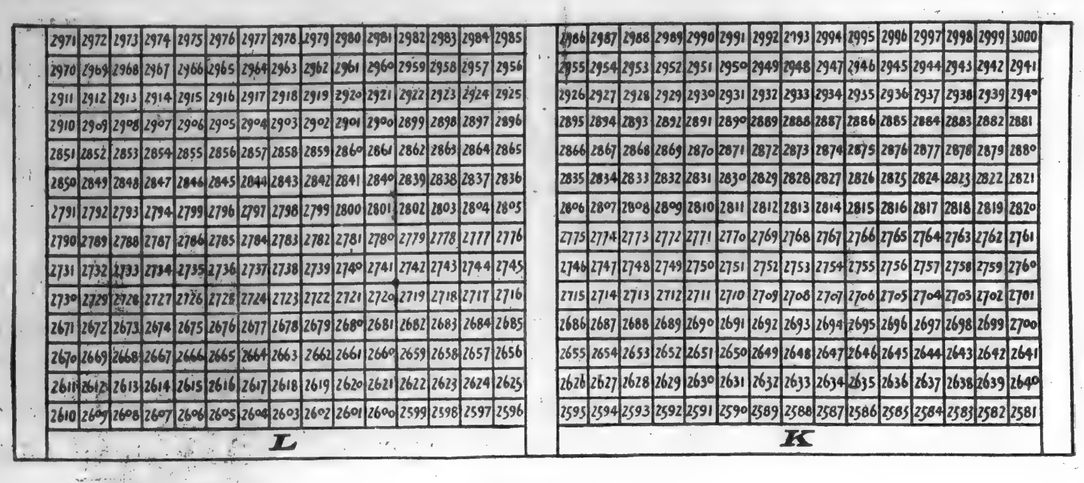
SELECTIONS, SYMPHONIC POEMS, RHAPSODIES, ETC.

Wagner.—Ride of the Walkyries, Siegfried Funeral March, Wotan's Farewell and Fire Charm, Prelude—Lohengrin, Prelude—Meistersinger, Prelude—Tristan and Isolde, Huldigung's March, Waldweben.

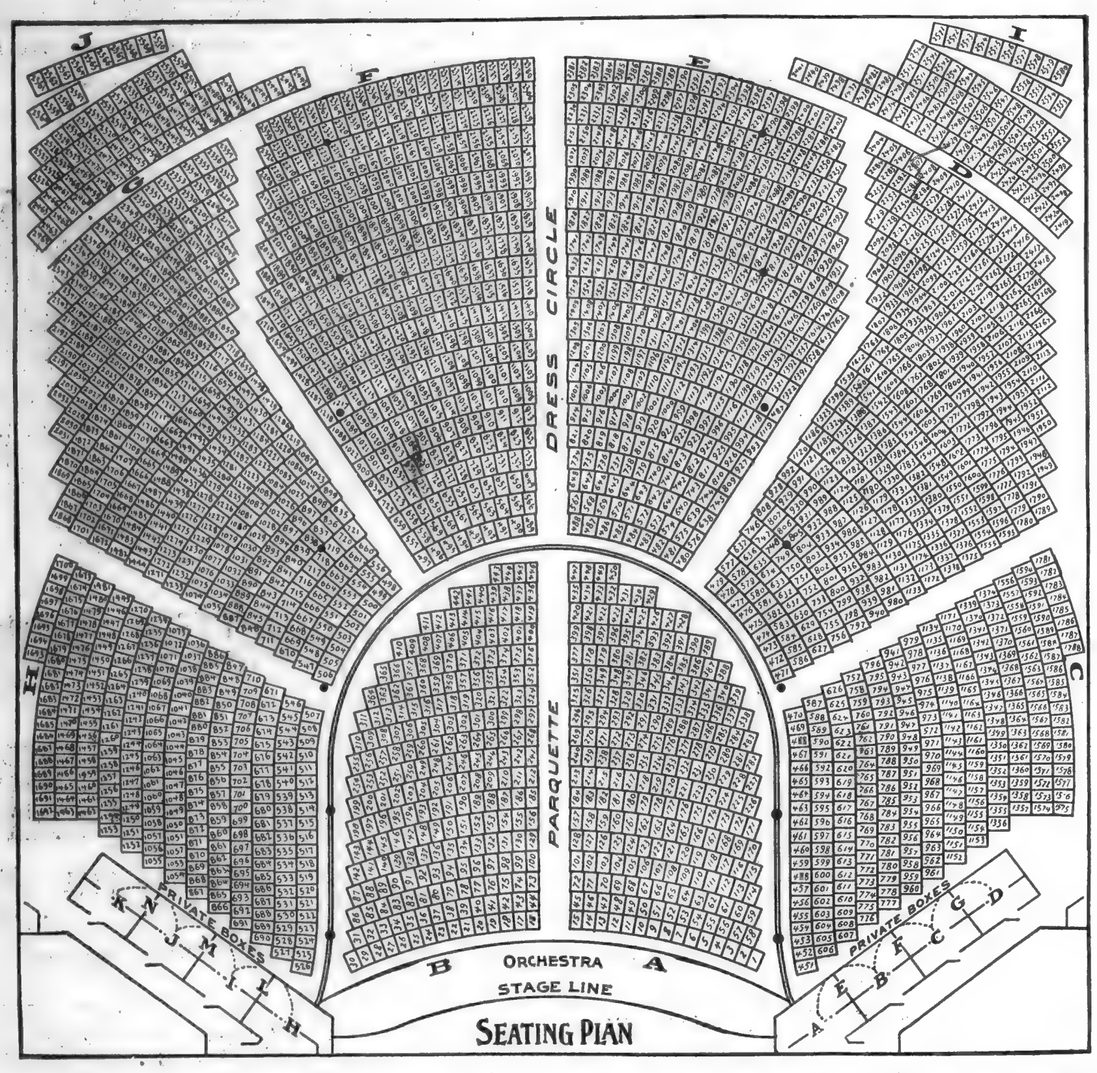
Saint Saens.—Danse Macabre, Le Rouet d'Omphale, Hercules.

Beethoven.—Turkish March, Ballet Music, Prometheus

Schubert.—Funeral March (arranged by Liszt), Entr' Acte from Rosamunde.



BALCONY.



The above cut represents exactly the seating plan of the Auditorium, where the May Music Festival is to be given. Select your seats and send the numbers to the Secretary. If the seats you have chosen have been marked off, he will send you seats as close to them as possible. Enclose check, cash or money order with your request.

Moskowski.—Suite in F.

Dvorak.—Scherzo Capriccioso, Symphonic Variations, Suite in D minor, Slavonic Dances.

Smetana. — Symphonic Poem—"Vltava."

Liszt.—Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1 and No. 2, Symphonic Poem—"Tasso," Symphonic Poem—"Preludes," Symphonic Poem—"Ideal," Symphonic Poem—"Fest Klange," Racokszy March.

Bach.—Pastorale from Christmas Oratorio, Suite in D, Prelude and Fugue (Albert).

Grieg.—Suite—"Peer Gynt."

Paganini.—"Perpetual Motion."

Volkman.—Serenade in F.

Nicode.—Symphonic Variations.

2 Repertoire

Brahms.—Variations on a theme by Haydn.

Svensden.—Norwegian Rhapsody.

Lachner.—Suite in D minor.

Lalo.—Rhapsody.

Strauss, R.—Symphonic Fantasy—"From Italy."

Bruch.—Fantasy for violin, harp and orchestra.

MacDowell.—Symphonic Poem—"Lancelot and Elaine.

C. H. SHACKLETON.

Capital Paid up, $75,000. ESTABLISHED 1890. Surplus, $50,000.

UNION NATIONAL BANK,

S. E. Cor. 6th & Main Sts., Louisville, Ky.

Accounts of Individuals, Manufacturers, Corporations, Banks and Bankers Solicited.

GEO. W. SWEARINGEN, PREST. W. P. OTTER, VICE-PREST. L. O. COX, CASHIER.

Removes Freckles, Moth Patches, Pimples and all Blemishes of the Skin.

—CONSULTATION INVITED.—

Ladies with good complexions should use my "soap" and "almond meal compound" and keep them so.

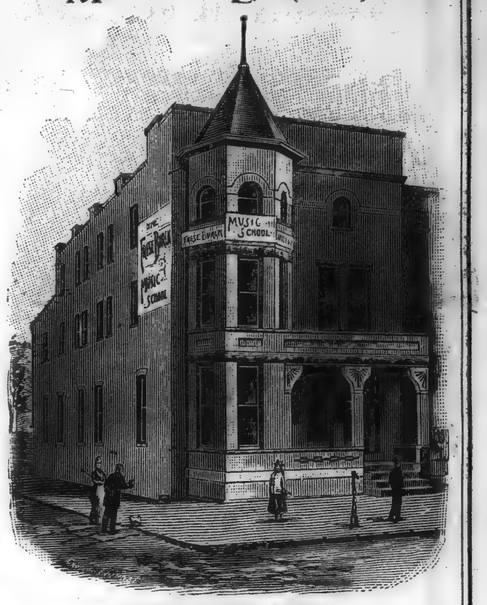
Valuable hints about washing, wiping, and preserving good complexions given free. Prominent Louisville physicians and hundreds of Louisville ladies who have used the Bleach as references.

Marion Walker Face Bleach

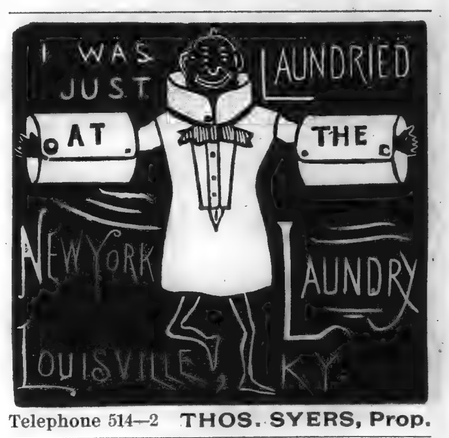
Mrs. Marion Walker,
514 FOURTH AVE.
LOUISVILLE, KY.

DIAMONDS
WM. KENDRICKS SONS,
336. 4TH AVE
LOUISVILLE, KY.
WATCHES JEWELRY SILVERWARE
OUR STORE & ART ROOM ALWAYS OPEN TO RECEPTION OF VISITORS.

THE FRESE-BURCK
Music ✣ School,



424 WEST WALNUT STREET.
CATALOGUE FURNISHED ON APPLICATION.



Telephone 514—2 THOS. SYERS, Prop.

BALLARD'S
OBELISK
FLOUR
ALWAYS RELIABLE.

F. TEUPE,
PIANOS and ORGANS,
713—715 East Gray Street.
BEST ASSORTMENT IN THE CITY
Prices Guaranteed Lower than at any other Store.

WILLARD HOTEL
(Late ALEXANDER HOTEL.)
W. R. LOGAN, Manager.
Nearest Hotel to all Theatres.
Corner Jefferson, Center and Green Sts., Opposite Court House.

REMINGTON
STANDARD
TYPEWRITER
The Remington has stood the test of time and use and is acknowledged to be the Standard and the Best. Call and examine the Remington, No. Five. A complete stock of typewriter ribbons, paper, etc., always on hand. Send for sample book of papers.
G. M. ALLISON & CO.,
No. 448 W. Main St., LOUISVILLE, KY.

[108]

A. C. LEWIS,

HATTER AND FURRIER,

415 Fourth Avenue,

AGENT FOR

Dunlap's Celebrated Hats

AND

CHRISTY'S ENGLISH HATS.

CUT FLOWERS.

ROSE BUDS A SPECIALTY.

FLOWERS ARTISTICALLY ARRANGED.

F. WALKER & CO.,

Telephone 1388—2. 644 FOURTH AVE.

Nursery and Floral C

BICYCLES!

COLUMBIA,

HARTFORD, ROVER.

Bicycles for

Ladies, Men,

Girls and Boys,

ALL SIZES AND PRICES.

Bicycling Sundries.

— Call for Catalogue. —

G. M. Allison & CO.,

448 W. Main St.,

LOUISVILLE, KY.

DIRECTORY OF THE LEADING BUSINESS HOUSES OF LOUISVILLE.

Lumber, Doors, Sash and Blinds.

S. P. Graham, 810 Magazine Street.
W. J. Hughes & Sons Co., Fourteenth and Maple streets.
G. Kline & Son, 1900 West Main Street.

Hotels.

Galt House, $3 to $5 per day, First and Main streets.
Hotel Rassinier, Market, between Fourth and Fifth streets.

Hardware and Cutlery.

W. B. Belknap & Co., Nos. 115 to 121 West Main street.

Architects.

Walters & Stillman, No. 601 Commerce Building.

Piano Dealers.

Smith & Nixon.
Emil Wulschner, No. 632 Fourth avenue.

Banks.

German Insurance, Market, near second.
Farmers' and Drovers', Market, near Fourth avenue.
Falls City, Seventh and Main Streets.
Merchants' National, Main, between Fifth and Sixth streets.

Wagon Manufacturing.

Kentucky Wagon Manufacturing Company.

Life Insurance Companies.

New York Life Insurance Company, Commerce Building.
Kentucky Life and Accident Insurance Company, No. 436 West Jefferson street.
The Sun Life Insurance Company of America, No. 502 West Main street.

Trust Companies.

Columbia Finance and Trust Company, Fifth and Main streets.

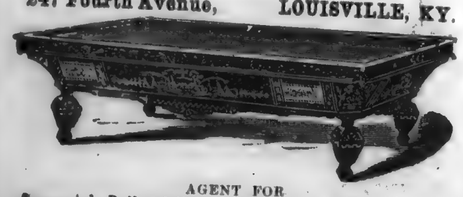
Gas Plumbing and Mill Supplies.

The Ahrens & Ott Manufacturing Co.

Suburban Billiard Parlors,

HENRY HEATH, Prop.

247 Fourth Avenue, LOUISVILLE, KY.



AGENT FOR

Brunswick-Balke-Collender Company's Billiard Tables AND SUPPLIES.

Repairing Tables a Specialty. All Orders promptly attended to. Prices on application.

SEMIQUAVERS.

Music Festivals are to be held next May in Pittsburgh, Indianapolis, Buffalo, Louisville and Salt Lake City, with other points yet to be heard from.

***

Agnes Huntingdon will be here with her opera company in "Paul Jones" on March 5th, 6th and 7th.

***

Lillian Russell broke her contract with Manager Duff because her physician forbade her appearance in tights—so she says.

***

Mardi Gras was celebrated at Covent Garden Theater, London, by a grand fancy dress ball. On February 14th "Elijah" was performed there with Anna Williams, Edward Lloyd and Watkin Mills.

***

Bill Nye is writing a play, which is to be produced at the Union Square Theater.

The Emma Juch Opera Company is meeting with great success in San Francisco. The principal operas produced were "Die Walkure," "Lohengrin" and "Tannhauser."

***

Next to theology I give the place and highest honor to music, for thereby all anger is forgotten, the devil is driven away, unchastity, pride and other blasphemies are expelled.

LUTHER'S Table-Talk.

***

Lillian Russell sat down on Sunday last to an expensive dinner. One of the courses was a brace of golden Chinese pheasants that had won prizes at the Poultry Show and had been presented to her by the Poultry and Pigeon Association. When living they were valued at fifty dollars.

***

Mr. Henschel was offered by cable the conductorship of the Philharmonic Society, New York, in succession to Theodore Thomas. The offer was declined.

Louisville ✣ Music ✣ Festival,

(UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE COMMERCIAL CLUB.)

✣

PROGRAM.

TUESDAY NIGHT, MAY 12th.

GRAND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra and a Celebrated Vocalist.

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON, MAY 13th.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR—LIGHT CLASSICAL MUSIC,

With a Famous Soloist.

WEDNESDAY NIGHT, MAY 13th.

OPEN REHEARSAL OF SELECTED CHORUSES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Grand Festival Chorus.

THURSDAY NIGHT, MAY 14th.

GRAND CLASSICAL NIGHT—WAGNER PROGRAM,

With One or More Great Soloists.

FRIDAY NIGHT, MAY 15th.

FIRST PART.

DVORAK'S "STABAT MATER,"

With Quartet of Soloists, Boston Symphony Orchestra and Festival Chorus.

SECOND PART.

CLASSICAL PROGRAM.

SATURDAY NIGHT, MAY 16th.

MENDELSSOHN'S ELIJAH.

Double Quartet of Soloists, Boston Symphony Orchestra and Grand Festival Chorus.

COR. SIXTH, HILL & A, LOUISVILLE, KY.

GERNERT BROS., & KOEHLER CO.,

Wholesale and Retail

Lumber, Sash, Doors and Blinds,

Turned and Scroll Work of all kinds.

SEND FOR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE.

— THE —

Central Thomson-Houston Co.,

No. 603 COMMERCE BUILDING.

The best Electric Machinery for Lighting, Railroads and Mines. Used everywhere. Write for Circulars.

HOTEL

RASSINIER,

Octave Rassinier,

PROPRIETOR.

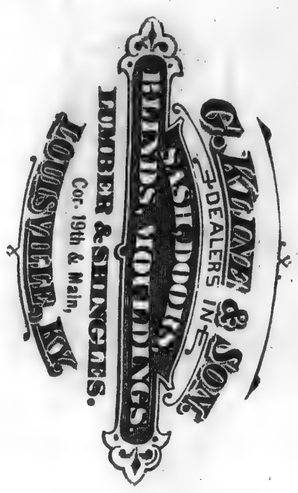
(EUROPEAN PLAN)

415-417 West Market St.,

LOUISVILLE, KY.

New and Complete in all its Appointments.

First-Class Restaurant for Ladies and Gentlemen.



VICTOR BICYCLES.

JEFFERIS BROS.,

620 Third Ave., LOUISVILLE, KY.

First-class Repair Shop connected with Store.

MRS. L. RICHARDSON,

SUCCESSOR TO

— MISS GARRITY, —

FOURTH & MARKET STREETS,

PHOTOGRAPHER.

SATISFACTION GUARANTEED.

QUEEN AND CRESCENT ROUTE.

LOUISVILLE SOUTHRN R. R.

SHORTEST AND QUICKEST LINE

— TO —

CHATTANOOGA, KNOXVILLE, ATLANTA, ROME, MACON, BRUNSWICK, JACKSONVILLE, NEW ORLEANS

And all points South and South-east.

PULLMAN × PALACE × CARS,

ELEGANT DAY COACHES.

Trains arrive at and depart from Union Depot, Seventh and River, Louisville.

Round-trip winter tourist tickets now on sale to all points in Florida, Louisiana, Texas and Mexico at very low rates. Good to return until June 1, 1891.

City Ticket Office, 216 Fourth Ave., Louisville.

For lowest rates, Time Tables, Maps and all desired information, address

C. H. WOODWELL,

DISTRICT PASS. AGT.,

216 Fourth Ave., Louisville, Ky.

THE FESTIVAL CHORUS.

SOPRANOS.

Adkins, Mrs. Lucien
Allen, Miss Marian V.

Baldwin, Mrs. J. S.
Booker, Miss Callie
Ball, Miss Bessie E.
Blakemore, Miss Jennie B.
Bradshaw, Miss Kate
Bristol, Miss Lucy
Button, Mrs. P. F.

Carr, Miss Anna E.
Chatterson, Mrs. J. M.
Clary, Miss Bertha E.
Costigan, Mrs. K. C.
Cottell, Mrs. H. A.
Culter, Mrs. J. H.

Darrow, Miss Effie
Duvall, Miss Mary E.
Dreismann, Miss Tillie

Edinger, Miss Nettie
Elliott, Miss Katie
Elliott, Miss Lila

Fallow, Miss Margaret
Ferrier, Miss M.
Field, Miss Fannie P.

Gage, Mrs. H. C.
Galt, Miss Urith
Gorman, Miss Maggie

Henderson, Miss Hattie
Hermany, Miss Madeline
Herndon, Mrs. E. C.
Hurst, Miss Fannie
Hutcheson, Miss Mary E.
Horn, Miss Katie
Huber, Miss Mattie C.

Kahlert, Miss Leo.
Kerr, Mrs. Geo.
Kline, Miss Blanche
Kohlhepp, Miss Emma Kohnhorst, Miss Clara
Kohnhorst, Mrs. Louis
Kuebler, Mrs. David
Kumler, Miss Sarah
Kurkamp, Miss Kate
Kurkamp, Miss Rose

Lawrence, Miss Julia
Latimer, Mrs. E. M.

McKee, Miss Eugenie
McPherson, Mrs. Clara
Mitchell, Miss Mary
Mitchell, Miss Jeane P.
Morris, Miss Mary
Mosier, Miss Carrie
Myers, Miss Birdie
Nall, Mrs. I. B.

Perry, Mrs. Angela
Perry, Miss Rose
Pulliam, Miss Sallie

Ramsey, Mrs. W. R.
Randolph, Miss Lilly W.
Reinecke, Miss Helen
Revenaugh, Miss
Riegger, Mrs. Constantine
Rogers, Miss Kate

Sachs, Miss Alice
Sanders, Miss Josie
Schack, Miss Bertha
Seiler, Mrs. Frank P.
Shelley, Miss Kate
Sieber, Mrs.
Simons, Mrs. Joseph
Speidel, Mrs. Edward
Stein, Mrs. Theo.
Steinberg, Miss Cora L.
Stout, Miss Anna S.
Strobel, Miss Katie M.

Timberlake, Miss Cornelia
Troxler, Mrs. Henry

Von Beust, Miss Helene

Webb, Mrs. C. K.
Williams, Mrs. Susie M.
Wischmeyer, Mrs. Henry

Young, Miss Rose

CONTRALTOS.

Baird, Mrs. J. B.
Barker, Mrs. Geo. M.
Barnes, Mrs. E. A.
Bell, Mrs. E. A.
Bell, Mrs. Margaret W.
Boone, Mrs. Carry
Brown, Mrs. J. L.

Carr, Mrs. Carroll
Chambers, Miss Annie E.
Connor, Miss Julia
Corinth, Mrs. Anna B.
Couper, Mrs. W. C.
Craik, Mrs. C. E.
Creed, Mrs. Walter
Curtius, Miss Lilly A.
Cowling, Miss Mittie

Day, Miss Jennie
Dewhurst, Mrs. E. C.
Dreismann, Miss Lulie
Drysdale, Miss Nannie

Elliott, Miss Emma

Fontaine, Miss Marie
Ford, Miss Sadie B.

Galt, Miss Nellie
Gault, Miss Maggie
Griffith, Miss Mamie

Hamilton, Mrs. C. L.
Hathaway, Mrs. C. T.
Hedden, Mrs. W. A.
Hutcheson, Miss Edith V.

Krieger, Mrs. J. L.

Lee, Miss Florence

Mantle, Mrs. C. H.
Martin, Miss Ida
McPherson, Miss L.
Miller, Miss Bettie
Miller, Miss Eulie
Moore, Miss Susie Gates
Monsch, Miss Anna
Montz, Miss Ella

Otte, Miss Minnie
Overton, Mrs. F. S.

Palmer, Miss Kate
Pilcher, Miss Mamie
Pfeiffer, Miss Alma

Ramsey, Miss Leonore
Read, Miss Carrie
Revenaugh, Miss
Robbins, Miss Lizzie J.

Schack, Miss Carrie
Shackleton Mrs. C. H.
Simpson, Miss Francis C.
Slaughter, Miss Bessie B.
Stark, Mrs. T. H.

Terstegge, Mrs. Henry
Thixton, Miss Marie N.

Van Cleave, Miss Ella

Wood, Miss Lizzie

TENORS.

Allen, A. B. W.

Barr, Thomas
Barfield, David
Barnett, Clarence M.
Baumgart, T. H.
Belling, Henry
Bodenstein, C. L.

Carr, Carroll B.
Corns, Alfred
Couper, W. C
Crossley, Alfred

Decker, Wm. P.
Dickins, John W.
Diffenderfer, G. M.
Dohrmann, H. W.
Dreier, Hugo E.

Earnest, W. C.
Esterle, E. R.

Flynn, John J.

Foree, Erasmus D.
Frank, G. Will Fryer, Robert

Gamble, T. Hoyt
German, O. H.
Gibbons, Lee.

Hamilton, C. L.
Hathaway, C. T.
Heazlitt, H. W.
Henderson, Geo. W.
Hughes, Walter N.
Hummel, F. J.

Jackson, W. H.
Kiger, Chas. R.
Kolb, J. Alton
Koop, W. E.
Kubaugh, Geo. W.

Latimer, E. M.

McConathy, James

Morrison, Ed N.
Pardon, Frank

Pilcher, W. E.
Probst, G.

Ragsdale, J. M.
Row D. I.
Rogers, C. G.

Shackleton, C. H.
Simons, Joseph
Slaughter, T. Grant
Speidel, Edward
Stark, Thomas H.

Unruh, Alfred A.

Wilde. Robert
Worland, G. O.

BASS.

Adams, Dr. J. L.

Beckmann, O. A.
Bradbury, H. R.
Broaddus, A.
Broaddus, Mortimer,
Bueters, Frank,
Bush, F. P.

Chambers, Samuel R.
Chatterson, J. M.
Clarke, W. F.
Cook, F. S.
Coulson, S. B.
Craik, Rev. Chas. E.

Davidson, Dorman B.

Ehrmann, Julius C.
Elliott, E. J.
Elliott, R. J., Jr.

Faure, F. J.
Fink, Chas. P.

Fraser, G. T. R.

Gage, H. C.
Gookins, Geo. B.
Graham, John C.

Hardy, W. B.
Hawes, J. D.
Heazlitt, T. H.
Hibbitt, Robert F.

King, Pat.
Kimmel Chas. A.

Lane, D. W.
Lane, T. C.
Lemon, Brainard
Little, W. N.

McGill, Jas. A.
Miles, A. D.
Morris, Jas. Craik
Moss, Jno.

Otte, W. Paul
Ouerbacker, John

Perry, James

Ramsey, W. R.
Ramsey, J. H.
Riegger, Constantine

Schlicht, Peter J.
Seiler, Frank P.
Stein, Herman

Thompson, A. W.
Tileston, Dr. H. B.
Tippitt, Chas. B.

Von Beust, T.

Webb, Douglas,
Wharton, Roy
Williams, L. A.
Wilde, James

INDUSTRIAL INSURANCE.

The Sun Life Insurance Company
OF AMERICA.

HOME OFFICE, No. 502 W. MAIN STREET, LOUISVILLE, KY.

Branch Offices: 580 Fourth Avenue, Louisville; Covington, Newport, Lexington, Henderson, Frankfort, Owensboro, Nashville, Knoxville, Memphis. Others being constantly opened. Agents wanted.

OFFICERS:

ALBERT S. WILLIS, President. M. W. ADAMS, Vice-President. GEO. H. LAKE, Secretary.

TELEPHONE 1093—2.
T. C. CAUMMISAR,
HEADQUARTERS FOR BROOMS
AND BROOM MAKERS' SUPPLIES,
No. 168 FOURTH AVENUE.
EXCELSIOR! For Upholsterers, Mattress and Furniture Manufacturers, Carriage Makers, Undertakers and Packing Purposes.

Grand Performance.

(Under Auspices of American Accident Co., of Louisville, Ky.)

PROGRAM.

GRAND CHORUS.

ENDORSEMENT OF THE COMPANY'S PLANS AND METHODS,
By Ten Thousand Policy Holders.

LOCAL CHORUS.

SONG OF PRAISE,
By Three Thousand Policy Holders in Louisville Alone.

HALLELUJAH.

CHORUS OF 500 CLAIMANTS
Who Have Been Paid Promptly at Sight.

QUARTET.

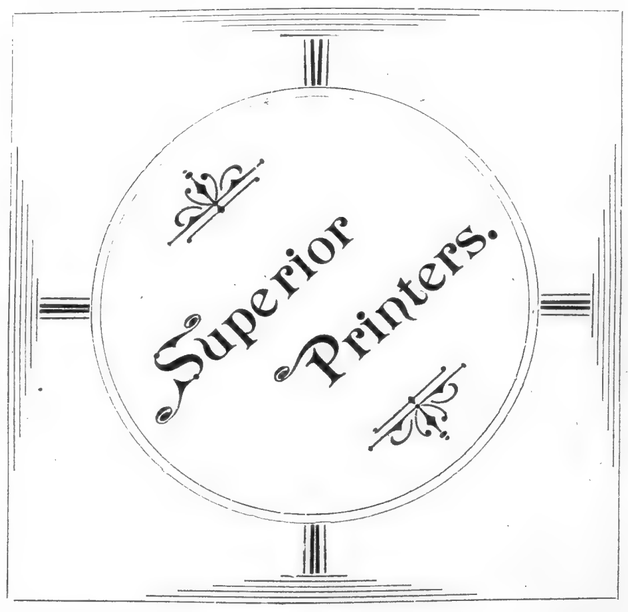
BY MOTHER, WIFE, WIDOW AND FATHER,
To Whom Total Losses Have Been Recently Paid.

LOUISVILLE TRUST CO.,

BACKS THIS ORGANIZATION WITH $100,000.00,
So that no Performer Need Fear Being "Stranded" on the Road, but will be Paid Promptly and Fully.

ROBT. SKENE, JR.,
SECRETARY AND GENERAL MANAGER,
No. 338 West Main Street, Louisville, Ky.

GEO. G. FETTER PRINTING CO.,
LOUISVILLE.



GEO. G. FETTER PRINTING CO., LOUISVILLE.
GEO. G. FETTER PRINTING CO., LOUISVILLE.
GEO. G. FETTER PRINTING CO., LOUISVILLE.

[108]

Columbia Finance and Trust Co.,

FIFTH AND MAIN STREETS, LOUISVILLE, KY.

Executors, Administrators, Trustees, Guardians, Receivers, Assignees and Financial Agents.

E. T. HALSEY, President. R. J. MENEFEE, Vice-President. W. W. HILL, Secretary.

NIKISCH IN BALTIMORE.

Of a performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Baltimore recently the News of that city made mention as follows:

"The magnificent work of the orchestra and the leader's perfect control of it was shown principally in the first number, the Beethoven symphony, which was performed with skill and precision through all its four movements. In the allegro the ideas of the composer were enthusiastically interpreted, and the peculiarities of the work fully displayed. The solemnity of the adagio would not have been more intense nor could the vivacity of the scherzo have had greater brilliancy. The concluding movement was finished to a degree of musical perfection rarely heard. Mr. Nikisch had reason to feel proud of the work of himself and his fellow-musicians when he turned, bowing, to acknowledge the applause which followed.

***

PATTI CHECKMATED

Patti has met her match at last, says the Mirror. The indomitable Mapleson was a mere fly on the wheel of her chariot; the stern-visaged Abbey always spoke to her in the softest whispers; when the autocratic Gye had a request to make he approached her on trembling knees.

But the haughty prima donna barked up the wrong tree, so to speak, when she hurled defiance at the Russian Government a few days ago.

Patti was booked to sing in St. Petersburg at the Royal Opera House. Arrived at Berlin she sent word to the Czar's capital that she would not fulfill her engagement unless the money for it was deposited with her banker in advance.

The answer to this was prompt and characteristically Russian. It came in the form of an order for the prima donna's arrest. To obtain her freedom she was obliged to give bail.

From this occurrence it is evident that an operatic bird who can sing, but won't sing, will be made to sing in St. Petersburg. Moral: Send recalcitrant prima donne to Russia.

There will be nine days of splendid racing at the Louisville Jockey Club, beginning with Kentucky's famous Derby on May 14th.

BOOK OF PROGRAMS.

We shall publish, in a short time, a book of descriptive programs giving a critical analysis of the larger works to be performed and shorter items of interest relating to all the other numbers. We would advise that persons who expect to attend the Festival should purchase the program book early and make themselves familiar with the works before they reach the concert hall. The books will be placed on sale at the music and book stores and at the hall during the Festival.

To the pianist and music lovers is extended a most cordial invitation to hear and play on the FINEST BABY GRAND PIANO ever placed on sale in this part of the country.

This piano is one that affords genuine pleasure both for the player and listener as it combines ALL of the requisites in a piano, full power, brilliancy, sympathetic tones, carrying quality, and an action that is simply perfect.

This instrument is offered to the public by Emil Wulschner, 632, Fourth avenue, who represents this renowned piano which has attained an unpurchased pre-eminence that establishes it as the leading piano of the world in reputation and genuine worth. 1t.

A WRECKED LIFE.

"My young life is wrecked," said Will A. McConnell, manager of the Fakir Company. "It all comes from having two contraltos in the company. You remember my telling you about having a double-headed company, two sopranos, two soubrettes, two actresses? It all worked well until I engaged two contraltos. That settled it. Then came the songs to select, and their places on the programme, to say nothing about dressing-rooms, etc. Say, I'd like to find Professor Darling and get that steel cage that he exhibited the lions in, and then I think we'd have harmony in the company."

Vladimir de Pachmann, who comes here under the auspices of Messrs. Smith & Nixon, the enterprising piano dealers, will give his concert at Macauley's Theatre, Monday afternoon, March 16th. Pachmann is now acknowledged the greatest living pianist. As this is his last concert, no musician will lose this opportunity of hearing him. Messrs. Smith & Nixon deserve the patronage of the musical community for taking the responsibility and shouldering the expense of these great concerts, otherwise fewer of the fine artists would come here. During the past three years the following artists have appeared under Messrs. Smith & Nixon's auspices: Mrs. Corinne Moore-Lawson, Teresa Carreno. William A. Sherwood, Edward Baxter Perry, Henry Schradick, George Magrath, Dr. Louis Maas, Miss Neally Stevens, Madame Rive-King, Signor A. Gorno, Andreas & Doerner, and Vladimir de Pachmann. 1t.

NEW YORK LIFE,

ORGANIZED 1845

KENTUCKY BRANCH OFFICE.

Fourth Floor, THE COMMERCE.

SMITH & NIXON

HIGH-GRADE

PIANOS.

THE LEADING DEALERS OF LOUISVILLE.

Largest Variety,
Finest Quality,
Lowest Price.

RENOWNED

CHICKERING,

KURTZMANN,

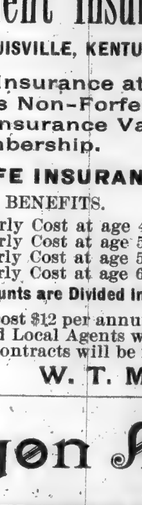
And other Favorite Instruments.

SMITH & NIXON,

622 & 624 FOURTH AVENUE.

M. Sid Platt Co.

MAKE TO ORDER THE "APOLLO YOKE" SHIRT



A FULL LINE OF MEN'S FURNISHINGS.

LATEST AND BEST.

FOURTH AND MAIN.

THE

Hegan Wall Paper Co.

Have a large selection of the newest and most artistic designs in —: WALL PAPER. :—

We invite you to call and examine these whether you contemplate purchasing or not. We are sole agents for M. H. Birge & Sons, and Thos. Strahan & Co.'s SPECIAL DESIGNS.

Pictures and Picture Frames.

JAS. H. BASSETT, JR.
GEO. E. SNYDER.
D. W. LANE.

HON. W. B. HOKE Prest. GEO. W. GRIFFITHS, M.D., Medical Supt. W. H. MCKINLEY, Sec'y. W. T. MCCARLEY, Supt.

The Kentucky Life and Accident Insurance Company,

436 W. JEFFERSON STREET, LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY.

This Company offers Life and Accident Insurance at One-Half the Rates Charged by stock companies. Policies Non-Forfeitable, and Have a Cash Surrender or Paid-Up Insurance Value after Five Years' Membership.

COST PER $1,000 FOR LIFE INSURANCE,

WITHOUT ACCIDENT BENEFITS.

Yearly Cost at age 25	$13 98	Yearly Cost at age 45	$19 86
Yearly Cost at age 30	14 82	Yearly Cost at age 50	24 84
Yearly Cost at age 35	15 96	Yearly Cost at age 55	32 46
Yearly Cost at age 40	17 40	Yearly Cost at age 60	44 00

Other Ages at Proportionate Rates. The above Amounts are Divided into Bi-Monthly Payments.

Accident Policies, $1,000 to $5,000. Preferred Occupations cost $12 per annum. More Hazardous occupations cost from $12 to $16 per annum. General and Local Agents wanted everywhere to represent the company, with whom liberal contracts will be made. Address

W. T. McCARLEY, Supt.

Kentucky Wagon Mfg. Co.

MANUFACTURERS

WORKS AT SOUTH LOUISVILLE.

CAPACITY, 35,000 WAGONS ANNUALLY.

"Old Hickory" and "Tennessee"

FARM AND FREIGHT WAGONS.

LOUISVILLE, - KENTUCKY.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 9, 1891.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the eighteenth Symphony concert given at Music Hall last Saturday evening was as follows:

Prelude, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Symphony No. 3, in D major op. 37.....Klughardt
(First time in the United States.)
Two movements from concerto for violoncello, in D minor, op. 82.....Reinecke
(First time in Boston.)
Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven

The symphony played was by a man comparatively unknown in this country, and the work was not the less welcome on that account. It is not a great symphony, and Klughardt is not a Mozart or a Beethoven, or even a Mendelssohn; but it is a good thing to hear modern compositions, that we may either desire a closer acquaintance with them or refuse our friendship. There are some excellent people who wish that only a few and world-approved names appear upon these programmes, and they reproachfully shake their heads when the symphony is not one of the nine, and the overture is not familiar. Music, however, is not confined to any one period or any one country. To thoroughly enjoy the best in music it is necessary to hear much; the ancient and the modern, the grave and the light. The programmes of our symphony concerts have too frequently shown an illiberal, if not a bigoted, spirit; and the catholicity lately displayed should be encouraged and not censured. Surely no one can accuse Moritz Hauptmann, the famous theorist, of looseness of musical morals. The old Cantor in Leipzig was the severest of the severe. Yet, shortly before his death, he wrote the following golden words concerning the narrowness and triteness of the Gewandhaus programmes: "The 'Eroica,' 'Calm Sea and Happy Voyage,' the E flat major Concerto, these are all most excellent pieces, but entirely too familiar; one knows every note, every little note, beforehand. I should often like to hear something else as yet unknown, whether it be of the past or present. Not that I wish to turn my back upon loved and tried friends, but I desire the acquaintance of other people. Nor should highest peaks exist without valleys and hills. And it were also a good thing for the public not to be obliged to constantly hear familiar pieces, for people bury themselves in gloomy admiration without any attempt at discrimination; and anything new inconveniences them, for they do not know exactly what they ought to say. We do not need to hear all the Beethoven symphonies every winter; in truth that is too much of a good thing. Where only the best is given, there will soon be no best. Each day can not be Sunday."

August Klughardt was born at Coethen in 1847 and is now kapellmeister at Dessau. In the course of his life he spent four years at Weimar, and his intercourse with Liszt is said to have influenced his style. This influence, however, is not felt in the symphony played Saturday. He has written three operas; three symphonies, "The Forest," "Lenore" and the one in D; overtures, chamber music and songs. This symphony in D is neither a very original or remarkable composition, and only the first movement rises to symphonic dignity; still it is melodious and pleasing music, with fresh themes clearly expressed, and developments in which knowledge is gracefully displayed, not rudely thrust upon the attention. The first movement is by far the strongest; the themes are interesting and well contrasted; there are abundant evidences of technical skill, and the whole movement is, in fact, admirably written. The largo is vague; it makes no decided impression. But it soothes, and it is free from the odium "intellectuality" which nowadays so often passes for genuine musical thought. The scherzo runs over with melody, and its lightness is akin to triviality. The finale is made up of "rapid fiddling" and suggestions of the operatic. The symphony is scored discreetly and often ingeniously. The brass is reduced to two horns and the trumpets—a rare thing in modern compositions of this class—and the fortissimos are never blatant. Klughardt has not striven here to produce great effects, or paint in musical colors natural scenery, or express assorted emotions: he has contented himself with writing music, and he has even been guilty of inventing a tune or two.

Mr. Leo Schulz played two movements of Reinecke's concerto in D minor for the 'cello; he chose the first and second, and played them in inverted order. It is generally believed in Leipzig that Reinecke is a musician of rare parts. At his best, his music is only a faint echo of Mendelssohn's, and at his worst it is respectable and dull. He is said to be a man of great amiability. It is probable, then, that whenever he is inclined to moroseness, or, like John Ford, gets "deep in a dump," he vents his spleen by writing pieces for the 'cello. His concerto is a depressing thing, "tiring the most consummate patience with a tedious exposition of some jejune thought." Mr. Schulz displayed a small, pinched tone and considerable technical skill. His intonation was not faultless, especially in the dreary cadenza. While his phrasing was musician-like, his performance of the stern task was not free from hardness and angularity. He was warmly applauded and twice recalled.

The playing of the orchestra in the Symphony was generally excellent, but there was much to be desired in the performance of the prelude to "Lohengrin." The quality of the tone was often coarse where it should have been most delicate, and the tone itself, in strings and wind, was at times impure. Yet such is the great beauty of the music that, as ever, it called forth genuine and long-continued applause. Nor was the "Egmont" overture so well played as upon former occasions. The rhythm and rhetorical accentuation were often slighted, and the overture was played in a perfunctory manner. It would have been well had Mr. Nikisch paid more attention to the work as a whole, and not given his undivided care solely to wrenching Beethoven's score in the nine measures just before the coda-section trio for the sake of a cheap effect. The programme of the concert to be given Tuesday evening, March 14, is as follows: Symphonic Prologue to Shakspeare's "Othello," by Arnold Krug; a concerto for piano and orchestra, by Paderewski (first time); a suite for strings and four horns, by Arthur Whiting (first time), and Liszt's Rakoczy March. The soloist is Mrs. Julia Rive King.

PHILIP HALE.

MUSIC NOTES.

The sixth and last of the Kneisel Quartette concerts will be given this evening at Union Hall. The quartette will be assisted by Mrs. [illegible] Weyman and Mrs. Helen Hopekirk. They will play the "Kaiser" quartette in C [illegible] selections from Cherubini and [illegible] Mrs. Weyman will sing an [illegible] by Dressel; and a [illegible] by Mrs. Hopekirk and [illegible]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 9, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT OF SATURDAY EVENING.

A Programme of Some Novelties, But the General Effect of Which Was Dulness—Mr. Leo Schulz, the 'Cello Player, the Soloist—Other Music Notes.

Although the concert of Saturday night contained novelties, it was by no means an exciting affair, and at times positive dulness seemed to reign. The prelude to "Lohengrin" was taken a little too deliberately and the phrases were too uniform, spite of the fortissimo of the final climaxes. The shading of the solo violins in the high passages in harmonics was commendable. These passages, by the way, are typical, for Wagner alone, of all the great masters, does not use the harp for celestial tone-coloring, but violins and woodwind in prolonged notes, in the highest positions. Schumann, Berlioz, Saint-Saens, in fact all the modern tone-colorists who have given celestial pictures, use the harp in them, purely because of the association of ideas which comes to us from the Scriptures, and this very association of the harp with heaven and the angels, only came about because the instrument was the most developed possessed by man at the time that the sacred book was written. Wagner's tone-coloring is intrinsically the more ecstatic, and one cannot but agree with the sarcasm of Theophile Gautier, that a "harp concert lasting 10,000 years must end by becoming tiresome." Wagner is the first who has broken through this harp conventionality.

Then came a new symphony by Klughardt. A German might sum up the work as "Klug und hart!" It is learned but cold, and leaves one entirely unmoved. There is much American music more worthy of performance in these concerts, and certainly either of Paine's symphonies is better than this work. It would be unjust to deny that the modest scoring is a step in the right direction, and that the symmetrical form of the first movement is not to be contemned. But in this first movement the themes are not attractive although melodic, and the last movement seems almost a light opera salad. One asks unconsciously the question of the old French critic — "What does this symphony want with me?" The melodic idea is not carried out in the manner of Haydn or Mozart, and the melody which begins the third movement is rather of a "Trompeter von Sakkingen" type than a true theme for sonata form. Later on this movement degenerates into a mere scene de ballet. There are bold modulations in the finale, and some ingenious turns of treatment, so that one is afraid to pass a resolute judgment on the work as a whole, but the impression left is, that while one obtains occasional glimpses of the lion's skin, one is not absolutely sure that there is a lion under it. The performance of the work was good. Reinecke's violoncello concerto in D minor followed, at least two movements of it, and these two were given in reversed order, I believe. This was unjust to the composer, and it was still more unjust to the soloist, Mr. Leo Schulz, to place these movements after the symphony. The allegro was the most characteristic movement, and it presented some touches of the Slavonic style in progressions of augmented seconds in its melody. The cadenza was far too long. Mr. Schulz played with refinement, generally pure intonation, and even in the most difficult skipping passages, in phrases where bowing and pizzicato were simultaneously employed, and in double-stopping, he was always secure; but his harmonics broke a couple of times and his tone was rather too light, although this wore away towards the end of the movement. One can, however, always praise the sympathetic style of this artist. He received two recalls.

The concert ended with the "Egmont Overture." The work seemed exaggerated in the reading, the pauses were pushed to a theatrical length, but the final passages were overwhelmingly successful, and freedom shrieked (without any falling Kosciusko) on the piccolo, in a manner that was stirring enough, and the concert ended at 9:30.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 9, 1891.

The Symphony Concert.

Late comers at the Symphony Concert Saturday night missed a performance of the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," which was one of the finest bits of playing given by Mr. Nikisch's orchestra this season. Even the most confirmed anti-Wagnerite could not but be roused to enthusiasm by such a rendition. From the opening to the close of the prelude the ensemble was perfect. It was such work as can only be done by this orchestra, but which, we regret to say, is not always done. The organization was in excellent form all through the evening. Perhaps its members had received new inspiration from their recention in New York and the other cities which have been visited during the previous two weeks. With such playing no one would object if Wagner was represented on the programme every evening. New interest was given to this magnificent prelude, and the concert closed with a performance of Beethoven's matchless overture "Egmont," a hearing of which, it is said, inspired Wagner himself to devote himself to music. Here, as in the Wagner prelude, the orchestra brought out all the effects possible. Mr. Nikisch's readings were clear and conservative, and these two numbers were a delightful opening and close of an excellent programme. The author of the symphony proper, which was given as the second selection, was a new name to the Symphony auditors—August Klughardt, a German who is Hof-Kapellmeister at Dessau. The work given had its first performance at the Leipsic Gewundhaus, and as a composer his work is well known in Germany. It was an instructive and entertaining performance. The author has never sacrificed melody in its composition, the first and last movements are exceedingly bright—the development is easily followed at the same time showing rare musical gifts, and there are some beautiful passages in the largo. The introduction of such compositions as this will be gladly welcomed, and the audience followed each movement with pleasure. Leo Schulz was the soloist, giving two movements from Reinecke's concerto in D minor for the 'cello. Mr. Schulz has given evidence in solo playing, outside of the Symphony concerts, of his ability and musical instincts. The number is a selection in which the 'cello takes the lead throughout, and in the allegro calls for remarkable technique and no ordinary skill. Mr. Schulz met all the difficulties readily. His tone was clear and pure, and the hearty applause which he received was every bit deserved. Mr. Nikisch was given almost an ovation at the close of the Wagner prelude, and it was one of the most enjoyable programmes in its entirety that the director has prepared this season. For the next concert, Mrs. Julia Rive-King is to be the soloist, and she will play a concerto for piano and orchestra by the famous Paderenski. A suite for strings and four horns, by Arthur Whiting, will also receive its initial performance at that time.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 8.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concerts.

